Both of the Mississippi district courts seem to have ample time to hear all the motions that may be presented by the state attorneys and to require fuller statements from both sides. Their rulings on evidence have also created problems for the Justice Department. In an attempt to prove a pattern of discrimination, the department has tried to bring in Negro witnesses who during a ten-year period have tried without success to register. The courts, however, limit the government to witnesses who tried during the time when the present registrar has been in office, often no more than a two-year period. Instead of forty to fifty witnesses, the government is allowed only the handful who have applied in that short period. In the toughest counties, the futility of trying to register has kept their yearly numbers down. Having limited the evidence to these few witnesses, the court is then unable to discover a "pattern" of discrimination, and the Justice Department's case is called "superficial at best."

But while the courts in Mississippi spin out the judicial processes, the Justice Department moves fast where it can. Take the case of John Hardy, a Negro student civil-rights worker. The year before last, Hardy was smashed in the head by a pistol butt wielded by the registrar of Walthall County when the student brought two Negroes in to register. Hardy was immediately charged with disturbing the peace and his case was promptly set for trial. The department sought an injunction against the trial but got an adverse ruling from Judge Cox the day before the trial was to begin. The department's attorney, John Doar, flew the same day to Montgomery, Alabama, to present the government's suit before Judge Richard T. Rives of the Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Rives indicated that he would issue a stay, and the state thereupon agreed to put off Hardy's prosecution. Meanwhile, the government filed two suits against the registrar, one for intimidation and another for failing to register any of the Negroes in his county. (The trial date had to be postponed because the registrar's jaw was broken in a fight.) In Walthall County, at any rate, registrars have stopped beating student workers with their guns. But Negroes have also stopped trying to register.

The Student Workers

Student workers like John Hardy are presently conducting the Negro voting drive in Mississippi under the field direction of Robert Moses, a twenty-seven-year-old Negro with an M.A. in philosophy from Harvard. Moses is a member of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC, pronounced Snick), and his co-workers are either from SNCC or CORE (Congress for Racial Equality), the NAACP or the National Urban League, or Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. For some time these Negro groups had separately been conducting voter-registration drives in the South along with sit-ins and Freedom Rides, but things were changed last spring when a Southwide Voter Education Project was formed under the auspices of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, and some $450,000 was received in grants from the Taconic Foundation, the Edgar Stern Family Fund of New Orleans, and the Marshall Field Foundation of Chicago. Among the Southern states, Mississippi was considered unique. "Because of the extreme resistance, harassment, and intimidation in Mississippi," said Wiley A. Branton, director of the project, "we have launched an entirely different program there." In Mississippi, the workers from various Negro organizations joined together in a new Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) to pool their efforts to get out the Negro vote, and workers for the council limit their activities strictly to registration drives.

Occasionally Robert Moses breaks into a quick grin, but usually his manner is grave and quiet. His job often requires him to urge much older people with family responsibilities to risk the little they have for the mere sake of registering, often unsuccessfully. He has been arrested several times and has spent some forty-five days in Mississippi jails. His latest offense was passing out leaflets to Negroes in front of the Indianola courthouse. Almost a year to the day earlier, he was beaten by a relative of the county sheriff when he accompanied two Negroes who attempted to register in Amite County. Nine stitches had to be taken in his head, and although the suit he brought against his assailant was unsuccessful, Moses feels that the publicity he got for being the first Negro to bring charges against a white man in Amite County has gained him "some kind of immunity" there. (On another visit there he wasn't beaten, but his traveling companion was.)

Moses has concentrated his efforts on the hard-core areas of the Mississippi Delta, counties where the Negroes outnumber the whites and their registered voters are few. In Amite County, for instance, only one Negro is registered. In Senator Eastland's Sunflower County, where the Negroes outnumber the whites three to one, only 1.2 per cent of the Negroes are registered. In thirteen counties the number of Negroes registered is zero, and in twenty others the percentage is .003. These are the areas where resistance to Negro voting will be the most determined.

Some Questions of Tactics

W. C. Patton, the NAACP field secretary from Memphis who has long been working to secure Negro voting rights, recently commented: "In all my years of voter campaigning no one in my group has been arrested. When they bring in sit-ins and freedom rides and someone is arrested, my campaign is shot. That's it." In the hard-core areas, he told me, "We should go in for a test case, and then pull out and go where we can get people on the books and registered." Though the students working under COFO do not conduct sit-ins or freedom rides, Patton notes that $5,000 was recently spent for legal fees following harassment of voter workers in Mississippi's Fourth Congressional District, but only eighty-three Negroes were registered.

The best defense of Robert Moses' operations in the hard-core area was given by government attorney John Doar. "He has to go where it's tough," Doar said, "to prove that he has courage." Courage, it seems, can be as contagious as fear. Recently, nineteen Ruleville Negroes tried again to register and four were successful. "They're really determined to see this through," Moses explained.

"I hope they don't get discouraged," Doar said of the student workers. "I hope they stick it out and keep working. After all, they're only trying to urge people to register." However, he noted sadly, it is "very difficult" to do anything about retaliation when it begins. "I can't keep a crime from being committed," he said. "We try the very best we can to eliminate the lawlessness by seeking injunctions and restraining various forms of economic retaliation. But it is very difficult to win. We have to prepare and check out those cases very carefully."

In John Hardy's case, for instance, the registrar had admitted hitting the student. "Justice really moved fast on that one," Moses told me with a grin, but added, "I suppose it was because the case was so clear-cut." In cases where the issue is not so clear-cut, it seems to the student workers (who are often the first to bear the brunt of ugly reprisals) that the department is unwilling to act unless it is sure of winning. The same complaint has been lodged against the NAACP.

Economic reprisals against the would-be voters are especially difficult to prove. The Ruleville sharecroppers who lost their jobs, for instance, must prove that it was because they tried to register, not because the crop was thin last year. A temporary injunction has been obtained by the Justice Department against mass evictions of sharecroppers in Tennessee, but such injunctions can restrain only so long. If the sharecroppers' leases run out or legitimate-sounding reasons for eviction turn up, it is useless. The Justice Department's main aim is to help the Negro get the vote, and where injunctions prove ineffective as well as difficult to obtain, it may concentrate its efforts elsewhere. For instance, it is understood that the department will bring a suit to secure Robert Moses the freedom to distribute voting literature without harassment, and this will help the Negroes' voting drive. This concentration of action sometimes looks like inaction or, as the student workers put it, "politics." Washington views it as a matter of tactics.

Robert Moses has seen too much in his two years to take a patient view. With seven others, he has just brought suit against Robert Kennedy and J. Edgar Hoover to require them to send Federal marshals to the courthouses to protect Negroes when notified of a registration attempt. The Justice Department had refused on the basis that it can't act as a police force for the entire state.

ON THE OTHER HAND, the first Negro candidate to run for office in Mississippi since Reconstruction, the Reverend R. L. T. Smith, who ran for Congress last year, is really "heartened" by the department's work and most understanding about the difficulties it faces. "The Justice Department has moved in what appears to be a slow fashion," he said recently, "but the 1960 Civil Rights Act is not fully established in the courts. However, they are getting the precedents established, and under somewhat trying conditions."

The story of Smith's candidacy has some interesting facets. When he announced his availability in November, 1961, it was treated by Negroes and whites alike as a grand joke. The president of one TV station in Jackson, WJTV, was eager in December to sell Smith program time for six appearances, but the candidate could afford only three appearances on a pay-as-you-go plan. After the first program, however, the station canceled the whole thing.

When Smith turned to the other TV station in Jackson, WLBT, it responded with a flat refusal to sell him any time at all. The first station, when appealed to again, explained that it had suffered so much intimidation since Smith's one appearance that it could consider his application only after he had appeared on the competing station. Smith reported his predicament to the FCC, and then accepted an invitation to speak at Brandeis University.

After his Eastern visit, Mrs. Roosevelt and James Wechsler, among others, wrote letters of protest to FCC Chairman Newton Minow. Smith also wrote to President Kennedy and got a quick reply from the President's office saying that the matter was being investigated. Within the week he received the letter, the second station notified him that it would sell him prime time, and an appointment was made with Fred L. Beard, its general manager.

It was an unusual interview. Beard confessed that he was afraid that if Reverend Smith made his appearance, "they" would blow up the station, topple the broadcasting tower, and shatter the plate-glass windows. He confided that if the Negro candidate was seen on the screen, "our two bodies will be found floating in the Pearl River," a peaceful stream just across the street from the station. He was kind enough to take the minister outside and point out where the barbed-wire fence would have to be erected, how the windows would be boarded up, and where on the roof he would have to station fifty armed guards. When they went back inside, Smith said he was ready to sign the contract. Nothing happened during or after his appearance, and he eventually was given one more showing on each of the two stations.

Though Smith did not win a seat in Congress and though Negro registration did not pick up significantly because of his campaign, he did win the right to run, the right to be accepted as a Democratic candidate in the counties and in the precincts, and the right to appear on television during his campaign.

The President's position is clear. After the shooting spree in Ruleville, he said: "I hope everybody will register in this country. . . . I commend those who are making the effort to register every citizen. They deserve the protection of the United States Government, the protection of the states, the protection of the local communities . . . And if it requires extra legislation, and extra force, we shall do that."

The Results

What have been the results of all the government's cases? "We have moved from no Negro registration to token registration," Attorney Doar pointed out. None of the cases has yet been won outright; some are on appeal and others have not been given a hearing so far. But in the counties where suits have been brought, the most obvious and blatant discrimination against Negro voters has ceased. Schoolteachers with Ph.D.'s, for instance, have recently been found qualified to pass the registration tests. And the department has, in effect, won one case though it is still pending. A temporary injunction against a registrar was obtained from the Court of Appeals before the case was decided in the district court. "We really bulled through on that one," John Doar recalled happily. The registrar is now in contempt, while the district court has yet to settle down for its long litigation over the issues involved. Furthermore, according to Aaron Henry, the head of the Mississippi COFO operation, if the Justice Department wins its omnibus case against the state and its voting laws it "will be a real breakthrough." The case is expected to open this month.

In the other pending cases, the department may win decisions finding a pattern of discrimination in the counties involved. The department will then, Doar told me, "in effect supervise voter registration there after that."

In Macon County, Alabama, for instance, where only nine Negroes had been able to register in a two-and-a-half year period, the department won such a case in 1961 with "dramatic" results. The decision had included a specific order to the registrars to report monthly on how many applied for registration, how many passed, how many were turned down, and for what reasons. In addition, the department had won the right of continuing record inspection. For three months after the court order, Negroes were allowed to correct inconsequential errors on their registration forms and applicants were processed at the rate of forty-four a day. As the shock of the court order began to wear off, however, another and more specific court order had to be issued to bring the registrars in line. The supervision of Mississippi registrars, obviously, will be a full-time job in itself.

Doar uses Macon County, where more than 2,800 Negroes are now registered, as an example of what lies ahead for Mississippi. "Every month now," he told me, "reports come across my desk from the registrar there, giving all the figures. We can check the reports by inspecting the records and if anything looks wrong send a man right to the spot."

Down the hall from Doar's office in the Department of Justice is a three-room section containing several machines that project microfilm onto screens for easy reading. Some fifteen members of the staff, including several Negroes, analyze and abstract the thousands upon thousands of Southern registration records that have already been photographed. Mississippi's records are at last beginning to come in.

From the office of Senators Dodd and Cooper

Duff. Gen.

FOR RELEASE MONDAY PM'S

February 4, 1963

Equal Voting Rights Bill

Senator Thomas J. Dodd (D-Conn) and Senator John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky) today introduced a bill to protect the rights of all persons seeking to vote in any Federal election. Their new voting rights bill, they said, "raises no constitutional issue, and can be enacted."

The purpose of the Dodd-Cooper bill is to provide a statutory method for enforcing the constitutional requirement that State standards for voting shall be applied equally to all individuals.

The bill requires a verbatim transcript to be made of all oral "literacy tests"--such as interpreting provisions of the State Constitution. This certified written record of the questions and answers given will permit the decision of local registrars to be reviewed or appealed, Senators Dodd and Cooper pointed out, and is a logical way to assure equal application of oral tests.

In addition, the Dodd-Cooper bill rules out disqualifying a voter for registration "errors" which have little or nothing to do with the person's eligibility to vote.

The Administration's literacy test bill foundered last year and failed to come to a vote in the Senate, the two Senators pointed out, because it could be attacked on constitutional grounds.

"Our bill respects the constitutional right of the States to establish voter qualifications," Senators Dodd and Cooper said. "It strikes down no State requirement for voting. It simply requires uniform and proper application of the State requirements, in determining whether or not an individual is qualified under State law to vote in a Federal election. It provides a constitutional and lawful method of preventing unlawful discrimination."

"The right to vote without discrimination on account of race or color is protected by the Constitution," Senator Dodd pointed out. "The 15th Amendment also specifies that Congress has the power, and I believe the duty, to enforce by Federal legislation the right to vote without discrimination."

"There can be no more important objective of the Congress than to enact legislation which will insure the full exercise of suffrage, so that our democracy will be fully effective," Senator Cooper declared.

Both Senators had been working separately on the voting rights problem for several months. During the literacy test debate last summer, Senator Cooper offered a substitute bill requiring that State standards be uniformly applied. Senator Dodd then developed a bill to regulate oral literacy tests and to rule out grammatical and clerical errors as disqualifying. Recently, Cooper and Dodd joined forces and combined their ideas. They are inviting other Senators to join in sponsoring the new bill, which they hope will gain wide bi-partisan support.

Although other measures may be proposed, the two Senators said their bill removes constitutional doubts, can be supported, defended, and is in the best position to become law.

- 30 -

Equal Voting Rights
Dodd-Cooper
2-1-63

EXPLANATION OF DODD-COOPER BILL TO SECURE EQUAL VOTING RIGHTS

To protect the rights of an individual seeking to vote in Federal elections, the Cooper-Dodd bill would prohibit:

(1) The use of any "standard, practice or procedure" which is different from that used by the registrar or election official (or other person) in determing whether other individuals are qualified under State law to vote. (The provision applies to literacy tests, registration and voting.)

(2) The use of an error or omission to deny the right to vote--unless the error or omission is material to a requirement for voting established under State law. (The provision applies to the registration application and to any other paper or record required in order to vote.)

(3) Literacy tests unless--

(a) the same practices are followed in administering and grading the tests of all individuals,

(b) the test is given in writing, or the questions and answers are transcribed verbatim, and

(c) upon request, a certified true copy of the questions and answers given is furnished to the individual within 30 days.

The bill is directed to voting in Federal elections--that is, any general, special or primary election in which a candidate for President or the Congress is elected or selected.

The voting-rights enforcement procedures of the 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Acts would be applicable to the provisions of this bill.

JOHN SHERMAN COOPER
KENTUCKY

Aff. Dev. JM LWD WBV SBV

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, D. C.

February 4, 1963

Dear Friend:

Senator Dodd and I introduced a voting rights bill today, and I thought you might like to see my remarks about it. I think you have already received our announcement that we would introduce this bill, together with a summary of its provisions, which I asked my office to send you over the weekend.

Since the bill will not be printed for several days, as it is lying at the desk for co-sponsors, I also enclose a mimeographed copy of the text of the bill.

If, after studying the bill, your or your organization has some comment on it, Senator Dodd and I would, of course, be glad to receive your comments or talk to you about the bill.

Sincerely yours,

John Sherman Cooper

John Sherman Cooper

gjw

88th Congress
1st Session

THE DODD-COOPER EQUAL VOTING RIGHTS BILL

S 666

A bill to further secure and protect the rights of citizens to vote in Federal elections.

Be it enacted in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress finds that:

(a) The right to vote is fundamental to a free and democratic government and it continues to be the responsibility of the Federal Government to secure and protect this right against all discriminatory restrictions.

(b) The right to vote of many persons has been subjected to discriminatory restrictions on account of race or color; different standards and practices have been used extensively as a device for discriminatorily denying the right to vote to otherwise qualified persons; and laws presently in effect are inadquate to assure that all qualified persons shall enjoy this essential right without discrimination on account of race or color.

(c) The enactment of this Act is necessary to make effective the guarantees of the Constitution, particularly those contained in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, by eliminating or preventing discriminatory restrictions on the right to vote which occur through the use of different standards and practices.

Sec. 2. Subsection (a) of section 2004 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (42 U.S.C. 1971), is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(a)" and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(2) No person, whether acting under color of law or otherwise, shall, in determining whether any individual is qualified under State law to vote in any Federal election,apply any standard, practice or procedure which is different from the standards, practices, or procedures applied to any other individual. Nor shall the right of any individual to vote in any Federal election be denied by any person, acting under color of law or otherwise, because of any error or omission in any records or papers required by section 301 of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 to be retained and preserved, if such error or omission is not material in determining whether or not such individual is qualified under State law to vote in such election.

"(3) No person, whether acting under color of law or otherwise, shall impose any literacy test as a qualification for voting in any Federal election, unless, in administering and grading any such test, the standards, practices and procedures used to determine whether any individual is qualified under State law to vote are the same as those used to determine whether any other individual is qualified under State law to vote, and unless--

"(A) such test is administered to each individual in writing, or the questions asked of each individual and answers given by such individual are transcribed verbatim; and

"(B) a certified true copy of the test given to each individual and of the answers given by such individual is, upon written request, furnished to such individual within thirty days after the submission of such request.

"(4) For the purpose of this subsection--

"(A) the terms 'vote' and 'qualified under State law' shall have the same meaning as defined in subsection (e) of this section;

"(B) the term 'Federal election' means any general, special or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of electing or selecting any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate, Member of the House of Representatives, or Resident Commissioner from the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico;

"(C) the term 'literacy test' includes any test of the ability of an individual to read, write, understand or interpret any matter;

"(D) the term 'State' includes the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico."

Equal Voting Rights
Dodd-Cooper
S. 666

REMARKS OF SENATOR JOHN SHERMAN COOPER
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
February 4, 1963

Mr. President: I am glad to join today with the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Dodd) in the introduction of a bill to further secure and protect the voting rights of all citizens. The specific purpose of our bill is to prevent the discriminatory application of State voter qualification tests against citizens because of their race or color.

I subscribe to the eloquent statement of my colleague, Senator Dodd, that "all Americans who believe in the free institutions of this country will affirm the right of every citizen to vote if that citizen meets the same requirements fulfilled by other voters in his State."

Last year the administration proposed, and the Senate considered for a time, a "literacy test" bill. The bill never came to a vote on its merits. Its purpose was laudable, but many of us believed that it was unconstitutional. We believed it to be unconstitutional because it assumed that Congress has the power to fix a qualification for electors--by providing that an applicant to vote who had "completed the sixth primary grade of any public school or accredited private school" should in effect be found to have fulfilled the literacy qualifications prescribed by State law.

I do not want to spend too much time in argument on constitutionality today, but I believe the heart of the argument of opponents of the Administration bill was that Article I, section 2 of the Constitution confers upon the States the power to prescribe qualifications for electors of members of the House of Representatives, and that this power was affirmed with respect to the election of Senators by the 17th amendment to the Constitution. This power of the States has been upheld by the Supreme Court in many cases, to the extent that qualifications prescribed by the State are valid upon their face and are applied equally and fairly to all voter applicants.

Nevertheless, the Congress is not without power to safeguard and require the proper application of voting qualifications prescribed by the States. The 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution specifically state that the Congress can enact--and Senator Dodd and I believe should enact--"appropriate legislation" to insure that State voting qualifications are applied equally and fairly to all citizens, and to prevent such qualifications being used discriminatorily against voters because of their race or color.

Some of the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the reports of the Civil Rights Commission, show that in some States of our nation voter qualifications, commonly called "literacy tests," enacted by the States and valid upon their face, have been discriminatorily applied against Negro voters. It has also been shown that these tests are frequently applied to Negro voters orally by local officials, and that there is no official record of the test which would give the applicant evidence upon which to appeal the decision of State election officials. As my colleague, Senator Dodd, has pointed out, "in 158 counties in 11 States, having a population 50% or more Negro, less than 5% of the Negroes are registered voters."

Our bill attempts to meet these problems in several ways, and by means which I think are constitutional and effective.

Curiously enough, although the Supreme Court of the United States has held on many occasions that voting practices, standards and procedures must be applied equally to all citizens, Congress has never codified these findings into statutory law.

One provision of our bill would codify these holdings of the Supreme Court by providing that all standards, practices and procedures, including tests, shall be applied equally and in the same manner to all applicants who seek voting privileges.

The second provision of our bill, as the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Dodd) has pointed out, is directed to the rather difficult problem of literacy tests--which depend on the decision of an election officer or registrar as to whether or not the applicant understands or comprehends some writing such as the State constitution or the Constitution of the United States. Of course, understanding and explaining a thing requires a subjective determination by an election official and perhaps, in some cases, by election officials who themselves could not meet the same test.

Our bill would require written literacy tests. Or, if an oral test is given, that the questions and answers be transcribed verbatim. This requirement would enable an applicant whose vote had been denied, to have an official record upon which to base an appeal, and would also give to the Federal court a record upon which to base any action.

In this respect, our bill would harmonize with the 1960 Civil Rights Act, because that act requires that all records relating to any application to vote shall be preserved for at least 22 months, and shall be available to the Attorney General and through him to the Federal district court. This provision, therefore, would fill a gap in the Civil Rights Act of 1960.

The third provision of our bill provides that any "error or omission" which is not material to determining whether an applicant is qualified under State law to vote in a Federal election, may not be used by election officials as a reason for denying the right to vote.

To give a simple example, the answer of an applicant as to his marital status, which does not bear upon the right to vote, has been seized upon in some cases by election officials to deny an applicant the right to vote.

I am sure that at some later date we will discuss the bill in more detail, but I should like at this time to join the distinguished Senater from Connecticut (Mr. Dodd) in saying that we are not offering this bill as merely a gesture. Rather, we are offering it in the expectation that it will be considered by the appropriate committee, the Committee on the Judiciary; with the intention of presenting our views before that committee; and with the firm purpose of pressing for a vote in the Senate on the bill.

We believe our bill constitutional. We believe it is lawful. We believe that it would be effective.

I know that some will say,"You are placing upon the States which do not discriminate against voters a heavy burden by requiring that they keep a verbatim transcript of any oral test." I answer by saying that, in a practical way, most of the eligible voters in these States have already been declared qualified to vote, and that the provision requiring tranacripts would apply only to new voters, who are coming of voting age, and to voters who in past years have been denied the right to vote because of discrimination.

However, even if this procedure were burdensome, and even if it were costly, I say, as the Senator from Connecticut has stated, it is not too heavy a burden to bear, considering the essential right of all citizens to vote and to have State requirements to vote applied equally to all prospective voters.

Another objection may be that the remedy provided by our bill will be too slow, or less effective than some apparently easier method, such as that proposed last year.

I answer that if a wrong is being done in this country, and if unlawful and unconstitutional procedures which discriminate between persons seeking the right to vote are being applied, then Congress must proceed in a constitutional way to stamp out an unlawful and unconstitutional wrong that is being used against voter applicants.

In my State of Kentucky, no educational qualifications are prescribed for voters. We have no literacy test. As far as I am concerned, if a State should decide that it should abolish its literacy test, I think it would be no great loss, because in most instances a man's practical sense and judgment would suffice.

Nevertheless, the States have the right to fix voter qualifications under the Constitution. The purpose of our bill is to see to it that State standards and qualifications are applied without discrimination to all persons who seek the right to vote.

I am very glad to join with the Senator from Connecticut in introducing this bill, and I hope that Members from other States who have been interested in this problem may also wish to join in the bill we have developed together.

I thank the Senator from Mississippi for his kindness.

* * * * * *

The bill (S. 1282) to permit a State to increase the mileage of its Federal-aid primary system when provision is made for the completion and maintenance of 75 percent thereof, introduced by Mr. MANSFIELD (for himself and Mr. METCALF), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The joint memorial presented by Mr. MANSFIELD is as follows:

SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL 6

Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Montana, to the Montana congressional delegation, to the U.S. Secretary of Commerce and to the Federal Bureau of Public Roads Administrator, urging that necessary steps be taken to introduce legislation to amend a Federal law relating to highways, to permit a State to build additional primary system mileage when 75 percent of a State's primary system is completed and maintained, instead of 90 percent as presently required

Whereas section 103 of title 23 of the United States Code Annotated requires that the primary highway system shall not exceed 7 percent of the total highway mileage of a State; and

Whereas when 90 percent of the primary system of a State is completed and maintained, said State may increase its primary mileage to 8 percent of the total State mileage; and

Whereas the State of Montana has not reached the required 90 percent but needs an increase in primary road mileage because of the large area to be served by highways in Montana; and

Whereas an increase in primary mileage would correct existing inequities in various counties; and

Whereas many Montana counties would have greatly increased travel if the proper primary highway mileage were available; and

Whereas when primary highways were designated in past years, many Montana areas which had a minor volume of traffic now have enough traffic to warrant primary highway designation; and

Whereas an increase in primary highway mileage would greatly benefit the State of Montana: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Montana, That necessary steps be taken by the Montana congressional delegation, in cooperation with Federal officials to introduce legislation to amend section 103 of title 23 of the United States Code Annotated, relating to highways, to permit a State to have additional primary highway system mileage when 75 percent of said State's primary highway system is completed and maintained instead of 90 percent which is presently required; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send copies of this memorial to the Honorable Michael J. Mansfield and Lee Metcalf, Senators from the State of Montana; to the Honorable Arnold H. Olsen and James F. Battin, Congressmen from the State of Montana; to Luther H. Hodges, U.S. Secretary of Commerce; and to Rex M. Whitton, Federal Bureau of Public Roads Administrator.

PROTECTION OF THE RIGHT TO VOTE

Mr. HART. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from North Dakota, [Mr. BURDICK], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. McINTYRE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], the Senator from Oregon [Mrs. NEUBERGER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. RIBICOFF], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill carrying out the recommendations of the President to strengthen the protection of the right to vote. These recommendations were outlined by the President in his historic February 28 message to the Congress on civil rights.

This administration, with great diligence, has sought to protect the constitutional rights of citizens seeking to register and vote. In no comparable period of our history has so vigorous an effort been made to see that this very keystone of our democracy is secure. Yet insidious and complex devices to frustrate citizens of this Nation in exercising their right of franchise hampers the functioning of this basic element of our governmental system.

Under this administration, the Department of Justice has brought 22 suits against voting discrimination and 4 suits involving incidents of intimidation of potential voters. Under the previous administration, over a period of 8 years, the Department of Justice brought a total of 10 suits, 6 involving discrimination in voting and 4 involving intimidation of voters.

But the President, in his message, made quite clear the need for additional legislation if we are to insure to all Americans their right to vote. He stated:

Experience has shown, however, that these highly useful acts of the 85th and 86th Congresses suffer from two major defects. One is the usual long and difficult delay which occurs between the filing of a lawsuit and its ultimate conclusion. In one recent case, for example, 19 months elapsed between the filing of the suit and the judgment of the court. In another, an action brought in July 1961 has not yet come to trial. The legal maxim, "Justice delayed is justice denied," is dramatically applicable in these cases.

Many of these cases illustrate the difficulties faced by an administration anxious to protect voting rights. Among the examples of the delays in these cases are the following:

United States against Raines, Terrell County, Ga., filed September 4, 1958; decree entered September 13, 1960.

United States against Alabama, Macon County, Ala., filed February 5, 1959; injunction issued March 17, 1961.

United States against Majors, Dallas County, Ala., filed April 1961; tried May 1962.

United States against Lucky, Ouachita Parish, La., filed January 1, 1961; not yet tried.

United States against Ramsey, Clarke County, Miss., filed July 1961; tried December 1962.

United States against Daniel, Jefferson Davis County, Miss., filed August 3, 1961; tried October 1962.

United States against Wood, Walthall County, Miss., filed August 1961; presently being tried.

United States against Ward, Madison Parish, La., filed October 1961; tried December 1962; no relief to date.

United States against Dogan, Tallahatchie County, Miss., filed November 17, 1961; segment of suit involving discrimination in registration not yet tried.

United States against Duke, Panola County, Miss., filed October 1961; tried March 1963; no relief to date.

The voting bill we introduce today includes four main provisions:

First. The appointment of temporary voting referees.

Second. Expedition of handling suits brought under Federal civil rights statutes.

Third. Requirement for application of uniform standards and procedures to applicants seeking to register.

Fourth. Establishment of a presumption that those seeking to vote who have a sixth grade education possess sufficient literacy to vote in Federal elections.

There is little doubt that this legislation would go far toward ending ugly racial incidents such as the recent one at Greenwood, Miss., where 19 Negroes were arrested during a registration campaign.

The President, at his press conference, pointed out that if the provision of this bill providing for temporary voting referees had been law, those seeking today to register in Greenwood, Miss., would have already gone before a court-appointed referee and many would be duly registered.

It is a shame that special legislation of this kind is necessary to win people their essential constitutional right. But clearly legislation is necessary, and I believe that Congress has no moral alternative but to pass it as swiftly as possible.

The most urgent part of this proposal is the provision for the appointment of temporary referees to carry out registration in these problem counties. All qualified citizens of these counties have the right to vote today, today, and also had this right yesterday. There is no excuse for putting off the full exercise of the right to vote—even for the lengthy period of litigation. Clearly the assurance that temporary relief can be obtained early in a voting case would be a most important step forward.

As always, the enactment of civil rights legislation is a lengthy task. Therefore, we are hopeful that there will be expeditious scheduling of committee consideration of this bill.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill, together with the letter of transmittal from the Attorney General, be printed at this point in my remarks. I also ask that that portion of the President's civil rights message containing the recommendations on voting rights be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I ask further that the bill lie on the table until the end of business on Thursday, April 11, for any additional Senators who might wish to join in sponsorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, letter, and portion of the President's message referred to will be printed in the RECORD, and the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Michigan.

The bill (S. 1283) to enforce constitutional rights and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HART (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "The Voting Rights Act of 1963."

SEC. 2. Section 2004 of the Revised Statutes (42 U.S.C. 1971), as amended by section 131 of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 (71 Stat. 637) and as further amended by section 601 of the Civil Rights Act of 1960 (74 Stat. 90) is further amended as follows:

(a) Insert "1" after "(a)" in subsection (a) and add at the end of subsection (a) the following new paragraphs:

"(2) No person acting under color of law shall

"(A) in determining whether any individual is qualified under State law to vote in any Federal election apply any standard, practice or procedure different from the standards, practices or procedures applied to individuals similarly situated who have been found by State officials to be qualified to vote.

"(B) deny the right of any individual to vote in any Federal election because of an error or omission of such individual on any record or paper relating to any application, registration, payment of poll tax, or other act requisite to voting, if such error or omission is not material in determining whether such individual is qualified under State law to vote in such election; or

"(C) employ any literacy test as a qualification for voting in any Federal election unless (i) such test is administered to each individual wholly in writing and (ii) a certified copy of the test and of the answers given by the individual is furnished to him within twenty-five days of the submission of his written request made within the period of time during which records and papers are required to be retained and preserved pursuant to title III of the Act of May 6, 1960 (74 Stat. 88).

"(3) For purposes of this subsection

"(A) the term 'vote' shall have the same meaning as in subsection (e) of this section;

"(B) the words 'Federal election' shall have the same meaning as in subsection (f) of this section; and

"(C) the phrase 'literacy test' includes any test of the ability to read, write, understand, or interpret any matter."

(b) Insert immediately following the period at the end of the first sentence of subsection (c) the following new sentence: "If in any such proceeding literacy is a relevant fact it shall be presumed that any person who has not been adjudged an incompetent and who has completed the sixth grade in a school accredited by any State or Territory or the District of Columbia where instruction is carried on predominantly in the English language, possesses sufficient literacy, comprehension, and intelligence to vote in any Federal election as defined in subsection (f) of this section."

(c) Add the following subsection "(f)" and designate the present subsection "(f)" as subsection "(g)":

"(f) Whenever in any proceeding instituted pursuant to subsection (c) the complaint requests a finding of a pattern or practice pursuant to subsection (e), and such complaint, or a motion filed within twenty days after the effective date of this Act in the case of any proceeding which is pending before a district court on such effective date, (1) is signed by the Attorney General (or in his absence the Acting Attorney General), and (2) alleges that in the affected area fewer than fifteen percent of the total number of voting age persons of the same race as the persons alleged in the complaint to have been discriminated against are registered (or otherwise recorded as qualified to vote), any person resident within the affected area who is of the same race as the persons alleged to have been discriminated against shall be entitled, upon his application therefor, to an order declaring him qualified to vote, upon proof that at any election or elections (1) he is qualified under State law to vote, and (2) he has since the filing of the proceeding under subsection (c) been (A) deprived of or denied under color of law the opportunity to register to vote or otherwise to qualify to vote, or (B) found not qualified to vote by any person acting under color of law. Such order shall be effective as to any Federal or State election held within the longest period for which such applicant could have been registered or otherwise qualified under State law at which the applicant's qualifications would under State law entitle him to vote; provided that in the event it is determined upon final disposition of the proceeding, including any review, that no pattern or practice of deprivation of any right secured by subsection (a) exists, the order shall thereafter no longer qualify the applicant to vote in any subsequent election.

"Notwithstanding any inconsistent provision of State law or the action of any State officer or court, an applicant so declared qualified to vote shall be permitted to vote as provided herein. The Attorney General shall cause to be transmitted certified copies of any order declaring a person qualified to vote to the appropriate election officers. The refusal by any such officer with notice of such order to permit any person so qualified to vote to vote at an appropriate election shall constitute contempt of court.

"An application for an order pursuant to this subsection shall be heard within ten days, and the execution of any order disposing of such application shall not be stayed if the effect of such stay would be to delay the effectiveness of the order beyond the date of any election at which the applicant would otherwise be enabled to vote.

"The court may appoint one or more persons, to be known as temporary voting referees, to receive applications pursuant to this subsection and to take evidence and report to the court findings as to whether at any election or elections (1) any applicant entitled under this subsection to apply for an order declaring him qualified to vote is qualified under State law to vote, and (2) he has since the filing of the proceeding under subsection (c) been (A) deprived of or denied under color of law the opportunity to register to vote or otherwise to qualify to vote, or (B) found not qualified to vote by any person acting under color of law. The procedure for processing applications under this subsection and for the entry of orders shall be the same as that provided for in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of subsection (e).

"In appointing a temporary voting referee the court shall make its selection from a panel provided by the Judicial Conference of the circuit. Any temporary voting referee shall be a resident and a qualified voter of the State in which he is to serve. He shall subscribe to the oath of office required by Revised Statutes, section 1757 (5 U.S.C. 16) and shall to the extent not inconsistent herewith have all the powers conferred upon a master by Rule 53(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The compensation to be allowed any persons appointed by the district court pursuant to this subsection shall be fixed by the court and shall be payable by the United States. In the event that the district court shall appoint a retired officer or employee of the United States to serve as a temporary voting referee, such officer or employee shall continue to receive, in addition to any compensation for services rendered pursuant to this subsection, all retirement benefits to which he may otherwise be entitled.

"The court or temporary voting referee shall entertain applications and the court shall issue orders pursuant to this subsection until final disposition of the proceeding under subsection (c), including any review, or until the finding of a pattern or practice pursuant to subsection (e), whichever shall first occur. Applications pursuant to this subsection shall be determined expeditiously, and this subsection shall in no way be construed as a limitation upon the existing powers of the court.

"When used in this subsection, the words 'Federal election' shall mean any general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of electing or selecting any candidate for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate, or Member of the House of Representatives; the words 'State election' shall mean any other general, special, or primary election held solely or in part for the purpose of electing or selecting any candidate for public office; the words 'affected area' shall mean that county, parish or similar subdivision of the State in which the laws of the State relating to voting are or have been administered by a person who is a defendant in the proceeding instituted under subsection (c) on the date the original complaint is filed; and the words 'voting age persons' shall mean those persons who meet the age requirements of State law for voting."

(d) Add the following subsection "(h)":

"(h) In any civil action brought in any district court of the United States under Section 2004 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and Title III of the Act of May 6, 1960 (74 Stat. 88), wherein the United States is plaintiff, it shall be the duty of the chief judge of the district (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) in which the case is pending immediately to designate a judge in such district to hear and determine the case. In the event that no judge in the district is available to hear and determine the case, the chief judge of the district, or the acting chief judge, as the case may be, shall certify this fact to the chief judge of the circuit (or in his absence, the acting chief judge) who shall then designate a district or circuit judge of the circuit to hear and determine the case.

"It shall be the duty of the judge designated pursuant to this section to assign the case for hearing at the earliest practicable date and to cause the case to be in every way expedited."

SEC. 3. If any provision of this Act is held invalid, the remainder of this Act shall not be affected thereby.

The letter and portion of the President's message presented by Mr. HART are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., April 2, 1963.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: It is my privilege to transmit for your consideration and appropriate reference the text of a draft bill including four of the civil rights proposals recommended by the President and discussed in some detail in his message of February 28, 1963.

The bill includes:

1. A provision for temporary and interim relief, including the appointment of temporary voting referees, in certain circumstances while voting suits are proceeding through the Federal courts.

2. A provision to expedite voting suits brought under the Federal civil rights statutes.

3. A provision to require the application of uniform standards, practices and proceedures to all applicants seeking to register and to vote in Federal elections; to prohibit the disqualification of any applicant because of immaterial errors or omissions; and to require any literacy test given to an applicant for voting in a Federal election to be administered in writing.

4. A provision to establish a presumption in voting suits brought pursuant to subsection (c) of 42 U.S.C. 1971 that any person who has completed the sixth grade in an accredited school where instruction is predominantly in the English language possesses sufficient literacy to vote in any Federal election.

This bill is designed to remedy two major defects which experience has shown exist in the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. While these acts have proven a useful tool in the protection of voting rights, a considerable period of time, measurable in terms of years, frequently elapses between the filing of a lawsuit and its ultimate conclusion. The result is that with respect to specific elections occurring during that period, the right to vote is lost forever. This bill, therefore, would accelerate the enjoyment of voting rights previously recognized by the Constitution and laws of this country, but too long denied to a substantial segment of our population.

Second, this bill would explicitly prohibit the application of arbitrary and discriminatory standards in determining the qualifications of persons seeking to register and to vote in Federal elections. As the President stated in his message, no one can rightfully contend that any voting registrar should be permitted to deny the vote to any qualified citizen through discriminatory administration of qualifying tests, or upon the basis of minor errors in filling out a complicated form which seeks only information. Yet the experience of this Department has been that such arbitrary and discriminatory practices play a major role in the deprivation of the right of otherwise qualified citizens to vote.

The need for legislation to correct this administrative abuse and to alleviate the delay now experienced by many of our fellow citizens in the enjoyment of their right to vote cannot be overemphasized. The Department therefore urges that Congress give prompt and favorable consideration to this bill.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that this legislation is in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

ROBERT KENNEDY,
Attorney General.

I. THE RIGHT TO VOTE

The right to vote in a free American election is the most powerful and precious right in the world—and it must not be denied on the grounds of race or color. It is a potent key to achieving other rights of citizenship. For American history—both recent and past—clearly reveals that the power of the ballot has enabled those who achieve it to win other achievements as well, to gain a full voice in the affairs of their State and Nation, and to see their interests represented in the governmental bodies which affect their future. In a free society, those with the power to govern are necessarily responsive to those with the right to vote.

In enacting the 1957 and 1960 Civil Rights Acts, Congress provided the Department of Justice with basic tools for protecting the right to vote—and this administration has not hesitated to use those tools. Legal action is brought only after voluntary efforts fail; and, in scores of instances, local officials, at the request of the Department of Justice, have voluntarily made voting records available or abandoned discriminatory registration, discriminatory voting practices, or segregated balloting. Where voluntary local compliance has not been forthcoming, the Department of Justice has approximately quadrupled the previous level of its legal effort—investigating coercion, inspecting records, initiating lawsuits, enjoining intimidation, and taking whatever followup action is necessary to forbid further interference or discrimination. As a result, thousands of Negro citizens are registering and voting for the first time—many of them in counties where no Negro had ever voted before. The Department of Justice will continue to take whatever action is required to secure the right to vote for all Americans.

Experience has shown, however, that these highly useful acts of the 85th and 86th Congresses suffer from two major defects. One is the usual long and difficult delay which occurs between the filing of a lawsuit and its ultimate conclusion. In one recent case, for example, 19 months elapsed between the filing of the suit and the judgment of the court. In another, an action brought in July 1961 has not yet come to trial. The legal maxim, "Justice delayed is justice denied," is dramatically applicable in these cases.

Too often those who attempt to assert their constitutional rights are intimidated. Prospective registrants are fired. Registration workers are arrested. In some instances, churches in which registration meetings are held have been burned. In one case where Negro tenant farmers chose to exercise their right to vote, it was necessary for the Justice Department to seek injunctions to halt their eviction and for the Department of Agriculture to help feed them from surplus stocks. Under these circumstances, continued delay in the granting of the franchise—particularly in counties where there is mass racial disfranchisement—permits the intent of the Congress to be openly flouted.

Federal executive action in such cases—no matter how speedy and how drastic—can never fully correct such abuses of power. It is necessary instead to free the forces of our democratic system within these areas by promptly insuring the franchise to all citizens, making it possible for their elected officials to be truly responsive to all their constituents.

The second and somewhat overlapping gap in these statutes is their failure to deal specifically with the most common forms of abuse of discretion on the part of local election officials who do not treat all applicants uniformly.

Objections were raised last year to the proposed literacy test bill, which attempted to speed up the enforcement of the right to vote by removing one important area of discretion from registration officials who used that discretion to exclude Negroes. Preventing that bill from coming to a vote did not make any less real the prevalence in many counties of the use of literacy and other voter qualification tests to discriminate against prospective Negro voters, contrary to the requirements of the 14th and 15th amendments, and adding to the delays and difficulties encountered in securing the franchise for those denied it.

An indication of the magnitude of the overall problem, as well as the need for speedy action, is a recent five-State survey disclosing over 200 counties in which fewer than 15 percent of the Negroes of voting age are registered to vote. This cannot continue. I am, therefore, recommending legislation to deal with this problem of judicial delay and administrative abuse in four ways:

First, to provide for interim relief while voting suits are proceeding through the courts in areas of demonstrated need, temporary Federal voting referees should be appointed to determine the qualifications of applicants for registration and voting during the pendency of a law-suit in any county in which fewer than 15 percent of the eligible number of persons of any race claimed to be discriminated against are registered to vote. Existing Federal law provides for the appointment of voting referees to receive and act upon applications for voting registration upon a court finding that a pattern or practice of discrimination exists. But to prevent a successful case from becoming an empty victory, insofar as the particular election is concerned, the proposed legislation would provide that, within these prescribed limits, temporary voting referees would be appointed to serve from the inception to the conclusion of the Federal voting suit, applying, however, only State law and State regulations. As officers of the court, their decisions would be subject to court scrutiny and review.

Second, voting suits brought under the Federal civil rights statutes should be accorded expedited treatment in the Federal courts, just as in many State courts election suits are given preference on the dockets on the sensible premise that, unless the right to vote can be exercised at a specific election, it is, to the extent of that election, lost forever.

Third, the law should specifically prohibit the application of different tests, standards, practices, or procedures for different applicants seeking to register and vote in Federal election. Under present law, the courts can ultimately deal with the various forms of racial discrimination practiced by local registrars. But the task of litigation, and the time consumed in preparation and proof, should be lightened in every possible fashion. No one can rightfully contend that any voting registrar should be permitted to deny the vote to any qualified citizen, anywhere in this country, through discriminatory administration of qualifying tests, or upon the basis of minor errors in filling out a complicated form which seeks only information. Yet the Civil Rights Commission, and the cases brought by the Department of Justice, have compiled one discouraging example after another of obstacles placed in the path of Negroes seeking to register to vote at the same time that other applicants experience no difficulty whatsoever. Qualified Negroes, including those with college degrees, have been denied registration for their inability to give a reasonable interpretation of the Constitution. They have been required to complete their applications with unreasonable precision, or to secure registered voters to vouch for their identity, or to defer to white persons who want to register ahead of them, or they are otherwise subjected to exasperating delays. Yet uniformity of treatment is required by the dictates of both the Constitution and fair play; and this proposed statute, therefore, seeks to spell out that principle to ease the difficulties and delays of litigation. Limiting the proposal to voting qualifications in elections for Federal offices alone will clearly eliminate any constitutional conflict.

Fourth, completion of the sixth grade should, with respect to Federal elections, constitute a presumption that the applicant is literate. Literacy tests pose especially difficult problems in determining voter qualification. The essentially subjective judgment involved in each individual case, the difficulty of challenging that judgment, have made literacy tests one of the cruelest and most abused of all voter qualification tests. The incidence of such abuse can be eliminated, or at least drastically curtailed, by the proposed legislation providing that proof of completion of the sixth grade constitutes a presumption that the applicant is literate.

Finally, the 87th Congress—after 20 years of effort—passed and referred to the States for ratification a constitutional amendment to prohibit the levying of poll taxes as a condition to voting. Already 13 States have ratified the proposed amendment and in 3 more one body of the legislature has acted. I urge every State legislature to take prompt action on this matter and to outlaw the poll tax—which has too long been an outmoded and arbitrary bar to voting participation by minority groups and others—as the 24th amendment to the Constitution. This measure received bipartisan sponsorship and endorsement in the Congress, and I shall continue to work with Governors and legislative leaders of both parties in securing adoption of the anti-poll-tax amendment.

PATENT POLICY

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish a uniform national policy concerning proprietary rights in inventions made through the expenditure of public funds.

The Subcommittee on Patents, Trademarks, and Copyrights of the Committee on the Judiciary has been engaged for some time in a study of the patent policies and practices of the various Government departments and agencies. The subcommittee has given particular attention to determining what disposition shall be made of patent rights in inventions arising from Government-financed research and development contracts. The need for a determination by the Congress as to this Government's patent policy is made clear by the fact that during the present fiscal year it is estimated that the Federal Government will obligate $14.7 billion for research and development. Government agencies conducting research in related areas have different patent policies. The general policy relating to disposition of such patent rights should be made by the Congress and not left to the discretion of each Government department.

A number of bills have been introduced on this subject. These have ranged from almost total ownership of patent rights by the Government to bills which would almost totally exclude the Government from such ownership. The Patents Subcommittee, during the 87th Congress, held extensive hearings for the purpose of receiving testimony from all individuals and groups who could make a useful contribution. The record of these hearings has been carefully studied and additional proposals have been explored by the subcommittee.

While this subject will require further study and possibly additional hearings, I have concluded that the most appropriate legislation would be a bill which would provide general guidelines to be observed by Government departments in disposing of patent rights. I am also of the view that no informed judgment can be made as to the disposition of patent rights at the time when the contract is negotiated and that such determination should be deferred until the inventions are actually disclosed.

The bill which I have introduced today, in my opinion, constitutes a reasonable solution to a complex question—a question which should be resolved. While the bill reflects what I believe is a sound approach to this matter, I do not pretend that it is perfect. I therefore invite those who are interested in this subject to communicate to the subcommittee their views as to this bill and any suggestions which they have for amendments. After reviewing the entire situation, the subcommitte will decide whether additional hearings are required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1290) to establish a uniform national policy concerning proprietary rights in inventions made through the expenditure of public funds, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. McCLELLAN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AUTHORIZATION FOR SECRETARY OF COMMERCE TO EMPLOY ALIENS IN A SCIENTIFIC OR TECHNICAL CAPACITY

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to employ aliens in a scientific or technical capacity. I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, together with a statement of purpose and need for the proposed legislation, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1291) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to employ aliens in a scientific or technical capacity, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The letter and statement presented by Mr. MAGNUSON are as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D.C., March 13, 1963.

Hon. LYNDON B. JOHNSON,
President of the Senate,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There are attached four copies of a proposed bill "To authorize the Secretary of Commerce to employ aliens in a scientific or technical capacity."

There are also attached four copies of a statement of purpose and need for the proposed bill.

We are advised by the Bureau of the Budget that it would interpose no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

Sincerely yours,

LUTHER H. HODGES,
Secretary of Commerce.

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE AND NEED

The proposed legislation will provide authority for the Department of Commerce to employ noncitizens in scientific or technical work. Authority, similar to that here sought, was granted by the Congress recently to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. Congress has exempted the Department of Defense from the prohibitions against employment of noncitizens. The Departments of State and Agriculture, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and the Public Health Service have also been given authority by Congress to employ noncitizens for certain necessary purposes.

On various occasions, agencies of this Department engaged in scientific and technical work of critical national importance have found that the only persons qualified and available to undertake these projects could not be hired because, as noncitizens, they were ineligible for employment by the Government.

The proposed legislation would enable the Department to make the best possible use of available scientific manpower. Any employment under the proposed legislation would, of course, continue to be subject to a prior determination that no qualified U.S. citizen is available for the particular position. The legislation provides adequate authority for investigation to determine the suitability and security status of aliens who may be employed thereunder. The Department of course has even more stringent security standards for aliens than it has for citizen applicants for comparable positions.

While the problems created by the prohibition on the hiring of aliens are present in several of the bureaus of the Department of Commerce, those problems are particularly severe at the National Bureau of Standards.

In certain areas of research now important in the technical program of the National Bureau of Standards, the availability of U.S. citizens with adequate specific training is extremely limited. Two factors have contributed to this situation. In the first place, the well-recognized general shortage of scientists and engineers in the United States has definitely restricted the Bureau's ability to fill important research positions. Secondly, some important Bureau research programs are in areas of the physical sciences that have not in recent years been fashionable or attractive to American students and scientists. In such fields, the training of new research scientists in American universities has been limited and the suppy of new research personnel has therefore continued to decline.

The following examples will illustrate the problems:

1. A number of our most important national programs are increasingly in need of precise data on atomic properties that can be obtained only through an intensive program in atomic spectroscopy. Such information is essential for example, in interpreting the astrophysical data obtained by space vehicles and other astronomical observatories, in measuring the energy and understanding the flow of energy in plasmas such as those involved in thermonuclear fusion research, and in understanding the physical processes involved in rocket propulsion. Programs such as these require information on the precise value of the spectral wavelengths of the radiated energy of the atoms of each of the elements and precise measurements of the rates with which atoms radiate or absorb energy.

The analysis of atomic spectra occupied the majority of the effort of academic physicists during the late 1920's and early 1930's, but most of the physicists trained in atomic spectroscopy during the early 1930's shifted their research interests to nuclear physics later in the decade. Through this change in interest and the retirement of previously active spectroscopists, great laboratories which once made major contributions to the field have drastically reduced their work in atomic spectroscopy. Thus, the recently increased demand for an enormous quantity of precise data falls primarily upon the National Bureau of Standards just at a time when American universities have been producing very few trained personnel in this field.

Although disappearing from American universities, spectroscopy is still an active field of study and research interest abroad. Major institutions are producing qualified atomic spectroscopists in Sweden, Israel, Great Britain, the Netherlands, Spain, and Belgium. While the nationals of some of these countries may be employed by the National Bureau of Standards under the present statutory authorization, it is desirable to extend the authorization to all such countries so that the Bureau may recruit the best-qualified research personnel for its particular programs.

2. A similar situation exists with respect to applied mathematics. In a number of relatively "unfashionable" branches of mathematics, the general shortage of trained mathematicians is aggravated by the lack of interest on the part of American students. Numerical analysis, for example, which involves the use of numerical techniques for the solution of problems of physics, chemistry, and engineering is a relatively new mathematical field in the United States. It has, however, become an important field in recent years because of the availability of powerful computers and the applicability of numerical analysis to extremely difficult problems in science and technology. One of the most valuable sources of trained personnel in this field of mathematics is Switzerland but the National Bureau of Standards is, under the present statute, precluded from the employment of Swiss nationals.

3. The neutron measurement field is another area in which the Bureau could obtain important assistance from Swiss scientists. Many segments of Government and industry look to the National Bureau of Standards for basic information on neutron cross sections and neutron polarization. Such data are of great importance in radiation shielding problems vital to defense and in reactor development. The Bureau has experienced great difficulty in recruiting competent scientists in this increasingly important field. The Bureau is aware of at least two Swiss nationals who are highly qualified for this work and probably would be interested in coming to the National Bureau of Standards if suitable authority was available for their employment.

REPEAL OF SECTION 1(8) OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill which would repeal section 1(8) of the Interstate Commerce Act, known as the commodities clause.

This bill is introduced at the request of the Transportation Association of America, and I ask unanimous consent that a letter from that association as well as statement of justification prepared by that association be included in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter and statement of justification will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1292) to repeal section 1(8) of the Interstate Commerce Act, commonly known as the commodities clause, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The letter and statement of justification presented by Mr. MAGNUSON are as follow:

TRANSPORTATION ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D.C., March 15, 1963.

Hon. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman, Senate Commerce Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN MAGNUSON: You will recall that during the last Congress, you introduced a bill, S. 734, to repeal section 1(8) of the Interstate Commerce Act, commonly known as the commodities clause. This clause presently restricts a railroad from transporting in interstate commerce commodities—other than lumber and the manufactured products thereof—which it owns, produces, or in which it has any interest, except commodities used in its business as a common carrier. A photocopy of your statement on the floor of the Senate when introducing this bill is enclosed, as taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 31, 1961.

Since the conditions justifying such legislation are just as valid today as at the time of introduction of this bill, we are hopeful that you will again consent to introduce such a bill. If agreeable, you could use approximately the same statement as given on January 31, 1961, or you might consider remarks along the lines of the enclosed statement. Also enclosed is a copy of the actual language of the bill, which you can note is quite simple.

As you undoubtedly are well aware, the President, in his transportation message of 1962, recommended that this clause be repealed. He stated further:

"The need for this provision, which goes back to the days of oppressive railroad monopoly, has largely passed; and its current effect is to handicap the railroads in competing with other modes of transportation. The antitrust laws can insure protection against the possible abuse by a railroad of its dual status as shipper and carrier."

Since this recommendation is thus part of the President's transport program, we hope that you will include any bill calling for repeal of the commodities clause with the administration's omnibus bill when you schedule the latter for hearings in the coming months. TAA would, of course, like to present testimony in support of repeal of the commodities clause.

Sincerely,

HAROLD F. HAMMOND,
President.

STATEMENT OF JUSTIFICATION

It is recommended that section 1(8) of the Interstate Commerce Act, commonly known as the commodities clause be repealed.

The clause, as it now stands, reads as follows:

"(8) From and after May 1, 1908, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to transport from any State, territory, or the District of Columbia, to any other State, territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any article or commodity, other than timber and the manufactured products thereof, manufactured, mined or produced by it, or under its authority or which it may own in whole or in part, or in which it may have any interest, direct or indirect, except such articles or commodities as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier."

Thus, the commodities clause presently restricts a railroad company from transporting in interstate commerce commodities which it owns (other than timber and the manufactured products thereof), produces, or in which it has any interest, except commodities which may be used in its business as a common carrier.

Since the passage of the clause—over 50 years ago—other acts have been enacted to provide for the regulation of other modes of transportation. None of these acts contain a provision similar to the commodities clause.

Competition between the various types of transport has developed since that time to a point of great intensity. This highly competitive condition in today's transportation field has made this clause an unnecessary and outmoded form of regulation that unfairly burdens the railroads.

The history of the commodities clause indicates that abuses at which it was originally directed would be reached by the antitrust laws or by the Interstate Commerce Commission's control over discrimination and railroad service. Since the clause first became effective, the jurisdiction of the ICC has greatly increased and the Commission now has the power to correct and prevent discrimination and preferential treatment.

The railroads presently occupy no monopoly position in the transport industry; in fact, their relative share of both total freight and passenger traffic has steadily declined since World War II. They are faced with intense competition from thousands of other carriers—both regulated and unregulated—and none of them is prevented from engaging in other nontransport fields by a commodities clause. Nonrail carriers are continuing to expand into many types of nontransport business operations.

Many of the largest and most prosperous corporations in the United States carry their own commodities in their own barges, ships, and trucks. It is estimated that at least one half of the total truck ton-mileage is moved by shippers' privately owned or leased equipment. If the commodities clause were applied in reverse, other industries would be prohibited from performing their own transportation services.

The President, in his transportation message of 1962, specifically called for repeal of the commodities clause. He stated: "The need for this provision, which goes back to the days of oppressive railroad monopoly, has largely passed; and its current effect is to handicap the railroads in competing with other modes of transportation. The antitrust laws can insure protection against the possible abuse by a railroad of its dual status as shipper and carrier."

Therefore, in order to relieve the railroads of an outdated regulation and to help "provide fair and impartial regulation," as called for in the declaration of national transportation policy in the Interstate Commerce Act, section 1(8) of the act should be repealed.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 64(a)(2) OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to amend section 64(a)(2) of the Bankruptcy Act and ask that it lie over for 3 days for the benefit of those who want to cosponsor this important legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the accompanying explanation of the bill also be printed immedately following the draft of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and explanation will be printed in the RECORD, and the bill will lie on the desk as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

Suffrage General

union leaders and teachers who had been working in collusion with the Soviet Embassy, and jailed their leaders.

Second, Soviet economic aid often neglects a nation's basic needs in favor of showy, politically motivated projects. Among the biggest Soviet bloc projects in Guinea are a radio transmitter, a printing plant, a sports stadium, a hotel, an outdoor theater and a citywide loudspeaker system. But the things that countries like Guinea really need are education, vocational training, agricultural development, good roads and small industries. The Soviets helped neither the country's economy nor their own popularity with the Guineans.

Third, the Soviets tried to control the economies of these young countries by means of attractive-sounding barters. It didn't take the Guineans long to find out the the Czechs and others were sending them overpriced and often shoddy equipment in exchange for Guinean products, which were then resold in the West for hard cash. And there's no better way of antagonizing an African than to appear to be taking advantage of him.

Fourth, the Soviet and other Eastern European technicians sent to Africa have had little or no experience in dealing with Africans. They don't understand their ways, they get annoyed with them—and friction follows. Their attitude—a mixture of grumbling and indifference—is resented by Africans, who like strangers to be friendly and relaxed. Word gets around that the Soviets are racists (because they don't mingle), uncultured (because they speak only Russian and their clothes are often dowdy or incompetent (because much of their equipment is inferior in quality to what the Guineans, for example, knew under the French). And when word gets around in Africa, it really gets around.

Finally, the Soviet effort to win over young Africans by giving them scholarships in Communist states has misfired. Africans in Eastern Europe have experienced racial discrimination—where they expected none; they complain about being subjected to long hours of political indoctrination. Back home, they compare notes with students who have gone to the United States, France, or Britain—and wish they had gone West.

So it's more than likely the Soviets are engaged in their own agonizing reappraisal about Africa. Here in Guinea, after 3 years and $125 million in Soviet bloc credits and grants, their record is nothing to brag about: a cluster of half-finished public buildings, a radio station and loud-speaker system that don't work, a stagnant economy, a disillusioned people, an Ambassador expelled and a government turning to the West and to private enterprise for development.

It isn't hard to imagine the uproar in Congress and the press if the United States had expended all this money and effort with similar results.

Knowing the Communists' capacity for taking the long view of history, we can't expect them to give up in Africa. The Chinese are quietly cultivating African leaders and avoiding Soviet mistakes. And the Soviets will never again take the Africans for granted.

But we should not gloat over Soviet failures, nor should we expect that the Africans will necessarily go pro-West. They are and will remain primarily concerned with independence, dignity, progress, and noninvolvement in the struggle of the major powers.

Our task now is to intensify our efforts to help Africans develop their countries in practical, useful ways. We have made a good start, but we need to remember that this is an impatient continent that wants to catch up with the rest of the world. Speed is a more important factor than size in African development programs; if the younger generations can't see signs of progress in cooperation with the West, they may yet be enticed down the Soviet path.

OUR BEST APPROACH

For the moment our best approach to Africa can be summed up in four words—we should try to be firm, friendly, frank, and fast.

We must be firm in our commitment to freedom in Africa; friendly and frank in our dealings with Africa's leaders, and fast in carrying out our promises to give desperately needed help.

Frankness has already paid off. Today most African leaders have overcome their suspicions of the United States and are beginning to realize that what we want for them is what they want for themselves: political independence and economic progress in freedom.

What the Communists want is very different—as the Africans are finding out.

PRESIDENT KENNEDY'S VOTING COMMISSION

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, democracy cannot exist without the voluntary participation of free citizens in the process of government. In our representative democracy, the will of the public is expressed through voting at the polls for those who are to make and carry out our laws and policies. All over the country on election day, in the smallest hamlets and the largest cities, millions of voters flock to the polls to exercise their right as a free people to select their representatives by secret ballot.

It is with great pride that I point out that Idaho has led the Nation in the last two presidential elections—1956 and 1960—in the percentage of civilians of voting age who actually cast ballots. In 1956, 77.3 percent of Idaho's eligible voters went to the polls and voted. And in 1960, this percentage rose to 80.8. I am confident that one of the major reasons for this extremely high turnout of voters in my State is the liberality of the voter-registration laws. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point tables which rank the States according to their respective voting percentages in the 1956 and 1960 general elections.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

How the States ranked in percentage of civilians of voting age who cast ballots in the 1956 presidential election

Rank	State	Percentage	Rank	State	Percentage	Rank	State	Percentage	Rank	State	Percentage
1	Idaho	77.3	14	Washington	71.4	27	New York	65.5	39	North Carolina	47.7
2	Connecticut	76.6	15	New Jersey	70.1	28	Pennsylvania	65.0	40	Tennessee	46.0
3	Utah	76.1	16	Colorado	69.6	29	California	65.0	41	Arkansas	39.9
4	Massachusetts	75.3	17	Wyoming	68.9	30	Ohio	64.9	42	Texas	38.1
5	New Hampshire	75.2	18	Vermont	68.6	31	Nevada	64.7	43	Louisiana	37.3
6	Rhode Island	74.6	19	Oregon	68.5	32	Maine	64.6	44	Virginia	34.2
7	Iowa	74.1	20	Minnesota	67.8	33	Oklahoma	64.0	45	Georgia	30.4
8	Illinois	72.5	21	Kansas	67.7	34	New Mexico	62.1	46	Alabama	28.5
9	Indiana	72.4	22	Missouri	67.5	35	Kentucky	56.7	47	South Carolina	24.6
10	West Virginia	72.4	23	Michigan	67.1	36	Maryland	54.8	48	Mississippi	22.1
11	Montana	72.3	24	North Dakota	67.0	37	Arizona	49.7
12	South Dakota	72.2	25	Wisconsin	66.6	38	Florida	48.3		National average	60.4
13	Delaware	71.5	26	Nebraska	65.9

1960 ELECTION SCOREBOARD

Percentage of civilians of voting age who voted in the 1960 presidential election

Rank	State	Civilian population of voting age	Total vote	Percent	Rank	State	Civilian population of voting age	Total vote	Percent
1	Idaho	372,000	300,451	80.766	26	Nebraska	857,000	613,095	71.539
2	New Hampshire	367,000	295,761	80.588	27	Ohio	5,833,000	4,161,859	71.349
3	Utah	469,000	374,981	79.953	28	Oregon	1,089,000	775,462	71.208
4	North Dakota	350,000	278,431	79.551	29	Kansas	1,315,000	928,825	70.633
5	South Dakota	388,000	306,087	78.831	30	California	9,219,000	6,507,082	70.583
6	West Virginia	1,085,000	837,781	77.214	31	Pennsylvania	7,102,000	5,006,541	70.494
7	Minnesota	2,003,000	1,541,887	76.978	32	New York	10,788,000	7,291,079	67.584
8	Connecticut	1,590,000	1,222,883	76.910	33	Oklahoma	1,399,000	903,150	64.556
9	Indiana	2,784,000	2,135,360	76,701	34	New Mexico	491,000	311,118	63.364
10	Massachusetts	3,230,000	2,469,480	76.454	35	Nevada	174,000	107,267	61.647
11	Iowa	1,669,000	1,273,820	76.321	36	Kentucky	1,876,000	1,124,462	59,939
12	Illinois	6,244,000	4,757,394	76.191	37	Arizona	680,000	398,491	58.601
13	Rhode Island	533,000	405,534	76.085	38	Maryland	1,819,000	1,055,349	58.017
14	Wyoming	186,000	140,892	75.748	39	Hawaii	321,000	184,745	57.552
15	Delaware	264,000	196,683	74.501	40	North Carolina	2,521,000	1,368,966	54.302
16	Maine	574,000	421,767	73.478	41	Tennessee	2,079,000	1,051,792	50.591
17	Michigan	4,519,000	3,318,097	73.425	42	Florida	3,099,000	1,544,180	49.828
18	Alaska	83,000	60,762	73.207	43	Louisiana	1,770,000	807,891	45.604
19	Colorado	1,007,000	736,246	73.112	44	Texas	5,329,000	2,311,670	43.379
20	Missouri	2,651,000	1,934,422	72.969	45	Arkansas	1,029,000	428,509	41.643
21	Washington	1,703,000	1,241,572	72.905	46	Virginia	2,244,000	771,449	34.378
22	Wisconsin	2,373,000	1,729,082	72.864	47	South Carolina	1,227,000	386,687	31.514
23	Vermont	230,000	167,324	72.749	48	Georgia	2,342,000	733,349	31.312
24	New Jersey	3,827,000	2,773,111	72.461	49	Alabama	1,825,000	564,242	30.917
25	Montana	387,000	277,579	71.725	50	Mississippi	1,163,000	298,171	25.638

Sources: State election officials, U.S. Census Bureau.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, as indicated by the charts, every election day there is a substantial number of citizens who do not exercise their franchise. In the last presidential election, only 63.9 percent of the potential voters—less than two-thirds—actually went to the polls. In 1952 and 1956 the comparable figures were 62.7 percent and 60.4 percent. This demonstrates that there is a bloc of potential voters, making up practically 40 percent of the electorate, who do not vote. The percentage of nonvoters in State and local elections is even greater.

The existence of this large group of voters should be a source of concern to all of us who want a vital democracy. It has led President Kennedy to recently establish the President's Commission on Registration and Voting Participation. The purpose of the Commission is to study the causes for the failure of many Americans to exercise their right to vote. The Commission has been asked to give particular attention to laws which restrict registration on the basis of residence, economic status and for other reasons; procedures for registration of voters; absentee voting provisions; causes of nonvoting by persons otherwise qualified to vote.

The Executive order establishing the Commission specifically directs it to avoid consideration of problems involving the denial of registration and voting on the basis of racial or other discriminatory grounds which are within the jurisdiction of the Commission on Civil Rights. The President, in a statement issued at the formation of the Commission, said that "responsible Americans are increasingly concerned with the widespread failure of our citizens to exercise their right to vote and restrictions which prevent many Americans from voting."

The Chairman of the Commission is Richard M. Scammon, Director of the Bureau of the Census. The other members include Bert Bennett, chairman, North Carolina State Democratic Executive Committee, Winston Salem, N.C.; Robert A. Forsythe, State chairman, Republican Party of Minnesota, Edwina, Minn.; Evron M. Kirkpatrick, executive director, American Political Science Association, Bethesda, Md.; James Bradshaw Mintener, attorney and civic worker, Washington, D.C.; Brendan Byrne, executive director, American Heritage Foundation, New York City.

The Commission also includes John Perkins, president of the University of Delaware, Newark, Del.; Mrs. Ruth Schertz Phillips, president, League of Women Voters (national), St. Charles, Ill.; Roy Reuther, director, United Auto Workers' Citizenship-Legislative Department, Detroit, Mich.; Victoria Schuck, professor of political science, Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Mass.; and Leon H. Washington, Jr., publisher, Los Angeles Sentinel, Los Angeles, Calif. The Commission is to report its recommendations to the President by November 30, 1963.

This bipartisan assemblage of responsible and knowledgeable citizens have an important task, which I am sure they will fulfill admirably. Their recommendations should be carefully studied by all those concerned with establishing an effective democracy. Let us look at some of the problems confronting them. The respected American Heritage Foundation, whose director is a member of the Commission, estimates that in 1956 more than 6 million citizens were disenfranchised because of moving and thereby failing to meet the residential requirement for registration. Many States make no provision for absentee ballots by the hospitalized and physically disabled. Some 5 million Americans were thus kept from the polls in 1956. It is also estimated that approximately 2,600,000 travelers were prevented from voting because they had no way of obtaining absentee ballots.

Registration requirements, one of the main areas of concern to the Commission, vary widely across the country. It is interesting to note that the 12 States which require only 6 months' residence in the State had an average of 73.5 percent of their potential voting population go to the polls in 1960. The three States, all southern, which required a 2-year residency averaged only 29.2 percent of potential, and the remainder of the States, having a 1-year requirement, averaged 63.3 percent of potential voters casting ballots.

In the 12 States with 6-month residency requirements, 85.8 percent of the potential voters are actually registered to vote. In the 2-year States and in the 1-year States, the comparable figures are 48 and 73.8 percent. There are many factors involved in the motivation of citizens to register and vote, but the above figures indicate that liberalized residency requirements are associated with greater participation in registration and voting.

One of the most difficult areas to study in voting is that of motivation. What impels a citizen to go to the polls or to stay away, aside from legal and procedural impediments? Part of the answer may be tradition and education. England and Canada, for example, have consistently higher turnouts at the polls than we do in America. In the last national election in each country, 8 out of every 10 voters went and cast ballots. Part of the answer, I think, can be found in giving a better education in the responsibilities of the democratic process to our young people. It should spur us to action to discover that Americans between the ages of 21 and 29 have the poorest voting record. I would think that the Commission would recommend programs designed to correct this problem.

Each of us has a stake in making democracy work. I think that the public-spirited citizens who have agreed to serve on the Commission on Registration and Voting Participation should be applauded for their role in formulating recommendations to make democracy work better. In summing up this discussion, I would like to append an editorial from the Washington Post entitled "Why Don't They Vote?" which outlines the necessity for a study such as that being undertaken by the Commission. An article by the well-known public opinion researcher Elmo Roper is also appended as a factual look at the state of registration and voting procedures and deficiencies. I ask unanimous consent that both of these articles be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY DON'T THEY VOTE?

President Kennedy is quite properly concerned about the 37,500,000 Americans of voting age who do not go to the polls. In the congressional elections the number of stay-at-homes is much larger. Last year only 49 percent of the potential voters actually cast ballots. What kept the majority away? Fortunately, the President's concern has prompted him to name a commission under the chairmanship of Richard M. Scammon, Director of the Census Bureau, to find out why so many avoid the polls and to recommend what should be done about it.

Many millions of Americans lose their votes each year because of changes in their places of residence. Some of this loss is unavoidable in a society on wheels, but an enormous amount of it is a direct result of voting laws carried over from the horse-and-buggy days. In many States the residence requirement for voting is unreasonably long. Others offer inadequate opportunity for registration. So much has been said in recent years about racial bars to voting (which are a special concern of the Civil Rights Commission) that other major impediments have been much neglected.

Another serious weakness is the system for absentee voting as it operates in many of the States. Why should not absentee ballots be made available to all qualified voters who are hospitalized or ill at home and to those who are away from home for any purpose as well as to the personnel of the armed services? Wider use of absentee voters' ballots could add many millions to the list of voters in a general election.

Some allowance always will have to be made for the few who "take a walk" on election day because of irritation with both parties and for those who have not sufficient interest in public affairs to go to the polls. A free country where voting is solely a matter of individual choice can never expect to equal the turnout of a totalitarian country where voting is in fact or in effect compulsory. But a vast improvement in the American voting record could be made by simply modernizing the laws so as to encourage participation instead of making it unnecessarily burdensome.

HOW TO LOSE YOUR VOTE

(By Elmo Roper)

Most people are indignant about the denial of voting rights to Negroes. Such disfranchisement is a glaring evil, an obvious contradiction of the Nation's moral principles, and as such it is easy to react against it passionately. Yet other forms of disfranchisement affecting much larger numbers of Americans arouse merely a public yawn.

There are between 2,500,000 and 4 million victims of poll tax and prejudice disfranchisement; but there are also 3 million Americans who can't vote because they are traveling in or out of the country or living abroad; 5 million who can't get to the polls because of illness or disability; and the largest group of all, 8 million otherwise eligible citizens who have moved too recently to be allowed to vote under our laws.

These victims of what might be called "accidental prejudice" lack partisans and pamphleteers; their cases are undramatic and their plight is taken for granted. But when one tries to formulate the rationale behind denying the vote to people who happen to be away from home, or who are ill, when one asks the relevance of State or local residence to voting in a presidential election, one is quickly forced to conclude that these are clear cases of "discrimination by law."

We pollsters have been complaining for years that only two-thirds of the electorate bother to vote—and that's in good years. This not only limits the democratic process but also inconveniences us by making election prediction more difficult.

Actually, we have been a bit unfair to the electorate, for a large proportion of those berated nonvoters are in that category through no fault of their own. In the 1960 presidential elections, 66 percent of voting-age citizens voted.

But of those citizens who actually met all State voting requirements, a larger 82 percent voted. Clearly, changes in those voting requirements would do more to "get out the vote" than any amount of preaching about the virtues of voting by public opinion pollsters or citizens' groups.

The proof lies in the actual voting records of the various States. In Idaho, where there is permanent tax-free registration and voters are allowed to register up to 3 days before the election, where only 6 months' residence in the State and 30 days in the county are required, where there is a liberal absentee voting law, 81 percent of the voting population voted in 1960.

In contrast, Mississippi, which requires 2 years' residence in the State and 1 year in the election district, which (except for the military) has a poll tax and no absentee voting, and which requires voters "to read, write, and interpret reasonably any section of the State constitution," had a 1960 turnout of 26 percent.

The eight States at the top of the turnout list—Idaho, New Hampshire, Utah, the Dakotas, West Virginia, Minnesota, and Connecticut—all have laws that facilitate voting.

The eight States at the bottom of the list—Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Virgina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and, finally, Mississippi—have laws that raise formidable barriers to voting. In the case of Negroes, these barriers are no doubt raised intentionally, but their effects extend farther than intended.

Around the period of any presidential election a certain amount of public feeling is aroused about such potential sources of voting injustice as the presidential primary and the electoral college.

Even the President recently wrote off any hope of doing anything about the imbedded electoral college, but perhaps enough public concern remains to provide the impetus to change some outmoded State election laws. Here are some changes suggested by experts and supported by the American Heritage Foundation, which might well be passed on to interested groups and legislators:

1. To facilitate the voting of movers in a nation increasingly on the move (a generally well-educated and thus highly qualified voting group), state residence requirements for local, State, and congressional elections should be reduced to 6 months and county requirements to 30 days. Residence requirements for voting in presidential elections should be pared to a minimum (Ohio now requires 40 days' residence), and people who move just before election day should be allowed to vote either in person or by absentee ballot—in the place they moved from.

2. All eligible voters physically unable to get to the polls should be allowed to vote—and register—by mail. Liberalization of the absentee balloting system—a measure supported by a heavy majority of the public—would solve most of the problems of travelers, people living abroad, as well as the sick, disabled and hospitalized.

3. Primaries should be held in late May or early June, instead of the summer, when many people are away on vacation.

4. Ballots should be shortened so that voters are not required to pass judgment on candidates they have never heard of for offices that logically belong under civil service or some other merit system.

5. Uncommunicative legal jargon used to describe propositions and amendments should be replaced by simple, descriptive language.

6. Registration should be permanent and registration lists should be checked annually to avoid fraud.

7. Paper ballots should be eliminated as fast as possible; voting machines or some better device should be substituted.

8. Literacy tests should be prepared by educators and should be objective and discrimination-proof.

If we can get some of the States to make some of these changes, we shall be on our way to that age-old democratic dream: universal suffrage.

FATHER DAMIEN AND THE KALAUPAPA SETTLEMENT

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, 90 years ago this month a young priest arrived at a forlorn settlement in the Hawaiian Islands to dedicate his life to the care of a colony of lepers. For 16 years, Father Joseph Damien de Veuster labored among the lepers until finally he himself became afflicted with the same disease and died a martyr's death.

The poignant story of the "Martyr of Molokai"—his life of self-sacrifice, his indomitable courage in rendering succor and solace to the outcasts in the leper colony—is related in an article which appeared in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin last week, under the byline of an able reporter, Chuck Frankel.

Father Damien's memory is held in such high esteem and affection and his work among the lepers regarded as so heroic that his many admirers have suggested a statue of the "Martyr of Molokai" be placed in Statuary Hall in this Capitol.

It is significant that the religious order of which he was a member—the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, more popularly known as the Picpus Fathers—is promoting the cause for Father Damien's beatification so that eventually he may be elevated to the rank of sainthood in the Catholic Church.

In noting the anniversary of the beginning of Father Damien's ministrations on Molokai, where a modern, efficient Hansen's disease settlement stands today, I should like to pay tribute to the Labor Reports

July-Aug, 1963
Suffrage Gen

THE MYSTERY OF A LOST LAW

Did you know that a whole section of the American Constitution has never been carried out? Well, it's true. Section 2 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which was adopted in 1868 and deals with the voting rights of American citizens, has never been enforced.

Specifically, this constitutional provision, which was one of many adopted after the Civil War to give full citizenship rights to the former slaves, provides that any state abridging or denying its citizens' right to vote shall have its quota of congressmen in the House of Representatives reduced proportionately. Thus, if state "X" is entitled by population to a quota of 10 congressmen, but 20% of its citizens are denied the right to register because they are Negroes, then under the Fourteenth Amendment state "X" should send only eight members to the House.

If Section 2 has never been carried out, it is not because there were no grounds for it. Quite the contrary; Negroes have been denied their voting rights in some states ever since the Fourteenth Amendment was first adopted. Today, only about one fourth of the non-whites in 12 Southern states are registered to vote. In 129 counties with heavy Negro populations, less than 10% of adult Negroes are registered to vote and in 23 counties not a single Negro is registered to vote.

Now, 95 years after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, two separate moves are afoot to begin to carry it out. In the Congress, Senator McNamara of Michigan has submitted a bill to implement it. And in the courts, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is seeking a court test to enforce it. But, at best, justice will still be delayed. The word from Congress is that short of an avalanche of popular support for the McNamara Bill it is destined to be strangled by those famous gold-dust twins, the reactionary Republicans and Southern Democrats. And in the courts, even if the NAACP wins its suit, the provisions of Section 2 cannot be carried out until after 1970, when the next national census will be taken. That's why the adoption of President Kennedy's civil rights bill, which boosts the Negro's chance of registering to vote in the South, is so important right now. It at least provides effective relief until the full weight of the Constitution can be brought into the battle. But, in the long run, both measures are needed if the voting rights of all Americans are to be safeguarded.

JLC Labor Reports

LWD, VJ, WB, file
J I

"On that day we rest, and to us it is the Sabbath of the Lord—its decent observance in a Christian community is that which ought to be expected.

"It is not perhaps necessary for the purposes of this case to rule and hold that the Christian religion is part of the common law of South Carolina. Still it may be useful to show that it lies at the foundation of even the article of the Constitution under consideration, and that upon it rest many of the principles and usages, constantly acknowledged and enforced, in the courts of justice."

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court, in Updegraph v. The Commonwealth, 11 Sergeant and Rawle, 400, made this declaration:

"Christianity, general Christianity, is, and always has been, a part of the common law of Pennsylvania; Christianity, without the spiritual artillery of European countries; for this Christianity was one of the considerations of the royal charter, and the very basis of its great founder, William Penn; not Christianity founded on any particular religious tenets; not Christianity with an established church, and tithes, and spiritual courts; but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men."

And subsequently, in Johnson v. The Commonwealth, 10 Harris, 111:

"It is not our business to discuss the obligations of Sunday any further than they enter into and are recognized by the law of the land. The common law adopted it, along with Christianity, of which it is one of the bulwarks."

In Arkansas, Shover v. The State, 10 English, 263, the Supreme Court said:

"Sunday or the Sabbath is properly and emphatically called the Lord's Day, and is one amongst the first and most sacred institutions of the Christian religion. This system of religion is recognized as constituting a part and parcel of the common law, and as such all of the institutions growing out of it, or, in any way, connected with it, in case they shall not be found to interfere with the rights of conscience, are entitled to the most profound respect, and can rightfully claim the protection of the lawmaking power of the State."

The Supreme Court of Maryland, in Judefind v. The State, 78 Maryland, 514, declared:

"The Sabbath is emphatically the day of rest, and the day of rest here is the Lord's Day or Christian's Sunday. Ours is a Christian community, and a day set apart as the day of rest is the day consecrated by the resurrection of our Saviour, and embraces the 24 hours next ensuing the midnight of Saturday. But it would scarcely be asked of a court, in what professes to be a Christian land, to declare a law unconstitutional because it requires rest from bodily labor on Sunday (except works of necessity and charity) and thereby promotes the cause of Christianity."

If now we pass from the domain of official action and recognition to that of individual acceptance, we enter a field of boundless extent, and I can only point out a few of the prominent facts:

Notice our educational institutions. I have already called your attention to the provisions of the charters of the first three colleges. Think of the vast number of academies, colleges and universities scattered through the land. Some of them, it is true, are under secular control, but there is yet to be established in this country one of those institutions founded on the religions of Confucius, Buddha or Mohammed, while an overwhelming majority are under the special direction and control of Christian teachers.

Notice also the avowed and pronounced Christian forces of the country, and here I must refer to the census of 1890, for the statistics of the census of 1900 in these matters have not been compiled: The population was 62,622,000. There were 165,000 Christian church organizations, owning 142,000 buildings, in which were sittings for 40,625,000 people. The communicants in these churches numbered 20,476,000, and the value of the church property amounted to $669,876,000. In other words, about one-third of the entire population were directly connected with Christian organizations. Nearly two-thirds would find seats in our churches. If to the members we add the children and others in their families more or less connected with them, it is obvious that a large majority were attached to the various church organizations. I am aware that the relationship between many members and their churches is formal, and that church relations do not constitute active and paramount forces in their lives, and yet it is clear that there is an identification of the great mass of American citizens with the Christian church. It is undoubtedly true that there is no little complaint of the falling off in church attendance, and of a lukewarmness on the part of many, and on the other hand there is a diversion of religious force along the lines of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Christian Endeavor Society, and the Epworth League. All these, of course, are matters to be noticed, but they do not avoid the fact of a formal adhesion of the great majority of our people to the Christian faith; and while creeds and dogmas and denominations are in a certain sense losing their power, and certainly their antagonisms, yet as a vital force in the land, Christianity is still the mighty factor. Connected with the denominations are large missionary bodies constantly busy in extending Christian faith through this Nation and through the world. No other religious organization has anything of a foothold or is engaged in active work unless it be upon so small a scale as scarcely to be noticed in the great volume of American life.

Again, the Bible is the Christian's book. No other book has so wide a circulation, or is so universally found in the households of the land. During their century of existence the English and American Bible societies have published and circulated 250 million copies, and this represents but a fraction of its circulation. And then think of the multitude of volumes published in exposition, explanation and illustration of that book, or some portion of it.

You will have noticed that I have presented no doubtful facts. Nothing has been stated which is debatable. The quotations from charters are in the archives of the several States; the laws are on the statute books; judicial opinions are taken from the official reports; statistics from the census publications. In short, no evidence has been presented which is open to question.

I could easily enter upon another line of examination. I could point out the general trend of public opinion, the disclosures of purposes and beliefs to be found in letters, papers, books, and unofficial declarations. I could show how largely our laws and customs are based upon the laws of Moses and the teachings of Christ; how constantly the Bible is appealed to as the guide of life and the authority in questions of morals; how the Christian doctrines are accepted as the great comfort in times of sorrow and affliction, and fill with the light of hope the services for the dead. On every hilltop towers the steeple of some Christian church, while from the marble witnesses in God's acre comes the universal but silent testimony to the common faith in the Christian doctrine of the resurrection and the life hereafter.

But I must not weary you. I could go on indefinitely, pointing out further illustrations both official and nonofficial, public and private; such as the annual Thanksgiving proclamations, with their following days of worship and feasting; announcements of days of fasting and prayer; the universal celebration of Christmas; the gathering of millions of our children in Sunday Schools, and the countless volumes of Christian literature, both prose and poetry. But I have said enough to show that Christianity came to this country with the first colonists; has been powerfully identified with its rapid development, colonial and national, and today exists as a mighty factor in the life of the republic. This is a Christian nation, and we can all rejoice as truthfully we repeat the words of Leonard Bacon:

"O God, beneath thy guiding hand
Our exiled fathers crossed the sea,
And when they trod the wintry strand,
With prayer and psalm they worshiped Thee.

"Thou heardst, well pleased, the song, the prayer—
Thy blessing came; and still its power
Shall onward through all ages bear
The memory of that holy hour.

"Laws, freedom, truth, and faith in God
Came with those exiles o'er the waves,
And where their pilgrim feet have trod,
The God they trusted guards their graves.

"And here Thy name, O God of love,
Their children's children shall adore,
Till these eternal hills remove,
And spring adorns the earth no more."

Suff. Ben.

AMERICAN BAR FOUNDATION PRIZE CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ESSAY

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, each year the American Bar Foundation sponsors the Samuel Pool Weaver Constitutional Law Essay Competition; and the winning essay for 1962 is one which every Member of the Senate should read. This paper, entitled "Free Elections and the Power of Congress Over Voter Qualifications," by Prof. Wilfred J. Ritz, of the Washington and Lee University Law School, has been published in the most recent issue of the American Bar Journal. Mr. Ritz, who is an acknowledged authority in the field of constitutional law, received his A.B. degree from Washington and Lee University, his LL.B. degree from the University of Richmond, and his master of laws and doctor of juridical science degrees from Harvard University.

In his essay, Professor Ritz traces the history and development of the Constitution's provisions relating to qualifications of voters; and he concludes that Congress should not legislate and, indeed, cannot legislate constitutionally, to alter the qualifications as prescribed by the States. Such an alteration is, of course, exactly what is provided for in title I of S. 1731, the administration's civil rights bill. This invidious proposal evidently evolved from the Civil Rights Commission's report and recommendations of 1961. It is interesting to note, however, that in its 1959 report the Commission recommended that the same objective be accomplished by the time-honored and only constitutional method of doing so—by amending the Constitution. I do not know what precipitated the Commission's remarkable turnabout; but I do know that if title I is adopted, it will be the first time in history that Congress has attempted to shortcut the amendment process and to prescribe qualifications by legislation.

Professor Ritz is not the first constitutional law professor to hold that congressional legislation in this area would be unconstitutional. The Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, in preparing for the hearings on the administration's so-called literacy bill, S. 2750, during the last Congress, requested opinions on the constitutionality and desirability of the measure, from constitutional law professors at every accredited law school in the country. At least half of the replies from professors, including those from distinguished law schools, such as the University of Michigan and George Washington University, agreed with Professor Ritz' thesis. S. 2750 did not pass either House in the 87th Congress, and I trust that the fate of title I of S. 1731 in this Congress will be equally deserved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Professor Ritz' essay, from the October 1963, American Bar Association Journal, be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREE ELECTIONS AND THE POWER OF CONGRESS OVER VOTER QUALIFICATIONS

(By Wilfred J. Ritz, professor of law, Washington and Lee University)

The group of Americans meeting at Philadelphia in 1787 to draft a Federal Constitution did not have a crystal ball to reveal the parts of their final product that would endure and those that would soon become obsolete. The course of future events soon demonstrated, though, that one of the constitutional provisions was unsatisfactory and essentially unworkable. This was the third clause of article II, section 1, providing for the election of a President and a Vice President.

No other provision of the Constitution was as lengthy; none was more detailed or drafted with greater care. And yet, in this provision, the Founding Fathers had entirely failed to foresee the rise of political parties.[1] As a result, the constitutional machinery for election of the Chief Executive worked well only while the people were agreed that a national hero should be the President—a phenomenon extremely rare in American life.[2]

After President Washington had retired from political life, the system survived the close election of 1796,[3] but very nearly broke down in the election of 1800, when the electoral votes were equally divided between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. Cooler heads prevailed and the tie was broken without disruption of the American experiment in government.[4] Nevertheless, if the situation had been oft repeated, the developing passions of the period most probably would soon have torn the American system of government apart.

After due deliberation, Congress in December of 1803 submitted to the States a proposed amendment to the Constitution to remedy the situation. The proposal received the speedy consideration it deserved, and by the end of July 1804, had been ratified by three-fourths of the States. As the 12th amendment it was operative for the next presidential election, held in November 1804.[5]

Unlike the lengthy and detailed clause covering the method of election of a President and Vice President which so quickly proved unsatisfactory, the original Constitution contains short and simple clauses covering the elections of Senators and Representatives. Their very simplicity, suggesting casualness of draftsmanship, can be misleading. Actually, the clauses are among the most carefully constructed in the document, and they are designed to carry out a basic constitutional purpose, a purpose that was continued when the 17th amendment was added in 1913.

The records of the Convention[6] show that it was deeply concerned with problems relating to the election of officials of the Federal Government. The Convention adopted a plan for the indirect election of the President and Vice President by use of an electoral college. Article II provides: "Each State shall appoint in such mannner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," thereby leaving the method of selection and qualifications to the States, although Congress was authorized to establish the time of their choosing.

In the election of Member of Congress, the Convention was concerned with four principal problems: (1) the method of election of Senators, which was resolved by giving the power to the State legislatures; (2) the method of election of Representatives, which initially involved a decision as to whether they should be chosen by the people or by the legislatures; (3) after popular election of Representatives had been decided upon, it was necessary to establish the qualifications of their electors; and (4) the extent to which the States and Congress, respectively, should participate in regulating the times, places and manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives.

On May 29, 1787, Edmund Randolph on behalf of the Virginia delegation presented the resolutions known as the Virginia plan, which provided the basic framework for the Constitution.[7] Randolph proposed a national legislature to consist of two branches, the members of the first to be elected by the people of the several States and the members of the second to be elected by the first branch from persons nominated by the State legislatures. The National Executive was to be elected by the National Legislature.[8]

Sitting on May 31 as a Committee of the Whole House, the Convention approved the resolution calling for a National Legislature to consist of two branches. It then considered and debated the resolution calling for election of the first branch by the people, adopting it by a vote of six States to two, with two States divided.[9] A few days later the Convention reconsidered, and again upheld popular election, this time by a vote of eight States to three.[10]

The New Jersey (or Patterson) plan, presented to the Convention on June 18, did not differ from the Virginia plan on this subject,[11] but during its consideration still another attack on popular election was narrowly defeated, when another motion to reconsider was voted down by six States to four, with one divided.[12] The Convention then agreed to election by the people of the first branch, with nine States in favor, only New Jersey opposed, and Maryland divided.[13]

On July 24 the Convention named a committee of detail to report a constitution conformable to the resolutions that had been adopted, among which were those calling for election of the Members of the first branch of Congress by the people and of the second branch by the State legislatures.[14] Election of Senators by the State legislatures, without more, established the qualifications of electors of Members of one branch of the Congress. In order to provide for popular election of Representatives, the committee had to consider alternative methods of defining the qualifications of their electors.

CONSIDERATION OF ELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES

The papers of the committee of detail show considerations was given to setting forth in the Constitution qualifications based on citizenship, manhood, sanity, residence, possession of real property or military service.[15] The committee also considered adopting the qualifications established by the States, with Congress given authority to alter or suspend them.[16] The final draft shows that the committee considered and deliberately struck out of its report a provision under which Congress would have been given the power to alter and supersede State provisions as to the qualifications of electors. Instead, the committee defined the qualifications of electors in the Constitution, denying the power of change to either the States or to Congress. This was done by providing that electors for the most numerous branch of the State legislatures should be electors for Representatives.[17] Except for minor stylistic changes, the final draft of the committee of detail was printed and delivered to the Convention on August 6.[18]

When the Convention on August 7 considered the report an effort was made to limit the suffrage to freeholders. After full and extended debate, the motion to make the change was defeated by the vote of seven States, with only Delaware in favor and Maryland divided.[19] On the following day further doubts were expressed as to the wis-

---

[1] Cunningham, "The Jeffersonian Republicans" 3–32 (1957); Miller, "The Federalist Era," 99–125 (1960).

[2] George Washington received all the electoral votes in the elections of 1789 and 1792.

[3] The electoral college gave votes to 13 candidates. John Adams with 71 electoral votes was elected President and Thomas Jefferson with 68 votes was elected Vice President.

[4] The electoral vote was 73 for Jefferson and 73 for Aaron Burr, thus throwing the election into the House of Representatives, where on the 36th ballot Jefferson was elected, receiving the vote of 10 States to 4 for Burr, with two not voting. Miller, op, cit. supra note 1, at 268.

[5] Virginia Commission on Constitutional Government, the Constitution of the United States, 39–41 (1961); Corwin, "The Constitution of the United States of America," S. Doc. No. 170, 82d Cong., 2d Sess. 942 (1953).

[6] Farrand, "The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787," 4 vols. (rev. ed. 1937), hereinafter cited as "Farrand."

[7] 1 Farrand 20.

[8] 1 Farrand 20–21, 27–28.

[9] 1 Farrand 46, 47–50, 54–55, 56, 60. Election by the people was favored by Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. New Jersey and South Carolina were opposed. Connecticut and Delaware were divided.

[10] 1 Farrand 118, 124, 130, 132–138, 140–141, 142–144, 145, 147. The six States previously favoring popular elections were joined by Delaware and Maryland, while Connecticut voted with the States favoring election by the State legislatures.

[11] 1 Farrand 291, 300.

[12] 1 Farrand 353, 358–360, 364–365, 367, 368. The motion was defeated by the votes of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia. The motion was favored by Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, and South Carolina. Maryland was divided.

[13] 1 Farrand 353, 360, 365. Before the final vote General Pickney withdrew a motion that the election by the people should be "in such mode as the legislatures should direct," when it was hinted that this might properly be left to the Committee on Detail, 1 Farrand 360.

[14] 2 Farrand 106, 129.

[15] 4 Farrand 40; 2 Farrand 151.

[16] 2 Farrand 153, 163–165.

[17] 2 Farrand 163–165.

[18] 2 Farrand 176, 177, 178–179.

[19] 2 Farrand 194, 201–208, 209–210.

dom of popular election, but the provision was approved without any State dissenting.[20] This ended the debate on the qualifications of voters.

On August 9 the Convention considered the power to be given to Congress to supersede State regulations as to the time, place, and manner of holding elections. The debate shows Congress was given power to do so to insure the fair conduct of elections in the event some State legislature should attempt manipulation for selfish or nefarious purposes and that the provision has nothing to do with voter qualifications.[21]

On September 8 the Convention named a committee of style, which rearranged the articles and phrased them somewhat more felicitously.[22] With only one change, made by the Convention to deny Congress any power over the place of election of Senators,[23] the provisions relating to elections were adopted and became a part of the completed Constitution.[24]

CONSTITUTION USES TERM "ELECTORS"

In summary, then, it can be said that under the original Constitution Representatives were the only Federal officials to be elected by the people directly. Article I, section 2, provides that Representatives shall be "chosen every second year by the people." The phrase "by the people" simply means that Representatives are to be elected by the people and not by State legislatures.

A different term is used to define the electorate, that is, the group of individuals who may actually vote for Representatives. This term, used throughout the Constitution, is "electors." Article I, section 2, also expressly defines, indirectly, the qualifications of electors for Representatives. It says that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."

The very simplicity of the clause invites use of a shorthand form of expression, and has led to statements to the effect that the States establish the qualifications of electors for Representatives. As the U.S. Supreme Court pointed out in United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299 (1941), "in a loose sense, the right to vote for Representatives in Congress is sometimes spoken of as a right derived from the States." Nevertheless, as the Classic case also pointed out, the qualifications of electors for Representatives are defined in the Constitution and are not defined by the States. The definition is in imperative terms—"the electors shall have."

Under article I, section 2, a State has no power to deny the right to vote for a U.S. Representative to a person qualified to vote as an elector for the most numerous branch of a State legislature, nor any power to give the right to vote for a Representative to a person who is not so qualified. Just as clearly, Congress has no power to deny the right to vote for a Representative to a person who is qualified to vote as an elector for the most numerous branch of his State's legislature, nor any power to give the right to vote to a person who is not so qualified.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ON VOTING ARE MANY

Elections and voting have been the subject of more constitutional amendments than any other single topic, as a listing of the amendments shows:

The 12th amendment, ratified in 1804, revised the method of electing the President and Vice President.

The 14th amendment, ratified in 1868, affects the subject in two respects: It provides for a reduction of representation in the House of Representatives whenever the right of male citizens 21 years of age and over to vote is abridged by a State for any reason other than participation in rebellion or other crimes. It disqualifies from further Federal or State officeholding any officeholder who, having sworn to support the U.S. Constitution, engages in insurrection or rebellion. The first provision has never been invoked to deny representation to a State, and the second has become obsolete with the passage of time.

The 15th amendment, ratified in 1870, prohibits denial or abridgment of the right to vote on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The 17th amendment, ratified in 1913, provides for the popular election of Senators. It follows the pattern set forth in the original Constitution by defining the qualifications of electors for this office. The electors in each State shall "have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures."

The 19th amendment, ratified in 1920, prohibits denial of the right to vote on account of sex.

The 20th amendment, ratified in 1933, revises and clarifies the method of election of the President in unusual situations.

Two of these amendments, the 15th and 19th, place direct restrictions on the qualifications the States may require of electors for State officials, and so indirectly these restrictions become limitations on the qualifications, as defined in the original Constitution and in the 17th amendment, of electors for Representatives and Senators. Otherwise, there are no constitutional restrictions on the qualifications the States may require of electors for State officials, and so also of electors of Federal officials.

In the summer of 1962 Congress adopted Senate Joint Resolution 29 proposing to the States another constitutional amendment dealing with voting qualifications. The proposed amendment prohibits the denial of a right to vote for President, Vice President, Senator or Representative because of a failure "to pay any poll tax or other tax."[25] In this resolution the pattern of previous amendments is departed from, in that a State is permitted to establish a different qualification for electors to the most numerous branch of its own State legislature than the State can establish for the election of Federal officials. The proposed amendment, however, continues the present policy of denying to Congress all power to establish or change the qualifications of electors for Federal officials.

COURT DECISIONS DEAL WITH SUFFRAGE QUESTIONS

Since the Constitution so clearly defines the qualifications of the persons who shall be electors for Federal officials, no litigation involving the point could arise until after the adoption of the 14th and 15th amendments. In Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. (21 Wall.) 162 (1875), a woman claimed that, since presidential electors in Missouri were elected by the people, she as a citizen of the United States was entitled to vote in such elections, so that the denial of the vote to her was prohibited by the privileges and immunities clause of section 1 of the 14th amendment. In accordance with the authoritative construction placed on that clause in the Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U.S. (16 Wall.) 36 (1873), the Supreme Court rejected the contention, pointing out that the 14th amendment did not confer a right of suffrage on anyone. If the 14th amendment had done so, the 15th amendment would have been unnecessary.

The 15th amendment, as it applies to State elections, was construed by the Supreme Court in United States v. Reese, 92 U.S. 214 (1876), in which the Court said: "The 15th amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone. It prevents the States, or the United States, however, from giving preference in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption, this could be done. It was as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, etc., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now it is not."[26]

In a series of cases the U.S. Supreme Court has considered the power of Congress under article I, section 4, of the Constitution to regulate the manner of holding elections. In these cases the Supreme Court has repeated time and again that the qualifications of electors are defined in the Constitution, and so are not subject to change either directly by the States or directly or indirectly by Congress. In a leading case, Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U.S. 651 (1884), the Court said: "The States in prescribing the qualifications of voters for the most numerous branch of their own legislatures, do not do this with reference to the election for Members of Congress. Nor can they prescribe the qualifications for voters for those to nomine. They define who are to vote for the popular branch of their own legislature, and the Constitution of the United States says the same persons shall vote for Members of Congress in that State. It adopts the qualifications thus furnished as the qualifications of its own electors for Members of Congress."[27]

This 1884 interpretation has not been departed from. The Supreme Court has recognized the power of the States to determine voter qualifications through the use of literacy tests[28] and poll taxes.[29] The Court has rejected the contention that since they are Federal officials some undefined power over the elections of Senators and Representatives rests in Congress.[30]

IMPLICATION OF CLASSIC CASE IS UNSUPPORTED

The principal judicial support for a view that Congress has some power over voter qualifications is found in a dictum by Chief Justice Stone (then an Associate Justice) in United States v. Classic, wherein he said: "While, in a loose sense, the right to vote for representatives in Congress is sometimes spoken of as a right derived from the States, * * * this statement is true only in the sense that the States are authorized by the Constitution to legislate on the subject as provided by section 2 of article I, to the extent that Congress has not restricted State action by the exercise of its powers to regulate elections under section 4 and its more general power under article I, section 8, clause 18."[31]

The implication that the powers of Congress under section 4 of article I may be used to restrict the powers of the States under section 2 of the same article is entirely without support in the history of the Federal convention of 1787 or in the prior decisions of the Court. If the reference had been to the power of the States to legislate un-

[20] 2 Farrand 213, 215–216, 225.

[21] 2 Farrand 229, 239–242, 244.

[22] 2 Farrand 547, 553, 554, 590, 592.

[23] 2 Farrand 613.

[24] 2 Farrand 651, 653.

[25] S.J. Res 29, 87th Cong., 2d sess., 108 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 16589.

[26] See also, United States v. Cruickshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876).

[27] See also, Swafford v. Templeton, 185 U.S. 487 (1902).

[28] Guinn v. United States, 238 U.S. 347 (1915); Lassiter v. Northampton County Board of Elections, 360 U.S. 45 (1959).

[29] Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277 (1937). See also Pirtle v. Brown, 118 F. 2d 218 (6th Cir. 1941), cert denied, 314 U.S. 621 (1941); Butler v. Thompson, 341 U.S. 937 (1951), aff'g 97 F. Supp. 17 (E.D. Va. 1951).

[30] Newberry v. United States, 256, U.S. 232 (1921).

[31] 313 U.S. at 315.

der section 4, instead of section 2, the statement would have been in complete accord with the language and history of the Constitution and the judicial precedents. Consequently, there is a strong probability that the reference to section 2 was a slip rather than a considered citation.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION MAKES RECOMMENDATIONS

In its 1961 report the Civil Rights Commission made a general finding No. 1: "There are reasonable grounds to believe that substantial numbers of Negro citizens are, or recently have been denied the right to vote on grounds of race or color in about 100 counties in 8 Southern States."[32] To eliminate this discrimination a majority of the Commission recommended that Congress adopt legislation prohibiting the States from denying the right to vote to any citizen of the United States "except for inability to meet reasonable age or length-of-residence requirements uniformily applied to all persons within a State, legal confinement at the time of registration or election, or conviction of a felony."[33] Two Commissioners dissented from this recommendation.

The Civil Rights Commission unanimously recommended that Congress adopt legislation specifically directed at State literacy tests. A sixth-grade education, under the proposed legislation, must be accepted by a State as sufficient compliance with a literacy test so as to qualify the applicant to vote.[34] A bill to carry out this recommendation was introduced into the second session of the 87th Congress, but, in the face of a southern filibuster, failed of adoption. It has been argued, as by the Attorney General, that such legislation would not establish a voting qualification, but only substitute "an objective and easily ascertainable requirement" for determining a previously established voter qualification,[35] and so is within the constitutional power of Congress. This argument has been vigorously opposed.[36]

Technically, the subject of what is or is not a voter qualification is outside the scope of this paper. However, since the purpose of legislation, such as that proposed in 1962 to restrict State use of literacy tests, is to permit persons to vote who otherwise would not be allowed to do so, the legislation necessarily restricts State control over voter qualifications to some extent. In this sense, whatever the particular terminology used, the proposed legislation gives Congress some control over voter qualifications. Consequently, it is appropriate to inquire into the reasons being offered for giving Congress power of this nature over voter qualifications.

ARGUMENTS FOR LEGISLATION ARE FOUND TO BE WEAK

Essentially, the arguments in favor of Congress having power to establish voter qualifications are two: (1) to eliminate restrictions on the exercise of a right of suffrage, such as the poll tax; and (2) to eliminate discrimination in the qualification of voters, as in the administration of a literacy test.

The force of the first reason is relatively weak, as is shown by the fact that the constitutional amendment proposed by the 87th Congress regarding poll taxes wholly prohibits the use of a tax as a voter qualification in Federal elections, leaving no discretion with Congress to abolish or establish this type of qualification. Consequently, the principal argument for having Congress assert some power over voter qualifications is based on the thought that the exercise of the power will enable Congress to eliminate discrimination in the administration of qualification tests more effectively than can be done under its present powers.

This raises the question whether there are not other remedies now available to eliminate discrimination. Ever since the post-Civil War period there has been Federal legislation, which has been frequently augmented, designed to protect American citizens in the exercise of their right to vote. The effectiveness of this legislation has been debated. After Attorney General Kennedy, in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee holding hearings on the literacy test bill, referred to particular examples of discrimination, the following verbal exchange took place between him and the chairman, Senator ERVIN, of North Carolina:

"Senator ERVIN. And I think all those situations could be cleared up with a few old-fashioned criminal prosecutions in the Federal courts.

"Attorney General KENNEDY. Well, I appreciate your support on that, Mr. Chairman, but I tell you we are bringing those, but it is going to take a long, long period of time.

"And I would like to have you join us in attempting to try to get rid of it so that it just does not go on, and we can pass legislation to deal with that problem and get rid of it much quicker than we could by bringing lawsuit after lawsuit."[37]

This colloquy shows that even the proponents of congressional power over voter qualifications recognize that the Federal Government already has sufficient power to eliminate voter discrimination. The basic disagreement is not whether discrimination is to be eliminated, but how soon and by what methods.

Recent Federal court decisions do not show any lack of power in the Federal Government to eliminate voter discrimination. The activities of the Civil Rights Commission have been sanctioned by the U.S. Supreme Court.[38] Powers given by Congress to the Attorney General to inspect Federal election records have been upheld and implemented.[39] Furthermore, when the Federal courts have found discrimination to exist as a fact, they have affirmatively ordered the registration of persons qualified to vote.[40]

The establishment of voter qualifications under the Federal Constitution is based on the principle that complete objectivity and self-interest are mutually exclusive concepts. Since the Members of Congress have a large self-interest in their own elections, and in certain instances they may be required to participate in the election of the President and Vice President, Congress can never take a wholly disinterested view toward the subject of voter qualifications.

This was recognized by the Federal Convention of 1787, and so power over voter qualifications was entirely denied to Congress. Similarly, in 1913, when the Constitution was amended so as to require popular election of Senators, the policy of denying to Congress power over voter qualifications was continued.

Conditions have changed since 1787. As time has gone by, the right to vote has been accorded ever greater significance in the pattern of American Government. Even so, the primary, if not the only, purpose to be served by having Congress assert power to fix voter qualifications seems to be to provide an additional weapon against voter discrimination. Discrimination must be eliminated and can be with the powers now available to Congress. As important as the objective is, an even more fundamental right is involved.

The basic right guaranteed to the people of the United States by the Federal Constitution, particularly by article I, section 2, and the 17th amendment, is a right of free elections. Truly free elections can exist only if the elected cannot influence their continued election by manipulation of the members of the group that constitutes their electors. For this reason, the Constitution establishes the qualifications of electors for Federal officials by a readily ascertainable and completely objective standard. This objective standard is beyond the power of the Federal Government to change, except by going to the States and the people to seek a change through the process of constitutional amendment. History demonstrates that when change has been needed, the necessary constitutional amendments have been forthcoming.

Under the Federal Constitution the people have reserved to themselves power to change the qualifications of voters for Federal officials. Since this is the fundamental principle on which the American system of free elections is based, the present constitutional guarantee of free elections should not be weakened by giving Congress power to establish voter qualifications.

---

[32] 1961 U.S. Commission on Civil Rights Report, Book 1, voting 135.

[33] Id. at 139.

[34] Id. at 141.

[35] Hearings on S. 480, S. 2750, and S. 2979 Before the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. Senate, 87th Cong., 2d sess. 263, 265, 310 (1962).

[36] See, for example, comments made by Senator ERVIN during testimony of Attorney General Kennedy. Hearings, supra note 41, at 261–291.

[37] Id. at 273.

[38] Hannah v. Larche, 363 U.S. 420 (1960).

[39] Kennedy v. Lynd, 306 F. 2d 222 (5th Cir. 1962); Kennedy v. Bruce, 298 F. 2d 860 (5th Cir. 1962); Dinkens v. Attorney General, 285 F. 2d 430 (5th Cir. 1961); In re Coleman, 208 F. Supp. 199 (S.D. Miss. 1962).

[40] Alabama v. United States, 304 F. 2d 583 (5th Cir. 1962). On October 22, 1962, the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari in this case and in a per curiam opinion affirmed the judgment below. 371 U.S. 37. United States v. Manning, 206 F. Supp. 623 (W.D. La. 1962).

NYT Mag. 11/17/63 Suff. Gen.

"Unlike other folks, too many Americans 'just don't give a damn'."

Drawing by Arno Sternglass.

Why One Third of Us Don't Vote

Of those who seldom enter a polling booth, a large number are kept away by political and mechanical barriers that should be removed.

By RICHARD M. SCAMMON

IT is a sad fact of our American politics that we just don't go to the polls the way other folks do. For years comment by observers here and overseas has underlined the relatively low percentage of our adults who participate in the decision-making of democracy by going to the polls to mark a ballot or pull a lever. Some say the business of getting registered and voting is just too cumbersome, others that many Americans "just don't give a damn." A Presidential Commission on Registration and Voting Participation is shortly to report on these problems. Meanwhile, just what is our score?

In November, 1960, there were 107 million civilians of voting age in the United States. Just under 70 million of these went to the polls — about 65 per cent. Compare this figure with the turnout last spring in elections in Austria and Italy. In these two countries better than 90 per cent voted. Our neighbors in Canada also voted last spring — and they turned out 80 per cent.

Now admittedly some of this difference is statistical rather than real. The 107 million who were of voting age here in 1960 included aliens, transients, people who didn't pay poll tax, and others who weren't legally eligible to vote anyway. But even making these allowances, our turnout in the Kennedy-Nixon 1960 contest was nothing to brag about. Our voting in the 1962 off-year elections was even lower, as it always is in the presumably less glamorous, less exciting non-Presidential years.

Looking at the record, one may well ask: Who are these Americans who don't vote? What keeps them from the polls?

Women are one major group of nonvoters. As far back as 40 years ago an elections expert, Prof. Harold Gosnell, discovered that three-quarters of the unregistered adult citizens in Chicago were women, and that a good number of these were deliberate antisuffrage nonvoters.

TODAY this antisuffrage group would be very much smaller, but the voting participation of women remains markedly lower than that of men—a full 10 per cent lower. Though there are several million more adult women than men in America today, official records and survey estimates agree that a Presidential election sees about an equal number of each at the polls. In part, this may still be due to the feeling from an older era that voting, or having anything to do with politics and public affairs, is "unladylike." The larger reason probably lies in the generally less active role of women in our public life; again and again polls tell us women are less well informed about our politics, less interested in politics, less concerned with political activity. (This is not a purely American phenomenon; it is true of most countries.) If it were not for the devoted work of organizations like the League of Women Voters the differential might be even greater.

Young people are another group whose turnout rate lowers the national average. The age curve for active voters rises sharply to 30, then more slowly to a peak somewhere between 50 and 65. After 65 it drops off gradually. All this is perfectly understandable. Youngsters just finishing school, just getting started in jobs or shifting them, young men involved in problems of military service — these young citizens could hardly be expected to vote with the same frequency as their fathers and mothers. And they don't. As they grow older, marry, begin families, settle down and get involved in public affairs, up goes their voting percentage.

Besides women and young voters, participation is low among what might be generally called "the disadvantaged," the citizens of low income or low education or, most frequently, of both. In a city like Albany, N. Y., with its highly efficient political organization, there may be an almost universal turnout. But this is the exception. Most areas have differentials in voter participation, and these differentials are most frequently a reflection of income and education.

In the Northern states, voting also tends to be generally lower in the city than in its suburbs, and frequently lower in the city than in small towns and in rural America. Though these trends are often reversed in the South, it is notable that the five states with the best voter turnout record in 1960 were Idaho, Utah, New Hampshire, and the two Dakotas; in all five states taken together there is only one place (Salt Lake City) with more than 100,000 people.

TO cite other examples of these turnout trends: In Hennepin County, Minnesota, the adults in Minneapolis voted 71 per cent in 1960; those in the suburbs outside Minneapolis voted 84 per cent. In Cuyahoga County, Ohio, Cleveland had a turnout of 61 per cent, the suburbs 79 per cent. In Illinois' close 1960 Presidential vote, Chicago showed a turnout of 72 per cent, suburban Cook County 81 per cent. Both these figures were lower than in a number of counties in rural southern Illinois, some of which ran up over 90 per cent voter participation.

But geographically the nonvoter is found first and foremost in the South. Here race, one-party politics and mechanical obstacles have combined to keep voter participation low. While many parts of the South have free, open voter-registration systems, with any citizen entitled to register and to vote, there are still areas, especially in the rural segments of the Deep South, where Negro voting ranges from difficult to impossible. The various reports of the Civil Rights Commission have documented this melancholy story in place after place. Though there have been increases in Negro registration in parts of the South, in many counties the Negro citizen is simply not allowed to vote in any significant numbers.

But the Southern nonvoter is also white; even disregarding the Negro, voter participation has been low in the South for generations. It is rising now; in the past 20 years the voter turnout in the Southern states has built up much more rapidly than elsewhere. While the rest of the country has changed only marginally, the Southern states have all shown marked gains. Of course, it may be said this is because the South has further to go, but the fact of gain is there—and it is a gain in white as well as in Negro voting.

MUCH of this Southern gain, and the relatively low turnout among women, young people and "the disadvantaged," are due in part to a set of factors we might call "involvement." A political party organization can mobilize voters for an election; plain sense of duty may call out others. But for many this isn't enough. There must be more, and that something more may be called interest or caring—involvement.

Caring may arise from a variety of sources—party dedication, issues, personalities, (Continued on Page 56)

RICHARD M. SCAMMON is director of the Bureau of the Census and chairman of the President's Commission on Registration and Voter Participation. A few years ago he edited a work in three volumes, "America Votes."

Why One Third Don't Vote

(Continued from Page 36)

these are a few. There is no question that a person with a high sense of party identification is more likely to vote than a generally uncommitted citizen.

Issues represent another strong potential in developing maximum voter interest and involvement. In 1958 referenda on "right-to-work" legislation helped to bring out heavy votes in Ohio and California. The state lottery voting next March in New Hampshire is widely expected to bring an increased turnout in that state. Many observers would argue that the "issue" of religion added to the voter participation in the 1960 Presidential race.

Personalities as well as issues can develop new areas of involvement. Al Smith in 1928 and Dwight Eisenhower in 1952 are two cases in point from the national scene, and almost every state and locality has examples of the way in which an individual can stimulate response from what were usually regarded as "uncaring" citizens.

IN the South increased participation may come from still a different source — the growth of a two-party, meaningful political system, at least at the Presidential level. The average citizen doesn't see much point in voting if there isn't anything to vote for, and for many years the monopoly of political power in the South was with Democrats. General elections didn't mean much, and primary elections often saw a higher turnout than did the November "contest."

But most of these reasons for a citizen's not voting involve not caring. They are personal, even psychological. Some may involve deliberate abstention, but most are indicative of a lack of interest. Just as important—maybe more so—are the mechanical barriers to voting, and perhaps the greatest of these is registration.

IN the great majority of our states, Americans have to register to vote. This requirement is not universal; in North Dakota and rural Minnesota, for example, you just go to the polling place and ask for a ballot. But the frauds so prevalent many years ago in our country led to widespread demands for personal registration by the voter, and that's the law today in most states. While Americans consider this a normal-enough procedure, it isn't the practice in other, high-turnout, countries. There it is the job of the local authorities to put every qualified person on the list of voters, automatically. All the voter has to do is show up on election day, ready to vote. This automatic registration of voters is perhaps the most important single factor in the high voter-participation figures in so many other countries.

Not only do most Americans have to register to vote, often they find the closeout date for final registering is weeks — or even months—before Election Day. Sometimes potential voters are allowed to register only "downtown," and possibly only during working hours. In some communities these limitations may be deliberately designed to cut down registration, but in the great majority they are simply a reaction to major cost problems or an example of bureaucratic apathy.

(Continued on Page 58)

(Continued from Page 56)

Another part of the "mechanical" problem in getting a bigger voter turnout at our polls is the long residence requirement—in one state it is two years — that disqualifies many. One in five of our people move in any year, and many lose their votes in the process. Then, too, voting is a working-day proposition in this country, and getting time off to vote is still sometimes a problem. This is especially true in those states which close the polls early; voting studies indicate the states with a late closing hour usually have the higher turnout.

LITERACY tests applied so as to discourage voting, complex absentee-voter laws, long lines on Election Day, all these are "institutional" hurdles to better American voter turnout. Among these there must still be counted the poll tax, but anticipated favorable action on a pending constitutional amendment should eliminate this obstacle.

But these are all institutional handicaps to voting. Even were these to go, turnout would not be perfect — even if we wanted it so. In Canada, where the automatic enumeration of voters lists nearly every eligible from Labrador west to Vancouver, there are still 20 per cent of these eligibles who don't vote. Even in Idaho, the present American voter-turnout champion, there are still a lot of eligible Idahoans who don't vote. In 1964, if America had a perfect system of listing our voters, we would still find millions who would not vote, even in the excitement and hurly-burly of a Presidential campaign.

(Continued on Page 60)

(Continued from Page 58)

For those potential voters who skip their chance to vote because of lack of interest, lack of caring—those who just "don't give a damn" — there probably isn't much that can be done. Indeed, there is very likely a limit beyond which there is not much that should be done. Active though the parties may be, and interested as the great majority of citizens may be, some people will always be found in the non-participating category.

Basically, such citizens are not interested enough in public affairs to have many ideas about anything. They are the ones who show up in public-opinion polls as "no opinion" or "don't care." Indeed, they might be called examples of lumpenwähler, or electoral bums. If they had any interest or ideas they would probably have some opinions, but without the former, they haven't the latter. For these people there is not much to do, and the democratic process is probably just as well off without them.

Moreover, not voting is their privilege, and very few would urge a system of compulsory voting to goad these reluctant electors to the polls. In our democracy there is as much right not to vote as there is to join in the decision-making of democracy.

BUT for the others, those disfranchised by restrictive legislation, institutional barriers can be torn down — and they should be torn down. Like the Berlin Wall, they are an affront to the democratic idea. Obstacles to voting by people who do give a damn, who do want to vote, who do seek to play a role in our American democracy can and should be eliminated. No unwilling voter need be dragged kicking and screaming to the polls. Equally, no willing voter should ever be able to say "they" kept him from exercising his right to vote.

11-18-63

HOW THE VOTING WENT IN IMPORTANT AREAS

In the elections: Racial, civil-rights resentments flaring in Philadelphia, Kentucky and elsewhere indicate re-election problems ahead for President Kennedy. Here is a look at key voting areas.

Suff. General

PHILADELPHIA

Election analysts are in agreement that President Kennedy has been hurt politically in this important city by his intensive drive for civil rights.

Examining the election figures of November 5, these men see signs that, if present trends continue, Mr. Kennedy may be hard put to win Pennsylvania's 29 electoral votes in 1964. Their loss would be a serious blow to the Democratic cause.

The voting showed that Negroes are standing stanchly behind the President and the Democratic Party, as seen in the accompanying table.

To a lesser extent, so, too, are voters of the Jewish faith. These groups identify Mr. Kennedy and the Democratic Party as the defenders of civil rights.

Troubles elsewhere. Democratic troubles come in other areas. White voters, especially among lower-income minority groups—Italians, Poles, Irish—are reacting against the President's effort to force integration of races by law.

Voters appear to reflect Negro encroachments in their residential areas, with an accompanying drop in property values. They apparently fear a loss of jobs to Negroes, under the President's plan. There is opposition to forced integration of schools.

These circumstances combined to slash usual Democratic pluralities in Philadelphia, and gave Mr. Kennedy a defeat of a peculiarly personal nature.

The Democratic nominee for mayor, James H. J. Tate, won by 61,000 votes. Four years ago, the Democrat's margin was 205,000. In 1960, Mr. Kennedy took the city by more than 331,000.

At the same time, he took the State by 116,000. To win Pennsylvania, it was necessary to score overwhelmingly in the city. This is a perennial situation in Pennsylvania politics. It will be the same next year.

The Philadelphia election was a personal setback for the President because, less than a week before Election Day, he came to Philadelphia to urge Mr. Tate's election. On Election Day, sound trucks, placards and leaflets urged a vote for Tate as a vote for Kennedy.

Democratic politicians are taking comfort in the fact that the party organization produced enough votes to elect Mr. Tate. It also was noted, however, that Mr. Tate, colorless as a campaigner, himself was running against a lackluster campaign of Republican James T. McDermott, a candidate with a record of past electoral defeats.

Tense city. Philadelphia has been a city of racial tension and sometimes

VOTE SHIFTS IN KEY PHILADELPHIA WARDS

In the race for mayor—

	Democratic percentage of major-party vote
	In 1959	In 1963
32nd ward—heavily Negro, scene of Negro rioting late in October	77.8%	78.8%
28th ward—also heavily Negro, near area of October rioting	79.4%	80.3%
26th ward—largely Italian, many voters critical of Negroes	60.9%	46.9%
48th ward—mainly Italian; also Irish, Jewish, Polish. Unions strong	58.9%	44.3%
52nd ward—heavily Jewish. Middle and upper class	77.2%	71.0%
54th ward—predominantly Jewish. Middle class; row and twin houses	74.7%	61.6%
45th ward—lower middle class. Many Poles and Irish. Negroes moving in	60.8%	47.8%
18th ward—lower middle class. Another area where Negroes are moving in	59.0%	40.4%
41st ward—middle class. Many new homes. Swinging to Republicans	60.5%	45.4%

Of these nine key wards, all of which went heavily Democratic 4 years ago, five switched to the Republican candidate this time. Republicans showed percentage gains in all but two.

—Wide World Photo

In Philadelphia, Democrat James H. J. Tate won the election for mayor by 61,000 votes. Four years ago, the Democrat was elected by 205,000 votes.

—"Louisville Courier-Journal" Photo

In Kentucky, Democrat Edward T. Breathitt won the Governorship by about 15,000 votes. Four years ago, the State went Democratic by 180,000.

—"Jackson Daily News" Photo

In Mississippi, Democrat Paul B. Johnson, Jr., won the Governorship. But a Republican who ran against him got an impressive 38 per cent of the total vote.

violence for more than a year. Unemployment is substantial, and the competition for jobs between the races has increased. Tension has mounted over mixing the races at school.

Negroes carried out sit-ins in Mayor Tate's office. Pressure was brought to bear on the building-trades unions to admit Negroes. Work on several construction projects was stopped.

Not long before the election, a Negro robbery suspect was killed by a white policeman. Negro rioting swept over areas of North Philadelphia.

Resentment also built up among whites against what they call one of the most militant National Association for the Advancement of Colored People organizations in the country. The NAACP leader endorsed Mr. Tate.

After the 1960 election, Republican strategists figured that, to win a Statewide election in Pennsylvania, they must have 40 per cent of the Philadelphia vote. Republican Senator Hugh Scott scored 41 per cent to win in 1958. Last year, Republican Governor William W. Scranton drew 43.2 per cent and was elected. Mr. McDermott's percentage in the voting of November 5 was about 46.

Of course, Mr. Kennedy, running for President next year, is expected to roll up a much more impressive total than did Mr. Tate. Whether he can win the city by enough to take the State also is the problem bothering Democrats.

LOUISVILLE, Ky.

A Republican appeal to segregationist sentiment almost won a gubernatorial election in Kentucky, with trouble plainly ahead for Democrats and President Kennedy next year.

The Democratic candidate, Edward T. Breathitt, won by about 15,000 in a State that four years ago went Democratic by 180,000. The losing Republican was Louis B. Nunn.

In addition to the race issue, a growth of Republican voting in recent years and factionalism among Democrats contributed to Mr. Nunn's strong showing.

Mr. Nunn based his strategy on these facts:

Since 1952, he had noticed, Republicans were winning federal elections in Kentucky. Dwight D. Eisenhower took the State in 1956, and Richard M. Nixon won by 81,000 in 1960. In the period 1952-62, Senator Morton and Senator John Sherman Cooper, both Republicans, were elected twice each. Meanwhile, Democrats were winning State and local races.

Mr. Nunn's decision was to run on federal issues.

Target: rights order. A handy weapon was a recent executive order issued by Governor Bert T. Combs opening establishments under State license to Negroes. The issuance of the order was, Mr. Nunn said, dictatorial, unconstitutional and an arbitrary act.

At the same time, he attacked the Kennedy Administration and sought to link it with Governor Combs's action. He also attacked the Supreme Court for its decision outlawing prayers in the schools.

These issues proved effective in the depressed areas of southeastern Kentucky and the southwestern part of the State where sympathies are highly Southern.

Kentucky's Negro population is relatively small. Most of the Negroes live in Louisville and surrounding Jefferson County. It was here that Mr. Nunn miscalculated.

This area is usually Republican. The Nunn camp had expected to carry Jefferson County by as many as 20,000 or more votes. But the Negroes were for the Combs executive order and hence for Mr. Breathitt. Mr. Nunn won in Jefferson County by a bare 5,000 votes.

When the county vote had been tabulated on election night, Mr. Nunn realized that he was in serious trouble, and conceded the election. This concession he withdrew a few hours later, charging voting frauds in several areas. He asked for recounts in these sections.

That leaves Mr. Breathitt with the executive order barring discrimination on his hands. The order was early tied up in litigation and never has been enforced. Mr. Breathitt said in his campaign that the subject had best be left to the legislature. It meets in January. When the executive order goes to the legislature for action, Negro leaders are planning a "march on Frankfort" to put pressure behind the issue.

The Democratic factionalism came from former Governor A. B. ("Happy") Chandler. Mr. Breathitt defeated him in the primary election. Mr. Chandler, who cherishes his grudges, organized a "Democrats for Nunn" group. Its activities are thought to have cost Mr. Breathitt votes in the bluegrass country.

INDIANAPOLIS

The civil-rights issue was present in a virtual Republican sweep of mayoral elections in Indiana. However, some people argued about the extent of its influence.

"If anything," said one knowledgeable observer, "the city voting shows that Kennedy has lost strength. So many Indiana Democrats are really 'Dixiecrats,' and Kennedy's civil-rights program just doesn't set well with them."

(continued on next page)

[continued from preceding page]

Civil rights was not openly an issue in any of the mayoral campaigns. Spokesmen for both parties said the Democrats appeared to hold much of the Negro vote as in the past.

In this setting, the Republicans elected 62 mayors to 49 for the Democrats. In 1959, the score was 71 Democrats to 37 Republicans. Three new cities elected mayors for the first time.

This was considered a big shift. Republicans called it the forerunner of "smashing Republican victories in 1964."

Indiana is traditionally considered a Republican State. However, it has two Democratic Senators, one elected in 1958 and the other in 1962. It also has a Democratic Governor, elected in 1960.

Nevertheless, Richard M. Nixon took Indiana and its 13 electoral votes in 1960 with a plurality of 222,762 votes. Many observers think Republican dominance now is being restored.

How cities went. The Republican triumph was most apparent in the State's 23 largest cities. Four years ago, the Democrats won 22 of the 23. This time, they won only seven.

Indianapolis, the largest city, stayed in the Democratic column by 5,600 votes—or 13,000 fewer than in the election of 1959.

Statewide, the principal issue was a 2 per cent sales tax that took effect in October. It now is under attack in the courts. Each party blamed the other for the bill. The Republican Lieutenant Governor broke a Senate tie in favor of the impost. The Democratic Governor, Matthew E. Welsh, signed the tax measure and defended it personally when unions sought to upset it in the courts.

The importance of the municipal voting lies in the city-hall patronage that can be thrown into next year's elections. From this point of view it was a distinct Democratic loss.

JACKSON, Miss.

For the first time since Reconstruction days, Republicans challenged the dominant Democratic Party here in Mississippi and were jubilant at the results.

Their candidate for Governor, Rubel Phillips, emerged with about 38 per cent of the vote.

As a result, party leaders hailed the arrival of a two-party system in the Deep South, especially when combined with a Republican's capture of 49.1 per cent of the vote in an Alabama election for a U S. Senate seat last year.

Mr. Phillips promised to support the nomination and election of Arizona Senator Barry Goldwater to the Presidency.

The winning Democrat, Lieutenant Governor Paul B. Johnson, Jr., like Mr. Phillips, is a stanch segregationist. He promised to support the massive-resistance policies of Governor Ross R. Barnett on racial integration.

Mr. Johnson argued against the establishment of a two-party system. It would, he said, "split white conservatives" and give moderates and Negroes the balance of power.

Write-in votes for a Negro candidate were declared illegal and not counted. After the election, civil-rights leaders said they would conduct a massive campaign to register 80,000 Negroes.

TRENTON, N. J.

The election left some gloomy Democrats in New Jersey, including Governor Richard J. Hughes.

In the first place, the voters turned down the Governor's proposal for 750 million dollars in bond issues for State institutions and highways.

In addition, Republicans took solid control of both branches of the State legislature.

The party gained four seats in the State senate. It had been ahead in the senate by 11 to 10. Now it is 15 to 6.

The Republicans also picked up 13 seats in the general assembly. They now get 33 seats to 27 for the Democrats. It had been: Democrats 37, Republicans 20, with 3 vacancies.

Defeat on the bond issues left Governor Hughes some knotty problems on raising revenues. He must seek Republican co-operation to get anything controversial accomplished. Republicans opposed the bond issues, are expected to come up with an alternative.

The Governor also has a tall job ahead soothing county and local leaders who consider that his insistence on the bond issues caused defeat in the legislative contests. The Governor was elected in 1961 by a bare 38,500 votes out of more than 2 million cast. He will be up for election again in 1965.

In Congress: taxes, civil rights and a logjam. Page 74.

IN THE PRESIDENT'S HOME TOWN—

BOSTON

Here in President Kennedy's home town, an election battle resulted in a repudiation of forced integration in public schools.

The battle had run all summer. On one side was the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. On the other was the local school committee, which controls public schools.

The Boston branch of the NAACP had charged that local schools were segregated because some were predominantly Negro. It demanded that some children be transferred from their neighborhood schools in order to bring racial "balance."

The chairman of the school committee, Mrs. Louise Day Hicks, refused to permit discussion of the charges in open committee meetings, ruling that there was no segregation in the schools.

Three others on the five-member committee supported Mrs. Hicks. One, Arthur J. Gartland, favored hearing the charges.

Committee re-elected. At the polls on November 5, Mrs. Hicks won a thumping victory for re-election, getting more votes than any other citywide candidate. With 128,000 votes, she outpolled even Mayor John F. Collins, who won a sweeping victory with 108,000 votes.

—Wide World Photo

Mrs. Hicks celebrates election

All five committee members were re-elected. Mr. Gartland received the smallest vote of the five. A Negro social worker, seeking a seat on the committee, finished seventh among 10 candidates.

Pressures brought by the NAACP produced strong feelings on each side. Several thousand children stayed out of school for one day in June. In September, eight pickets sat all night in the headquarters of the school committee.

Cabbage Town

I first began working in Cabbage Town around the end of May. To give myself an excuse for taking with people, and also just to gather some information, I began by taking a housing survey around. Spending up to forty-five minutes with each person, we would get into all sorts of subjects. I was very careful not to say anything about organizing at this point, since I didn't know how suspicious people wuld be. In general, though, they were quite friendly. After about a week, as a cover for returning to the same people, I composed a second questionnaer asking bout the problems the person had mentioned, what he/she hd tried to do about them and if they felt that some people together could accomplish things where they alone had failed. People were receptive enough that I didn't need the survey as a cover to discuss this idea.

On May 31, we held our first meeting in Cabbage Town. Only three people came (all women). In that m ting, we planned for all of us to continue taking the survey, and when we got enoug interested people, we would draw up lists of complaints for each landlord and get a delegation to present them to the landlords. It wasa good plan, but it failed because of the ladies' husbands. I have found that the women tend to be much more active there than the men. I'm not sure why, but the husbands all x prohibited their wives from doing anything further. (In part, this was due to the women's attraction to a new young man with part of a college education; the men resented me.)

After that meeti g's failure, I continued my survey on my own to find sme new people, which I did. We planned several meetings, none of which materialized. I still don't know why, since people readily agreed that we should get together to talk about our problems. By the endof June, I came up wth one person who was interested enough in these problems to do something about them.

Vine City

It wasn't until around the second week of June that I began to really get anywhere in Vine City. On June 9, several t enagers came to us and asked for help in getting a recreation center for them. After their intial reauest, though, they let the matter drop, so that it was left to me to follow it up. In the next few weeks, I got to know several of them by sitting in the back lot drinking b eer or home brew. Whenever I felt it appropriate, I brought up the subject of the recreation center, but I didn't want to qush anything too much.

During this time, my days were divided between relaxing wth the block boys in Vine City, and working in Cabbage Town. However, on the day Helen Howard qualified, three guys and I went downtown to see Jack Delius of the Department of Parks. We held a two hour conversence with him. This was the beginning of some action. For the next week or so, we went to see the other city and EOA officials. Everywhere we went, they told us we should see somebody else, so finally we just decided to see the Mayor. About ten of us went. They told us he was busy; somebody said we would wait; sothey got us Dan Sweat - a Mayor's Aid. After two conferences with him, it became clear to everybody that they weren't going to do anyt ing.

Mainly because I'm living in Vine City, I found that when there was work to be done in Cabbage Town and Vine City, I tended to do the Vine City work. So when things began to happen in Vine City, I found myself spending lessand less time in Cabbage Town.

For weeks, I talked with the guys and tried to get them to do something. The most I could get them to do was to go out and use a recreation center in Peachtree Hills.

On July 14, however, something finally began to happen, through the action of sometteenagers in Mechanicsvill. After they blocked the streets, we got together to discuss working together for a recreation center in both areas. Their action stimulated several teenage guys here. On Saturday, July 16, we held our first demonstration here. Several guys from Mechanicsvill came over and joined in. A demonstration we planned to have over there for several days later kept getting postponed to wait for meetings with some officials or other. I think some of the guys working on it got disappointed that we were neither accomplishing xxx something, nor demonstrating. So when the city came up with a compromise offer of renovating an old house, if we could find one, they decided to accept. I think they were wrong - that this is just in keeping with the pattern of the Negroes getting the scraps while they have the nice new building out in Peachtree Hills. But I didn't say anything because I had already pushed too much.

Right now, I'm not really sure what is going to happen. I don't think the guys are very happy with the settlement they agreed on, and they haven't even had the initiative to go out and look for a building - something I don't intend to do myself. Perhaps if the guys in Mechanicsvill get their center, that will stimulate those here in Vine City.

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL Guide

Nov., 1949
Vol. 7, No. 2

OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

farmers build together

When we work as a team, it is easy to get the job done. Farmers have learned long ago that they must work together if they want to prosper. Farm organizations are an important part of farm life. Here in Ohio we need to build an even stronger FARM BUREAU to meet the problems ahead. We need teamwork today more than ever before.

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL Guide

Jan. 1950
Vol. 7, No. 4

OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

MARKETING OUR OHIO CROPS

Marketing our crops efficiently is one of the most important jobs facing Ohio farmers today. Farm output in 1948 is about 40 per cent above the 1935-39 average, but the population has increased only about 15 per cent. The threat of surpluses may break the market if we do not learn to market better the things we grow.

Farm prices are already down 20 per cent from their peak in 1947 and they may fall another 15 per cent in 1950.

Today farmers are only getting 49 cents out of each dollar that consumers spend. We may get less next year.

These are a few of the facts which stare us in the face today. The problem is to find some way to market our crops at a better price. Many of us are using farmer marketing cooperatives to increase our farm income.

HOW FAR SHOULD WE GO IN MARKETING OUR VARIOUS FARM PRODUCTS THROUGH COOPERATIVES?

HOW CAN WE MARKET OUR FARM PRODUCTS AT A BETTTER PRICE?

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL Guide

Mar. 1950
Vol. 7 No. 6

OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

DO WE NEED MORE EFFICIENT GOVERNMENT?

We own a 257 billion dollar debt.

Our Government will spend around 42½ billion dollars this year.

In the coming year Uncle Sam will collect and spend over 20 percent of our national income.

Even this will leave a 5 billion dollar deficit.

Our total tax bill for federal, state and local government adds up to 28 percent of our national income.

The Hoover Commission reports that many activities of our Government are poorly organized and wastefully administered.

e are shareholders of the biggest business of all time,—the U. S. Government. We are going into debt for it to the tune of 257 billion dollars. We are willing to pay this price because our freedom and our way of life are threatened. To us this freedom means more than cash.

We have a big job on our hands of keeping this freedom alive in the world.

To do this we have to keep ourselves and our nation strong.

In time of war we have to turn to our Government for defense. Two world wars have forced us to strengthen the arm of Government. In 1910 our nation struck its first billion dollar budget and billion dollar debt. The new budget is 42½ billion dollars, and the 257 billion dollar debt is going up.

George Washington supervised 9 agencies. Harry Truman is supposed to keep tab on over 70. With new and bigger problems rolling into Washington, the Government family grew up like Topsy. We can't say that Government bigness is necessarily an evil. We are a big and powerful country and we need big Government. But we shouldn't expect a twentieth-century America to be run by eighteenth-century governmental machinery. Many claim this machinery needs to be modernized.

We would not put up with broken-down machinery on our farm. We couldn't get the work done. Why should we try it in government, when it means so much to our national safety and prosperity? We need to keep our democratic government running smoothly in order to achieve our political, economic and social aspirations.

Is our national debt a threat to our strength?

Are we paying too much for our national security?

Are we getting all we pay for?

Are we loading too many of our problems onto our Government?

Do you see any weak spots in our government? If so, what can we do about it?

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL Guide

May, 1950
Vol. 7, No. 8

OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

BUILDING A SOUND FARM PROGRAM

Ohio farmers are worried about the future. Farm prices continue to drop while the things farmers buy remain high. For the first time since 1941 farm prices have fallen below parity. Farmers are asking, "What kind of a farm program should we have in the United States?" What can we do to help ourselves?

What things should the Government help us with?

Farmers are not alone in their concern about the farm problem. Everyone who eats food and wears clothes is interested. All want a fair solution to the farm problem.

During the war farmers were urged to increase production. The results were immediate. Production in 1948-49 climbed to 138 percent of the 1935-39 prewar level. Now more food and fibre are being grown than can be sold at a fair price. The question to be decided now by the American people is:

What is to be done with actual and potential surplus farm production in order to keep farm prices and farm income in a reasonable relationship with non-farm prices and incomes?

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL GUIDE
July, 1950
Vol. 7, No. 10
OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

MEET

Farm and city people have much in common, but they meet so seldom that it is not surprising that misunderstandings often arise. Everything should be done to remove these misunderstandings. One way to do it is by bringing farm and city people together more often in small groups where they can talk over their problems. This Advisory Council Guide, "Where Farm and City Meet," offers a number of practical suggestions. In your discussions you will find other ways of building better relations between farm and city people.

Do you feel that people in town and on the farm need to understand each other better and work together more?

Is this something your Council can do something about?

"RESOLUTIONS WHY and HOW"

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL GUIDE
Aug., 1950
Vol. 7, No. 11
OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

o doubt there are a lot of things which need to be done in your community. You know what many of these problems are. It may be that your rural roads are poor; that you have a school problem which is serious; or health conditions are bad and need attention.

There are several attitudes which we can take as we face problems in the community.

We can say "Let George do it—leave it to someone else."

Or we can throw up our hands and say "That problem is beyond me."

Or we can say "Let's get together with our neighbors and tackle the problem together."

Our Farm Bureau Advisory Councils are made to order for tackling problems. We meet together each month and discuss local and national issues. We know each other well enough to say what we think and feel. We have learned that when we work as a group we get things done which would be impossible to accomplish alone.

No doubt your Council has a long record of successful projects.

hat do you consider the outstanding thing your Council has done to help your community?

hat are some projects you might carry out that would help your community?

SOLVING COMMUNITY PROBLEMS TOGETHER

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL GUIDE
Vol. 7, No. 12
Sept., 1950
OHIO FARM BUREAU ★ COLUMBUS, OHIO

"IN THIS TIME OF WORLD CRISIS OUR COUNTRY NEEDS THE BEST THINKING OF HER CITIZENS ON ISSUES THAT WEIGH SO HEAVILY ON THE FUTURE OF OUR NATION"

FARMERS LOOK AHEAD TO '51

At a time when the United States is facing a possible third world war, it is difficult to sit down together and try to make constructive plans. Yet, in this time of world crisis our country needs the best thinking of her citizens on issues that weigh so heavily on the future of our nation. Through our Council discussions on these matters we are making a vital contribution to human freedom.

Last month Councils talked about local issues. Hundreds of good suggestions are pouring in to county resolutions committees, where they will be acted on before annual meetings are held. This month we want to look at problems farther away from home, but which are just as important to us.

Next January the Ohio Assembly will meet in Columbus to consider many proposed laws which will directly affect farmers. Now is the time for us to talk over some of the proposals which are likely to be made and see where we stand. How can your Council help make Ohio, the United States, and the rest of the world a better place to live?

"RESOLUTIONS—STATE, NATIONAL, INTERNATIONAL"

THE ADVISORY COUNCIL GUIDE

Vol. 8, No. 1

Oct., 1950

OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO

YOUR HIGHWAY MANNERS ARE SHOWING

Are you surprised to learn that traffic deaths to youth under 25 in one year exceed the combined death toll of the San Francisco fire, the sinking of the Titanic, the Johnstown flood and all crashes of scheduled airlines since aviation began?

Nearly 7,500 auto drivers under 25 lose their lives each year in traffic deaths. In terms of money this loss probably costs the nation almost as much as $600,000,000 cost of all fires.

A car in the hands of a teen-ager is, roughly, twice as dangerous as a car driven by a mature adult.

Result: higher insurance rates if a driver under 25 is to operate the car. A year or so ago some 40 states allowed insurance companies to hike the premiums on drivers under 25.

Reports from 28 states in 1948 show that 31 percent of the drivers involved in all fatal accidents were under 25 years of age — that's nearly one out of three. The Inter-Highway Safety Committee reports that the 16-20 age driver group will have 5 times as many accidents as the 45-50 age group. 16-year-old drivers have nine times as many accidents at the 45-50 year group.

DEATH BEHIND THE WHEEL

Advisory GUIDE Journal
OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO
Nov., 1950 Vol. 8, No. 2

WHO shall speak for Farmers?

Today we are in the midst of a world struggle to keep our democracy alive. To win this fight we are forced to do a lot of things through our government. This means government regulations and controls—a temporary loss of some of our liberties.

We gladly make these sacrifices to protect our freedoms. But we want to make sure we do not lose our freedoms in the process.

Freedom is not won by guns. It's something we have to build.

The battlefront for human rights stretches from Korea to every home in America.

1. How can we do our part on the home front in the battle for a free world?

2. How can farmers as citizens make their voices heard in the legislature?

Many folks outside the farming business are ready and eager to speak for farmers. Legislators, business groups, labor, the press,—all are willing to say how the 18 percent of Americans on farms should be treated: how their economy should be set up; what kind of a government program they should have.

This interest is all to the good, but as farmers we want to speak for ourselves. Agriculture affects all other groups, and their own welfare depends on the well-being of farmers. Let us help them to become well informed about farm problems.

But when it comes to speaking for farmers, can other groups do that? Can labor? Can business? Can government? Or should we do that ourselves through our farm organizations? Why shouldn't the 200,000 and more farm families in Ohio have the strongest voice in matters that vitally affect their pocketbooks and their daily lives?

Advisory Council
GUIDE
OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO
Jan., 1951 Vol. 8, No. 4

New frontiers in farming

RESEARCH HAS INCREASED FARM PRODUCTION

THINK BACK TO THE WAY OUR FATHERS AND GRANDFATHERS DID THINGS AS COMPARED WITH OUR PRESENT METHODS OF FARMING. HOW MUCH OF THIS PROGRESS IS DUE TO RESEARCH?

In America, we have made great progress in farm production. In 1800, it took 373 man hours to produce 100 bushels of wheat, while in 1940, it took only 47 man hours. Under the pressure of war, improvements have been even more startling. Today's production compared with the 1935-39 average is 36% higher for beef; 51% higher for wheat; and 75% higher for chickens. By one new development alone, hybrid seed corn, we have added $750 million a year to farm income!

Study and research, plus the readiness of farmers to put these new discoveries to work, have made these amazing strides possible. Specialists have tested seeds to find which give best results; they have improved livestock strains. New ways to improve the soil have been found. In laboratories and at experimental farms, research people have patiently searched for better and better ways to farm. Through our reading, the work of our county agents, discussion meetings and over the line fence, we have learned of these new ways and put them into practice.

Advisory Council
GUIDE
OHIO FARM BUREAU COLUMBUS, OHIO
Feb., 1951 Vol. 8, No. 5

PLANNING FOR OLD AGE

More People Are Older Now

Do you know that more people in America are living to an older age? In 1900, 4.1% of the population were 65 and over. By 1949, 7.6% were 65 and over. Today, more than 11 million Americans are over 65, and by 1980 it is expected that there will be over 20 millions in this group. Because of the wonders of modern medicine, many of us can expect to live longer than our grandparents did.

Opportunity to live longer is a mark of progress. On the other hand, the increasing number of older people brings a new problem to our families, our communities and our nation. The problem is this:

Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last of life for which the first was made:
Our times are in His hand
Who saith, "A whole I planned, Youth shows but half; trust God: see all nor be afraid!"
—Robert Browning, from "Rabbi Ben Ezra" how can we help ourselves and others make best use of our later years?

16-Human Rights

Jules 2

25

JUDAISM

and

RACE EQUALITY

Issued by

THE COMMISSION ON JUSTICE AND PEACE
of the
CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS

1 9 4 8

JUDAISM AND RACE EQUALITY

MAN derives his worth from the fact that he is created by God in the image of God. This is an unconditional status. It is not dependent on any other circumstance. He may be black, yellow or white; he may worship nature or the spirit within nature; he may be born on mountainside or on the plains. He is still equal in the sight of God. Any differences in his worth are those he creates himself by his utilization of his potentialities through learning and industry. But these are only evaluative differences. They are not essential. In no way do they limit the inalienable rights inherent in man's status as a child of God.

These teachings were burned into the soul of Israel by his experience with Egyptian slavery. From the very beginning of his national existence he knew the heart of the stranger, and the leitmotif of his social discipline was, "Thou shalt have one law for the stranger and for him that is home-born."

We rejoice that the President's Committee on Civil Rights has recognized a similar emphasis in American history. In the foreword to its magnificent report, "To Secure These Rights," we read:

> "The central theme in our American heritage is the importance of the individual person. From the earliest moment of our history we have believed that every human being has an essential dignity and integrity which must be respected and safeguarded. Moreover, we believe that the welfare of the individual is the final goal of group life. Our American heritage further teaches that to be secure in the rights he wishes for himself, each man must be willing to respect the rights of other men. This is the conscious recognition of a basic moral principle; that all men are created equal as well as free. Stemming from this principle is the obligation to build social institutions that will guarantee equality of opportunity to all men. Without this equality freedom becomes an illusion. Thus the only aristocracy that is consistent with the free way of life is an aristocracy of talent and achievement."

We heartily commend the President's Committee for placing the spot-light of its inquiry on the faults and failures of our American democracy: lynching, Jim Crow, poll tax, the virtual peonage of tenant farmers, the inadequacy of educational, health and housing facilities for large sections of our population. We share the Committee's concern that the Bill of Rights is not as available to the non-white races in the American population as it is to the white race. We recognize the vicious cycle by which the denial of these rights forces the racial minorities into social degradations which make it all the more difficult for them to attain these rights. We endorse the Committee's recommendation that the Federal Government use its present constitutional powers to abolish Jim Crow in the District of Columbia and to preserve the right to the ballot to all Negro citizens of the South. We endorse the Committee's recommendation that the proper restitution and compensation be made to the Japanese citizens who were forcibly removed from their homes during the war. We likewise affirm the Committee's recommendation to strengthen the Civil Rights Section of the Department of Justice so that its regional offices may be of more assistance to local officers who wish to protect the citizen's basic rights under the Constitution.

We are encouraged to note that the New York State Commission Against Discrimination is singled out as an example of the way in which administrative agencies can grant civil sanctions to remedy the denial of the right to employment to members of minority groups. Our Conference must be all the more resolute in supporting the movements to establish similar agencies in all the states of the Union.

We rejoice in the Committee's recommendation that Federal Grants-in-Aid to public or private agencies be withheld if they practice discrimination and we commend the President's Committee on Higher Education for making a similar proposal. Proposals such as these coming from distinguished bodies appointed by the highest officer of our government cannot but help to change the climate of opinion which has heretofore passively tolerated, when it has not actively sanctioned, the violations of our Bill of Rights.

Economic opportunity, political equality, social dignity for our racial minorities can be only partially guaranteed by strengthening our laws and implementing our administrative agencies. The major resistance to necessary changes lies in the moral weakness, in the prejudices and bigotries of many of our citizens. Legal sanctions, criminal investigations, Federal pressures will never be able to sterilize the seed bed of these prejudices. Since the cause is largely the moral weakness and ignorance of individuals, the remedies must be largely in the hands of our homes, our schools, and our churches.

The difference between the equalitarian promise of the American dream as revealed in our Declaration of Independence and in our Bill of Rights and the inequalities of American practice measures the challenge to the churches and synagogues of the land. We must ignore the pessimism of the cynical who regard this gulf between word and action as proof of the hopeless hypocrisy of human beings. Our faith must inspire and sustain us in our endeavor to bridge this gap. It was faith in the ultimate goodness of the average man that led our Founding Fathers to erect a structure of government for the people and by the people. We must justify that faith by removing the barriers of prejudice and ignorance which frustrate the fulfillment of the American dream. We have evidence today as we have never had it before that racial discrimination is not only a heavy drain on the human wealth and national competence of this country, not only militates against America's moral leadership of countries populated by non-white races, but is bringing about the steady erosion of the moral fibre of the nation. The persistence of discrimination and segregation justifies many of our citizens in holding to the belief that the victims of discrimination are basically inferior. This creates a split which goes through the whole structure of our democracy and threatens it with ultimate destruction.

The Central Conference of American Rabbis commits its membership to the ceaseless struggle for the abolition of economic, political and social discrimination. A decent regard for the integrity of our faith demands it. Loyalty to the spiritual foundations of American democracy requires it.

☆ ☆ ☆

Additional copies of this statement may be secured by writing to Rabbi Julius Mark, chairman, Commission on Justice and Peace, CCAR, 136 Seventh Ave., N., Nashville, 3, Tenn.

Human Relations Education

Library of Jewish Information
The American Jewish Committee
386 Fourth Ave., New York City

May 3, 1951

INTERGROUP EDUCATION
A Selected Bibliography

General

Books

AMERICAN Council on Education. Committee on the Study of Teaching Materials in Intergroup Relations. Intergroup relations in teaching materials; a survey and appraisal. Washington, D.C., 1949. 231 p. $3.00.
Examination of textbooks and courses of study revealed that the greatest weakness of our present teaching materials lies in the "omission of pertinent, often basic, information" on many of the peoples of the United States.

BLANDING, Sarah G. Guidance toward democratic citizenship. (In Educational conference, 13th, 1948. Education for the preservation of democracy. Washington, D.C., American Council on Education, 1949. p. 17-22)

BRAMELD, T. B. H. Minority problems in the public schools; a study of administrative policies and practices in seven school systems. New York, Harper, 1946. 264 p. (Bureau for Intercultural Education. Publication series. Problems of race and culture in American education, no. 4) $2.50.

CALIFORNIA Elementary School Principals' Association. Education for cultural unity. Oakland, Calif., 1945. 155 p. (17th yearbook, 1945) $1.00.

Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion in Their Relation to the Democratic Way of Life, New York, 1944. Approaches to national unity; fifth symposium, ed. by Lyman Bryson, Louis Finkelstein and R. M. MacIver. New York, Harper, 1945. 1037 p. $5.00.
Includes papers on Education for intergroup co-operation, The Springfield Plan, and Communication through education.

Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion in Their Relation to the Democratic Way of Life, 1945. Approaches to group understanding; sixth symposium, ed. by Lyman Bryson, Louis Finkelstein, and R. M. MacIver. New York, Harper, 1947. 858 p. $5.00.
Includes papers on Cultural understanding through education.

Conference on Science, Philosophy and Religion in Their Relation to the Democratic Way of Life, 1949. Perspectives on a troubled decade; tenth symposium, ed. by Lyman Bryson, Louis Finkelstein, and R. M. MacIver. New York, Harper, 1950. 901 p. $5.00.
Includes papers on the Concept of culture in American education, Group tensions in the modern world, and Unity in difference.

DuBOIS, Mrs. Rachel (Davis). Neighbors in action; a manual for local leaders in intergroup relations. New York, Harper, 1950. 294 p. $3.00.
Report of a project in intergroup relations carried on by a Parents association in cooperation with the Workshop for Cultural Democracy.

DUNCAN, Ethel M. Democracy's children. New York, Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge, 1945. 189 p. $2.00.

HEATON, Margaret M. How to select themes that contribute to intergroup understandings, appreciations, adjustments. (In Conference on reading. Promoting personal and social development through reading. Chicago Univ. of Chicago Press, 1947. p. 158-163)

JAWORSKI, Irene D. Becoming American; the problems of immigrants and their children. New York, Harper, 1950. 113 p. (Bureau for Intercultural Education. Publication series. Problems of race and culture in American education, no. 7) $1.50.

JOHN Dewey Society. Ninth yearbook: Intercultural attitudes in the making; parents, youth leaders, and teachers at work, ed. by W. H. Kilpatrick and William Van Til. New York, Harper, 1947. 246 p. $3.00.

NATIONAL Council for the Social Studies. Democratic human relations; promising practices in intergroup and intercultural education in the social studies; sixteenth yearbook, ed. by Hilda Taba and William Van Til. Washington, D.C., 1945. 366 p. $2.30.

NATIONAL Education Association of the United States. Dept. of Supervisors and Directors of Instruction. Americans all; studies in intercultural education, sponsored by the Dept. of Supervisors and Directors of Instruction of the National Education Association, the National Council of Teachers of English, and the Society for Curriculum Study. Washington, D.C., 1942. 385 p. $2.00.

RANKIN, P. T. Reading and intergroup understandings, appreciations, adjustments. (In Conference on reading. Promoting personal and social development through reading. Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1947. p. 153-157)

SHUSTER, G. N. Education and cultural understanding. (In Modern education and human values; v. 2. Pittsburgh, Univ. of Pittsburgh Press, 1948. p. 42-66)

STONE, W. J. International and intergroup education. (In California Elementary School Principals' Association. The principal and curriculum building; twentieth yearbook, 1948. p. 122-9)

VAN TIL, W. A. Developing desirable attitudes. (In National Council for the Social Studies. Study and teaching of American history; seventeenth yearbook. Washington, D.C., 1947. p. 64-76)

VICKERY, W. E., and Cole, S. G. Intercultural education in American schools; proposed objectives and methods. New York, Harper, 1943. 214 p. (Bureau for Intercultural Education publications. Problems of race and culture in American education, no. 1) $2.00.

YAUCH, W. A. Improving human relations in school administration. New York, Harper, 1949. 299 p. $3.50.

Pamphlets

AMERICAN Association of School Administrators. Commission on Intergroup Education. From sea to shining sea. Washington, D.C., 1947. 64 p. 50¢.
Administrators handbook for intergroup education.

ASSOCIATION for Childhood Education. Adventures in human relations. Washington, D.C., 1948. 36 p. (Membership service bulletin. 2d, 1948) 50¢.

BOYD, Doris I. Expanding horizons; adventures in intergroup education with young people. 2d ed. New York, National Conference of Christians and Jews, 1948. 76 p. (Human relations pamphlet, no. 9) 25¢.

EDMAN, Marion and Collins, Laurentine B. Promising practices in intergroup education; prepared for Administrative Committee on Intercultural Education, Detroit Public Schools. New York, Bureau for Intercultural Education, 1947. 32 p. 20¢.

ELLIOTT, J. H., and others. Building bridges between groups that differ in faith, race, culture. 4th rev. ed. New York, National Conference of Christians and Jews, 1948. 62 p. (Human relations pamphlet, no. 11) 25¢.

EVERETT, Samuel, ed. School and community meet; the community approach to intercultural education. Prepared for the Bureau for Intercultural Education and the American Education Fellowship. New York, Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge, 1948. 49 p. 35¢.

INTERGROUP Education in Cooperating Schools. Literature for human understanding, by the staff; Hilda Taba, director. Washington, D.C., American Council on Education, 1948. 61 p. (Work in progress series) $1.00.

INTERGROUP Education in Cooperating Schools. Sociometry in group relations; a work guide for teachers, by Helen Hall Jennings; in association with the staff of Intergroup Education in cooperating schools, Hilda Taba, director. Washington, D. C., American Council on Education, 1948. 85 p. (Work in progress series) $1.25.

KARELSEN, F. E., Jr. Human relations: a challenge to our public schools; 123 outstanding American leaders in education and other fields express their opinion on a vital subject. New York, The Author, 1947. 74 p. 50¢.

KILPATRICK, W. H. Modern education and better human relations. New York, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, 1949. 31 p. (Freedom pamphlets) 25¢.

LANSING, Michigan. Dept. of Public Instruction. Understanding others; a handbook on intercultural education. Lansing, Mich., Supt. of Public Instruction, 1946. 34 p. (Bulletin, no. 344) 15¢.

MASSACHUSETTS. Fair Employment Practice Commission. Scrapbook for teachers, ed. by Isabel Currier. 3d ed. Boston, Fair Employment Practice Commission; in cooperation with the Massachusetts Committee on Catholics, Protestants and Jews, 1950. 96 p.

MUDGETT, Helen Parker. Democracy for all; a study program. Pub. for the General Extension Division, Univ. of Minnesota. Minneapolis, Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1945. 87 p. 50¢.

NATIONAL Commission for the Defense of Democracy Through Education. True faith and allegiance; an inquiry into education for human brotherhood and understanding. Washington, D.C., National Education Association, 1950. 101 p. 75¢.

NATIONAL Council for the Social Studies. Improving human relations through classroom, school, and community activities; Howard H. Cummings, ed. Washington, D.C., 1949. 158 p. (Bulletin, no. 25, Nov. 1949) 50¢.

NATIONAL Education Association of the United States. Commission on the Defense of Democracy Through Education. More than tolerance; suggestions to teachers on inter-group education. Washington, D.C., 1946. 32 p. 15¢.

NATIONAL Institute of Social Relations. Learning to live together. Washington, D.C., 1946. 12 p. (Series G-110-1946) 5¢.
A discussion guide.

OLSEN, E. G. Social travel; a technique in intercultural education. New York, Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge, 1947. 46 p. (American Education Fellowship. Service Center pamphlets) 35¢.

STEWART, M. S. Prejudice in textbooks. New York, Public Affairs Committee, 1950. 31 p. (Public affairs pamphlet, no. 160) 20¢.
Based on Intergroup relations in teaching materials, a report of the Committee on the Study of Teaching Materials in Intergroup Relations.

TRAGER, Helen G., and Brown, Spencer. Making democracy work in your community; a group action guide. 2d ed., rev. A discussion outline pub. for the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. New York, Bureau for Intercultural Education, 1948. 55 p. 20¢.

UNITED Nations. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. A handbook for the improvement of textbooks and teaching materials as aids to international understanding. Paris, 1949. 172 p. (Publication, no. 368) 45¢.

U. S. Office of Education. National unity through intercultural education [prepared by Rachel Davis-DuBois; in cooperation with the U. S. Office of Education] Washington, D.C., U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1942. 34 p. (Education and national defense series. Pamphlet, no. 10) 15¢.

Periodicals

ALPENFELS, Ethel J. "Routes to better human relations." High School Journal, Oct. 1948. p. 147-50.

The American Teacher. Democracy in education; education for democracy [special issue] Mount Morris, Ill., American Federation of Teachers, 1944. 40 p. (v. 28, no. 7, April 1944)

-----[Special issue on race and teaching of tolerance] Chicago, American Federation of Teachers, 1940. 40 p. (v. 24, no. 5, Jan. 1940)

BOGARDUS, E. S. "Intercultural education and acculturation." Sociology and Social Research, Jan. 1950. p. 203-8.

BOUDEMAN, Ila F., and Spaulding, D. M. "Developing a program in intercultural education." Educational Outlook, May 1948. p. 183-96.

BRAMELD, T. B. H. "Intercultural democracy; education's new frontier." Educational Forum, Nov. 1947. p. 67-73.

-----"Minority problems in the public schools." North Central Association Quarterly, Oct. 1947. p. 182-93.

BREINAN, Alexander. "How the teacher can help to foster intercultural relations." High Points, March 1948. p. 52-6.

BRICKMAN, W. W. "Intergroup education." School and Society, Nov. 26, 1949. p.341-6.

COIE, S. G. "Building a program of intercultural education." California Journal of Secondary Education, Feb. 1949. p. 101-5.

----"An intercultural self-rating scale." National Education Association Journal, Feb. 1949. p. 112.
A scale is presented for an educator, a school or a school system to use in self analysis.

----"Trends in intercultural education." Religious Education, Jan. 1949. p. 23-31.

COOK, L. A. "Intergroup education." Review of Educational Research, Oct. 1947. p. 266-78.

DIX, L. H. "Intercultural education in the South." High School Journal, Oct. 1947. p. 183-7.

DOMNITZ, M. "Education and human relations." Adult Education, June 1948. p.194-203.

Education. Inter-group education number. Helen P. Mudgett, editor. Boston, Palmer Co. 1946. 259-339 p. (v. 66, no. 5, Jan. 1946)

----Intergroup education; practice and principle. Helen P. Mudgett, editor. Boston, Palmer Co., 1947. 131-192 p. (v. 68, no. 3, Nov. 1947)

Elementary English Review. One land, one language, one people [special issue] Chicago, National Council of Teachers of English, 1944. 81-119 p. (v. 21, no. 3, March 1944)

FAGAN, M. B. "Intercultural education is a process." Education, Nov. 1947. p. 182-7.

HAFEMANN, Henrietta. "Vitalizing intercultural relations." Chicago School Journal, Jan. 1947. p. 54-61.

JOHNSON, Willard. "Reflections on intergroup education." Menorah Journal, Autumn 1948. p. 313-23.

The Journal of Negro Education. Education for racial understanding. Washington, D.C., Pub. for the Bureau of Educational Research, Howard Univ., by the Howard Univ. Press, 1944. 265-446 p. (v. 13, no. 3, Summer 1944. Yearbook no.)

KILPATRICK, W. H., and others. "A frame of reference for intercultural education." Journal of Educational Sociology, May 1949. p. 555-72.

LAWRENCE, Annette S. "How do we start an intercultural education program?" Education Digest, Nov. 1948. p. 34-5.

MacKENZIE, Catherine. "Prejudice can be unlearned." New York Times Magazine, July 25, 1948. p. 9 ff.

Progressive Education. Minority groups and the American school. Washington, D.C., Progressive Education Association, 1935. 140-213 p. (v. 12, no. 3, March 1935)

REDFIELD, Robert. "The study of culture in general education." Social Education, Oct. 1947. p. 259-64.

ROBERTSON, Wanda. "Culture units and social education." Educational Leadership, Dec. 1950. p. 163-70.

SCHON, H. A. "Movies, vehicle for intergroup education." Education, Nov. 1947. p. 159-61.

SHAPIRO, Leo. "Intergroup materials in the English classroom." School Review, Dec. 1949. p. 559-63.

SHAPIRO Leo and Finkenberg, Ann. "New trends in intergroup understanding." School and Society, Oct. 16, 1948. p. 257-61.

SHAPIRO, Leo and Goldenberg, Benjamin. "Promising practices in intergroup education." National Education Association Journal, Feb. 1948. p. 96-7.

SUBARSKY, Zachariah. "Human relations in our time, challenge to the educator." Science Education, April 1948. p. 138-42.

TABA, Hilda. "What kind of intergroup education." National Association of Secondary School Principals Bulletin, April 1949. p. 15-20.

TIPTON, J. H. "Administrators can clear or obstruct the way toward good human relations." Education, Nov. 1947. p. 134-41.

VAN TIL, W. A. "Building intercultural attitudes through the school." North Central Association Quarterly, Jan. 1949. p. 243-6.

VAN TIL, W. A., and Denemark, G. W. "Intercultural education." Review of Educational Research, Oct. 1950. p. 274-86.

Evaluation

AMERICAN Jewish Committee. Dept. of Scientific Research and Program Evaluation. A brief survey of the major agencies in the field of intercultural education study done under the direction of Rudolph Wittenberg, with the assistance of Lillian Gottlieb. New York, 1950. 68 p. 40¢.

DODSON, D. W. "Is evaluation much ado about nothing." Journal of Educational Sociology, Sept. 1947. p. 53-7.

INTERGROUP Education in cooperating Schools. Evaluation in intergroup relations. New York, 437 W. 59th St., 1946. $1.00.

The Journal of Educational Sociology. Evaluation of agencies and programs in intergroup relations. Leo Shapiro, issue editor. New York, Payne Educational Sociology Foundation, 1947. 64 p. (v. 21, no. 1, Sept. 1947) 35¢.

PITKIN, V. E. "Appraisal of the intercultural education movement." High School Journal, May 1948. p. 112-18.

ROTHNEY, J. W. M., and Hanson, M. H. "Evaluation of radio instruction in intercultural relations." Journal of Experimental Education, Dec. 1947. p. 101-21.

Teacher Education

BIRNBAUM, Max and Wolcott, Leon. "Human relations education for teachers through the institute type course." Journal of Educational Sociology, Oct. 1949. p. 78-96.

CALIVER, Ambrose. Education of teachers for improving majority-minority relationships; course offerings for teachers to learn about racial and national minority groups. Washington, D.C., U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1944. 64 p. (U. S. Office of Education. Bulletin 1944, no. 2) 15¢.

CHWOROWSKY, M. P. Intergroup aspects of teacher education. (In American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education. Yearbook, 1950. Oneonta, N.Y., State Teachers College, 1950. p. 194-202)

HARRIS, R. P. "Improving inter-group relations through teacher training." Education, Nov. 1947. p. 142-7.

LIPPITT, Ronald. Training in community relations; research exploration toward new group skills. New York, Harper, 1949. 286 p. $3.50.
The report of an experiment "designed to reveal effective ways of teaching individual and group skills required for harmonious and productive living in modern society."

NORTH Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. Improving intergroup relations in school and community life; study conducted and reported by the Sub-Committee on In-Service Education of Teachers, Paul W. Harnly, chairman. Lincoln, Neb. Univ. of Nebraska, 1946. 48 p. 25¢.

Centers and Workshops

BEAUCHAMP, Mary, and others. "My teacher went to the workshop." Educational Leadership, May 1947. p. 507-16.

CLINCHY, E. R. Intergroup relations centers. New York, Pub. for the Louis J. and Mary E. Horowitz Foundation, by Farrar, Straus, 1949. 54 p. $1.50.
A proposal to establish centers at universities to attack prejudice by coordinating research, providing personnel training, and engaging in clinical practice in problems of community, industry, and school.

DIEDERICH, P. B., and Van Til, William. The workshop. Prepared for the Service Center of the American Education Fellowship and the Bureau for Intercultural Education. New York, Hinds, Hayden & Eldredge, 1945. 32 p. 25¢.

DIX, Lester. The Montclair conference on workshop planning. New York, Bureau for Intercultural Education, 1945. 55 p. (Work in progress series) 25¢.

HARVARD University. Workshop in Intercultural Education. Workshop papers, Summer 1944, nos. 1-9. Cambridge, Mass., Graduate School of Education, Harvard Univ., 1944. 9 papers.
Papers are variously priced.

Intercultural Workshop, University of Southern California. Program of intercultural education in San Diego. Los Angeles, Pacific Coast Council on Intercultural Education, 1947. 95 p. 50¢.
Prepared by the San Diego members of the Workshop.

The Journal of Educational Sociology. Education workshops. A. F. Myers, issue editor. New York, Payne Educational Sociology Foundation, 1951. 249-304 p. (v. 24, no 5, Jan. 1951) 35¢.

The Journal of Educational Sociology. Human relation practices. Issue editor: Herman H. Giles. New York, Payne Educational Sociology Foundation, 1951. 305-68 p. (v. 24, no. 6, Feb. 1951) 35¢.
Discussions on the Center for Human Relations Studies of the School of Education at New York University.

----Human relations education for democracy. H.H. Giles, issue editor. New York, Payne Educational Sociology Foundation, 1950. 313-376 p. (v. 23, no. 6, Feb. 1950) 35¢.

----Workshops in intergroup education. Hilda Taba, issue editor. New York, Payne Educational Sociology Foundation, 1945. 513-576 p. (v. 18, no. 9, May 1945) 35¢.

KANSAS CITY Citizens Committee on Human Relations. 1950 workshop in human relations. Kansas City, Mo., 1951. [24] mimeo. l.
Workshop conducted at the University of Kansas City under the auspices of the University, the Kansas City Public Schools, the Kansas City Citizens Committee on Human Relations, and the Association of Trusts and Foundations.

MORRIS, Addie R. "Impressions of the intercultural workshop." High School Journal, Oct. 1948. p. 151-2.

National Training Laboratory in Group Development. 1st, Gould Academy, 1947. Group growth and educational dynamics. Sponsored by the National Education Association and Research Center for Group Dynamics, M.I.T. Washington, D.C., National Education Association, Dept. of Adult Education, 1948. 64 p. (Bulletin, no. 2) 75¢.

----Preliminary report. Sponsored by the National Education Association and Research Center for Group Dynamics, M.I.T., Bethel, Maine, June 16 to July 4, 1947. Washington, D.C., National Education Association, Dept. of Adult Education, 1947. 142 mimeo. p. (Bulletin, no. 1) $1.00.

National Training Laboratory in Group Development. 2d, Gould Academy, 1948. Report of the Second summer laboratory session, Bethel, Me., June 13 to July 3, 1948. Sponsored by the National Education Association and Research Center for Group Dynamics, Univ. of Michigan. Washington, D.C., Dept. of Adult Education, National Education Association, 1948. 136 p. (Bulletin, no. 3) $1.25.

Pittsburgh Schools (periodical). Intergroup education workshops, 1945. Pittsburgh, Board of Public Education, 1946. 31-108 p. (v. 20, nos. 2-3, Nov.-Feb., 1945-1946)

SCHIFF, Harold. "Audio-visual institutes for intercultural education." American Teacher, Dec. 1950. p. 7-9.

SHAPIRO, Leo. "The trouble with intercultural workshops." Educational Leadership, April 1949. p. 427-31.

----"Where teachers go to school." Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. ADL Bulletin, Oct. 1950. p. 4-5.
Discusses ADL participation in some sixty workshops, institutes and conferences for teachers and school administrators.

Stanford Workshop on Intercultural Education, Stanford University, 1945. Charting intercultural education, 1945-55, by the staff of the Stanford Workshop in Intercultural Education, Stewart G. Cole, and others; report sponsored by the Stanford University School of Education and the West Coast Office of the Bureau for Intercultural Education. Stanford University, Calif., Stanford Univ. Press, 1946. 58 p. 50¢.

WILLIAMS, H. B. "Using sociodrama in an education workshop." High School Journal, Jan. 1948. p. 18-21.

"Workshops on intergroup education." Higher Education, Feb. 15, 1951. p. 142-3.

Individual School Systems

ALLAND, Alexander. The Springfield plan; photographs by Alexander Alland; text by J. W. Wise. New York, Viking, 1945. 136 p.

ATLANTIC CITY. Public Schools. Committee for Practical Democracy. A report of a study on practical democracy. Atlantic City, 1946. 56 p. (Report, no. 2)

BALTIMORE. Public Schools. Better intercultural relations. Baltimore, Dept. of Education, 1947. 44 p. 25¢.

CHATTO, C. I., and Halligan, Alice L. The story of the Springfield plan. New York, Barnes & Noble, 1945. 201 p. $2.75.

COOKE, W. H. The teaching of international and intercultural understanding in the public schools of California. San Francisco, International Center, 1946. 82 p. 50¢.

DETROIT. Public Schools. Administrative Committee on Intercultural Education. Promising practices in intergroup education; summary of practices reported for the year 1945-46 from 152 public schools in Detroit. Detroit, Board of Education, 1947. 46 p. 55¢.

DETROIT. Public Schools. Division of Instruction. Intercultural education through the social studies. Detroit, 1945. 49 mimeo. p. 50¢.
Material for grades 1-12.

ERICKSON, Edith F. "Intergroup education at Collinwood." Clearing House, Sept. 1947. p. 3-8.

MILWAUKEE. Public Schools. Intercultural Curriculum Committee. Improving human relations; suggestions to guide an all-school program. Milwaukee, 1947. 44 mimeo. p. (Curriculum Bulletin, v. 4, no. 7, 1947)

NEW YORK (CITY). Board of Education. Unity through understanding. Brooklyn, 1946. 48 p. (Curriculum Bulletin, 1945-46. Series, no. 4) 15¢.

NEW YORK (STATE). University. Education for unity in the schools of New York State; a report on the program of intergroup education in New York State schools. Albany, New York State Education Dept., 1947. 104 p. 50¢.

PHILADELPHIA. Public Schools. Living together with mutual respect; reports and recommendations from a Conference on Intercultural Relations held on October 11, 1944 at the Edward Bok Vocational School. Philadelphia, Feb. 1945. 35 mimeo. p.

SAN DIEGO, Calif. City Schools. A program of intercultural education in San Diego. Los Angeles, Pacific Coast Council on Intercultural Education, 1946. 95 p. 60¢.

Primary Schools

HERMAN, Sema W. "First steps in democracy." Chicago Schools Journal, Jan. 1947. p. 71-6.

HERMAN, Sema W. "I teach a way of living." Elementary English, Nov. 1947. p. 425-34.

MYERS, S. W. Techniques in promoting intergroup understandings, appreciations, and adjustments through reading in the primary grades. (In Conference on reading. Promoting personal and social development through reading. Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1947. p. 164-168)

TRAGER, Helen G. The primary teacher. New York, National Committee for Mental Hygiene, 1949. 36 p. 20¢.
Case studies showing how the teacher assisted in building intercultural attitudes. Reprint of Chapter 3 of intercultural attitudes in the making, the ninth yearbook of the John Dewey Society.

Elementary Schools

COUNCIL Against Intolerance in America. We're all Americans; teacher's manual no. 2, elementary schools. New York, 1941. 91 p. Gratis to teachers.

DUNCAN, Neal. "Evaluating on personal worth." Chicago Schools Journal, Jan. 1949. p. 141-4.

GILCHRIST, R. S., and others. Building friendly relations. Columbus, Ohio State Univ., 1947. 51 p. (Ohio State Univ. College of Education. Adventures in education. Univ. school series, no. 4) $1.00.

"Intercultural materials and activities for elementary school children." High School Journal, Oct. 1947. p. 192-205.

INTERGROUP Education in Cooperating Schools. Elementary curriculum in intergroup relations; case studies in instruction, by the staff of Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools; Hilda Taba, director. Washington, D.C., American Council on Education, 1950. 248 p. (Work in progress series) $2.50.

----With focus on human relations; a story of an eighth grade, by Hilda Taba and Deborah Elkins. Washington, D.C., American Council on Education, 1950. 227 p. (Work in progress series) $2.50.

ROLLINS, Charlemae. Techniques in promoting intergroup understandings, appreciations, and adjustments through reading in the middle and upper grades. (In Conference on reading. Promoting personal and social development through reading. Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1947. p. 169-174)

Secondary Schools

BROWN, Spencer. They see for themselves; a documentary approach to intercultural education in the high school. New York, Harper, 1945. 147 p. (Bureau for Intercultural Education. Publication series. Problems of race and culture in American education, v. 3) $2.00.

COUNCIL Against Intolerance in America. An American answer to intolerance; teacher's manual no. 1, junior and senior high schools. Rev. ed. New York, 1940. 116 p. 50¢; gratis to teachers.

DERNBACH, Helen E. "Administering a program of intergroup education in the secondary school." National Association of Secondary Schools Principals Bulletin, April 1949. p. 21-31.

ECK, M. J. "Administering a program of intergroup education in the secondary school." National Association of Secondary School Principals Bulletin, April 1949. p. 31-40.

INTERGROUP Education in Cooperating Schools. Curriculum in intergroup relations; case studies in the instruction for secondary schools, by the staff, Hilda Taba, director. Washington, D.C., American Council on Education, 1949. 168 p. (Work in progress series) $1.25.
Reprinted from the Bulletin of the National Association of Secondary School Principals, v. 33, Feb. 1949.

MIIES, Louella. "Opportunities for intergroup education in senior high school American history." Education, Nov. 1947. p. 154-8.

MURRAY, W. L. Techniques in promoting intergroup understandings, appreciations and adjustments through reading in high schools and junior colleges. (In Conference on reading. Promoting personal and social development through reading. Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1947. p. 174-179)

VAN TIL, W. A., and others. Democracy demands it; a resource unit for intercultural education in the high school. New York, Harper, 1950. 117 p. (Bureau for Intercultural Education. Publication series. Problems of race and culture in American education, v. 6) $1.50.

Colleges and Universities

AMERICAN Council on Education. Council on cooperation in Teacher Education. College programs in intergroup relations; a report by twenty-four colleges participating in the College study in intergroup relations, 1945-49, L. A. Cook, editor and director of the project; in collaboration with college committee chairmen and members, and staff associates. Washington, D.C., 1950. 365 p. (College study in intergroup relations, v. 1) $3.75.
The first of a projected two-volume report.

GOLDBERG, M. H. "Intergroup education; the still small voice." Educational Forum, Jan. 1948. p. 227-37.

KATSH, A. I. "Democracy and interfaith." Journal of Educational Sociology, Oct. 1948. p. 116-35.

U. S. Office of Education. Practicing democracy in the college, prepared by John Lund. Washington, D.C., U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1942. 31 p. (Education and national defense series. Pamphlet, no. 8) 20¢.

Reading Lists

AMERICAN Jewish Committee. Division of Youth Services. About 100 books; a bibliography to promote human understanding among young readers, comp. by Ann G. Wolfe. New York, 1949. 29 p. 15¢.

AMERICAN Jewish Committee. Film Division. Selected list of human relations films. New York, 1950. 28 p. 15¢.
An annotated bibliography of 16 mm. non-theatrical films suitable for use by organizations, churches, schools, libraries, television stations, etc.

INTERGROUP Education in Cooperating Schools. Reading ladders for human relations, by the staff; Hilda Taba, director. Rev. and enl. ed. Washington, D.C., American Council on Education, 1949. 115 p. (Work in progress series) $1.25.

JONES, Mary A. "Books are bridges." Wilson Library Bulletin, Oct. 1949. p. 154-7.

MAGUIRE, J. P., comp. Aids in the teaching of intercultural understanding; a selected list of films, film-strips, recordings and radio scripts. Rev. ed. Hartford, Connecticut Inter-Racial Commission, 1946. 51 p. 15¢.

MILES, Louella. One world in school; a bibliography. Montgomery, Ala., American Teachers Association, 1946. 58 p. (American Teachers Association studies, no. 2) 35¢.

OLIN, Ida. "Children's books as a bridge between cultures." Horn Book, March 1949. p. 150-8.

ROLLINS, Charlemae, ed. We build together; reader's guide to Negro life and literature for elementary and high school use. Rev. ed. Chicago, National Council of Teachers of English, 1948. 71 p. 65¢.

RYAN, Nellie F., and others. A guidebook in literature; grades 7 and 8. Chicago, Bureau of Curriculum, Board of Education, 1948. 216 p. $1.00.

St. Paul. Schools. All Americans; a book list for friendly children. St. Paul, Board of Education, 1950. 13 mimeo. p.
University of Minnesota curriculum workshop project, Summer 1950.

"Selected readings in intergroup education." Journal of Educational Sociology, May 1948. p. 553-6.

TIPTON, J. H., and Weinandy, P. K. Films in intercultural education. New York, Bureau for Intercultural Education, 1947. 18 mimeo. p. 10¢.

TRAGER. Helen G., and Everitt, Roberta M. "Tools for human relations education." Educational Leadership, May 1950. p. 530-9.
Annotated list of books for children and youth.

Immigration

Cable Address:
JEWLABCOM

Telephone LEhigh 5-3700

Jewish Labor Committee

Atran Jewish Culture House

25 EAST 78th STREET
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

ADOLPH HELD, Chairman
JOSEPH BASKIN, Secretary
DAVID DUBINSKY, Treasurer
JACOB PAT, Executive Secretary
N. CHANIN, Chairman, Office Committee

B. TABACHINSKY, National Campaign Director

•

Vice-Chairmen
L. ARKIN
F. ATRAN
M. BLUMENREICH
J. BELSKY
J. BRESLAW
I. BRESLOW
H. BURAKOFF
N. CHANIN
J. DORFMAN
I. FEINBERG
B. GEBINER
M. GERBER
D. GINGOLD
J. GOLD
I. H. GOLDBERG
P. L. GOLDMAN
H. GREENBERG
DR. L. HENDIN
S. HERSHKOWITZ
J. HOCHMAN
L. HOLLANDER
L. HYMAN
E. JESHURIN
B. KAPLAN
J. KESSLER
CH. KREINDLER
I. LEVIN-SHATZKES
M. LEWIS
A. MILLER
I. MINKOFF
N. M. MINKOFF
I. NAGLER
S. RIFKIN
J. ROBERTS
G. RUBIN
J. SCHLOSSBERG
DR. S. SILVERBERG
I. SIMON
A. SNYDER
W. STERN
L. STOLBERG
J. TYBERG
J. TUVIM
M. VLADECK-BROMBERG
J. WEINBERG
M. WEINSTEIN
O. WOLINSKY
W. WOLPERT
M. ZARITSKY
CH. ZIMMERMAN

RECEIVED
APR 21 1952
Southern Regional Council

RECEIVED
APR 21 1952
Southern Regional Council

Dear Sir and Brother:

The Congress of the United States is presently preparing revisions in our immigration policies and procedures which have been in operation for over twenty years. The new codified law will cover the whole field of immigration legislation.

In as much as our immigration policies have both domestic and international significance, it is essential that the new law be both consistent with our democratic traditions and a credit to us in the eyes of our friends abroad - while the security of our country is properly safeguarded.

The McCarran and Walter bills presently under discussion in Congress contain provisions that will seriously endanger the rights of United States citizens as well as antagonize the people of other countries - without any corresponding advantage to us. We are enclosing an analysis of these bills.

It is because of these important shortcomings of the McCarran and Walter bills that the Humphrey-Lehman and Roosevelt bills were introduced. An analysis of these bills is also enclosed. These bills are in the best tradition of our democratic ideals and provide for procedures that will properly secure our national interests.

-over-

M. MERLIN, Atlanta
S. CAPLAN, Baltimore
H. TURK, Baltimore
P. BLOCK, Boston
J. BLUME, Boston
H. GROSSMAN, BOSTON
M. BIALIS, Chicago
D. SCHIER, Chicago
J. SIEGEL, Chicago

M. WEINRIB, Chicago
J. AXELROD, Cleveland
L. FRIEND, Cleveland
N. KIRTZMAN, Cleveland
S. WEISBERG, Cleveland
J. BERNSTEIN, Detroit
DR. S. KLEIMAN, Detroit
A. SCHECHTER, Grand Rapids
P. KARL, Los Angeles

I. STENZOR, Los Angeles
M. WEINTRAUB, Los Angeles
T. MAISEL, Mexico
J. DUNTOV, Miami
S. RIVIN, Missoula
M. RUBINSTEIN, Montreal
B. SHANE, Montreal
M. SILCOFF, MONTREAL
H. BERNSTEIN, NEWARK

H. BERGER, PHILADELPHIA
B. DENNIS, PHILADELPHIA
H. DORDICK, Philadelphia
J. SCHWARTZ, Philadelphia
M. SIEGEL, PHILADELPHIA
N. MALYN, PITTSBURGH
B. TOPOLSKY, PITTSBURGH
D. DWORKIN, Toronto
A. KIRZNER, Toronto
J. A. CHERNIAK, Winnipeg

46

Organized labor has always been concerned with basic human rights and individual freedoms, and is a potent factor in winning the friendship of people throughout the world for democracy. We therefore deem this legislation of vital concern to you. Your serious consideration of this legislation is essential for the welfare and reputation of our country.

Fraternally yours,

Jacob Pat

JACOB PAT
Executive Secretary,
Jewish Labor Committee

oeiu;153

Immigration

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

RECEIVED
Southern Regional Council

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Alexander Brooks and Sol Rabkin

DATE: May 7, 1952

SUBJECT: Article on McCarran Legislation

Enclosed is an article reprinted from the Nation, and written by a staff member of the Civil Rights Department of the American Jewish Committee, dealing with the McCarran omnibus immigration bill, now pending in the Senate and due to be debated very soon. The Walter bill, the McCarran bill's counterpart, was adopted in the House on April 25, by a vote of 206 to 68, after three days of debate, and it is expected that the McCarran bill will give rise to much controversy in the Senate. The enclosed article analyzes the restrictive and racist features of the McCarran bill and points to the liberal provisions of the Humphrey-Lehman bills, also up before the Senate.

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

To: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

From: Sol Rabkin and Frances Levenson

Date: April 30, 1952

Subject: Rhode Island Civil Rights Legislation

In the closing minutes of the 1952 session, the upper house of the Rhode Island Legislature approved a bill passed unanimously several weeks earlier by the lower house changing the name of the State Fair Employment Practices Commission to the State Commission Against Discrimination, and broadening its authority to include curbing racial and religious discrimination in places of public accommodation. This action was taken by the Rhode Island Senate by the narrowest possible margin --one vote. The bill now awaits signature by the Governor of Rhode Island.

The bill follows the pattern set in New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts and New York of enlarging the jurisdiction of the administrative agency enforcing the state laws against discrimination in employment to permit the agency to receive, investigate, and adjust complaints of discrimination in places of public accommodation. Under the Rhode Island bill, such places as theatres, hospitals, eating places, hotels, stores, saloons and public housing projects are included within the definition of a place of public accommodation.

B'nai B'rith in Rhode Island played a leading role in the campaign of education prior to the enactment of this legislation.

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Frances Levenson

DATE: April 23, 1952

SUBJECT: Integration Achieved in Public Housing in Sacramento, California

Sacramento, the capital of California, has recently joined the constantly increasing number of cities which are ending racial segregation in public housing. Last November, a small committee on segregation in public housing was formed by the local NAACP. The committee made a survey of the public housing projects and found that a pattern of racial segregation was being followed. Discussions with the executive director and members of the Housing Authority proved fruitless with the city officials refusing to change their existing policy.

The NAACP committee then formed a new, larger committee broadly representative of all segments of the community including the various minority groups, religious groups, labor unions, social worker groups and liberal groups. The committee also had among its members prominent individuals including the local rabbis and a number of Catholic priests and Protestant ministers.

This committee released a public statement exposing the racial segregation that existed in public housing projects. This release was made available to local editors including church and labor publications. The committee also undertook to raise funds to finance publicity as well as the filing of a suit to compel termination of segregation. In addition, meetings were arranged with the housing authority, the city council, the city manager and even the Governor's legislative secretary.

When all these conferences resulted in no change of policy, the committee found three plaintiffs and brought court action attacking the constitutionality of the segregation policy.

The Housing Authority agreed to a consent judgment and bound itself to end racial segregation. It is noteworthy that in the stipulation ending the suit the Housing Authority of the City of Sacramento did not admit that it had engaged in racial segregation and stated that it had the right to "limit the occupancy" of its housing units "by 'non-whites' to a percentage of the total housing units determined in accordance with the housing needs in the area served by such projects." The plaintiffs accepted this quota provision only because they believed it to have no binding legal effect and because they thought it would help achieve integrated housing projects by making all-Negro ones less probable.

With the signing of the consent judgment, the committee worked in cooperation with the Authority in preparing the general community and the project tenants to accept interracial housing. Integration was instituted smoothly and is continuing with no adverse reaction whatever.

Meanwhile, the committee continues to watch the situation and to give what help and support it can to the Authority in advancing the policy of racial integration in all its projects.

The events in Sacramento and in other cities where a change-over from racial segregation in public housing to integration has been accomplished, underscore the need for and the strength of broadly constituted citizen groups in securing reform. In most instances, it is not until a committee is organized and brings pressure that city officials are wont to change existing patterns. Dire predictions of riots and disorders often deter Housing Authorities from acting to institute integration. It is only after they are assured that the community wants and is willing to fight for unsegregated public housing that a housing authority will change its policy. Experience then shows that integration can almost invariably be accomplished peaceably.

A city ordinance or a state law barring discrimination in public housing is to be desired but the Sacramento story is an example of what can be accomplished even without a statute so long as there is an alert and organized citizenry.

Finally, after a long uphill fight by community groups, segregation is also being ended in the public housing projects of Los Angeles County. (Racial integration has always been the rule in the city projects in the City of Los Angeles.)

Immigration

American Jewish Congress

ISRAEL GOLDSTEIN, President
SHAD POLIER, Chairman Executive Committee
MORTON M. BERMAN, Chairman Administrative Committee
BENJAMIN S. KALNICK, Treasurer
NATHAN L. EDELSTEIN, Secretary
DAVID W. PETEGORSKY, Executive Director
ISAAC TOUBIN, Assistant Director

COMMISSION ON LAW AND SOCIAL ACTION

WILL MASLOW, Director
LEO PFEFFER, Assistant Director

15 East 84th St. • New York 28, N. Y. • TRafalgar 9-4500

CLSA NATIONAL ADVISORY BOARD

SHAD POLIER
Chairman, Executive Committee

THURMAN ARNOLD
BERNARD BERNSTEIN
LOUIS B. BOUDIN
D. ANGUS CAMERON
BARTLEY C. CRUM
HUBERT T. DELANY
THOMAS I. EMERSON
JAMES L. FLY
ABE FORTAS
ELMER GERTZ
ROLAND B. GITTELSOHN
FRANK P. GRAHAM
JEROME R. HELLERSTEIN
CHARLES H. HOUSTON
ALVIN JOHNSON
J. DONALD KINGSLEY
FREDA KIRCHWEY
JOSEPH P. LASH
MAX LERNER
CONSTANCE S. LINDAU
EDWIN J. LUKAS
THURGOOD MARSHALL
CAREY MCWILLIAMS
JEROME MICHAEL
MATHILDA D. MILLER
ROBERT R. NATHAN
CHARLES POLETTI
DANIEL A. POLING
ANNE POLLOCK
IRA DE A. REID
JACOB ROBINSON
MALCOLM ROSS
ARTHUR H. SCHWARTZ
HARRY SHULMAN
EDWARD S. SILVER
SIMON SOBELOFF
RODERICK STEPHENS
MICHAEL STRAIGHT
HAROLD TAYLOR
JACOB J. WEINSTEIN

May 9, 1952

Dear Friend,

You may be interested in the enclosed summary and analysis of the recent three-day debate in the House of Representatives on the Walter Omnibus Immigration bill. The analysis may also be helpful in summarizing the arguments of those who favor this type of legislation.

Shocking, however, is the barely concealed anti-Semitism, race prejudice and xenophobia which is described here in detail.

Sincerely,

Will Maslow

Will Maslow

Enclosure

STATEMENT
of Alexander F. Miller, Southern Director Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith before
President's Committee on Immigration & Naturalization
Atlanta, Ga., October 17, 1952

My name is Alexander F. Miller. I am the Southern Director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. B'nai B'rith is America's oldest civic organization of American Jews. It represents a membership of 300,000 men and women and their families.

The Anti-Defamation League is the educational arm of B'nai B'rith. It is a creative organization seeking to build in the lives of all Americans those basic attitudes on which good human relations are founded. It is an action organization aiming for the continual expansion of democratic horizons.

I am grateful for this opportunity to express my views with reference to our immigration and naturalization laws. We believe it is healthy and significant that from time to time we examine objectively our procedures, our policies and our laws, to determine whether they are consonant with the democratic patterns established so wisely by our forefathers.

It is our belief that the current immigration and naturalization laws are at variance with the democratic process. We believe that our immigration policies are a paradox which not only tend to undermine our international and domestic situation, but are also an affront to our morality and to our ethic.

The several reasons for our opposition to the current immigration and naturalization policies have been rehearsed before this commission many times. It is my intention today to list these reasons but briefly in order to give background and perspective for the specific testimony I shall attempt to offer with regard to the Southern scene.

The three main features of our present immigration laws are: (A) the principle that persons who may be harmful to our country, such as criminals, subversives, diseased, are absolutely excluded; (B) the principle of limitation of the number of immigrants permitted to enter the United States in any year; and (C) the system of racial and national exclusion and preferences by which quotas are assigned to some lands and denied to others.

As to the first of these principles, the right to exclude undesirables, we think that it has the solidest support of American public opinion. Americans quite properly insist that immigrants be good human material.

The second of these principles, the idea of a numerical limitation upon the total volume of immigration in the United States, was an outgrowth of the isolationist and know-nothing thinking of the early '20s. During the past quarter of a century, that attitude of necessity has been profoundly modified. Not only have opinions changed on the whole problem of "isolationism," but more specifically that part of the American public that has given serious thought to immigration problems has begun to doubt the value of any blanket numerical limitation upon immigration. The time is close at hand when reconsideration of the principle of total limitations will be in order.

The third principle of our immigration laws, the principle of racial and national exclusions and preferences, has been repudiated by every decent American. The principle of racial preference came to be recognized after 1933 as Hitlerism. It is diametrically opposed to our Declaration of Independence, which proclaims that all men are created equal. Even the McCarran-Walter Act, which has been sharply criticized by many groups throughout the country for its restrictive and backward looking features, gives grudging acceptance to the public wish to rid our immigration policies of racism. Indeed, it was to a large extent on the basis of the provisions eliminating the bar against the immigration and naturalization of Asiatics that Senator McCarran made his spurious appeal for support of the bill.

As Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver of Cleveland pointed out recently, "There are no superior races. There are no races endowed by nature with superior qualities of mind and character. The doctrine of racial superiority was used by the Nazis and Fascists as a cover for their vicious deeds in the last World War. Racial conceits and pretensions have frequently been used by the forces of privilege, darkness and reaction — and the great religions of mankind have always warned mankind against them." "God created only one Adam," declared a Jewish sage, "in order that in the future no man shall be warranted in saying: 'I come from better stock than you do.'" And St. Paul declared in a magnificent summary of the Judeo-Christian tradition on the subject of race: "The God that made the world and all nations therein...has made of one blood all nature and men to dwell on the face of the whole earth."

To remedy the defects in our immigration policies the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, acting together with The American Jewish Committee, has outlined a four-point program.

1. The establishment by law of a national immigration policy commission whose members would be partly selected from the Senate and the House and partly appointed by the President. This Commission would set the maximum number of immigrants to be admitted to this country each calendar year. In so doing, the Commission would be required by law to set a number no lower than 300,000 or .2% (2/10's of 1%) of our total population. The criteria for the number of immigrants admitted each year should be determined by:

A. The demand for immigration visas in each country by qualified bonafide applicants for immigration registered at our consulate in that country.

B. The extent of our economic and military commitments in the various countries.

C. The impact of a particular quota on the implementation of our foreign policy.

D. The relationship of immigration from a particular country to our domestic and economic needs.

2. The establishment of a Visa Review Board to which persons denied visas by an American Consul may appeal. We believe that it is contrary to the basic principles of Democracy to allow any subordinate official of the United States to have unlimited power over other persons, subject to no review.

3. The revision of deportation laws so that only those situations should be declared grounds for deportation where the interest of the United States clearly requires deportation. Deportation has long been recognized as a drastic punishment which may be tantamount to imprisonment or death and which therefore should be used with circumspection and with due regard to the interest of all individuals involved.

4. The elimination of all disabilities suffered by naturalized citizens because they are not native born. Naturalized citizens now suffer many inequities from which our citizens by birth are free. There have actually been established two classes of citizenship. The very existence of classes and levels of citizenship is a detriment to democracy.

One aspect of our immigration laws which has run counter to the general policy in force since 1924 has been the special legislation which has permitted the immigration of displaced persons during the post-war era. I believe that an examination of the effect of the influx of these displaced persons provides us with a handy test tube in which we can examine whether the proposals advanced to liberalize immigration policy would be fortuitous for this country.

I am certain that testimony with regard to the integration into the fabric of this country of these refugees from totalitarianism has been advanced to this commission. The splendid effect of this broad-visioned Displaced Persons policy upon our foreign relations has been documented.

It is my purpose, today, to examine the Displaced Persons policy against the background of the Southern area to attempt to determine whether an enlarged flow of immigrants coming from countries whose residents are normally restricted from journeying to these shores has been helpful or hurtful.

Let us first take a brief look at the South itself, its need, its capacity, its desire to absorb new immigration.

The South is in a period of transition from an agricultural to an industrial economy. The South can no longer be classified as it was only 15 short years ago as the nation's Number One economic problem. The South is prosperous and its industry is expanding rapidly. There is great need for more industry, more capital, more technicians, more skilled workers, both in industry and on the farm. The present population cannot fully meet the labor demand. Examine, if you will, the want ads of the daily papers through the South and you will note the tremendous demand for skilled people to man the gears of our expanding economy. No better pool of skilled manpower can be found than among the reservoir of those desiring to enter these shores.

Population-wise, the South is far from being over-inhabited. There are vast areas that need settlement in order to bring the land to its fullest productivity and fruitfulness. Take an automobile ride in any area of the South, and you will note how thinly the land is populated.

A great minister of this city, Reverend Pierce Harris, has on the bulletin board of his church, "And the people are friendly." I think the same thing can be said generally of our Southern folk. They are noted for their friendliness and hospitality. The settlement of immigrants under the DP bill caused, as far as I have been able to discover, neither tension nor irritation. Southern hospitality for the stranger within our gates has become, with justification, a by-word in our country's language.

Unfortunately, some of the actions of a few of our irresponsible and violent elements have been used with telling effect by the Communist publicists in their efforts to undermine American prestige throughout the world. A cross-burning, a flogging, a Klan parade has been grist for the Red propaganda mill in Asia, in Africa and in Europe. Effective efforts by the South to curb the Klan through anti-mask and anti-crossburning laws and through the prosecution of Klan leaders have hardly been whispered abroad.

What better way to demonstrate that the Klan and the Klan mentality represent the deviation rather than the pattern, than by taking the Klan philosophy out of our immigration laws. The successful adjustment of immigrants in our South has been and will continue to be a living lie to world-wide Communist propaganda.

In conclusion, may I present to you some figures to illustrate my thesis, These figures are based on the adjustment of Jewish displaced persons in the South.

During the time the displaced persons law was effective, some 6,500 Jews were settled in the Southern area. Of this number, according to the United Service for New Americans, the agency which was in charge of settling them, not one has been a recipient of public charity. The average length of time that these immigrants have received private charity has been only three months. This represents a period just long enough for the immigrants to become acclimated and to learn enough of the language to hold a job. Almost uniformly these immigrants — these New Americans — have enriched the South through their industry, their culture, their scientific and technical knowledge, and above all, through their loyalty and devotion to their newly adopted land. Some of these immigrants, because of their special talents, have started unique industries which have provided employment and income for thousands of Southerners.

For example, take the case of Mr. A.,,a paint chemist. In partnership with a native Southerner, he started a paint factory which offers a highly unique and important service to Southern industry. This paint factory is not in competition with other paint manufacturers. As a matter of fact, Mr. A., because of his special knowledge is called in to help other paint manufacturers to solve some of their knotty problems. He has invented formulae which permit the application of paint to machines being operated at extreme temperatures. His factory now gives employment to a number of native Southerners. His contribution has supplemented and aided and helped industry in this area to expand.

Other immigrants, trained as doctors, scientists and physicists have also been extremely useful. There is a tremendous demand for doctors to serve in our rural areas. A number of the new Americans have settled in agricultural communities, where they are performing valued and needed services. One of the greatest needs of all in the field of medicine is for selfless, devoted doctors to serve in state-operated mental institutions. These mental institutions find it difficult for a number of reasons to attract sufficient doctors. A number of Southern mental hospitals now have as residents new immigrants. Nor is there any need to detail for this commission the valued services of the physicists and other scientists who have worked at various Southern atom-bomb projects, nor to outline the histories of several uniquely trained scholars who occupy important niches in a number of Southern colleges and universities. It is important to underline, however, that there is still a tremendous need for added services in the South -- needs which can only be filled by the acceleration of a flow of talented immigrants to these shores.

May I reiterate once more the deep and fervent hope of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith that this Commission hearing will serve to lead to a nation-wide discussion of how our immigration and naturalization laws and policies measure up against our democratic principles and how these laws and policies can be made to conform more closely to our democratic ideals. Out of this discussion we hope will come a democratic, humane, intelligent and far-sighted immigration and naturalization policy which will aid in building democracy, not only in our country but throughout the world, and which will enable our country as a leader of the democratic forces of the world to play its proper role in the elimination of want and fear everywhere.

RESOLUTIONS ON IMMIGRATION AND MCCARRAN-WALTER ACT

RESOLUTION ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION ADOPTED BY NATIONAL AFL CONVENTION, SEPTEMBER, 1952, NEW YORK CITY

The Walter Omnibus Immigration and Nationality Bill enacted by the last session of Congress represented a culmination of four years of study of our entire immigration and naturalization system and an attempt to encompass in a single law the many enactments of the past thirty years. Representatives of our National Legislative Committee appeared before the Congressional committees considering these bills and effectively presented our views on these questions of vital concern to labor.

The law, as finally passed, represented the first comprehensive revision of our immigration and naturalization laws in nearly three decades. Such a sweeping effort can neither be wholly satisfactory nor can it revolve the many current problems arising from the pressures of world population. We ask that the American Federation of Labor renew in the 83rd Congress its efforts to bring about sound improvements and necessary revisions of the immigration and naturalization law.

With these comments, your Committee recommends the adoption of this portion of the Executive Council's report.

RESOLUTION ON IMMIGRATION POLICY ADOPTED BY NATIONAL CIO CONVENTION, DECEMBER, 1952, ATLANTIC CITY, N.J.

In many respects the United States stands unique among nations. It was created by the immigration to our shores of men of many and diverse races and creeds. Large scale immigration enabled this country to grow from a wilderness into a great and powerful nation and afforded haven and a new life to millions of the oppressed and impoverished of the Old World.

This country, too, has long avowed two great principles - that our government shall not discriminate on the basis of race, religion or color, and that it shall deal fairly and justly with all.

Yet increasingly these principles, and our whole tradition of a liberal immigration policy, have, in the drafting of our immigration and naturalization laws, gone into the discard. Beginning in 1924, Congress not only severely restricted numbers of immigrants permitted to enter each year, but established quotas for each country, these quotas being set to favor immigrants from Northern European countries and to discriminate against immigrants from elsewhere. In addition, Asiatics had earlier been entirely excluded from immigration, and those already here from naturalization.

During the last two years the immigration and naturalization laws have been extensively amended by Congress. Unfortunately, the revisions, passed over President Truman's veto, constitute, as a whole, an even less liberal immigration policy than the prior laws. In addition they make second class citizens of all naturalized citizens and deny to aliens resident in this country the fair protection of our laws.

Under these new statutes even fewer immigrants will enter the country than under the 1924 Act. The issuance of visas is impeded by technicalities and red tape. The national origin quota system established by the 1924 Act is continued, together with its discrimination in favor of immigrants from Northern Europe. Asiatics are given a token quota and are, with belated justice, accorded the privilege of naturalization. This nod towards racial equality is offset, however, by an offensive new concept of racial origin, as distinguished from national origin, which is made applicable to Asians, and by new discriminations against Negroes.

The new law also contains broad provisions barring from immigration to this country persons who were once totalitarian adherents, no matter how long ago, or in what circumstances, and without regard to what their proven opinions may be now. The new law accepts, as a ground for exclusion, criminal convictions by foreign courts, even those of totalitarian countries which resort to framing political opponents. These provisions bar forever from this country the many individuals who have broken with communism and are now prepared to devote their lives and their knowledge to fighting it. Such an immigration policy impairs our capacity to appeal to the people behind the iron curtain to renounce the communist allegiance which has been forced upon them.

The Constitution contemplates that once immigrants are naturalized and admitted to the rights and duties of American citizenship, they shall stand on the same footing as natural born citizens, save only as regards eligibility for the Presidency. But the McCarran-Walter Act makes second class citizens out of all naturalized citizens by subjecting them to denaturalization on various grounds such as contempt of Congress.

The new legislation also greatly expands the grounds for deportation for aliens who are residents here but have not yet become naturalized. Many of these new grounds for deportation are, contrary to every principle of justice, made retroactive so that persons can now be deported for conduct which was perfectly legal when undertaken.

These resident aliens may have lived here for many years, and many be married to Americans, and have children who are American citizens. Their deportation may inflict great hardship on their families, but no discretion is granted by the law to the immigration officials to take humanitarian considerations into account.

This restrictive immigration policy and this virulently anti-foreign legislation comes at a peculiarly inapposite time. For us, when we are striving to build a mutual security system in cooperation with our allies abroad, to make our immigration and naturalization laws ever more isolationist and anti-foreign, not only makes very little sense; it embarrasses us in the pursuit of the wider objectives of our foreign policy. Both our national interest and the deep humanitarianism which has always characterized Americans as a nation require that we reverse this trend of the last two years, and establish a new policy on immigration and naturalization which will be consistent with 20th century conditions and ideals.

During the recent Presidential campaign, both candidates declared their opposition to the McCarran-Walter Act and pledged their support for a new and more liberal immigration policy.

This policy should be liberal, and democratic, and make no distinction among immigrants on grounds of race, religion or color. This immigration policy should encompass a liberal permanent, or long-run, immigration policy. In addition, there is the immediate need for special relief for the persons displaced by World War II who still, more than 7 years after the war's end, have not found permanent homes. We can be proud that our country has already given refuge to large numbers of those displaced by World War II, but we should not rest until the problem is completely solved. We cannot longer leave these people in temporary refuges. This country, along with others, must do its share toward providing them with permanent homes.

We need also a special program for aiding the brave refugees who are now reaching Western Europe from the countries behind the iron curtain. The courage and the determination to live in freedom shown by these people should be rewarded and encouraged. They have, at grave risk to themselves, proven their devotion to democracy and their enmity to communist totalitarianism. Both humanitarianism and common sense dictate that we, in cooperation with other free lands, find homes for these people.

We are confident that, in the present state of our economy the United States could admit each year a substantial number of immigrants without danger to the national economy or to American wage scales and standards of living.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED:

1. The CIO urges that the McCarran-Walter Act be repealed and replaced by a new policy on immigration and naturalization which will be consistent with 20th century conditions and ideals.

2. This new immigration policy should provide for the admission each year of substantial numbers of immigrants, without discrimination based on race, color or religion. Pending complete elimination of the national origins quota system, we urge, at the least, that unused portions of quotas be made transferrable. The new immigration policy should, in addition, provide for special relief for the persons displaced by World War II who still have not found permanent homes, and for the refugees currently escaping through the iron curtain.

3. Congress should enact a new law on naturalization according to naturalized citizens the same rights and privileges as native born citizens, as intended by the Constitution.

4. We urge that Congress likewise enact legislation to provide that resident aliens can be deported only for serious crimes, and to give the immigration authorities discretion to administer the deportation laws in a humanitarian manner.

* * * *

Immigration

ADL

SOUTHERN OFFICE

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH

11 PRYOR ST. S. W. ATLANTA 3, GA.

October 27, 1952

RECEIVED
OCT 29 1952
Southern Regional Council

CHAIRMAN OF BOARD
WILLIAM P. BLOOM

CHAIRMAN OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
ABE GOLDSTEIN

DIRECTOR
ALEXANDER F. MILLER

NATIONAL COMMISSION
HON. MEIER STEINBRINK
Chairman

BARNEY BALABAN
A. G. BALLENGER
PHILLIP W. HABERMAN
A. C. HORN
SENATOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN
CHARLES W. MORRIS
DONALD OBERDORFER
Honorary Vice-Chairmen

PHILIP KLUTZNICK
MAURICE DANENBAUM
EDMUND WATERMAN
Vice-Chairmen

RICHARD E. GUTSTADT
Executive Vice-Chairman

JACOB ALSON
Treasurer

BENJAMIN R. EPSTEIN
National Director

COMMISSIONERS
Southern Area

LEONARD ABESS
Miami, Fla.

WILLIAM P. BLOOM
Tuscaloosa, Ala.

FRANK GARSON
Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Friend:

Since the passage of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act by Congress recently over President Truman's veto, there has been a great deal of interest evolved in the whole problem of our immigration policy.

President Truman has appointed a special Commission to study our immigration and naturalization policies. This Commission has been holding hearings in various cities throughout the country.

On October 17th, the Commission held its only Southern hearing in Atlanta, Georgia. You may be interested in the attached statement made by the Director of our Southern Office, as it summarizes our position and also offers a number of proposals for altering our immigration policy.

I would deeply appreciate any comments or suggestions you may have regarding this important matter.

Sincerely yours,

William P. Bloom

William P. Bloom
Chairman, Southern Regional Board

WPB/fs

Encl.

STATEMENT
of Alexander F. Miller, Southern Director Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith
before
President's Committee on Immigration & Naturalization
Atlanta, Ga., October 17, 1952

My name is Alexander F. Miller. I am the Southern Director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. B'nai B'rith is America's oldest civic organization of American Jews. It represents a membership of 300,000 men and women and their families.

The Anti-Defamation League is the educational arm of B'nai B'rith. It is a creative organization seeking to build in the lives of all Americans those basic attitudes on which good human relations are founded. It is an action organization aiming for the continual expansion of democratic horizons.

I am grateful for this opportunity to express my views with reference to our immigration and naturalization laws. We believe it is healthy and significant that from time to time we examine objectively our procedures, our policies and our laws, to determine whether they are consonant with the democratic patterns established so wisely by our forefathers.

It is our belief that the current immigration and naturalization laws are at variance with the democratic process. We believe that our immigration policies are a paradox which not only tend to undermine our international and domestic situation, but are also an affront to our morality and to our ethic.

The several reasons for our opposition to the current immigration and naturalization policies have been rehearsed before this commission many times. It is my intention today to list these reasons but briefly in order to give background and perspective for the specific testimony I shall attempt to offer with regard to the Southern scene.

The three main features of our present immigration laws are: (A) the principle that persons who may be harmful to our country, such as criminals, subversives, diseased, are absolutely excluded; (B) the principle of limitation of the number of immigrants permitted to enter the United States in any year; and (C) the system of racial and national exclusion and preferences by which quotas are assigned to some lands and denied to others.

As to the first of these principles, the right to exclude undesirables, we think that it has the solidest support of American public opinion. Americans quite properly insist that immigrants be good human material.

The second of these principles, the idea of a numerical limitation upon the total volume of immigration in the United States, was an outgrowth of the isolationist and know-nothing thinking of the early '20s. During the past quarter of a century, that attitude of necessity has been profoundly modified. Not only have opinions changed on the whole problem of "isolationism," but more specifically that part of the American public that has given serious thought to immigration problems has begun to doubt the value of any blanket numerical limitation upon immigration. The time is close at hand when reconsideration of the principle of total limitations will be in order.

The third principle of our immigration laws, the principle of racial and national exclusions and preferences, has been repudiated by every decent American. The principle of racial preference came to be recognized after 1933 as Hitlerism. It is diametrically opposed to our Declaration of Independence, which proclaims that all men are created equal. Even the McCarran-Walter Act, which has been sharply criticized by many groups throughout the country for its restrictive and backward looking features, gives grudging acceptance to the public wish to rid our immigration policies of racism. Indeed, it was to a large extent on the basis of the provisions eliminating the bar against the immigration and naturalization of Asiatics that Senator McCarran made his spurious appeal for support of the bill.

As Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver of Cleveland pointed out recently, "There are no superior races. There are no races endowed by nature with superior qualities of mind and character. The doctrine of racial superiority was used by the Nazis and Fascists as a cover for their vicious deeds in the last World War. Racial conceits and pretensions have frequently been used by the forces of privilege, darkness and reaction — and the great religions of mankind have always warned mankind against them." "God created only one Adam," declared a Jewish sage, "in order that in the future no man shall be warranted in saying: 'I come from better stock than you do.'" And St. Paul declared in a magnificent summary of the Judeo-Christian tradition on the subject of race: "The God that made the world and all nations therein...has made of one blood all nature and men to dwell on the face of the whole earth."

To remedy the defects in our immigration policies the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, acting together with The American Jewish Committee, has outlined a four-point program.

1. The establishment by law of a national immigration policy commission whose members would be partly selected from the Senate and the House and partly appointed by the President. This Commission would set the maximum number of immigrants to be admitted to this country each calendar year. In so doing, the Commission would be required by law to set a number no lower than 300,000 or .2% (2/10's of 1%) of our total population. The criteria for the number of immigrants admitted each year should be determined by:

A. The demand for immigration visas in each country by qualified bonafide applicants for immigration registered at our consulate in that country.

B. The extent of our economic and military commitments in the various countries.

C. The impact of a particular quota on the implementation of our foreign policy.

D. The relationship of immigration from a particular country to our domestic and economic needs.

2. The establishment of a Visa Review Board to which persons denied visas by an American Consul may appeal. We believe that it is contrary to the basic principles of Democracy to allow any subordinate official of the United States to have unlimited power over other persons, subject to no review.

3. The revision of deportation laws so that only those situations should be declared grounds for deportation where the interest of the United States clearly requires deportation. Deportation has long been recognized as a drastic punishment which may be tantamount to imprisonment or death and which therefore should be used with circumspection and with due regard to the interest of all individuals involved.

4. The elimination of all disabilities suffered by naturalized citizens because they are not native born. Naturalized citizens now suffer many inequities from which our citizens by birth are free. There have actually been established two classes of citizenship. The very existence of classes and levels of citizenship is a detriment to democracy.

One aspect of our immigration laws which has run counter to the general policy in force since 1924 has been the special legislation which has permitted the immigration of displaced persons during the post-war era. I believe that an examination of the effect of the influx of these displaced persons provides us with a handy test tube in which we can examine whether the proposals advanced to liberalize immigration policy would be fortuitous for this country.

I am certain that testimony with regard to the integration into the fabric of this country of these refugees from totalitarianism has been advanced to this commission. The splendid effect of this broad-visioned Displaced Persons policy upon our foreign relations has been documented.

It is my purpose, today, to examine the Displaced Persons policy against the background of the Southern area to attempt to determine whether an enlarged flow of immigrants coming from countries whose residents are normally restricted from journeying to these shores has been helpful or hurtful.

Let us first take a brief look at the South itself, its need, its capacity, its desire to absorb new immigration.

The South is in a period of transition from an agricultural to an industrial economy. The South can no longer be classified as it was only 15 short years ago as the nation's Number One economic problem. The South is prosperous and its industry is expanding rapidly. There is great need for more industry, more capital, more technicians, more skilled workers, both in industry and on the farm. The present population cannot fully meet the labor demand. Examine, if you will, the want ads of the daily papers through the South and you will note the tremendous demand for skilled people to man the gears of our expanding economy. No better pool of skilled manpower can be found than among the reservoir of those desiring to enter these shores.

Population-wise, the South is far from being over-inhabited. There are vast areas that need settlement in order to bring the land to its fullest productivity and fruitfulness. Take an automobile ride in any area of the South, and you will note how thinly the land is populated.

A great minister of this city, Reverend Pierce Harris, has on the bulletin board of his church, "And the people are friendly." I think the same thing can be said generally of our Southern folk. They are noted for their friendliness and hospitality. The settlement of immigrants under the DP bill caused, as far as I have been able to discover, neither tension nor irritation. Southern hospitality for the stranger within our gates has become, with fortification, a by-word in our country's language.

Unfortunately, some of the actions of a few of our irresponsible and violent elements have been used with telling effect by the Communist publicists in their efforts to undermine American prestige throughout the world. A cross-burning, a flogging, a Klan parade has been grist for the Red propaganda mill in Asia, in Africa and in Europe. Effective efforts by the South to curb the Klan through anti-mask and anti-crossburning laws and through the prosecution of Klan leaders have hardly been whispered abroad.

What better way to demonstrate that the Klan and the Klan mentality represent the deviation rather than the pattern, than by taking the Klan philosophy out of our immigration laws. The successful adjustment of immigrants in our South has been and will continue to be a living lie to world-wide Communist propaganda.

In conclusion, may I present to you some figures to illustrate my thesis. These figures are based on the adjustment of Jewish displaced persons in the South.

During the time the displaced persons law was effective, some 6,500 Jews were settled in the Southern area. Of this number, according to the United Service for New Americans, the agency which was in charge of settling them, not one has been a recipient of public charity. The average length of time that these immigrants have received private charity has been only three months. This represents a period just long enough for the immigrants to become acclimated and to learn enough of the language to hold a job. Almost uniformly these immigrants -- these New Americans -- have enriched the South through their industry, their culture, their scientific and technical knowledge, and above all, through their loyalty and devotion to their newly adopted land. Some of these immigrants, because of their special talents, have started unique industries which have provided employment and income for thousands of Southerners.

For example, take the case of Mr. A...,a paint chemist. In partnership with a native Southerner, he started a paint factory which offers a highly unique and important service to Southern industry. This paint factory is not in competition with other paint manufacturers. As a matter of fact, Mr. A., because of his special knowledge is called in to help other paint manufacturers to solve some of their knotty problems. He has invented formulae which permit the application of paint to machines being operated at extreme temperatures. His factory now gives employment to a number of native Southerners. His contribution has supplemented and aided and helped industry in this area to expand.

Other immigrants, trained as doctors, scientists and physicists have also been extremely useful. There is a tremendous demand for doctors to serve in our rural areas. A number of the new Americans have settled in agricultural communities, where they are performing valued and needed services. One of the greatest needs of all in the field of medicine is for selfless, devoted doctors to serve in state-operated mental institutions. These mental institutions find it difficult for a number of reasons to attract sufficient doctors. A number of Southern mental hospitals now have as residents new immigrants. Nor is there any need to detail for this commission the valued services of the physicists and other scientists who have worked at various Southern atom-bomb projects, nor to outline the histories of several uniquely trained scholars who occupy important niches in a number of Southern colleges and universities. It is important to underline, however, that there is still a tremendous need for added services in the South -- needs which can only be filled by the acceleration of a flow of talented immigrants to these shores.

May I reiterate once more the deep and fervent hope of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith that this Commission hearing will serve to lead to a nation-wide discussion of how our immigration and naturalization laws and policies measure up against our democratic principles and how these laws and policies can be made to conform more closely to our democratic ideals. Out of this discussion we hope will come a democratic, humane, intelligent and far-sighted immigration and naturalization policy which will aid in building democracy, not only in our country but throughout the world, and which will enable our country as a leader of the democratic forces of the world to play its proper role in the elimination of want and fear everywhere.

STATEMENT OF PHILIP MURRAY BEFORE THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

October 28,1952
****

My name is Philip Murray. I am President of the Congress of Industrial Organizations and appear here on its behalf.

I appreciate this opportunity to appear before the Commission and to give our views on the important public issues which this Commission is considering. I shall deal with the major questions of policy involved, rather than with the minutiae of legislation which is now on the books. If agreement can be reached on the basic principles, their implementation will be relatively easy. The problem, then, is to decide on what basic principles our immigration and naturalization laws should rest.

Immigration Policy

The CIO favors a liberal immigration policy. We favor such a policy both from humanitarian motives and because we think such a policy is in the best interests of the United States.

In all frankness, how could the Congress of Industrial Organizations conceivably take any other position? Had this country not generously extended welcoming arms to me, I might have spent my life trying to eke out a meagre existence in the coal mines of Scotland.

The heads of several of our International Unions, besides myself, immigrated to this country. Many of our members did. In other cases it was their parents or grandparents who came over. It is a truism that if we go back far enough, all Americans are descendants of immigrants.

We who have come to this country from other countries know that immigration has benefited us. We know that it has, over the years, benefited millions of others by permitting them to leave the poverty and tyranny of the old world and start life anew in a free country whose boast is equality of opportunity for all.

We sincerely believe, moreover, that immigration has not only benefitted the immigrants but has benefited the United States as well. The great trans-continental railroad construction of the 19th century was made possible only by the back-breaking toil of tens of thousands of Irish and Chinese immigrants. The farms of the middle west, which have become the granary of the nation, were hewn from the wilderness by German and Scandavian immigrants. During the latter part of the 19th century and during this century our great industrial plants have in considerable part been manned by immigrants or the sons of immigrants,Italians and Slavs, and men of many other races.

Nor have immigrants contributed only their muscle. Many of this nation's finest scientists today are men who were born across the seas. Dr. Albert Einstein's vital contributions in many fields, including the development of atomic energy, are well known. And only this last Friday the Nobel Prize for medicine and physiology was awarded to Dr. Waksman of Rutgers for his discovery of streptomycin. Dr. Waksman came to this country from the Russian Ukraine as an immigrant 42 years ago.

That is why we favor a liberal immigration policy.

This liberal immigration policy should, we think, encompass three separate situations. There is, first, the need for a liberal permanent, or rather long-run, immigration policy. Secondly, there is the immediate need for special relief for the persons displaced by World War II who still, more than 7 years after the war's end, have not found permanent homes. Thirdly, there is the current problem of offering special refuge to the streams of refugees who continue to find their way through the iron curtain.

I shall address myself first to these last two phases of our immigration policy.

Surely this country should, on an emergency and special basis, open its gates and afford haven to the displaced of World War II who have not yet found homes. We can be proud that our country has already given refuge to large numbers of those displaced by World War II, but we should not rest until the problem is completely solved. We cannot longer leave these people in temporary refuges. This country along with others, must do its share toward providing them with permanent homes.

We need, too, a special program of aiding the brave refugees who are now reaching Western Europe from the countries behind the iron curtain. The courage and the determination to live in freedom shown by these people should be rewarded and encouraged. They have, at grave risk to themselves, proven their devotion to democracy and their enmity to communist totalitarianism. Yet as these new pilgrims reach the promised land of the west they are simply herded into the old DP camps, where they wait for months or years, unemployed and without hope. This intolerable condition must be ended. Both humanitarianism and common-sense dictate that we, in cooperation with other free lands find homes for these people.

I come now to the question of what our permanent long-range, immigration policy should be.

I have said that we in the CIO favor a liberal immigration policy. What do I mean by liberal? I mean that we should be willing to admit to our shores each year a generous number of immigrants, and that in their selection there should be no discrimination based on color, religion, or racial origin.

I am, of course, aware that there was a time when the labor movement of this country was fearful that unrestricted immigration would undermine union wage standards. I do not know whether these fears were ever well-grounded. In 1940-41, the five states with the largest number of immigrants had an average annual per capita income of $891, or about twice the $453 per capita income of the five states with the smallest number of immigrants.

It may be that large sdale immigration stimulates production and rising wages. This country, until it adopted a policy of sharply restricting immigration in 1924, admitted immigrants whose numbers annually (except during World War I) approximated 1% of the current population. I do not believe that any evidence has ever been adduced that immigration on this scale adversely affected wage scales in this country or the economy of the country: if anything the evidence seems directly to the contrary. Hence it appears that this country could, without danger to its wage scales or economy, absorb each year a very substantial number of immigrants. If results harmful to the United States should develop from too large scale immigration, Congress could always reconsider the question.

I have said that we should extend the right to immigrate to all of the world's peoples without regard to race, religion or color. We in the CIO believe that one man is as good as another, regardless of his race or his religion or the color of his skin. We in the CIO not only believe that: we practice it. Our unions are open to all, and all are accorded equal treatment, equal rights, and equal opportunity. We believe, moreover, that no race has any monopoly on virtue or talent, and that the various cultures can each make great contributions to our civilization, given freedom to develop and stimulation to achievement.

This means, of course, that we oppose the national origins quota system which has been utilized in this country since 1924. We do not see any virtue in limiting immigration according to the percentages of various racial stocks in this country at a particular period of time, as 1920 under the present legislation. During the 345 years since Europeans first settled in this country, the racial composition of the country and of various parts of it have undergone numerous and far reaching changes. Indeed the idea that the racial composition of our population can be frozen, which seems to underlie the racial origins quota, is childish in the extreme. We are unable to see, however, that these changes in racial stocks have done this country any harm in the past, and see no reason to anticipate harm from such changes in the future.

The choice of 1920 as the year embodying the ideal composition of racial stocks shows the fanciful nature of the whole concept. Are we to suppose that in that year the country's population reached an all-time high in virtue, intelligence, and physical well-being? There is, of course, nothing to support such a conclusion, or to indicate that whatever attributes the 1920 population may have had had any thing to do with the then prevailing distribution of racial origins.

Another important issue of general immigration policy has to do with the qualifications which immigrants should be required individually to meet. There is, I should suppose, general agreement as to the exclusion of criminals, those having communicable disease,etc. The controversy which has raged about this issue in the last few years has revolved rather about the question of what consequences should be made to attach to a would-be immigrant's past political views and associations.

Here, too, we in the CIO believe that a liberal policy should be followed.

Certainly, we should take care to exclude from immigration to this country communist spies or saboteurs. It is, however, quite another thing to say that we will not admit anyone who was ever a totalitarian adherent no matter what his or her proven opinion may be now.

This country has in the past demonstrated its capacity to absorb and to convert to our democratic system of government people of diverse political persuasions. To say that we cannot do so now is to doubt the vitality of our democratic faith and the power of our society to demonstrate its advantages to those who have known another system. The very fact that people choose to leave the society in which they were born to come to this country is itself some indication that they were favorably disposed to our institutions.

We should remember, moreover, that people brought up in certain countries at certain periods may have become communists or nazis virtually automatically. There are probably few adults now in the confines of the Soviet Union, and few among the thousands of immigrants currently escaping through the iron curtain, who are not excluded from admission by the political standards of our present laws. These individuals may have broken irrevocably with communism, and now be prepared to devote their lives and knowledge to fighting communist agression. By treating them as forever tainted in our eyes, we deprive ourselves of their help and make ourselves ridiculous and unreasonable in the eyes of the foreign nations and people we seek as allies. We likewise greatly impair our capacity to appeal to others behind the iron curtain to abandon their communist allegiance in favor of democracy. For how can we hold out our hand to them and at the same time turn our back?

Naturalization, Denaturalization, and Deportation

Let me now outline somewhat more briefly the policy the CIO thinks this nation should pursue as regards naturalization, denaturalization and deportation.

The principle in which the CIO believes, and which controls our attitude on these issues, is a very simple one. We believe that the naturalized citizen should have the same rights and be treated the same way as native born citizens. We adamantly oppose the conception that naturalized citizens are second class citizens, and that their rights are less than those of native born citizens. We strongly object, therefore, to such provisions as that in recent legislation making naturalized citizens subject to denaturalization for contempt of Congress. Once a person has been naturalized and admitted to the rights and privileges of American citizenship, we believe that his citizenship should be subject to forfeit on only two grounds: (1) fraud in the procurement of the citizenship, or (2) as a punishment for crime, as in the case of natural born citizens.

Nor would we permit these principles to be whittled away by treating as fraud trivial or incidental misrepresentations. The only sort of fraud which should be permitted to vitiate citizenship is deliberate and intentional fraud on an issue which would have prevented naturalization.

What I have said about denaturalization applies, too, to deportation following denaturalization. Once a man has become an American citizen and has, as he must to become an American citizen, foresworn his allegiance to the country from which he came, he is, in our view, entitled to remain in this country and is its responsibility.

At this point, indeed, another consideration, in addition to justice to the individual, enters the picture. What basis has this country for asking another country to take back individuals who renounced their allegiance to that country and became American citizens years ago, even though they may now have turned out to be undesirable citizens? We believe that other countries are quite within their rights in refusing to take back their former citizens.

If naturalized citizens are guilty of crimes they should be punished as are other citizens. Punishment should not include denaturalization and deportation: else they are denied the full status of American citizens.

The final point to which I wish to address myself has to do with the deportation of resident aliens, that is of immigrants who may have lived here for years but have never been naturalized.

I am advised by counsel that people in this category enjoy very little in the way of Constitutional or legal protections, because the Supreme Court has held that for an alien to reside here is a matter of privilege and not of right, and that deportation is not "punishment" so that it can be inflicted without regard to the rights to which a defendant in a criminal trial is entitled. But regardless of what the legal rights of alien residents may be, it is our moral obligation to treat them fairly and decently.

There are two principles which, it seems to me, should be observed in framing a policy on deportation. The first is that the grounds for deportation should not be changed retroactively. As I understand it, during the recent revisions of the immigration laws, new grounds for deportation were added and were made retroactive. That means that a resident alien, who came into this country perfectly legally years ago, can now be deported for reasons that did not bar his entry when he came in. This seems to me grossly unfair and unjust, and to violate the principle against ex poste facto legislation. Deportation is in fact a punishment, whether or not it is so as a matter of legal technicality.

Even worse, under these new revisions of the immigration laws, a resident alien can be deported for conduct which not only did not bar his entry, but which may have occurred, and been repented, long ago. It seems to me difficult to conceive legislation more grossly unfair than this.

The other principle which seems to me should guide us with regard to deportation is that the authorities administering the law should have sufficient discretion to enable them to take humanitarian considerations into account. These resident aliens about whom we are talking may have lived in this country for years, may have married spouses who are American citizens, and may have children who are American citizens. Deportation of the alien may mean intolerable hardship for the family. The officials enforcing the laws should therefore have authority to look at the whole picture and decide whether, in the light of all the circumstances, the national interest will or will not be served by deportation of an individual. The laws should be administered in a liberal and humanitarian, rather than a technical and punitive,spirit.

CONCLUSION

Each passing decade has shown that our nation cannot live in isolation from the rest of the world. We cannot be prosperous while the rest of the world starves; we cannot be militarily secure if the rest of the world succumbs to aggression. Increasingly, the well-being of this nation has become interwoven with that of other nations.

Our immigration policy is a part of our overall national policy. For us, at the very time when we are striving to build a mutual security system in cooperation with our allies abroad, to make our immigration and naturalization laws ever more virulently isolationist and anti-foreign, not only makes very little sense; it embarrasses us in the pursuit of the wider objectives of our foreign policy. Both our national interest and the deep humanitarianism which has always characterized Americans as a nation require that we reverse this trend of the last two years, and establish a new policy on immigration and naturalization which will be consistent with 20th century conditions and ideals.

THREE-FAITH STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES
REGARDING AMERICAN IMMIGRATION POLICY*

We believe in an affirmative immigration policy for America - one which will welcome, without racial, national, religious or other discriminations, those who seek to immigrate and become part of our national life; one which will provide the ever new life-blood which America needs and by which, throughout its history, it has been enriched; one which will assure to new immigrants the basic rights guaranteed to its citizens and will welcome permanent residents into citizenship; one which will express America's active concern to cooperate with other nations in providing a fair share of resettlement opportunities in the U.S.A., as well as in other countries, for those oppressed for freedom's sake.

Such an immigration policy would:

-Be free from any implications of superiority or inferiority as between peoples such as are inherent in the national origins quota system, without sacrificing the right of the United States to grant preferences and priorities;

-Safeguard basic American rights and privileges to immigrants and insure equal status for native and naturalized citizens;

-Welcome new immigrants to the U.S.A. in substantial numbers determined not only on the basis of America's ability to absorb new immigrants and her need for workers of hand and brain but also including her participation in providing opportunities for the victims of oppression overseas, for completing the reunion of families, as well as providing for new-seed immigrants;

-Be closely integrated with our policies of international cooperation, foreign relations and mutual assistance;

-Recognize the tragic plight of uprooted people in the world as a continuing problem and the urgent need for the continuation of America's traditional policy of helpfulness in providing a haven for the oppressed.

---

* Adopted November 25, 1952 by Policy Committee on Immigration, consisting of representatives of the Catholic, Protestant and Jewish faiths and the operating agencies in the field of immigration.

JEWISH LABOR COMMITTEE

Suggested Activities for Local Programs on U.S. Immigration Policy

I. Structure

A. Establishment of a local or state community-wide "Citizens Committee to Revise McCarran Immigration Law" or "Committee on Immigration' with representatives of religious, nationality, civic, labor and veterans groups, under the chairmanship or co-chairmanship of prominent civic or religious leaders. Sub-committees of such a group might be appointed to set up a speaker's bureau, prepare and distribute materials and literature, secure necessary financing, and conduct other necessary aspects of the public relations campaign.

II. Program of Activities

A. Channels for bringing this issue to the attention of the community include the following activities, all of which should be well publicized.

1. Forums and conferences at organization, neighborhood and community-wide level. Local Congressmen should be invited to speak to community-wide meetings and, if they cannot attend, to send their views in a message or relegram.

2. Discussions, interviews and debates over local radio and T.V. stations and discussions by commentators.

3. Local general as well as minority, foreign-language and sectarian press. This would include letters to the editor, favorable editorials, feature stories, etc.

4. Joint inter-faith statement and press conference by leaders of religious groups in the community.

5. Resolutions by local unions, service organizations (Lions, Kiwanis); bar association, if possible, veterans groups; civic associations.

6. Sermons by clergymen of all faiths.

7. Formal proclamations by governors and mayors.

8. Resolutions by city councils and state legislatures memorializing U.S. Congress to revise the McCarran Immigration Act.

B. Themes for above activities.

1. Report of President's Commission on Immigration.

2. Significance of a humane U.S. immigration policy to reinforce our foreign policy needs in cold war against Communism.

3. Local case histories on evils of McCarran Act.

4. Racist implications of McCarran Act.

C. Where possible, activities can be tied in with special days and celebrations. Examples for forthcoming weeks are:

1. Lincoln's Birthday
2. Brotherhood Week
3. Washington's Birthday

D. It may be desirable to tie activities in with local historical sites and traditions of significance. Examples are (1) Boston-Plymouth Rock; (2) New York-Statue of Liberty;(3) Philadelphia-Liberty Bell; (4) Washington, D.C.-Washington Monument, Lincoln Memorial; and (5) San Francisco-anniversary founding of U.N. (symbolizing U.S. world leadership); etc.

the new Leader

DECEMBER 15, 1952

Revise the McCarran Act

By Jules Cohen

After being a campaign issue, the Immigration Act should now be rewritten so as to eliminate its unfair and discriminatory features

THE IMMIGRATION and Naturalization Act of 1952, Public Law 414 (the McCarran-Walter Bill), was adopted over a slashing veto by the President, against a backdrop of almost complete Congressional and public apathy and ignorance regarding U.S. immigration policy.

It is true that the study of our general immigration laws by the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration and Naturalization, which resulted in the McCarran Immigration Act, was initiated in 1947. It is also true that many major religious, racial, nationality and civic groups testified at Congressional hearings on earlier versions of this measure, and objected to all or parts of it. Nevertheless, the public was largely unaware of the fact that the Act not only continues the anti-alien policy which the United States has been following since 1924, but strengthens suspicion and fear of the immigrant by its innumerable restrictive and discriminatory provisions. Except for the few Senators and Representatives who served on the Immigration and Naturalization Subcommittees of both houses and the handful who opposed the bills under the leadership of Lehman and Humphrey in the Senate and Javits and Roosevelt in the House, it appears from the tone of the debates and the limited numbers of those who listened, let alone participated in them, that the bulk of our national legislators had neither read nor studied the measures and cared little about them.

In favor of this controversial Act, it must be said that it does give us a single immigration and naturalization code. It eliminates sex discrimination. On its face at least, it seems to have eliminated racial discrimination, since it provides quotas, if tiny ones, for all the countries which had no quotas before. Also, the Act removes citizenship disability from aliens in the United States of Japanese origin, who were ineligible for naturalization heretofore.

There was strong opposition to the Act because, in general, it makes immigration more difficult while it facilitates deportation and denaturalization. Specifically:

1. The Act continues to use the discriminatory national-origins quota system as the formula for determining the numbers of immigrants who are permitted to enter the United States from various countries. Under this formula, each country is given an annual quota within the total annual ceiling of about 154,000 allowable visas. Using 1920 as the base year, the great bulk of the quotas are assigned to England, Ireland and the countries in Northwestern Europe, which do not need and have not used their high quotas. Southern and East European countries have ridiculously low quotas under this system, although these are the countries which have the greatest emigration problem. This formula was adopted in 1924 on the theory, which was openly advanced and accepted at the time, that the people from the countries of Southern and Eastern Europe are racially inferior to those from the countries considered "Nordic."

2. The Act does not eliminate racial discrimination. On the contrary, it continues the pattern of the "Asia-Pacific Triangle" provision, under which anyone with JULES COHEN is National Coordinator of the National Community Relations Advisory Council, coordinating agency for 32 major Jewish community relations organizations, including the American Jewish Congress, Jewish Labor Committee, Jewish War Veterans, and Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

NEW CITIZENS: LET US BE A PLACE OF REFUGE AGAIN

one parent from a country within the Triangle must apply for entry into the United States under the Triangle quota of 100 and not under the quota of the country of birth. Also, it adds a new form of discrimination against Negroes, by limiting to 100 annually the number of colonials from the West Indies who formerly could enter the U.S. under the quota of the mother country.

3. The Act provides for deportation retroactively. Certain of its deportation provisions are unnecessarily harsh and based upon such vague criteria as "the opinion of the Attorney-General," and make liable for deportation aliens who "might" be guilty of certain offenses in the future.

4. The Act makes no provision for appellate procedures to review possible arbitrary acts of Government officials. It neither makes the Board of Review statutory nor provides for a Visa Review Board.

5. The Act revokes statutes of limitation.

6. The Act places naturalized citizens in a second-class status by denying to them the same rights that are accorded to native Americans.

7. The Act gives undue preference to skilled labor.

8. The Act puts under the quota system professors who formerly enjoyed a non-quota status.

9. The Act continues the inequitable 1920 census as the base for computing quotas, as against the up-to-date 1950 census.

Factors other than general apathy worked against the proponents of a decent immigration policy. Time was against them. The advocates of the McCarran-Walter bills rushed them through Congress before the people could become sufficiently informed about the issues. And such was the power of Senator McCarran that he refused to hold hearings on the liberal Humphrey-Lehman substitute measure; a motion to recommit the McCarran-Walter legislation to the Judiciary Committee, so that such hearings might be held, was defeated 44 to 28.

Lack of unity among the private organizations also played into Senator McCarran's hands. On March 24, 1952, President Truman, in a special message to Congress, called for the enactment of a liberal and humane immigration law. Representative Emanuel Celler (D.-N. Y.) and Senator Hendrickson (R.-N. J.) introduced identical bills calling for the admission of 300,000 escapees, refugees, expellees and "surplus" populations of Europe into the United States within a three-year period. Immediately, some of the strength of the opposition to the McCarran-Walter bills was siphoned off through the creation of the American Committee for Special Migration, which was organized in support of the Celler and Hendrickson bills. It was the mistaken judgment of the leaders of this movement that such emergency legislation would be adopted by the Eighty-second Congress more readily than a liberal basic immigration code. The members of many nationality groups, which until then had been solidly united behind the effort to defeat the McCarran-Walter bills and to enact the Humphrey-Lehman measure, found themselves in the impossible position of striving to defeat one measure while trying to enact a decent basic immigration code and special emergency legislation all at the same time!

The reactionary character of the Eighty-second Congress insured the success of Senator McCarran's effort to have his restrictive bill adopted. The Congressional Record's account of the debates in both Houses shows clearly that Representative Walter and Senator McCarran were in complete control. The mood in the lower house was one of hostility to all suggestions for significant amendments to the Walter bill. Amendments which were introduced were knocked down with the rapidity of ten pins in a bowling alley; Mr. Walter, merely by indicating that a given amendment was unacceptable to him, insured their defeat. In a debate noted for its anti-Semitic overtones, the few liberal members who led the opposition, but who were not well organized, were put to a complete rout in three days (April 23-25) and the bill, with only three minor amendments, was adopted by a vote of 206 to 68.

In contrast, the opposition to the McCarran bill in the Senate was herculean. Senators Lehman and Humphrey were inspired in their effort to defeat the McCarran bill or to have it sent back to the Judiciary Committee for further study. The time will undoubtedly come when the American people will acknowledge their deep indebtedness to Senators Lehman and Humphrey and to the handful of valiant Republican and Democratic Senators who fought with them, against overwhelming odds. The Senate debate lasted eight afternoons over a period of two weeks, from May 9 to May 22, when the McCarran bill was adopted by a voice vote.

The opposition to the McCarran bill, in and out of the Senate, was labeled "Communist." Senator McCarran, who must know better, drew attention to the fact that the Senators who opposed his immigration measure were, by and large, the same Senators who had opposed another bill of his which became the Internal Security Act of 1950, the clear implication being that this group was soft on Communism. The irony of this smear is that the responsible religious, nationality and civic groups which opposed the McCarran measure are strongly anti-Communist, and were completely successful in their scrupulous effort to keep the Communists and their front organizations at a distance. (In this connection, it is interesting to note that a coalition of "patriotic" organizations which supported the McCarran-Walter measures was composed largely of extreme right-wing groups, including some with little or no following. A notable exception is the reputable Japanese-American Citizens League, which must have been most uncomfortable in such dubious company.)

On June 25, President Truman vetoed the bill, the Senate and House versions of which had been reconciled by a conference committee of both houses. As expected, the House overrode the veto on the afternoon of June 26. Upon receiving word of the House action, the Senate, by unanimous consent, agreed to vote on the bill the next afternoon. It is to the everlasting credit of the opposition that the bill was passed by a vote of 57 to 26, just two short of the one-third necessary to sustain the veto.

The prospects for amending Public Law 414 in the Eighty-third Congress are favorable. Developments since the Law's enactment have created an atmosphere better than that which existed last spring. The American people now know more about the Law's harmful implications, and a larger number of Senators and Representatives are now aware of the need for a constructive change in immigration policy.

In September, President Truman appointed a Commission on Immigration and Naturalization to study the whole question and to submit its recommendations by January 1, 1953. Between September 30 and October

IKE: 'THE McCARRAN LAW MUST BE REWRITTEN'

28, the Commission held hearings in New York, Boston, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, St. Paul, St. Louis, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Washington, to ascertain the views of the people. All points of view were solicited by the Commission, which heard more than 400 witnesses testify as individuals, but in most cases on behalf of major religious, labor, veterans, racial, nationality and civic groups. More than 90 per cent of these witnesses objected to one or more provisions of PL 414 and urged the Commission to recommend its speedy revision.

It was acknowledged at the Commission hearings that there must be a ceiling on the total number of immigrants who can be permitted to enter the United States annually, limited by our capacity to absorb those who qualify after screening for security, health and moral reasons. There was an almost unanimous demand for a change in the Law's anti-alien philosophy, witness after witness condemning it not only on religious, ethical and moral grounds but also as inimical to the domestic and foreign policies of our country. The restrictive and discriminatory nature of PL 414 was underscored and the national-origins quota system singled out for a particular heavy attack. This system was branded as being scientifically unsound and out of harmony with American concepts of equality; its elimination was called for, along with its replacement by a non-racist formula.

Some witnesses suggested that the concept of deportation, as a form of "banishment" held over from the Dark Ages, should be dropped entirely, except in cases of fraud or illegal entry. Many urged that the harsh and retroactive deportation provisions of PL 414 should be considerably tempered. Demands were made for appellate safeguards in immigration cases and for equality of treatment under the law for naturalized citizens. Immediate partial amelioration of the problem of European escapees, refugees and expellees was sought.

The national and local press coverage of the hearings of the President's Commission brought home the significance of the immigration issue to many more people than were ever reached during the debates on Public Law 414. Irrespective of what may befall the report of the Commission, since it was appointed by the outgoing President, its educational value will be lasting.

In a message to the Jewish Welfare Board on October 17, President Truman hammered away at the mischievous McCarran Immigration Act and the Republicans in the Senate who voted for it. He said:

> "The Republican candidate for the Presidency cannot escape responsibility for his endorsements. He has had an attack of moral blindness, for today he is willing to accept the very practices that identified the so-called 'master race' although he took a leading part in liberating Europe from their domination."

This statement was immediately picked up by the General and other spokesmen for the Republicans, who charged President Truman with having injected bigotry into the pre-election campaign. Charges and countercharges centering about the President's statement flew thick and fast, in the course of which much was said and written about the restrictive and un-American features of our present immigration policy. The candidates of both parties received a much-needed education on the evils of Public Law 414.

General Eisenhower promptly took a forthright position on the issue of immigration and the need for revision of Public Law 414. According to the New York Times of October 18, General Eisenhower said in a speech at Newark, New Jersey:

> "And now we come to another glaring example of failure of our national leadership to live up to high ideals. I refer to the McCarran Immigration Law, which was passed over the President's veto at the last session of Congress. A new immigration law was certainly needed. But with leadership rather than vetoes, we should have had, and we must get, a better law than this McCarran Act. . . . Obviously, there must be limits to the number of immigrants this country can or should absorb. We must establish fair limits—fair to ourselves and fair to others. We must develop a system of limitation in line with our concept of America as the great melting pot of free spirits, drawn here from all the nations of the earth.

"Let me give you an illustration of the workings of the McCarran Act. The quotas proclaimed by the President under the McCarran Act provide for the entry of over 65,000 immigrants per year from the United Kingdom, but only 5,645 from Italy and only 308 from Greece. The United Kingdom does not use anywhere near the full immigration quotas which it has, but countries like Italy, Greece and the Baltic States and the nations of Eastern Europe use their tiny quotas to the full. They have a pathetic backlog of applications which by law cannot be applied against the unused United Kingdom quota. . . .

"Ladies and gentlemen, the McCarran Immigration Law must be rewritten.

"A better law must be written that will strike an intelligent balance between the immigration welfare of America and the prayerful hopes of the unhappy and the oppressed."

On two other occasions in the campaign, the General dealt with the same theme. In Bridgeport, he said, according to the New York Times: "We must repeal . . . the unfair provisions of the McCarran Act." In Boston, a day later, he stated: "Only second-class Americanism tolerates second-class citizenship. It's time to get rid of both, and that includes rewriting the unfair provisions of the McCarran Immigration Act."

The significance of these statements by the General are enhanced by the critical reference, in his Newark speech, to the inequitable distribution of quotas under the national-origins quota system. Vice President-elect Nixon, who voted to override President Truman's veto, has also indicated in somewhat less unequivocal language that amendments to Public Law 414 are desirable. Nor will the import of General Eisenhower's remarks be lost upon the old and new Republicans in the Eighty-third Congress. It is not unreasonable to expect that the straightforward position of the new President, particularly in view of his overwhelming personal victory on November 4, will compensate for the omission of any reference to the subject of immigration in the Republican platform. Also, following the General's lead, many successful Republican candidates pledged themselves to support and vote for liberalizing amendments to Public Law 414.

Still another factor which contributes to the more favorable atmosphere for revising PL 414 lies in the results of the Senate elections. First, Senator McCarran will no longer be chairman of the key Judiciary Committee. His Republican successor is likely to be Senator William Langer (R. N. D.), who consistently and vigorously opposed the McCarran measure. Second, on the basis of past voting records and general orientation, it can be expected that certain new Senators—Jackson (D.-Wash.), who is a liberal; Kennedy (D.-Mass.), who testified against Public Law 414 at the Boston hearings of the President's Commission; Gore (D.-Tenn.), who opposed the Walter bill as a Representative; Purtell and Bush (R.-Conn.), who, as candidates, pledged themselves to support revisions of Public Law 414; and Mansfield (D.-Mont.), Symington (D.-Mo.), Beall (R.-Md.), Payne (R.-Me.) and Cooper (D.-Ky.)—will probably support actively legislation to amend Public Law 414.

All this does not mean that revisions in the Law will be made without renewed effort on the part of private organizations. This writer is not unaware of the illusory nature of campaign promises. In view of the many crucial problems which the new President and Congress will have to face, immigration may be given a very low priority or no priority at all.

It can be expected that efforts to amend PL 414 will be bitterly resisted by many members of the Eighty-third Congress. This resistance can be overcome, but only if the people are united in their objective and press to the fullest the advantages inherent in the present unique combination of favorable circumstances. It would be disastrous, for example, if any of the major religious or nationality groups were to press for enactment of special legislation in partial relief of European refugees, escapees, expellees and "surplus" populations and thereby jeopardize the opportunity to get a decent basic immigration law. There is no assurance that such emergency legislation can be secured more easily than a revised general immigration law; but, even if it could be, special legislation to admit from 250,000 to 300,000 from these groups for a period of three years would not begin to solve the emergency, which involves millions in Europe alone. The problems of migration posed by the refugees, the dislocated, and the "surplus" populations are worldwide and will have to be resolved through joint international approaches. The "emergency" is a continuing one, and, to the extent that the United States can set an example for other nations, our general immigration law can be made flexible enough to allow for acute situations not only in the next three years, but whenever and wherever they may arise in the future. Special provisions in the amendments to PL 414, for the same groups, in the same numbers and for the same period of time, could accomplish the same results as special legislation. The latter, on the other hand, invites support by the opponents of a liberal permanent immigration policy for the purpose of preventing adoption of such a policy. It is to be hoped that the American people will not be diverted from the objective of securing a permanent liberal immigration law by the seemingly attractive, but in fact misleading and temporary, advantages of special emergency legislation.

A united, intensive and continuing educational campaign, in the favorable atmosphere created by the developments noted above, can bring about, in 1953, liberalizing revisions in the Immigration and Naturalization Act of 1952. This would reaffirm the tradition of America as a place of refuge for the oppressed and the persecuted and strengthen our foreign policy.

Printed in U.S.A.

BULLETIN

AMERICAN COMMITTEE for CULTURAL FREEDOM

December 1952 VOL. II, NO. 3

A memorandum on THE VISA PROBLEM

The following analysis of the visa problem is concerned primarily with the question of temporary (visitors') visas, and particularly with the troubles that arise for foreign scientists, writers, and intellectuals out of the legislation now incorporated in the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, and out of its administration by the State Department. No attempt has been made to discuss the general principles of the law. The purpose of this memorandum is a practical and concrete one: to recommend specific revisions of both the legislation and its method of enforcement, within the framework of the intent of Congress.

This memorandum, prepared by the staff of the American Committee for Cultural Freedom, is based on: discussions with the staff of the Senate Judiciary Committee, members of Congress interested in these matters, members of the State Department, Department of Justice, and Central Intelligence Agency; interviews with foreign diplomatic and intelligence officers, and with foreigners personally involved in visa problems; review of the relevant statutes and regulations; and extended direct participation in a number of visa cases.

THE PROBLEM

Some months ago, the United States Government asked the Norwegian labor movement to send a delegation of trade union leaders to this country. This delegation was to take the form of a Study Commission, which would examine at first hand the way of life of the American worker, and which would then report its findings to the Norwegian people. The Norwegian unions nominated nine of their outstanding personalities to the Study Commission. Imagine their consternation when the State Department then informed them that four of their nominees could not be granted visas until their life-histories had been subjected to a more intensive scrutiny!

What was the reason for the State Department's action? One of the nominees, a venerable labor journalist and outstanding anti-Communist, had been affiliated with the Norwegian Communist movement in the early 1920's. A second nominee had visited Russia at the request of the Norwegian labor movement -- but had written so hostile a report that the United States Government had reprinted it and distributed it all over the world. The third nominee had been mistaken by the State Department for someone else. The case of the fourth nominee, who had never been connected with any Communist activities, was inexplicable and remains so to this day; presumably he was the victim of a false and malicious "confidential denunciation."

After much delay and unpleasant publicity, all four were cleared for travel in the United States. One can easily imagine, however, that despite the happy ending this incident did not exactly promote good feeling toward America.

Unfortunately, there have been more than a few such incidents, not all of them with happy endings. It is true that, for the kind of bureaucratic civilization in which we live, and in relation to the total number of visitors, they do not cut a large figure. In the past years, tens of thousands of scientists, writers, artists, intellectuals, journalists, students, labor leaders, etc. -- far more than in any comparable previous period -- have received visas to enter the United States, most of them under governmental grant or subsidy. Nevertheless, it is almost impossible to exaggerate the bad impression created by those cases where an injustice has been suffered. These generally involve prominent members of the intellectual and professional classes, whose status and prestige in their own communities are far higher than that usually accorded to their counterparts in this country. Any senseless affront to them is widely reported in the foreign press and as widely resented by their fellow-citizens. A series of such affronts will cause even the most sympathetic to give credence to the Communist portrait of the United States as a land dominated by a mindless fever of "witch-hunting."

By now, there has been sufficient public turmoil over the visa muddle to elevate what had been a suspicion into a certainty: something is wrong, somewhere. But it is not easy to place one's finger on the exact source of error. Some critics have argued that the State Department has deliberately administered the McCarran Act in such a way as to exaggerate its worst features for the sake of "showing it up." There is, in fact, little evidence to substantiate this accusation. Other critics have asserted that the law itself as it pertains to visitors' visas is gov-

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR CULTURAL FREEDOM
affiliated with
CONGRESS FOR CULTURAL FREEDOM

INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE

Honorary Chairmen
Benedetto Croce
Karl Jaspers
Salvador de Madariaga
Jacques Maritain
Reinhold Niebuhr
Bertrand Russell

President of the Executive Committee
Denis de Rougemont

Secretary-General
Nicolas Nabokov

Executive Committee
Georges Altman
Raymond Aron
Francois Bondy
Irving Brown
Nicola Chiaromonte
T.R. Fyvel
Sidney Hook
Eugen Kogon
Haakon Lie
M.R. Masani
David Rousset
Carlo Schmid
Ignazio Silone
Stephen Spender

NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Chairman
George S. Counts

Vice-Chairmen
German Arciniegas
Charles S. Johnson
H. J. Muller
Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.

Secretary-treasurer
Grace Zaring Stone

Executive Director
Irving Kristol

Executive Committee
Arnold Beichman
Daniel Bell
James Burnham
Elliot Cohen
James T. Farrell
Clement Greenberg
Sidney Hook
Hans Kohn
S. M. Levitas
Norbert Muhlen
William Phillips
Richard Rovere
George Schuyler
Peter Viereck
Max Yergan

erned by an "anti-foreign" xenophobic bias, and that Congress intended surreptitiously to exclude, not only Communists, but also non-Communist liberals, socialists, etc. Here, too, there is no evidence to back up such a charge.

Actually, it would seem that the present situation arises from a complex law which is defective in important respects, and which is administered by a large bureaucratic organization that is not well fitted, either by individual training or institutional precedent, for this novel task.

GENERAL INADEQUACIES OF THE LAW

The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, which goes into effect on December 24th, codifies existing legislation in this sphere. With respect to the provisions touching upon visitors' visas, the law has several fairly obvious defects:

(a) Parts are too vaguely worded. For instance, Sec. 212, (a), (27) prohibits the issuing of visas to:

Aliens who seek to enter the United States whether solely, principally, or incidentally, to engage in activities which would be prejudicial to the public interest, or would endanger the welfare or safety of the United States.

This permits of almost any interpretation, and could be used to exclude practically anyone displeasing to a particular administration, party, faction, or even individual official. Similarly, though another section bars aliens who are members of a Communist or other totalitarian "affiliate" or "subsidiary," it is nowhere made clear what is meant by such an "affiliate" or "subsidiary."

(b) The provisions of the law include detailed matters that ought properly to be left in the hands of the administrators. This was done by Congress because of its belief that the Executive and the State Department have been "too soft on Communism," Whatever the meaning or merits of this notion, Congress was mistaken in supposing that it is possible to legislate the detailed administration of so complicated and diverse an operation as the handling of thousands of visa applications in all nations of the world.

(c) The law does not make any clear distinction between visitors' visas and permanent immigration visas.

(d) The law fails to make any special provision for exiles and escapees from nations now under Communist rule.

GENERAL INADEQUACIES OF ADMINISTRATION

With regard to the administration of the law, the following glaring defects immediately strike the eye:

(a) The procedures for getting a visa are unnecessarily slow and cumbersome, braked by too many and too detailed questionnaires, and too mechanical in their failure to allow for atypical cases.

(b) Consuls, like the rest of humanity, are frequently not as good-natured or well-informed as they might be. Consequently, the authority they possess is often wielded irresponsibly.

(c) Because of a fear of Congressional displeasure or investigation, most consular officials will tend to resolve doubts in favor of a "strict" interpretation of the law and of their instructions. The censure they may receive for withholding a visa without good cause is of little weight in comparison with the obloquy they may suffer for granting a visa to someone who, in the opinion of a Congressman, ought not to get it.

(d) Many harrowing difficulties can be traced to the "confidential denunciation," which the ordinary consul rarely can evaluate properly. The very existence of such a confidential denunciation in a dossier -- regardless of its validity -- is ordinarily enough to cause action to be suspended for a lengthy period. This is the explanation of many cases which have seemed particularly baffling and arbitrary.

(e) Congress has failed to appropriate enough money to the Departments of State and Justice for the rapid handling of visa applications. Much of the infuriating delay that is now experienced is simply the result of the huge backlog of applications which has accumulated.

RECOMMENDED CHANGES IN THE LAW

1) Sec. 212 (a) (27), quoted above, of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, should be eliminated. Its specific content is included in other provisions, and its vague injunctions do not belong in any law.

2) The law should clearly separate the question of temporary (visitors') visas from that of permanent (immigrant) visas. It is both unwise and unnecessary to set up the same stringent requirements for both classes. Temporary visas should be granted with the least possible delay to all applicants, unless there is reason to believe that the applicant intends to make use of his visit to engage in illegal or subversive activities. Membership in the Communist party, or the holding of a leading position in a Communist-front organization, may be interpreted as such a declaration of intention. But even here, there ought to be some room for exceptions, in view of the fact that association with a front organization can mean different things at different places at different times. Especially in countries where the Communists have a mass base, it is not unusual for the names of naive and prominent businessmen, statesmen, and intellectuals who are definitely non-Communist to turn up on the letterheads of innocuous-appearing, but Communist-sponsored, organizations.

3) There should be special provisions for escapees and exiles from Communist countries. These would take into account the different significance of membership in Communist organizations in Communist, as distinguished from non-Communist, countries. While assuring adequate security measures, they should deliberately aim at encouraging escape and at making easier the integration and utilization of escapees.

4) One clause of the new law, while not involving visitors' visas, does affect cultural interchange and is of special concern to such an organization as the American Committee for Cultural Freedom. Until now, a professor at a college or a university, and his immediate family, have been entitled to enter this country for permanent residence as non-quota immigrants. This privilege is abolished by the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. Henceforth, professors must wait their turn as ordinary quota immigrants, unless they can prove to the satisfaction of the Attorney General that their services are "needed urgently in the United States." (Sec. 203 (a) (1).) It is impossible to fathom the purpose of this. Certainly, no security problem is at issue, since even as non-quota immigrants these professors would have to meet the standards set up for all immigrants. The only forseeable consequence is that the United States will be depriving itself of distinguished foreign scholars willing to accept permanent posts at American universities. The previous legislation on this matter should be restored.

5) Sec. 212 (a) (28) of the new law represents a big stumbling block. Its main provisions bar aliens who (A) are anarchists, (B) advocate, or are affiliated with an organization that advocates, opposition to all organized government, (C) are members of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party or any of its subdivisions and affiliates, (D) advocate the "economic, international, and governmental doctrines of world Communism" or of any other form of totalitarianism, (E) are members of any organization required to register under the Subversive Activities Control Act of 1950, (F) advocate, or are members of any organization that advocates, "the overthrow by force or violence" of the Government of the United States, (G) write, publish or circulate written or printed matter that calls for the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force, or which teaches "the economic, international, and governmental doctrines of world Communism" or of any other form of totalitarianism, (H) are affiliated with organizations which publish or circulate matter of the kind described in (G). A final section (I) permits the entrance of an alien barred by any of the previous provisions if he can show that he was under sixteen years of age when affiliated with an objectionable organization, or that his membership was involuntary and under constraint, or that since the termination of his membership -- and for a period of at least five years -- he has been actively opposed to such organizations and their doctrines, or if "the admission of such alien into the United States would be in the public interest."

This section is an outstanding illustration of an attempt by the Immigration and Nationality Act to regulate detailed matters that ought properly to be left in the hands of administrators. It should be drastically amended so that it is more flexible and leaves more to administrative discretion. Mere past, or even present, membership in a single front or semi-front organization -- or even in several -- ought not in itself to constitute a presumption of subversiveness, though it might be defined as "evidence relevant to a determination of the applicant's admissibility under this paragraph..." As has been said above, it is rare that a record of a person's political biography speaks unambiguously for itself; more generally, the significance to be attached to any parts of this record, or to the whole of it, has to be supplied by the informed and intelligent observer -- in this case, the consul in charge of issuing visas.

In amending or re-writing this section, the following specific changes should be made:

(a) There should be eliminated from subparagraph (I) the qualification "when under sixteen years of age" and the definite timing of "for at least five years prior...." The first is superfluous, the second a nuisance by virtue of its being so arbitrary a figure. Moreover, allowance ought to be made for those people, and there are many, who leave the Communist movement and forsake politics altogether. To be sure, it is conceivable that a Communist agent will give the appearance of having become non-political, in order better to deceive. But it is no less conceivable that he will, if necessary, pose as an active anti-Communist. Communist subversion is too protean a force to be calculated and measured definitively by any law, and administrative intelligence will always be needed for the determination of any concrete case.

(b) The clause, which appears twice in subparagraph (I), and which reads: "the admission of such alien into the United States would be in the public interest," should be made to read: "the admission of such alien into the United States would not be counter to the public interest."

(c) The phrase, "economic, international, and governmental doctrines of world Communism or ... of any other form of totalitarianism," should be avoided on the grounds of vagueness. Its intent would seem to be adequately executed in subparagraph (F), which bars those who "advocate or teach or who are members of or affiliated with any organization" that advocates or teaches the violent overthrow of the Government of the United States. Whether a person is implicated in the Communist, or any other totalitarian, conspiracy is a fact that usually can be objectively determined. To decide whether his beliefs are in accord with Communist or totalitarian doctrine, or what this doctrine precisely is, is infinitely difficult. At the very least, the law should also make a distinction, such as that drawn by the Supreme Court in the case of the Smith Act, between a purely speculative opinion -- whether it be Communist, Fascist, Nazi, or Anarchist -- held by an individual and a belief that constitutes advocacy of, or incitement to, illegal action.

RECOMMENDED CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

1) The main thing is that the quality of consular officials in charge of visas should be improved. All too frequently, these officials are assigned to handle visa applications at the outset of their careers, at a time when they are unversed in the law and in administrative procedure, and when they are generally not very expert in the language, the culture, the history, or the politics of the land in which they work. It is absurd to expect a novice to make sense of the tangled lives of men who have been in, say, the maze of French left-wing politics over a period of decades. What will happen -- what has happened -- is that he takes refuge in fantastically detailed questionnaires which he is anyway incapable of properly interpreting. (For example: what will such a consul make of an applicant who left the French Communist Party in 1936, rejoined it during the war when it was a part of the Resistance, left it again in 1947 in order to join the Rassemblement of General de Gaulle, and whose name has been signed to the Stockholm Peace Appeal? Such veerings and turnings are the rule in France, not the exception.)

Anyone who knows the French -- or German or Indian -- scene well, and who is politically sophisticated, can determine quite easily whether an applicant is or is not a Communist. (Of course, a secret agent might slip past him -- but such an agent can be identified, not by a consul, not by a law, but only by our own counter-intelligence service.) He will at least know whom to ask, and how much store to set by their opinions. At least he will know, as the consul in Liverpool did not, that Arthur Koestler was the author of The Yogi and the Commissar, and that the fact of its being dedicated to Michael Polanyi (who was denied a visa) was an item of some political significance. There is simply no substitute, either legal or administrative, for this kind of expert judgment.

There was a happy time when the granting of visas was a tedious and minor clerical assignment, demanding no particular skill. Those days are gone -- though not forever, let us hope. As things now stand, the consul in charge of visas has to make very difficult decisions on the basis of very complicated evidence, and his decisions will have a weighty bearing on the success or failure of American foreign policy. Therefore, the need is for first-rate men, and many of them. If the State Department does not now have them, it is inconceivable that it cannot find them.

2) Congress should appropriate sufficient funds, both for the State Department and the Attorney General, to permit adequate staffs for disposing of visa problems more quickly. This might help avoid such farcical episodes as that involving Professor R. E. Peierls of the University of Birmingham, who as a representative of the British government, and holding a diplomatic visa, took part in a top-secret conference in Washington on atomic energy while the consul in Birmingham was waiting for a decision from his superiors on the wisdom of giving Mr. Peierls a visa to attend a scientific convention in Chicago.

3) There is far too much paper work attendant upon the getting of a visa. This is merely the result of the bureaucratic mania for printed forms, and is of no use whatsoever. Why should an applicant have to give the exact address and exact dates of every place of residence since the day he was born? (Question 16, Form LV-2). How many State Department officials or Congressmen can answer such a question honestly and accurately? All such trivial questions should be summarily stricken from application blanks.

4) The improvement of administrative procedures in the field could be aided by the appointment of a temporary roving commission, which would survey the problem and make specific suggestions for its amelioration. This commission should consist of members of the Foreign Service plus business efficiency experts and experts on Communism.

5) A special mechanism should be set up for dealing with visas for attendance at international conferences held within the United States. Perhaps a short-term visa can be issued to cover attendance at accredited conferences and similar meetings. Or, perhaps a special board can be set up within the State Department to deal with proposed lists of foreign delegates to a conference by non-routine methods. It is apparent, however, that something must be done. It is now almost impossible to plan an international conference in this country, because the sponsors dread the embarrassment of inviting a distinguished guest and of having his request for a visa turned down.

CONCLUSION

One of the favorite bits of propaganda of an anti-Communist group in France has been to post ironic placards, urging French Communists to visit "the Soviet Paradise," and instructing them to apply for a visa at the Soviet Embassy in Paris. This witty comment on the existence of the Iron Curtain was well appreciated by the average Frenchman. Recently, an anti-Communist journalist in Paris, who had been denied an American visa because he belonged to the Communist Youth movement more than two decades ago, received one of these placards in the mail, with the word "Soviet" crossed out and the word "American" written above it.

What could he say? And what can we, as Americans, say to him?

We know that the visa problem was not created by arbitrary malice on the part of Congressmen or State Department officials. It is but one reflection, and not by far the largest, of the stresses and strains which this free country is suffering as a result of its determination to resist Communist totalitarianism.

Nevertheless, it is a problem whose power of irritation is out of all proportion to its dimensions. Throughout the world, in universities, laboratories, libraries, and editorial offices, we have friends and potential friends whom we have, in effect, insulted and shamed. The worst of it all is that it needn't have happened--that no one really wanted the visa muddle we now flounder in. It was the unintended consequence of over-zealous legislation compounded by over-cautious administration.

This memorandum has made specific suggestions which, we believe, will eliminate the majority of nasty situations that now arise so frequently. We urge Congress and the State Department to act upon them with all possible haste.

FLEISCHMANN HONORED

Julius Fleischmann, industrialist and patron of the arts, was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor of France on December 4th. The decree, signed by President Auriol, was presented to Mr. Fleischmann by Andre Marie, Minister of Education, at a ceremony attended by U.S. Ambassador James Dunn and others.

The honor was awarded Mr. Fleischmann for his contribution to French-American cultural relations, and especially for his activity as chairman of the exposition of "Masterpieces of the Twentieth Century," held in Paris in May 1952 under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom. Mr. Fleischmann personally undertook to raise the major portion of the money necessary for the Exposition, and made it possible to bring to Paris such attractions as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New York City Ballet, and a collection of 150 great paintings of the twentieth century.

INTERNATIONAL MUSIC CONTEST ANNOUNCED

The Congress for Cultural Freedom will hold an international competition for composers in Europe next summer. Although final arrangements have not yet been made, it is believed that the competition will take place in Rome early in September. A total of $6000 in prizes will be awarded, with $3000 going for the best violin concerto, $2000 for a short symphonic work, and $1000 for a work for cello and piano.

Contestants will be restricted to twelve --four in each category. They will be chosen by a music advisory board from a list to be submitted by the International Secretariat of the Congress. Preference will be given to composers under 35, but older composers considered to have been unjustly neglected will also be eligible.

An international jury of five music critics will judge the entries. The prize-winning compositions will be guaranteed at least three performances in Europe and three in the United States.

PAMPHLETS AVAILABLE

Single copies of Sidney Hook's pamphlet, "Heresy, Yes -- Conspiracy, No" are available at this office upon request. Orders in bulk may be obtained at the rate of twelve for $1.00. Also available are reprints of two articles by the noted Polish writer, Czeslaw Milosz: "Murti-Bing" and "A Poet Who Fled From Communist Poland."

AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR CULTURAL FREEDOM
35 West 53rd Street
New York 19, N. Y.

POSTMASTER: If addressee has removed and new address is known, notify on postage for which is guaranteed.

FORM 3547

Sec. 34.66, P. L. & R.
U. S. POSTAGE
Paid
New York, N. Y.
Permit No. 3643

Immigration

Cable Address:
JEWLABCOM

Telephone DEhigh 5-3700

Jewish Labor Committee

Atran Center For Jewish Culture

25 EAST 78th STREET

NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

ADOLPH HELD, Chairman
DAVID DUBINSKY, Treasurer
JACOB PAT, Executive Secretary
N. CHANIN, Chairman, Office-Committee

B. TABACHINSKY, National Campaign Director

•

Vice-Chairmen
L. ARKIN
M. BLUMENREICH
J. BELSKY
J. BRESLAW
I. BRESLOW
H. BURAKOFF
N. CHANIN
J. DORFMAN
B. GEBINER
M. GERBER
D. GINGOLD
J. GOLD
I. H. GOLDBERG
P. L. GOLDMAN
H. GREENBERG
DR. L. HENDIN
S. HERSHKOWITZ
J. HOCHMAN
L. HOLLANDER
L. HYMAN
E. JESHURIN
B. KAPLAN
J. KESSLER
CH. KREINDLER
I. LEVIN SHATZKES
M. LEWIS
A. MILLER
I. MINKOFF
N. M. MINKOFF
I. NAGLER
S. RIFKIN
J. ROBERTS
G. RUBIN
J. SCHLOSSBERG
DR. S. SILVERBERG
I. SIMON
A. SNYDER
W. STERN
L. STULBERG
J. TUVIM
J. TYBERG
M. VLADECK-BROMBERG
J. WEINBERG
M. WEINSTEIN
O. WOLINSKY
W. WOLPERT
M. ZARITSKY
CH. ZIMMERMAN

February 3, 1953

Dear Friend:

Revision of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act will most likely be one of the major issues of the 83rd Congress. Although the leaders of both political parties have pledged themselves to support changes in the law, there is every indication that revisions will be vigorously opposed.

The AFL and CIO, recognizing that a liberal, egalitarian immigration policy is one of our major sources of strength both at home and abroad, have, together with other liberal, religious and civic groups, reached agreement on the revisions that are most pressing.

Enclosed you will find an article dealing with this, together with other testimony, resolutions and statements which we believe will be of value in whatever efforts you make to involve your membership in the national campaign to revise the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act. Additional copies of Jules Cohen's article, "Revise the McCarran Act", are available from this office at $22.50 per thousand, and "A Memorandum on the Visa Problem" at $25 per thousand.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Betty Kaye

Betty Kaye,
Field Representative

BK:ej
oeiu-153
Enclosures

M. MERLIN, Atlanta
S. CAPLAN, Baltimore
H. TURK, Baltimore
P. BLOCK, Boston
J. BLUME, Boston
H. GROSSMAN, Boston
M. BIALIS, Chicago
D. SCHIER, Chicago
J. SIEGEL, Chicago

M. WEINRIB, Chicago
J. AXELROD, Cleveland
L. FRIEND, Cleveland
N. KIRTZMAN, Cleveland
S. WEISBERG, Cleveland
J. BERNSTEIN, Detroit
DR. S. KLEINMAN, Detroit
A. SCHECHTER, Grand Rapids
P. KARL, Los Angeles

I. STENZOR, Los Angeles
M. WEINTRAUB, Los Angeles
T. MAISEL, Mexico
J. DUNTOV, Miami
S. RIVIN, Missoula
M. RUBINSTEIN, Montreal
B. SHANE, Montreal
M. SILCOFF, Montreal
H. BERNSTEIN, Newark

H. BERGER, Philadelphia
B. DENNIS, Philadelphia
H. DORDICK, Philadelphia
J. SCHWARTZ, Philadelphia
M. SIEGEL, Philadelphia
N. MALYN, Pittsburgh
B. TOPOLSKY, Pittsburgh
D. DWORKIN, Toronto
A. KIRZNER, Toronto
J. A. CHERNIACK, Winnipeg

393

Human Rights

Memorandum from . . . . AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

15 East 84th Street, New York 28, N.Y. • TRafalgar 9-4500

February 26, 1953

To: Community Relations Councils Group Relations Agencies

From: Leo Pfeffer

You may be interested in the attached copy of Will Maslow's testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee in opposition to the proposed amendment to the Constitution (S. J. Res. 1) introduced by Senator Bricker, limiting the exercise of the treaty power. The proposed amendment, if adopted, would seriously cripple, if not make impossible, all attempts at international cooperation to protect and safeguard human rights. You may wish to discuss this problem with your own Senators and Representatives.

RECEIVED
MAR 5
Southern Regional Council

303

Statement of

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

In opposition to the

BRICKER RESOLUTION (S.J. Res. 1) TO AMEND
THE CONSTITUTION SO AS TO LIMIT THE TREATY-MAKING
POWERS OF THE UNITED STATES

Submitted to the

SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Washington, D. C.
February 25, 1953

The American Jewish Congress is a national organization representing about 500,000 American Jews. It was founded in 1918 by such American Jewish leaders as Supreme Court Justice Brandeis, Judge Mack and the late Rabbi Stephen S. Wise for the purpose of preserving Jewish values and maintaining and extending the democratic way of life.

The American Jewish Congress is vitally concerned with the proposed Constitutional Amendment embodied in S.J. Res. 1, limiting the competency of the United States to enter into treaties and international agreements. We share its sponsors' desire to safeguard our precious democratic freedoms from encroachment by any body foreign or domestic, national or international. However, it is our view that the Constitution of the United States provides today, as it has for 160 years, ample protection from such encroachment. We fear that the proposed Constitutional Amendment by disabling the United States from participating in various instrumentalities of world cooperation may well, under the guise of protecting our cherished rights, be sealing their doom. These rights cannot survive either successful armed aggression against our territorial borders or a prolonged state of military emergency in which we find ourselves a lone outpost in a world engulfed by Communism. Collective defense based on treaties of international cooperation with the other nations of the free world provides in the last analysis, the only true protection for our own precious rights.

Moreover, the American Jewish Congress feels that the proposed amendment, by limiting the power of our government to enter into such agreements as the Covenant on Human Rights and the Genocide Convention designed to insure minimal standards of Human Rights throughout the world, will prevent us from fulfilling the obligations we have already assumed under the United Nations Charter. Articles 55 and 56 of that Charter pledge all members to "take joint and separate action in cooperation with the [United Nations] for the achievement of..."

> "...universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion."

It is our firm conviction that the United States has thus assumed a moral and legal responsibility to insure that other peoples enjoy the same rights and freedoms that we have so zealously protected in our own country. We believe that we must honor this responsibility not only because failure on our part to do so will forfeit our claim to leadership of the free world but also because only in an atmosphere of "universal respect for an observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms" can our own rights and freedoms be safeguarded and extended. In that conviction the World Jewish Congress of which the American Jewish Congress is a constituent part has prepared and transmitted a series of submissions to the various preparatory bodies set up by the United Nations to consider the Genocide Convention, the Declaration of Human Rights and the Covenant of Human Rights. In the interest of the United States as well as others, the American Jewish Congress opposes all attempts to disable our country from effective participation in international efforts to insure that what has been the heritage of only a few nations will become a standard of conduct for all.

It is our contention that the present impetus for an amendment limiting the exercise of the treaty power arises to a large extent out of grave misconceptions as to existing Constitutional limitations on that power; an entirely unmerited lack of confidence in the Senate and President of the United States and existing constitutional procedures governing the exercise of that power; and a misunderstanding as to the provisions of recent international proposals to safeguard Human Rights.

Before analyzing the individual sections of S. J. Res. 1 in detail we should like to take up these misconceptions as we understand them.

The first is that the treaty power is not limited in any way by the Constitution and that by use of this power the President and Senate could cripple or destroy the United States, undermine its basic Constitutional structure, and abridge essential liberties of the Bill of Rights. This is not the case. Although the Supreme Court has never held a treaty to be unconstitutional, this has not been because the treaty power is above the Constitution but solely because no treaty or other international agreement to which the United States has been a party has abridged rights guaranteed by the Constitution to individuals. The courts have repeatedly emphasized that a treaty may not offend specific prohibitions of the Constitution, the classic statement being that in the case of Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890).

> "The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent (Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U.S. 525, 541)..."
> (emphasis supplied)

In the case of Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 433 (1920) the Supreme Court, although ruling that a treaty and legislation pursuant thereto overrides state laws, was careful to point out that treaties could not contravene specific prohibitions of the Constitution. The Court in that case stated "We do not mean to imply that there are no qualifications to the treaty making power..." ..."The treaty in question does not contravene any prohibitory words to be found in the Constitution." See also U.S. v. Minnesota, 270 U. S. 181, 208 (1926); Asakura v. City of Seattle, 265 U. S. 332, 341 (1924); The Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wall. 616, 620-21 (1870).

In the light of these Supreme Court pronouncements the fact that Article VI of the Constitution declares laws made "In Pursuance" of the Constitution and treaties made "under the Authority of the United States" to be the supreme law of the land, does not imply that treaties are above the Constitution. The difference in phraseology resulted solely from the fact that the framers wanted the supremacy clause to apply not only to treaties made in the future under the Constitution but also to treaties which had already been made under the Articles of Confederation. Certainly no implication can be drawn from this that treaties are not subject to constitutional limitations.

Another argument advanced in support of the proposition that treaties can abridge our basic liberties without constitutional recourse is based on the fact that the First Amendment, unlike the rest of the Bill of Rights, refers only to Congress; "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, ..." However, the Courts have assumed that the Amendment applies to actions by all branches of the Federal Government impairing freedom of speech, press or religion or the rights of assembly or petition. See e.g.; Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall 679. Specifically the amendment has been thought to limit the actions of the President. Joint Anti-Fascist Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 135-136, 143, 199-200 (1951); Bailey v. Richardson, 182 F. 2d, 46, 59-60, 71-74, (D.C. Cir. 1950). Treaties being the result of presidential action in conjunction with the Senate, it cannot be claimed that First Amendment freedoms can be invaded by treaty with constitutional impunity.

Thus it can readily be seen that the Constitution already provides ample safeguards against abridgement by treaty or executive agreement of essential liberties guaranteed to the individual by the Bill of Rights. A constitutional amendment to this effect is unnecessary and redundant.

The Senate and the President, and later the Congress as a whole, each has an opportunity to reject, modify or nullify an international agreement insofar as it affects internal law. Initially the President and the State Department can refuse to sign a treaty or insert modifications in a proposed treaty which is found in some measure repugnant to American ideals or interests. An example of this ability to effect modifications in proposed international agreements is found in the proposal submitted by the United States to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights which would insure that the constitutional balance between Federal and state powers under our Constitution could not be altered by the proposed Covenants on Human Rights. (Proposed Art. 48, Draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Proposed Art. 26, Draft Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights).

Should the President sign a treaty, the Senate is free to refuse ratification. Indeed, a minority of the Senate -- one-third of a quorum plus one -- can block American entry into any treaty arrangement. Moreover, if it so desired, the Senate is free to ratify with any reservations it considers important. For example, the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Genocide recommended to the full committee that the Genocide Convention be ratified with four "understandings". Among these understandings was one which was designed, according to the late Senator McMahon, chairman of the committee, to overcome fears that lynchings might be classified as genocidal acts. New York Times, April 13, 1950; Legislative History of Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 81st Cong., Doc. No. 247, at 27-29 (1950).

Even if a bad treaty is signed or ratified, a majority of both Houses can pass an act ending its internal effect. This results from the doctrine that treaties, with respect to their internal effect, are generally of the same dignity as statutes. Their domestic implications and consequences can be modified or repealed by a subsequent Federal act. Head Money Cases, 112 U. S. 580, 597-599 (1884); The Cherokee Tobacco, 11 Wall. 616; Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U. S. 581, 600 (1889); see United States v. Minnesota, 270 U. S. 181, 208 (1926). The case of Hijo v. United States, 194 U. S. 315, 324 (1904) states "...it is well settled that in the case of a conflict between an act of Congress and a treaty... the last one in date must prevail..."

Clearly the opportunity for rejection and modification of treaties granted each arm of the government at each of the stages enumerated above provides ample safeguards against hasty and unthinking international commitments.

A third serious misconception relates to the actual content and substance of the proposed international agreements protecting human rights and interdicting crimes against humanity. It has been claimed that by entering into such an agreement as the Covenants on Human Rights the United States would be surrendering its own rights and reducing its own standards to conform to those of nations enjoying a bare minimum of liberty and individual freedom.

The Draft Covenants on Human Rights expressly provide, however, that the Covenants shall not cause any lowering of existing standards in countries whose standards are higher than those proposed in the Covenant. For example Article 4 of the proposed Covenant on Civil and Political Rights reads:

> "2. There shall be no restriction upon or derogation from any of the fundamental human rights recognized or existing in any Contracting State pursuant to law, conventions, regulations or custom on the pretext that the present Covenant does not recognize such rights or that it recognizes them to a lesser extent."

Almost identical language is contained in Article 5 of the proposed Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights.

Another objection sometimes raised to the Covenants on Human Rights is that they will enable the Federal government to encroach on areas traditionally reserved to state control. These fears should be allayed by the proposed federal amendment to that Covenant referred to above.

The dangers of S. J. Res. 1 to the welfare of this nation will, we believe, be manifest upon an examination and analysis of the individual paragraphs of the proposed amendment.

Section 1

Section 1 of S. J. Res. 1 provides:

> "A provision of a treaty which denies or abridges any right enumerated in this Constitution shall not be of any force or effect."

Section 1 nullifies the effect of any treaty provision which denies or abridges any right "enumerated" in the Constitution. This section represents a substantial improvement over the phrasing of Section 1 of the resolution introduced at the last Session of Congress, S. J. Res. 130, in that it omits the phrase in the prior resolution which would have prohibited treaties which merely touched upon constitutional rights without in any way abridging or infringing upon them. However, the phrase "rights enumerated in this Constitution" is ambiguous and subject to varying interpretations.

For example, if the term "rights enumerated in this Constitution" is contrasted with the term contained in the next paragraph, "rights of citizens of the United States within the United States enumerated in this Constitution" it would appear that a different set of rights is referred to in each section. Except perhaps for the right of a citizen of the United States to demand protection from the Federal Government on the high seas or abroad (Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall 56, 79 (1872) the individual rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution do not apply to American citizens in countries other than the United States (In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453, 464 (1890); Neely v. Henkel, 180 U. S. 109, 122-123 (1901). That being the case, it may well be argued that the broad term "rights enumerated in this Constitution", since it omits the qualifying phrase contained in Section 2 of the Resolution limiting the "rights" to those enjoyed within the United States by citizens of the United States, is in fact intended to prohibit treaties dealing with the subject matter of the enumerated rights even in situations to which the constitutional guarantees would not actually apply. In any event such ambiguity should not be tolerated in a constitutional amendment.

Similarly, it might be argued that the term "rights enumerated" encompasses the right of the states not to have their reserved powers invaded by the Federal government. Under such an interpretation, many of the most common types of treaties would be invalid, since their subject matter does not come within the delegated powers of Congress. For example, treaties relating to the rights of aliens to engage in trade or business, as applied to businesses having no interstate character, Asakura v. Seattle, (265, U. S. 332 (1924) would be barred, as well as treaties of extradition involving purely domestic crimes. (Charlton v. Kelly (229 U. S. 447 (1913).

Assuming, however, that these ambiguities of Section 1 are clarified so that Section 1 only prohibits treaties or agreements which abridge or infringe basic individual rights such as those guaranteed by the Bill of Rights and the 14th Amendment, the wisdom of this section is still open to question. While such a restatement of currently established constitutional doctrine would probably be harmless, it may give rise to an argument at some future time that a change in basic principle must have been intended since the complex machinery of adopting an amendment would not ordinarily be utilized merely to restate existing law.

Section 2

Section 2 of S. J. Res. 1 provides:

> "No treaty shall authorize or permit any foreign power or any international organization to supervise, control, or adjudicate rights of citizens of the United States within the United States enumerated in this Constitution or any other matter essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States."

Initially this section is open to the objection that the phraseology is ambiguous and many of the words used have no clearly defined legal meaning. For example, does the phrase "rights of citizens of the United States within the United States enumerated in this Constitution" merely describe the type of rights which cannot be supervised. In that event, where rights are enjoyed by aliens within the United States, as is the case with most Constitutional safeguards, a treaty could not vest power in international bodies to deal with the rights of aliens. On the other hand, if the key word is "citizens", the prohibitions of Section 2 apply only to citizens.

Secondly, the meaning of the term "supervision" is uncertain, and existing case law provides little guidance to its meaning in this context. It would seem that Section 2 by using this word along with the term "control" contemplates a prohibition on international bodies whose powers are even less than "control" or "direction". What degree of power less than "control", however, is not clear. Does the word "supervise" encompass such action as mere inspection without the power to effect changes? Does the phrase "supervise, control or adjudicate" cover such processes as fact-finding, mediation and conciliation?

The very presence of these ambiguities in the language of the proposed Amendment, even though they are eventually resolved by the Supreme Court, will inevitably produce a period of uncertainty during which the necessary decisions and precedents will be evolving. Throughout this period other nations will hesitate to enter into binding committments with us and the conduct of our foreign affairs will thus be seriously hampered.

Since the American Jewish Congress is committed to the principle that the rights of Americans can be safeguarded and extended only in an atmosphere of universal respect for the dignity and rights of all men and that international cooperation is vitally necessary to assure such universal respect and sensitivity to human rights, we are particularly interested in the effect of S. J. Res. 1 on such efforts at international cooperation as the Covenants on Human Rights and the Genocide Convention.

It is our conclusion that the proposed Constitutional Amendment might seriously limit if not preclude the United States from participating in either of these agreements as well as in many of the day to day activities of the United Nations designed to elevate standards of conduct in the area of civil and political rights.

For example, the proposed Draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights contains an implementing provision which would authorize an international Human Rights Committee set up thereunder to ascertain facts, report its conclusions and make available its good offices in instances where a nation is charged with failure to give effect to the provisions of the Covenant (Art. 44 Draft Covenant on Civil and Political Rights). Since the Covenant deals with civil and political rights which may be considered "essentially domestic in nature" as well as "rights of citizens... enumerated in this Constitution", and since the powers of fact-finding and conciliation exercised by the Human Rights Committee may well be interpreted as "supervision, control or adjudication" within the meaning of Section 2 of Res. 1, S. J. it can readily be seen that United States participation in attempts to settle problems involving violations of human rights by cooperative and peaceful means might well be prohibited.

Similarly the proposed restrictions of Section 2 might inhibit the ability of the United States to participate in such investigations as the current joint United Nations International Labor Organization investigation of forced labor in countries beyond the Iron Curtain and in certain areas of Africa. The special Committee on Forced Labor, in addition to obtaining facts by questionnaires directed to the various participating countries, also appoints consultants to collect evidence within nations charged with harboring forced labor. See New York Herald Tribune, July 2, 1952. Section 2 would also disable us from participation in the United Nations inquiry into the disgraceful policy of apartheid which is currently creating wide unrest in South Africa.

Clearly the United States will not long be permitted to participate and in fairness can claim no right to participate in joint investigations and fact finding with respect to conditions in other countries unless it is willing to permit inquiry and perhaps supervision of conditions existing within its own territorial borders. Can we say that the doctrine of equality before the law which we proudly affirm with respect to the relations between our citizens and their government is completely inapplicable to the relations between that government and other governments and to the law of nations. Can we retain our moral leadership of the free world if we claim special privileges and special immunities from investigation or censure by the other nations of the world.

The American Jewish Congress advocates the ratification of the Genocide Convention. We do so not only because we view the Convention as a means to deter genocide, of which the Jewish people have been most frequently the victims, but also because the Convention represents another step towards achieving a world order based on rule of law rather than arbitrary force.

Section 2 of the proposed Constitutional Amendment, although it might not prevent the United States from ratifying the Genocide convention in its present form, could well interfere with future attempts effectively to punish perpetrators of this horrible crime. Article VI of the Genocide Convention provides that persons charged with Genocide shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the state in which the act was committed or by an international penal tribunal only "with respect to those contracting parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction." Although the first draft of a statute for an International Criminal Court has been prepared by a Committee of the United Nations it is still in the formative stage, the United States has not accepted its jurisdiction, and of course ratification of the Genocide Convention in no way commits the ratifying state to participate in such an International criminal tribunal if it is set up.

The American Jewish Congress does not now urge that the United States accept the jurisdiction of the proposed International Criminal Court as it is presently envisaged. Nor do we advocate that power be vested in any international tribunal to adjudicate rights of Americans or other persons unless such tribunal complies with the fundamental principles of due process of law. However we do believe that there may well come a time when an international penal tribunal, operating with proper safeguards, may become important in effectively policing other international crimes, such as violation of international atomic controls inimical to world security. The advantages of such an international tribunal even at the present time cannot be overlooked. One of its salutary features would be that an American journalist such as Oatis in Prague, could, if charged with fomenting civil strife in Czechoslovakia, be tried by an international tribunal and not by the prejudiced and subservient courts of Czechoslovakia.

Section 2, however, would prevent the adjudication of American rights by such an International tribunal even if it conducted its proceedings with all the judicial safeguards now available in the Courts of the United States governed by the Constitution. It is our view that the sponsors of Section 2 are unwise in attempting to tie the hands of our treatymakers by disabling them from future participation in such international courts.

Amending the Constitution in the terms set forth in Section 2 of S. J. Res. 1 would seriously diminish the chances for effective international control of atomic power. It would disable the United States from permitting international "supervision" or "control" of atomic energy production in plants located within this country, since such production might well constitute a matter involving essentially domestic rights of citizens of the United States. Without the consent of the United States to such supervision of plants within its borders, it is highly unlikely that other nations would agree to international control and supervision of their atomic production. Similarly, Section 2 might prevent effective international control of opium and other narcotics. In addition it might limit the possibility of joint solutions to such vital military matters as pooling of productive resources, rights in military bases, and prisoners of war.

Section 3

Section 3 of S. J. Res. 1 provides:

> "A treaty shall become effective as internal law in the United States only through the enactment of appropriate legislation by the Congress."

Under this section in order for the provisions of a treaty to take effect as internal law, they would have to be approved by the President, ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and then subsequently approved by a majority vote of the Senate and the House.

This requirement would seriously hamper our day-to-day, non-controversial relationships with other nations by delaying the operation of treaties already approved by two-thirds of the Senate until Congressional enactment is secured. Among the types of treaties which have traditionally been self-executing are those providing for the reciprocal rights of aliens to hold, acquire, inherit and dispose of property, to engage in businesses, to be protected in their persons and property, and to be free from burdensome taxation. In many instances these treaties would lose their effectiveness if their operation were suspended even temporarily. In any event the fact that during the intervening period, private citizens as well as state governments could freely flout international committements will not only create confusion but will make other nations reluctant to enter such reciprocal treaties with us, thereby jeopardizing rights and privileges of Americans abroad.

There is no perceptible advantage to be gained from superimposing a requirement of Congressional enactment upon the existing constitutional provision that a treaty must be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate before taking effect. (Art. II, Section 2). Treaties, in any event, are self-executing only under certain conditions. Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199 (1796). They may moreover, be made non-self-executing by their express terms. Foster & Elam v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253 (1829); U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. 51 (1833). For example, the Genocide Convention was phrased so that it would be non-self-executing, and present drafts of proposed conventions relating to human rights are cast in non-self-executing terms. Articles 55 and 56 of the United Nations Charter, obligating the parties to "promote" certain objectives and to "pledge themselves to take joint and separate action" for the achievement of certain purposes was held non-self-executing in the Fujii case. Fujii v. State 242 P. 2d 617 (Sup. Ct. Calif. (1952).

In addition, the Senate in the exercise of its power to impose reservations on treaties (See Memorandum of Parliamentarian of Senate, 98 Cong. Rec. 2602, March 20, 1952) may insist as a condition of ratification that the treaty not be considered self-executing.

In view of these safeguards, it would appear unnecessary to include in the Constitution an inflexible provision which would not only subordinate all treaties to conflicting state law in the absence of additional congressional action, but would render them ineffective internally even where no existing law or policy was contravened. Such a requirement would impose a substantial burden on the time and energies of the Congress of the United States without offering protection to individual rights and to our existing democratic system not already available through present procedures. We do not take any position on Sections 4 and 5 of S. J. Res. 1 relating to executive agreements.

Conclusion

Our analysis of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the proposed amendment leads us to conclude that the adoption of these Sections in their present form would seriously hamper the conduct of our foreign relations and our ability to fulfill existing international obligations. It would interfere with efforts to serve the interest of the United States and its citizens by promoting universal respect for and observance of human rights and would cripple attempts of the United States to cooperate with other nations for our mutual defense. In the interest both of our own domestic well being and in the furtherance of a constructive foreign policy, this resolution should not be adopted.

Will Maslow
General Counsel

Lois Waldman
Of Counsel
February 24, 1953

Immigration

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE · NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
212 FIFTH AVENUE · NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: February 16, 1954

SUBJECT: U. S. ex rel. Allcorn v. District Director of Immigration and Naturalization (111 F. Supp. 6)

DIGEST:

Federal District Court rules that Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 does not permit court review of administrative decision denying bail to a naturalized American citizen detained pending determination of whether she expatriated herself by residence abroad.

A. THE FACTS

Mrs. Allcorn, born in Russia, emigrated to the United States in 1909 at the age of 8. She became a naturalized American citizen in 1933. In 1947, after having lived in the United States for 38 years, she married a British subject and took up residence in Canada and England. In England she registered with the American Consulate. On December 5, 1952, an American passport was issued to her, stamped as valid until August 20, 1953.

When in January, 1953, she returned to the United States and sought admission as a United States citizen, she was detained for a hearing before a special inquiry officer of the Immigration Service on whether she had lost her American citizenship under Section 352 (a) (2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 (The McCarran-Walter Act) which provides that a naturalized American citizen loses his citizenship if he lives abroad for as long as 5 years. (If he resides in his country of birth he loses his American citizenship after only 3 years of residence.)

The special inquiry officer ruled against Mrs. Allcorn. He held that she had lost her American citizenship by staying abroad for longer than 5 years. This decision is pending before the Board of Immigration Appeals. Mrs. Allcorn applied for release on bail pending a decision on her appeal. The application was denied, without any reason being given for such denial. Mrs. Allcorn then petitioned the Federal District court in New York for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the denial of bail was arbitrary.

B. THE DECISION OF THE FEDERAL DISTRICT COURT IN NEW YORK

a) The Original Decision (March 24, 1953)

U.S. District Judge Edelstein first conditionally granted Mrs. Allcorn's petition. He pointed out that Mrs. Allcorn, while abroad, was issued an American passport good for well beyond the date of her return to the U. S. A. The Judge stressed that the immigration authorities treated Mrs. Allcorn as an inadmissible alien by taking her into custody and refusing her request for bail. Hence, the judge argued, the immigration authorities had already prejudged the issue of her citizenship. Should the decision of the immigration authorities be wrong and should Mrs. Allcorn turn out to be an American citizen, "We should have a citizen deprived of her liberty without having been permitted even the procedural due process accorded a resident alien," the Judge said. He concluded that the denial of bail to Mrs. Allcorn by the immigration authorities was arbitrary since no attempt was made to justify the denial of bail, and he granted the writ unless "within 10 days, a proper basis for the exercise of discretion in denying bail is advanced", or unless Mrs. Allcorn was released on bail.

b) The decision on Reargument (April 3, 1953)

The Immigration Service asked the Judge for permission to reargue the case. In the reargument, the Service relied upon Section 236 (C) of the McCarran-Walter Act which they interpreted to mean that a decision of a special inquiry officer, that a person had expatriated himself and hence was inadmissible, is not reviewable by the court. The Judge accepted this interpretation of the McCarran-Walter Act. He, therefore, reversed himself and dismissed Mrs. Allcorn's petition on the ground that she, as an entering alien, had no standing to raise the issue of due process in the refusal to grant her request to be released on bail pending final disposition of her case.

C) COMMENT

This case illustrates one of the many injustices written into the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act.

1. The decision shows that under the McCarran-Walter Act, naturalized citizens are less secure in their status than native born citizens. If Mrs. Allcorn were a native-born citizen of the United States, she could have stayed abroad for 20 or 30 years without jeopardizing her citizenship. Since she was a naturalized citizen, she was ruled to have lost her citizenship simply because she stayed abroad with her husband for a little over 5 years. This case, therefore, supports the charge against our immigration law that it countenances 2 classes of citizens.

2. The loss of citizenship by a naturalized citizen as a result of a stay abroad of more than 5 years does not depend on a determination by a court following a trial, but occurs automatically upon expiration of the 5 years. Hence, a naturalized citizen returning from abroad may be treated as an entering alien and detained on Ellis Island without bail or justification for refusal of bail, if the immigration authorities in their sole discretion believe that the person has lost his citizenship by staying in his country of origin for more than 3 years or anywhere else abroad for more than 5 years. The determination as to whether such a person is or is not an American citizen is left to the immigration authorities, and to the Attorney General on appeal. (An appeal to the Courts from such a determination may be made only by writ of habeas corpus, which permits a very limited review.)

3. The McCarran-Walter Act grants new broad powers to immigration officials, and in many cases deprives people of the right to court review.

The instant case is a good example. Mrs. Allcorn who was a naturalized citizen of this country since 1933 and who claims still to be a citizen, is imprisoned on Ellis Island pending the determination of whether she is or is not an American citizen. Bail, which is the constitutional right of citizens even when they are accused of crime (except in the most serious cases), is denied her by the immigration authorities without any reason being given. Nor under the McCarran-Walter Act, does the Federal District Court have jurisdiction to review that arbitrary denial of bail.

No. 49

Immigration

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

RECEIVED
MAY 7 1954
Southern Regional Council

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Paul Hartman and Sidney Liskofsky

DATE: April 27, 1954

SUBJECT: Ives-Javits Bill to Amend the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act

On April 12, 1954, six Republican Congressmen -- Javits, N.Y.; Cretella, Conn.; Fino, N.Y.; Frelinghuysen, N.J.; Morano, Conn.; Scott, Pa. -- introduced in the House of Representatives identical bills to amend the McCarran-Walter Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 (H.R. 8802 to 8807). The following day, April 13, Republican Senators Ives of New York, Hendrickson of New Jersey and Saltonstall of Massachusetts introduced in the Senate S. 3292, the companion bill to the above mentioned House bills.

In announcing the introduction of this measure, Congressman Javits stated in the House of Representatives, among other things:

> This bill is a proposal from the Republican side, a proposal having come from the Democratic side in July 1953. The bill deals with injustices pointed out by the President in his letter of April 6, 1953 to Senator WATKINS, with procedural and administrative inequities which have shown up in the administration of the law and with a modernization of the means for the utilization of 154,000 quota numbers provided by the law to provide for its full use instead of leaving unused an average of 65,523 quota numbers for every year since 1946.
>
> * * * * * *
>
> The provisions of the McCarran immigration law with its discrimination between naturalized and natural citizens, its unusual hazards of deportation, denaturalization without adequate statutes of limitations, its injustices and discriminations against Negroes, Asiatic and other non-self-governing peoples and its cumbersome procedures apparently designed to prevent rather than facilitate reasonable immigration make a rewriting job vital. This is essential in the interests of our country's great traditions as the new world and especially vital now as a critical element in our leadership of the free world so heavily burdened with problems which can be enormously helped by the proper exchange and resettlement of persons. The President has said:

"A better law must be written that will strike an intelligent, unbigoted balance between the immigration welfare of America and the prayerful hopes of the unhappy and oppressed."

The sponsors of this bill believe that the administration intends to lend its weight and influence to the rewriting of the McCarran Immigration law and propose to lend all aid and cooperation to see that this is done.

In contrast to the omnibus immigration bill S. 2585 introduced last year by Senator Herbert H. Lehman, six other Democratic Senators and Independent Senator Morse, the Republican-sponsored measure does not rewrite our immigration law in its entirety. It would not repeal the McCarran-Walter Act, but would amend it in a number of important respects. The present national origins quota system would be maintained, but some of its inequities would be alleviated by the utilization of unused quotas in favor of applicants from countries with oversubscribed quotas. Furthermore, the proposal would mitigate some of the hardships resulting from the present provisions on deportation. It would also eliminate some of the provisions discriminating against naturalized citizens. Finally, it would narrow down the field where decisions are left to the free discretion of immigration officials and broaden the possibilities of appeal from decisions of such officials. In particular, it would create a Board of Visa Appeals to review refusals of visa applications by American consuls.

Set forth below are some of the highlights of the measure just introduced:

1. Yearly Total of Immigrants

By substituting the 1950 census for the 1920 census as the base year for determining the total of quota immigrants admissible each year, the bill would increase the total from 154,000 under present law to approximately 251,000.

Immigrants born in independent countries of the Western Hemisphere would continue to be admissible outside of the quota system (as "non-quota immigrants") as they are at present. Hence the total of immigrants admitted each year could exceed the figure of 251,000 which is the maximum number reserved to quota immigrants.

2. Pooling of Unused Quotas

The bill would maintain the national origin quota system on which our present immigration law is based. Under this system, each prospective quota immigrant is assigned to the quota established for the country where he was born. The quotas assigned to countries in Northern and Western Europe from which comparatively few people wish to emigrate are so high that they are never fully utilized, while quotas for countries in Eastern and Southern Europe and Asia are minimal even though there is a large demand for immigration visas in those countries. As a result, persons originating from those latter countries may have to wait many years before becoming eligible for immigration to the United States. The Ives-Javits bill would mitigate this hardship by making quotas unused during any fiscal year available to persons born in countries with oversubscribed quotas. By this device, unused quotas assigned for use by persons born in Great Britain and Ireland could be transferred to persons born in Italy, Greece, and other countries with small, fully used quotas.

Under the proposal, only persons born in a country with a quota not exceeding 7,000 could receive unused quota visas of other countries. Since the German quota is 25,814, persons born in Germany could not benefit from the proposal.

By pooling unused quotas as described above, the proposed bill would make sure that the total number of persons eligible as quota immigrants each year would actually be admitted. No longer would many thousands of quota numbers be left unused every year. (The number left unused in the fiscal year 1953 as a result of the present rigid quota system was 57,763, more than one-third of the total number of quota immigrants admissible each year.)

3. Elimination of Mortgaging Future Quotas

Under the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, persons admitted to the United States under that Act were charged against future quotas of the countries of their origin (mortgaging of future quotas). This provision which further extended the waiting period for persons born in countries of Southern and Eastern Europe was retained by the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952. The Ives-Javits bill would abolish this provision and thus ease the restrictions facing immigrants from Eastern and Western Europe.

4. Elimination of Discrimination Against Asiatics

The McCarran-Walter Act of 1952 treats Asiatics differently from other persons. Under the national origins quota system, an immigrant is charged to the quota of the country where he was born. But this rule does not apply to persons of Asiatic ancestry who, regardless of their place of birth, are charged to the tiny quotas assigned to Asiatic countries. The Ives-Javits bill would eliminate this discrimination against persons of Asiatic ancestry and make universal the rule that the quota to which a person is charged is determined by his birth.

5. Immigration from the West Indies

Prior to the adoption of the McCarran-Walter Act, immigrants from the European dependencies and colonies in the Western Hemisphere were chargeable to the quotas of their governing countries which they could fully utilize. The McCarran-Walter Act introduced a new restriction to the effect that no more than 100 persons could immigrate annually from each dependency regardless of the quota situation of the mother country. This provision reduced drastically immigration from the British West Indies since persons born in that part of the Western Hemisphere (most of them Negroes) could no longer fully utilize the large British quota. The Ives-Javits bill would abolish this restriction which for the first time put into our immigration laws a provision discriminating against Negroes, and thus restore the law as it was in effect prior to the adoption of the McCarran-Walter Act.

6. Immigration of Totalitarians

Under the law in force prior to the enactment of the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952, present and former members of a communist or any other totalitarian organization were generally barred from immigration to the United States. The McCarran-Walter Act redefined the term "Totalitarian Party" limiting it to organizations advocating totalitarianism in the United States. Under this language, members of the nazi and fascist parties are no longer barred from admission since these two parties allegedly did not advocate the establishment of totalitarianism in the United States. The bill under discussion would restore the law to what it was prior to the McCarran-Walter Act. Hence, present and past members of the nazi and fascist parties would be ineligible for immigration to the same extent as members of the communist party.

7. Substituting Objective for Subjective Standards in Determining Admissibility

Under present law, a person is excluded from immigration if "in the opinion of the consular officer" he is likely at any time to become a public charge. Similarly, a person is excluded if the consular officer "knows or has reason to believe" that he seeks to enter the United States for subversive purposes. Such language leaves the determination of admissibility to the subjective, uncontrolled view of the consular official. The bill would change the language of these provisions to make it clear that the excludability of an alien follows from the existence of certain facts (likelihood of becoming a charge or of engaging in subversive activities) rather than from the belief of the consular officer.

8. Creation of a Board of Visa Appeals

As a further means to reduce the danger of arbitrary action by consular officers, the bill would establish a Board of Visa Appeals in the Department of State. The Board would have jurisdiction to review all determinations denying, withdrawing or revoking a visa or extension of a visa and thus be able to insure an equitable and uniform administration of the immigration law by the United States consular officers throughout the world.

9. Deportation

The bill seeks to reduce some of the hardships arising from the provisions of the present law relating to deportation. Among the measures proposed by the bill are the following:

a) Repeal of the retroactive effect of deportation provisions. Under the bill, persons could no longer be deported for reasons which were not grounds for deportation at the time of their arrival.

b) Establishment of a statute of limitation barring deportation unless proceedings are started within ten years after the commission of the crime or other occurrence which made the alien deportable.

c) Broadening of the possibility of granting a deportable alien suspension of deportation in hardship cases.

d) Granting of the right to judicial review of any final deportation order, without the limitation that the alien must have been taken into custody before review is available to him. Under present practice, an alien declared deportable can seek judicial review only by habeas corpus after he is taken into custody.

10. Status of Naturalized Citizens

The bill would repeal those provisions of the present law under which a naturalized citizen loses his American citizenship by residing in his country of origin for three years or in any other country for five years. These provisions which affect only naturalized citizens have been criticized as relegating naturalized citizens to a status inferior to that of a native-born citizen.

There are still other grounds on which, under the present law, naturalized citizens, unlike native-born citizens, may be deprived of their citizenship (conviction for contempt for refusal to testify before a Congressional committee; joining of certain organizations). Those provisions would be left untouched by the bill herein discussed.

11. Court Proceedings to Establish United States Citizenship

The law as it stood prior to the McCarran-Walter Act of 1952 enabled the person whose citizenship was denied by United States authorities to institute a legal action to establish his American citizenship. In line with its tendency to reduce court review of administrative decisions, the McCarran-Walter Act curtailed the right to institute such legal proceedings in several important respects. It limited the right to persons in the United States. Furthermore, it barred the remedy if the proceedings were not started within five years from the final administrative denial of his right of citizenship. The Ives-Javits bill would eliminate these restrictions and give any person claiming American citizenship access at any time to the courts to obtain a ruling on his claim.

ph-sl/bwl
59

Second Annual

HUMAN RELATIONS INSTITUTE

of the

NATIONAL CONFERENCE of CHRISTIANS AND JEWS

THEME

"YOUTH POINTS THE WAY"

☆

HONORED YOUTH GUESTS

MISS EILEEN MORROW
Southern High School . . . . . Baltimore, Maryland

MISS MARY CECIL
Presentation Academy . . . . . Louisville, Kentucky

JOHN HALL
McKinley High School . . . . . Washington, D.C.

☆

KOUBEK CENTER, UNIVERSITY OF MIAMI
2705 S. W. 3rd Street
MIAMI, FLORIDA

SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1955
Registration 9:30 A.M.

Program

MORNING SESSION . . . 9:30 - 12:30

ALBERTHA JOHNSON, President, IYC, Presiding

9:30 Registration—Porch — Koubek Center

10:00 Auditorium

Address—Dr. C. Doren Tharp, Secretary of the University and Dean of the Faculties, University of Miami

"The National Conference of Christians and Jews and Youth"

10:30 Group Meetings—Class Rooms — Koubek Center
Discussion Subject: The NCCJ and IYC—Relationship—Resources and Service

Group 1
Chairman—DOROTHY WILLIAMS
Reporter—GWENDOLYN MOON
Adult Counsellor—JUDGE L. E. THOMAS
Room 2

Group 2
Chairman—GEORGE LOVE
Reporter—KENNETH MAJOR
Adult Counsellor—MRS. L. J. MCCAFFREY
Room 3

Group 3
Chairman—BARBARA SEALY
Reporter—EUGENE MOON
Adult Counsellor—DR. C. DOREN THARP
Room 4

Group 4
Chairman—DOROTHY LEWIS
Reporter—ALVIN BRYANT
Adult Counsellor—MR. S. D. WEISSBUCH
Room 5

Group 5
Chairman—VERONICA DEAN
Reporter—SUSAN DUNKEL
Adult Counsellor—DR. DEAN GEORGE EPLEY
Room 6

Group 6
Chairman—CORA ANN CULVER
Reporter—ANN SAUNDERS
Adult Counsellor—MR. WILLIAM E. REED
Room 7

Group 7
Chairman—IRAL DAVIS
Reporter—EUGENE DENNEY
Adult Counsellor—DR. JACOB H. CUNNINGHAM
Room 8

11:15 Auditorium

Group Reports and Group Discussion

Directed by Dr. Dean George Epley, Chairman, Human Relations Department, University of Miami

12:30 Lunch—A catering service is providing the food. Each person, excepting guests, will pay for his meal.

☆

AFTERNOON SESSION . . . 1:15 - 6:00

RONALD ADLER, Vice President, IYC, Presiding

1:15 Auditorium

Address—Dr. Jacob H. Cunningham, Florida Director, The National Conference of Christians and Jews

"How the Intergroup Youth Council Serves Youth"

1:45 Group Meetings—Class Rooms — Koubek Center
Discussion Subject: How Can IYC Serve Our Organizations?

Group 1
Chairman—Bill Renuart
Reporter—Carol Symonette
Adult Counsellor—Mr. Ben Porch
Room 2

Group 2
Chairman—Ronald Adler
Reporter—Steve Greenberg
Adult Counsellor—Mr. Jerry Carver
Room 3

Group 3
Chairman—Alice Brown
Reporter—Antoinette Spicer
Adult Counsellor—Miss Marie D. Roberts
Room 4

Group 4
Chairman—Charles McArthur
Reporter—Sam March
Adult Counsellors—Mr. Carl Edwards and Mr. Moses Perry
Room 5

Group 5
Chairman—Albertha Johnson
Reporter—Diane Barthel
Adult Counsellors—Miss Reta Reed and Miss Geraldine Rooks
Room 6

Group 6
Chairman—Eugene Denney
Reporter—George Love
Adult Counsellor—Mr. Joe Hall
Room 7

Group 7
Chairman—Joan Siegel
Reporter—Linda Marks
Adult Counsellor—Miss Fern Hoffman
Room 8

2:45 Auditorium
Group Reports and Group Discussion—Directed by Dr. Dean George Epley

4:00 Group Singing, Skits and Free Period
Directed by Mrs. Joel Ingraham, Director of Chorus, Dorsey High School

4:45 Auditorium
Panel Discussion Subject: "Youth Working For Brotherhood"
Moderator: James M. Legate, Chairman, Board of Directors NCCJ and General Manager, Radio Station WIOD

Panelists:

Mary Cecil
Presentation Academy . Louisville, Kentucky

Veronica Dean
Dorsey High School . . Miami, Florida

John Hall
McKinley High School . Washington, D.C.

Eileen Morrow
Southern High School . Baltimore, Maryland

Bill Renuart
Miami Edison High School . Miami, Florida

Lyn Roberts
Miami Senior High School . Miami, Florida
(Formerly St. Louis, Missouri)

6:15 Dinner—A catering service is providing the food. Each person, excepting guests, will pay for his meal.

☆

EVENING SESSION . . . 7:30 - 9:00

Bill Renuart, Secretary, IYC, Presiding

7:30 Auditorium
Address—Dr. Edward R. Annis, NCCJ Board Member and Prominent Surgeon
"Youth's Opportunities"

8:15—Installation of IYC Officers for 1955-56

OFFICERS OF THE INTERGROUP YOUTH COUNCIL OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS

1954-55

ALBERTHA JOHNSON, President Negro
RONALD ADLER, Vice President
BILL RENUART, Secretary
DAISY HARRIS, Treasurer Negro
WILLIAM PEELER, Chaplain

1955-56

RONALD ADLER, President
DOROTHY WILLIAMS, Vice President Negro
LINDA MARKS, Secretary
ANN SAUNDERS, Treasurer Negro
GEORGE LOVE, Chaplain

ADULT COUNSELLORS

MISS RETA REED
DR. JACOB H. CUNNINGHAM

INSTITUTE PLANNING STAFF

COMMITTEE

BILL RENUART, Chairman
ALBERTHA JOHNSON
DIANE BARTHEL
EUGENE DENNEY
GEORGE LOVE
CHARLES MCARTHUR
HENRY SCHMERER

CONSULTANTS

DR. C. DOREN THARP, Dean of Faculties, University of Miami
DR. DEAN GEORGE EPLEY, Chairman, Human Relations Department, University of Miami
MISS RETA REED, Director, Y Teens, YWCA
MISS MARIE D. ROBERTS, Teacher Booker T. Washington High School
DR. JACOB H. CUNNINGHAM, Director, Florida Region, NCCJ

☆ ☆ ☆

The Membership of IYC includes delegates from the following youth-serving organizations and institutions:

Allied Youth

B'nai B'rith Youth Organization

Future Teachers of America

Dade County Public High Schools

Young Men's Christian Association

Young Women's Christian Association

The National Conference of Christians and Jews appreciates the cooperation of Dr. Jay F. W. Pearson, President of the University of Miami, in permitting the Institute to be held at Koubek Center and for providing leadership for the Institute.

Special thanks also go to the following NCCJ Directors for their cooperation in selecting youth representatives from their Regions for participation in the Institute:

JOHN T. KENNA, Louisville, Kentucky
ROSS CLINCHY, Baltimore, Maryland
LEONARD ARIES, Washington, D.C.

Members of IYC are also grateful for the leadership provided by interested adults in the Institute.

Dodson Talks To Workshop

"Community Backgrounds in Human Relations" will be discussed by Dr. W. Dodson, first visiting consultant of the University of Miami Human Relations Workshop, in Room 733 at U-M tomorrow and Saturday at 8:30 a.m.

Dr. Dodson

Dr. Dodson is director of New York University Center for Human Relations Studies and currently managing editor of the Journal of Educational Psychology.

The workshop began its six weeks of theoretical and practical study yesterday with Dr. Dean George Epley, chairman of the U-M's human relations department, as director.

Non-workshoppers interested in hearing Dr. Dodson may get in touch with Dr. Epley at the university for permission to sit in on the lecture. Room 733 is in Temporary Building 73 directly behind the Merrick Building.

Armed Forces

The Negro and the National Defense, a Rational Approach

BY

West A. Hamilton, Colonel, Infantry

RECEIVED
OCT 25 1948
Southern Regional Council

Reprinted from
The Southwestern Journal, Langston University, Langston, Oklahoma
SPRING EDITION—1948

THE NEGRO AND THE NATIONAL DEFENSE, A RATIONAL APPROACH

By West A. Hamilton, Colonel, Infantry

"Goin' to lay down my burden
Down by de river side,
Down by de river side,
Goin' to lay down my burden
Down by de river side
To study war no more.

"I aint goin' to study war no more,
Aint goin' to study war no more,
Aint goin' to study war no more,
Aint goin' to study war no more."

In the above quoted lines from a well known Negro spiritual perhaps we may get insight into the Negro's thinking or philosophy on the matter of participation in the National Defense program of the nation.

True it is, that the American Negro has had a fine and altogether creditable record in the various wars, major and minor, in which the nation has been involved from the Revolutionary War down to the present. The fact that Crispus Attucks, a Negro, was the very first to die in the Boston Massacre, the forerunner of the Revolutionary War, is a source of great racial pride of Negroes. It has been the subject and theme of innumerable orations and written articles. In the same way Negroes point with pride to their participation in the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and finally World Wars I and II. The statement that no black man in the country's history has been guilty of treasonable or disloyal action is accepted as a legendary fact.

It is an historic fact that the American Negro in any national war effort in which he has been called upon to serve has by and large acquitted himself creditably and at times heroically. This of course must be qualified with the statement that due regard must be paid to the opportunities, limited at times, which the Negro citizen and member of the Armed forces have been given.

The theme of the spiritual which opened this article seems to have followed the Negro out of slavery through the Civil War and now for three generations since then. This means that except in times of major war crises, no serious attention was paid by the American people and indeed by the Negro himself to the matter of an adequate participation in the military and naval establishments of America. Of course, the whole national pattern of America so far as its military policy is concerned shows a characteristic and continuous indifference to questions of national preparedness and security down through the years. When a national war crisis has developed, the whole nation has risen to supreme heights of achievement, and, aided up to now by fortuitous circumstances, has always emerged on the winning side.

The Negro segment of the population has outdone the rest of America in sheer indifference and lethargy. It is true that through the years, or at least since the Civil War, Negroes have had, as it were, a token representation in the Armed Forces establishments in time of peace. Up to World War II, our representation in the Regular Army for instance had well nigh disappeared. A pitifully small representation in the National Guard existed, with a sprinkling in the Organized Reserve. Service in, and participation in the Armed Forces on the part of the general run of Negroes was a thing apart. Not once during all of these years does history record any serious efforts to participate in adequate or equitable numbers in the military establishment. Nor were any efforts put forth to arouse the national conscience to a realization that all of America's citizens should have a part in preparing to share the responsibilities inherent in citizenship rights and privileges.

The matter simply drifted. Army service was not particularly popular among the mass of America's citizenry, it was not popular at all among the Negro segment.

The great real and potential benefits of participating in a program designed to develop the spartan attributes of men made no impression. The carry over value of developing strong bodies in which to house strong minds did not register. Thus the Negro segment of the population came down to the cataclysmic crisis of World Wars I and II. Whereas, despite over all national apathy and indifference, there was a real nucleus—the Regular Army and National Guard—upon which to expand our multimillion army and navy, the Negroes of America practically did not exist except for the vast untrained levies which they were called upon to furnish.

Thus the Negro segment of the nation were practically strangers to the Armed Services and vice versa. In other words over three quarters of a century had been spent sleeping, and Negroes had defaulted their right as free men to a full or at least reasonable participation in a transcendentally important phase of our nation's life. The pattern had been set. We were not used to the services, and the services were not used to us.

When a pattern or habit obtains for so long a period of time as has been indicated, it is a difficult matter to change in a relatively short time. During these days of World War II, a veteran Negro educator made the statement "The Negro is just not psychologically prepared for this war." No one would quarrel with that statement. Again the theme of the spiritual, "Study War No More," comes to mind.

More than that, such expressions as the following were extant: "We have nothing to fight for," "This is a white man's war," "The Germans and the Japs haven't done anything to me." As justification for these attitudes, of course, past and present shortcomings in American democracy were cited. None is so naive as to deny the existence of these shortcomings. And there should be none so naive as to deny that democracy or the ideal of democracy is the goal toward which we strive and toward the attainment of which progressive strides have been made.

Skipping the years, I make bold to state as a fact that the Negro has emerged from World War II with many gains social and economic. His gains in the armed services, particularly in the Army, have not been inconsiderable. While not nearly large enough, the American Army is larger than ever before except when on an actual wartime basis. Correspondingly, the Negroes' numbers in the Army are larger by many fold than ever before.

Continuing the population and the war-time ratio, the Negro elements in the army as to numbers are roughly a tenth of the whole. This participation extends in practically every single branch of the service. It is true that the Negroes' representation in some services is very small.

There are at the present time hundreds of Negro officers on active duty with the Army. This number includes, of course, the officers of the Regular Army, relatively few in number to be sure, but certainly a very substantial start has been made. This increase in the Regular Army Personnel is many, many fold times the number we actually had at the beginning of World War II.

I have pointed out that over a long period of years the Negroes' inadequate and inequitable representation in the armed forces has been due to: (1) the neglect by the American Government (following the national pattern) to give serious consideration to the claims of this minority group for a reasonable participation; (2) the downright somnambulance of the great mass of American Negroes, including their leaders and spokesmen, in this regard. It seems to be that the whole problem has been neglected over the years until now, when we have what appears to be a wave of opportunism. In other words, the pattern in the Armed Forces is in no whit different from its counterpart in any other phase of American life that might be mentioned.

The problem of the American Negro in the army is the same problem as the one he faces in other walks of life: educational, political, social, economic. This is not to say at all that the disabilities of citizenship from which he suffers are right or just or ought not to be corrected. I am saying that this problem of the Armed Forces will be solved at the same time as the others and not before. I repeat; there can be none so naive or intellectually dishonest as to deny that a start in the solution of all these problems has been made; that much progress has been made and is being made; and much remains to be done.

It is the supreme duty of every American citizen everywhere to contribute his mite and might toward the removal of the defects in our society and the consummation of the goals and ideals toward which we strive.

The job will not be accomplished by wishful thinking, by executive order, legislative enactment or judicial fiat. It will be accomplished by the combined efforts of us all extending through several generations. Each one of us in his day and generation must advance the cause.

Presently in our day much impetus can be given the movement by an intelligent and forward looking effort toward: Capitalizing on the gains already made, utilizing the opportunities at hand and steadfastly pressing on toward the ultimate goals.

One of the very practical ways in which we can seize present opportunities is this: For the American Negro segment of the population to put its best foot forward so far as the Armed Services are concerned. By that I mean that we should assiduously encourage our youth, the talented, the educated ones, to enter the army in reasonably creditable numbers. We must devote a reasonable proportion of the "cream of our youth" to this very necessary program. In this manner we can help eliminate the situation which too often arises where we default grand opportunities because of a lack of qualified people.

We can by stressing education and public health raise the overall level of literacy and physical well-being of Negro youth. In this way we can alleviate the tremendous disadvantages which we have faced thus far, of having about 70 per cent of our army levies classified as illiterate or near illiterate. We can and should attempt to decrease the overwhelming numbers of unskilled workers whether for the pursuits of peace or for national defense.

In the civilian components, wherever there is offered an opportunity we should seize it. Our R. O. T. C. Units where they exist should be literally bursting at the seams with thousands of enthusiastic youth seeking preparation for service and leadership. This same pattern should be followed over the whole national picture.

In this way, using the practical and logical means at hand, we shall hasten the coming of the ideal. It is well to remember that this is the story of human progress down to date. Sometimes the gains are slow and subtle and sometimes imperceptible. Arthur Hugh Clough puts it in these very appropriate lines:

> Say not, "The struggle naught availeth,
> The labour and the wounds are vain,
> The enemy faints not nor faileth
> And as things have been they remain.
>
> "For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
> Seem here no painful inch to gain,
> Far back, thro' creeks and inlets making,
> Comes silent, flooding in, the main."

I commend the philosophy of this poem to all Americans as a challenge to their faith and clear thinking in the solution of our great problems.

Colonel West A. Hamilton of Washington, D. C., is Professor of Military Science and Tactics at Prairie View University, Prairie View, Texas. One of the highest ranking Negro officers in the United States Army, Colonel Hamilton has had a distinguished career in the Infantry beginning with service on the Mexican Border and continuing through World Wars I and II.

Since July 23, 1948, PMS&T at Morgan State College, Baltimore, Maryland.

37- US Army

DEPARTMENT OF PROMOTION AND PUBLICITY
NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE
1133 Broadway
New York 10, N.Y.

GUICHARD PARRIS, Director
WAtkins 4-0505

FOR RELEASE:
Sunday, January 21, 1951

(This is a transcript of discussion heard over the ABC network 10:30 a.m. EST, January 21st. In it James Hicks, Afro-American Newspapers, and E. W. Kenworthy, New York Sunday Times, discuss integration of Negroes into the Armed Services.)

ANNOUNCER How is the new policy of equality and democracy in the armed services working out? How do the men like it? Is it practical?

On July 26, 1948, President Truman issued Executive Order 9,981. It said: "there shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin." This order established a committee to determine how equality could be carried out. Less than two years later, due in large measure to the work of this committee, the Air Force, the Navy, and the Army declared that their policy would be equality of treatment and opportunity for all. Here this morning to tell us how "Operation Equality" is working out in the armed services are Mr. E. W. Kenworthy of the New York Sunday Times, and Mr. James H. Hicks, of the Baltimore Afro-American. Mr. Kenworthy served as executive secretary of the President's Committee, and Mr. Hicks recently returned from several months in Korea as a war correspondent.

Mr. Kenworthy:

RECEIVED JAN 19 1951 Southern Regional Council

KENWORTHY The President's Committee was set up 2½ years ago to investigate ways to accomplish complete equality of opportunity in the American armed services. One of the five members of the Committee was the National Urban League's executive director, Lester B. Granger. Now, various minority groups have claimed that there was discrimination in the armed services for the past 30 years and more, but no specific facts were presented or found concerning discrimination, except with respect to Negroes. So the Committee tackled this phase: The President's Committee said the way to use manpower and improve efficiency would be to use a man where he was needed regardless of his color. You've just come back from Korea, Mr. Hicks. Are Negroes still fighting in their own racial units, or have they been mixed in with white troops?

HICKS Well, Mr. Kenworthy, in the Marine Corps, which comes under the Navy, the situation is very, very healthy.

KENWORTHY You have whites and Negroes fighting side by side in the Marines?

HICKS Yes, I saw Negro marines who went into the Inchon landing completely integrated. I remember one squad which had a Negro squad leader and a Negro BAR man. This BAR man had clung to his grenade launcher at a time when the going was rough and all the other guys in the squad had thrown theirs away. It developed later on, that he was able to save the HICKS (Cont'd.) entire squad with this grenade launcher by knocking out a machine gun position that had his unit pinned down.

KENWORTHY A year ago I visited Air Force installations, and everywhere I went I found Negroes completely integrated, on the jobs, and in the schools, in barracks and in mess halls. They were doing all the same jobs that the white soldiers were doing. How's the Air Force in Korea?

HICKS This thing is working so beautifully in the Air Force that they actually laugh at the Army. I recall going to a unit in Taegu and seeing an aviation engineer group. There was a colored soldier sitting there, and I walked up to him, and being accustomed to finding all-Negro units, I assumed he was in one. I asked him his job on the base, and he told me he was an engineer. I said, "that's good, now how many other colored units on this base"? He looked at me and smiled and said: "We don't have any colored units on this base--I'm in the aviation engineers." Well, soon a Negro soldier came up who was in the Army, and this fellow smiled at me and said, "there's a man in a colored unit--he's in the Army". It's reached that point--you know how the guy in the Army felt!

KENWORTHY Did you get on any fleet units at all?

HICKS No, I did not. But the Navy, I happen to know, is doing an excellent, completely democratic job.

KENWORTHY How about the Army?

HICKS Well, I was with the Army a good deal of the time, and there the situation is bad, very bad.

HICKS (Cont'd.) You have integration, but the integration has come not because of policy set by the high command, but because of the expediency of battle. You have so many casualties that a general simply looks around for men, and finding only colored men available, puts them in the lines along with the rest.

KENWORTHY Well, Mr. Hicks, I got the impression from several dispatches that when the going got pretty tough, in August, down around Masan and the Southern Coast, and there was danger of a break through, Negroes were pulled out of segregated units and put in white units. Can you verify that?

HICKS In August, last year, the 8th Army got the idea they were going to put some Negroes into white units. I was actually amazed when an 8th Army Inspector-General asked me to come into headquarters and talk with him on this integration. He wanted to get my views on whether or not it would work. He asked me such questions as: How will the Negro people back home feel about this? How will the men we put into these outfits feel, and so on? This is something that is supposed to have been carried out all the time. I told him I thought all this talk was ridiculous. You needed men in these white regiments, and there were colored men available--they were American soldiers, and they were supposed to be trained soldiers, and there was nothing else to do but put them in there. It was then that they began to integrate some men into the 24th, the 35th, and the 27th.

KENWORTHY Well, the basis on which the Committee started out to get integration was that it would be futile to argue the case for integration on moral or intellectual grounds. The Army would always say it agreed with you absolutely, "but, unfortunately, we are not in the business of morals, but warfare. We have to run an efficient Army. Our experience has proved absolutely that racial units are the most efficient, that they give the Negro a better chance to advance--much better than he would have in a white unit, because he hasn't had as good schooling, or as many advantages in civilian life".

HICKS That's a familiar argument.

KENWORTHY Well, when the military says to you this is efficient and that is not, regardless of your feelings, you can't ignore the argument. So we decided from the outset to meet the Army on its own ground, and to examine this whole question of efficiency. When we examined it historically, and in the field, at various camps and installations, we found that segregation was completely inefficient. For instance, the Army never tired of talking about what an inefficient division the 92d was in combat in Italy in World War II. Well, if it was inefficient, it wasn't doing its job, and it was a waste of several thousand men. There was no historical experience the Army could point out, of combat efficiency on the part of the Negro unit. Yet it continued to maintain that it was the only way they could run these things. But when you looked at camps or schools here, the whole argument again broke down.

HICKS Let me raise a question here, if I may--if integration works in Korea--and it does--is it plain simple prejudice, or is it just some general holding things up? You have the Committee's report; you have the President issuing a directive saying this will be done, and yet you don't have it done. I've been an Army officer and I haven't seen orders complied with like that. If an order says this is the way it should be done, then why isn't it done?

KENWORTHY Perhaps that throws some light on the phrase, "the old Army game", because there is a vast difference in the way this order has been carried out. The Navy and the Air Force left no question when they adopted the democratic policies that they were to be carried out. One high Air Force commander said there was no room in the Air Force for any white officer who wouldn't obey this policy. The Navy allows no deviation whatsoever.

HICKS Well, why is it that the Army, then, doesn't stick to this policy it has adopted?

KENWORTHY I think one way the Army has been able to dodge this is through local commanders shifting men from one job to another. In the Navy or Air Force, if a man is trained as engineman, he is not used as ship's carpenter, for instance. But in the Army, people do not always serve in their primary military specialty. It's easy to say "sorry, our radar jobs are all filled. This Negro is a radar specialist, and we have no jobs open for him, but we have a job in a Negro outfit as a truck driver" and therefore KENWORTHY (Cont'd.) he's shifted to a service unit. The President's Committee recognized the Army had a bigger job than either the Navy or Air Force. It had, proportionately, many more Negroes of lesser skills, because both the Navy and Air Force had higher mental requirements for entrance.. So, it was tougher to break up a Negro service unit of men with lower skills than it was in the Navy to take men who had skills which the service wanted and shift them.

HICKS You've got to start out by saying that every job in the Army is open to every man, regardless of color.

KENWORTHY That was the first point in our four point program. You'd see that the Negro with a skill had a chance to use that skill. Next we wanted every Army school opened to insure the man with potentialities a chance at school training. These were the important steps—to begin with basic training where the jobs were assigned, and to begin with the schools to see that the Army trained the better Negro. Then we said to the Army, take 40 or 50 military specialities in which you desperately need men, and say - "we don't care what a man's color is; we need men who have these skills and insert Negroes in white units. Then the whole thing would begin to break down of its own weight as you progressed The fourth point the Committee went after was the quota system. From the Committee viewpoint, it wasn't important how many Negroes you had in the Army; what was important was that those you had were good soldiers, could do their jobs, and you weren't keeping them, or dismissing them either, because of their color. The Army finally came around and waived its KENWORTHY (Cont'd.) 10% quota system.

HICKS You know, it's always been a myth that the Negro soldier is happier fighting in a Negro unit.

KENWORTHY Yes, one officer testified before the President's Committee that there need not necessarily be poor morale or low battle efficiency in a racial unit. And, he cited the experience of the Japanese-American unit in Italy which fought so valiantly and won so many decorations. However, Mike Matsuoka, who fought in that unit interrupted this officer to say that the record of the Nisei was not to demonstrate the superiority of the racial unit, but to eliminate segregation. I think the Army should take the leap, and carry out the President's policy.

HICKS That's right, Mr. Kenworthy. The success of the Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force proves it can be done. All this business about esprit de corps in a Negro unit is a lot of poppycock. The best esprit de corps that a Negro soldier gets is as a part of the American Army and not a part of any Negro, segregated unit.

KENWORTHY I agree, his morale is built not on the fact that he is fighting alongside another Negro so much as that he is a part of this entire thing.

HICKS And when you deny him or make him feel that he is a separate part of that army, certainly in my Army experience, it's not something that will raise his morale or build esprit de corps. The young Negroes out there in Korea today fighting under the banner of a segregated regiment want just one kind of Army, a democratic Army.

KENWORTHY It's just a matter of time till the Army comes around to the realization which the Air Force and Navy have proved, that the efficient use of manpower is democratic use. As a result of its examination into the rules, procedures, and practices of the armed services, both past and present, the President's Committee concluded its report by saying, "a policy of equality of treatment and opportunity will make for a better Army, Navy, and Air Force. It is right and just. It will strengthen the nation."

ANNOUNCER You have heard E. W. Kenworthy of the New York Sunday Times and James H. Hicks, of the Baltimore Afro-American discussing equality of treatment and opportunity in the armed services

U. S. Armed Forces

The Research Program

of the

HUMAN RELATIONS DIVISION

HUMAN RESOURCES RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Air Research and Development Command

Department of the Air Force

August 1953
Maxwell AF Base, Alabama

Note: The information contained herein is not an official AF release and it is not for release or publication. This program statement is provided for information only of Sociologists, Social Psychologists and other interested professional groups, and members of the Air Force.

Contents

	Page No.
Organization of H.R.R.I.	iii
The Staff.	iv
Human Relations Division: Primary Task	1
Work Areas	1
1. Executive Control and Coordination . . .	2
2. Supervision and Discipline.	2
3. Personal Adjustment and Work Satisfaction	2
4. Base-Community Relations	3
5. Measurement of Unit Effectiveness and Morale.	3
Outline of Concepts and Projects	3
Bibliography . . . . . (Abstracts of Completed Reports)	15
Name Index	48

ORGANIZATION OF THE HUMAN RESOURCES RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Maxwell Air Force Base, Alabama

The Human Resources Research Institute was set up in July 1949 to conduct research in the human resources problems of the Air Force and to assist the Air Force in making use of social science research in general. Its objectives are:

a. To realize the maximum utilization by the Air Force of results wheresoever accomplished in human research.

b. To perform or sponsor necessary study, research, and experimentation to insure improvements in concepts, techniques and methods for personnel utilization and management, including education and career guidance.

c. To perform or sponsor studies or experiments to insure improvements in those aspects of strategic planning, intelligence, and psychological warfare involving knowledge of the human factors.

d. To study means of increasing the effectiveness of the United States Air Force as a deterrent to war.

e. To perform such human resources research and development programs and projects as may be assigned by the Chief of Staff, USAF.

Just as certain units of the Air Force are concerned with research leading to improved aircraft, equipment, and weapons, so is HRRI concerned with research leading to improvement of the human factor in Air Force performance -- for example, better human relations and morale, more adequate officer education, more efficient use of manpower, more effective procedures in the gathering of intelligence, and in the planning of and defense against psychological warfare.

The research function within the Institute is carried out under the Directorate of Research, by six divisions, each responsible for projects in one of the areas of responsibility assigned to the Institute. These are (1) Officer Personnel, (2) Officer Education, (3) Human Relations, (4) Manpower, (5) Strategic Intelligence, and (6) Psychological Warfare. A Technical Services Division within the Research Directorate provides statistical service and advice on experimental design. Overseas detachments were established in Tokyo and Paris in January 1951. The mission of these detachments is to assist in the conduct of human factors research in overseas areas.

The Staff

The Institute
F. O. Carroll, Major General, USAF	Commander
George W. Croker, Colonel, USAF	Vice Commander
Herman J. Sander, Ph.D.	Acting Research Director
The Human Relations Division
Abbott L. Ferriss, Ph.D.	Chief
Robert L. Beers, Major, USAF (M.A.)	Executive Officer
Stuart N. Adams, Ph.D.	Asst. Program Officer
George W. Baker, Ph.D.	Asst. Program Officer
Ernest L. McCollum, Major, USAF (Ph.D.)	Special Project Officer
Joseph J. Rosa, Major, USAF (M.A.)	Special Project Officer
Robert W. Hites, Ph.D.	Project Officer
Daniel L. Camp, B.A.	Project Officer
Glenn C. McCann, Ph.D.	Asst. Project Officer
Alfred S. Moore, M.A.	Asst. Project Officer
James J. Boylan, Jr., 2/Lt., USAF (B.S.)	Asst. Project Officer
Louis M. Herman, 2/Lt., USAF (M.A.)	Asst. Project Officer
William A. Glenn, B.A.	Research Technician
Angelo Orlandella, M/Sgt., USAF	Research Technician
Frederick H. Esch, S/Sgt., USAF (M.S.)	Research Technician
Janet C. Gilliland, A/2C, USAF (B.A.)	Asst. Research Technician
John E. Dunning, A/3C, USAF (B.S.)	Asst. Research Technician
Edward E. Cureton, Ph.D.	Consultant - Summer '53
E. William Noland, Ph.D.	Consultant - Summer '53

The Human Relations Division

Primary Task:

The Human Relations Division conducts studies into organizational and behavioral factors which influence effectiveness and morale of Air Force units. Since the group rather than the individual is the primary focus, sociology, cultural anthropology, and social psychology provide the disciplinary orientations for the studies. Typically, the method of study is to construct measures of variables and to conduct field experiments, using control and experimental groups, in order to identify factors which may be manipulated to increase effectiveness and morale.

In improving a complex organization such as the Air Force, the studies of the Division contribute to policy decisions, provide guidance to effective leader behavior, indicate the most appropriate organizational set-ups, and produce tools for assessment of various aspects of unit effectiveness. These several contributions are made primarily upon the basis of requests from Air Force "operating" agencies. These include the Inspector General, Directorate of Personnel Planning and of Military Personnel, Headquarters, USAF, and of various other agencies of the Air Defense Command, Strategic Air Command, Air University Command, the Far East Air Force Command, and the USAF European Command.

What are the behavior mechanisms by which an individual gets on with other individuals with whom he works? Just what are the behavior patterns, the attitudes and sentiments, the value system, of different individuals in group interaction -- and how do they relate to job performance? How does the organizational structure of a work unit set limits for the behavior that takes place therein? How do such factors in Air Force performance as executive control, supervision, discipline, work satisfaction, and base-community relationships affect unit effectiveness and morale? -- These are some of the questions under study.

Work Areas

In studying the structure and operation of Air Force units, work can be logically divided into five major areas. These foci, together with the titles of Division research projects falling under each are:

1. Executive Control and Coordination

Rules, regulations and policies of an Air Force unit set forth the way the work of the unit is to be carried out. The tasks of many sub-units must be coordinated to accomplish the over-all unit mission. This process of control and coordination is the focus of study here -- how decision-making can be handled in an optimally cooperative manner; what makes for maximal intra- and inter-unit teamwork; how executive turnover and succession affect interpersonal relationships within the organization; how to organize for optimal communication among units.

Projects:

(a) Productivity and Motivation of Civilian and Military Personnel at AMC Installations (AF 505-036-0007)

(b) Leadership in Combat (AF 505-039-0001)

(c) Factors Affecting the Staff Process of Decision-Making (AF 505-036-0004)

2. Supervision and Discipline

Once set up and staffed, an organization operates through effective supervision and realistic and consistent discipline. A system of rewards and punishments is essential for proper motivation and social control. What are the leader-follower relationships most conducive to maximum performance in various types of work units? How do organizational characteristics define and delimit supervisory activities? What are the situational determinants of satisfactory supervision and discipline?

Projects:

(a) Squadron Human Relations Problems (AF 505-036-0002)

(b) Assessing, Building and Maintaining Discipline (AF 505-036-0008)

(c) Non-Commissioned Officer Responsibilities (AF 505-036-0009)

3. Personal Adjustment and Work Satisfaction

People bring to their Air Force jobs a complex of living habits, experience and training which bears directly and dynamically upon their chances for satisfactory interpersonal adjustment. How do the value systems of civilian life run counter to those of military life? How does the stratification system of the Air Force, described in terms of the interrelationships among rank, power and prestige, impinge upon the motivation and morale of personnel? How do friendship cliques and other reference group affiliations affect on-the-job performance?

Projects:

(a) Communication and Performance (AF 505-036-0003)

(b) Human Relations Factors in Air Force Maintenance Units (AF 505-036-0006)

(c) Studies in Attitudes and Attitude Change (AF 505-036-0010)

(d) Motivation and Integration of New Officers (AF 505-036-0011)

(e) Human Relations Problems of Isolated Air Defense Sites (AF 505-036-0001)

4. Base-Community Relations

The impact of one's family life, community characteristics, and off-the-job activities upon his job performance has been substantially established in industrial situations; the corresponding relationship in military life is recognized but needs clarification and appraisal. How do Air Force policies affect family adjustment? How can commanders utilize the power structure of the host community to accomplish certain ends through community leaders? How can those off-the-job activities which enhance rather than impair one's energy and zest for work best be obtained and promoted? How can Air Force personnel's conduct while overseas be made to gain friends for the United States?

Projects:

(a) Human Factors in Air Force Base Efficiency (AF 505-037-0001)

(b) Air Base-Community (AF 505-037-0002)

5. Measurement of Unit Effectiveness and Morale

Of substantially different focus than the preceding projects in this area are designed solely to develop criterion measures. Progressively better measurement of the two primary variables, unit effectiveness and morale, is a continual task.

Projects:

(a) The Development of Measures of Effectiveness of Air Force Squadrons (AF 505-046-0001)

(b) FEAF Unit Performance Measures (AF 505-039-0002)

Further Conceptualization of Work: An Outline of Concepts and Corresponding Research Projects.

The program of the Human Relations Division has two major foci-- a substantive, problem-solving concern; and a methodological and basic research emphasis, the latter including problem-finding and research utilization tasks. The following is a systematic outline of concepts which define major topics of study. Opposite each concept are found titles of research reports completed to date or in progress. Abstracts of the completed reports are found in the Bibliography. The number in parenthesis after each completed report refers to the page on which the abstract of the report is found

First Major Focus

Concepts	Research Reports
A. Development of Measures of
1. Unit effectiveness (i.e., mission accomplishment)	Development of Efficiency Criteria of Air Surveillance Crews (p.22)
	Air Force Operational Records as Criterion Sources (p. 18)
	Productivity and Motivation of Civilian and Military Personnel in AMC Installations (In progress)
2. Morale
3. Efficiency	Development of An Index of Work Group Efficiency (P.24)
B. Executive Control and Coordination
1. Rules and Regulations	Some Latent Functions of An Executive Control Device: A Sociological Analysis of a Social System under Stress (p. 33)
	Rate of Promotion: Functioning of An Administrative Arm of AC&W (p.25)
	Personnel Turnover in Relation to Orientation and Morale in a Division of the Air Defense Command (p. 37)

	Occupational Instability, Time Perspective, and Work Effectiveness (In Progress)
	Small Group Integration and Squadron Organization (In progress)
2. Staff Process	General Factors Influencing the Effectiveness of the Staff Process: A Survey of the Opinions of Experienced Staff Officers (p.37)
	Case Studies of Two Air Force Staffs (p. 38)
	The Command Process-Division and Squadron (In progress)
3. Decision-making	Occupational Instability and Decision-Making (In progress)
4. Communication Networks
a. Formal channels	Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. VI, Organization and Communication (p. 23)
5. Organizational Structure
a. Type	Attitudes toward Two Systems of Aircraft Maintenance Resistance to Organizational Change (In progress)
	The Organization of Air Base Service Activities (In progress)
	Attitudes Toward Selected Elements of Organization and the Performance of Bomb Squadrons (In progress)
	Some Observations of Change and Adjustment in Bomb Wing Organization (In progress)
b. Size

c. Spatial arrangement and geography
d. Allocation and Stratification	Social Stratification in a USAF Base (p.31)
	The Effects of Status Differentials Upon Cooperation (p.39)
	Personnel Policies and Organizational Needs: A Case for System Analysis (In progress)
(1) Power
(2) Authority	The Organization of Executive Action: Authority, Power, and Wing Integration (p.33)
(3) Rank	The First Sergeant in the USAF (p. 32)
(4) Position
(5) Office
(6) Influence
(7) Prestige
(8) Esteem
(9) Mobility
6. Inter-Unit Coordination	The Coordination of the Air Base Supply and Maintenance Activities (In progress)
	The Coordination of Flying Activities in Bomb Wings: Integration and Performance (In progress)
	The Coordination of Maintenance Activities in Bomb Wings: Integration and Performance (In progress)

C. Supervision and Discipline

1. Leadership-Followership

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. VII, Leadership (p. 24)

Measuring Followers' Perceptions of Leaders' Human Relations-Mindedness in A Military Organization (p. 25)

Conceptions of Official Leader Roles in the Air Force (p. 25)

Incidents of Leadership in Combat Vol. I, Human Relations (p. 16)

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. II, Communication (p. 17)

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. III, Personal Conduct (p. 17)

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. IV, Organization and Planning (P. 17)

Incidents of Leadership in Combat Vol. V, Administration and Supervision of Duties (p. 17)

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. VI, Execution of Duties (p. 18)

Situational Elements in Combat Leadership (p. 18)

Acceptance of Aims of the Korean Campaign (p. 15)

Perception of Human Relations--Leadership at the Squadron CO Level (In progress)

Non-commissioned Officer Responsibilities (In progress)

	Differential Perception and Leadership Types (In progress)
2. Social Controls	Factors Affecting the Performance of Leadership among Air Force Non-Commissioned Officers (p. 46)
a. Rewards
b. Punishment	Attitudes Toward Promotion in AC&W Sites (In progress)
3. Communication Process
a. Informal, "grapevine"	Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. V, A Study of small group Integration (p. 23)
	Internal Orientation in a Large Military Organization (p. 37)
	Internal Orientation of Squadrons in an Air Division of the Air Defense Command (p. 37)
	AWOL Rates, Motivation and Unit Esprit (In progress)
D. Personal Adjustment and Work Satisfactions	Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. II, Personnel Problems (p. 21)
	Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. III, Needs of Site Personnel (p. 22)
	Career Choice and Job Satisfaction: A Study of the Military Man (p. 26)
	Attitudes and Adjustment Problems of a Sample of Newly Commissioned AROTC Officers Assigned to Maxwell Air Force Base, Summer 1951 (p. 29)
	Attitudes and Judgments of Some Lieutenants Related to Present Active Duty Intentions (p. 43)

	Influence of An Indoctrination Course on Active Duty Attitudes (p. 44)
	The Active Duty Intentions of Some ARDC Lieutenants (AFROTC) Related to Several Service-Associated Variables (p. 45)
	Job Adjustment in Radar Operations (In progress)
	Comparison of Supervisor's and Subordinates' Rating of Work Situations in ARDC (In progress)
	Interpersonal Relations and Work Effectiveness (In progress)
1. Value Systems
2. Reference Group Indentification	Behavior Standards of USAFE Personnel (p. 29)
	Behavior Standards of USAFE Personnel (Summary) (p. 29)
	Some Patterns of Bomb Squadron Culture (In progress)
a. Friendship Cliques	Friendship Cliques in U.S. Air Force Wings (p. 30)
b. Status Classes	Status Classes, Morale and Performance in a Bomb Wing (p. 32)
c. Identification with Unit and Air Force	Attitudes of Regular and Reserve Officers toward the Korean Campaign (p. 15)
	Disappointments Related to Active Duty Intentions (In progress)
	Situational Factors and Attitudes Expressed toward Duty with ARDC (In progress)

d. Prestige Ranking of Types of Units	Prestige Structure of an Air Base: Squadron Rankings and Morale (p. 33)
	Squadron Prestige, Interaction and Morale (In progress)
3. Background Factors	JADF Survey (A Report on the Findings of a Research Team Survey of Human Relations at Japan Air Defense Force Sites in the Summer of 1952. (p. 26)
	Background personnel Factors, Unit Position, and Internal Orientation (In progress)
4. Military-Civilian Employee Relationships
E. Base-Community Relations
1. Off-Duty Activity	Off-Duty Activities and the USAF Mission: A Survey of 10 USAF Bases and Their Host Community Settings (p. 34)
	A Manual for the Survey of Off-Duty Activities and Off-Duty Needs (p. 34)
2. Family Life
a. Characteristics	The Family Life of Officers and Airmen in a Bomb Wing (p. 31)
b. Mutual Impingement with the Air Force	Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. VIII, Family Adjustment to Military Life (p. 24)
3. Community
a. Facilities for Air Force Use
b. Community-Base Integration

(1) Associational membership
(2) Community power structure	Host Community and Air Force Base (p. 32) Air Force Base Participation Project: Report on Turner Air Force Base (p. 35) The Air Site and the Community (In progress)
c. Community-Base Interpersonal Relations
(1) Cultural, racial, ethnic differences	Anthropological Survey of Neah Bay, Washington, November 1951 (p. 26)
(2) Physical disturbances
(3) Economic system disturbances
4. Assignment to Foreign Country
a. Intercultural Relationships	Attitudes of FEAF Personnel Toward Natives (p. 15) Attitudes of Men at AC&W Sites in Japan (p. 27) The U.S. Air Force in England (p. 30) Attitudes Toward Presence of Air Force Dependents in the Far Eastern Theatre of Operations (p. 15)
b. Adjustment to climate and geography

Second Major Focus

Concepts	Research Reports
A. Methodology	A Method for Determining Dispersion Scores in Attitude Measurement (p. 43) A Method for the Analysis of Small Samples (P. 28)

Criteria of Military Leadership: A Factor Analysis of Rating Scale Variables (p. 19)

Avoiding Spuriousness in Biserial Correlations Used as Coefficients of Internal Consistency (p. 19)

A Systematic Procedure for Categorizing Descriptive Material (p. 19)

The Establishment of Critical Requirements for Air Force Combat Leadership Through Use of the Critical Incident Technique (p. 20)

An Index of Crystallization (p. 43)

Some Experiences with the Group Interview (p. 30)

Sociometric Pilot Study (In progress)

Sampling Differences in Sociometric Observation (In progress)

Speed and Accuracy of Work Communication - A Problem of Criterion Measurement (In progress)

B. Basic Research

Experimental Investigation of the Effect of Group Properties Upon Individual and Group Recall (p. 39)

The Effects of Different Probabilities of Success Upon the Group Problem-Solving Process Under Varying Conditions. (p. 40)

Differential Definitions of Situations, Commitments, and Actions (p. 45)

Some Functional Consequences of Primary Controls in Formal Work Organization (p. 28)

Some of the Assumptions Underlying Administrative Theory (p. 39)

Experiments Dealing With Group Conditions Making For Conformity: An Analysis of Group Decision and Attitude Change (p. 40)

Experiments Dealing with Group Conditions Making for Conformity: The Nature of Group Norms and Attitude Change (p. 40)

Experiments Dealing with Group Conditions Making for conformity: Perception of Group Consensus and Tolerance for Own Non-Conformity (p. 41)

Experiments Dealing with Group Conditions Making for Conformity: The Nature of Conformity (p. 41)

Attitudes as the Perceived Means for Attaining Individual Goals: Predicting Attitude Position as a Function of Value (p. 41)

Personality Determinants and Ego Defensiveness in Relation to Attitude Change: Rational Persuasion Compared with Authoritarian Suggestion (p. 42)

Personality Determinants and Ego Defensiveness in Relation to Attitude Change: Rational Persuasion Compared with Self-Insight (p. 42)

Initiating and Maintaining Research Relations in a Military Organization (p. 34)

The Shaping of Research Design in Large Scale Group Research (p. 28)

C. Exploratory Research

Analysis of FEAF Critical Incidents with Emphasis on Situational Variables (p. 20)

Incidents of Organizational Confusion in Combat (p. 20)

Bibliography of Military Leadership (p. 21)

Squadron Human Relations Problems: What They Are, and What They Mean to Squadron Operations (p. 35)

Some Preliminary Findings from the Study of Human Relations Problems of Squadrons (p. 36)

Human Factors Affecting the Air War Effort (p. 16)

A Survey Report on Military Management Problems in Aircraft Control and Warning Stations in the Air Defense Command (p. 28)

D. Study of Research Utilization

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Abstracts of Completed Reports

505-044-0002

Acceptance of the Aims of the Korean Campaign. Daniel L. Camp, Classified. (Pub.)

This report describes the attitudes toward the Korean campaign held by Air Force personnel in the war theatre and explores the reasons why the men felt as they did.

Attitudes of Regular and Reserve Officers Toward the Korean Campaign. John K. Folger. Classified. (Pub.)

This is a report on certain differences between regulars and reserves in the Air Force, particularly with respect to morale and attitudes related to performance.

Attitudes of FEAF Personnel Toward Natives. Abbott L. Ferriss. Classified. 1952 (Pub.)

This reports on the attitudes of Air Force personnel in Korea and native Koreans toward each other. Some of the variables considered were

(1) frequency of contact between the two groups
(2) location of base
(3) background factors of Air Force personnel

Attitudes Toward Presence of Air Force Dependents in the Far Eastern Theatre of Operations. Francis J. Di Vesta. Classified. 1952 (Pub.)

This is a study of the effects on both personnel and operations of having dependents in the theatre of operations. Conclusions are tentative, based on limited data, but shed some light on policy regarding the disposition of families while troops are overseas. Major findings are:

(1) Presence of dependents in theatre increased morale of men with their dependents with them, but decreased the morale of the married men who did not have their dependents with them.
(2) The policy of having wives in the theatre was favored least by single men, next by married men with wives elsewhere, and most by married men with wives with them.

(3) Job satisfaction was highest among airmen with wives at the base.
(4) Men with dependents in the theatre in general felt that the presence of these dependents

((a)) did not hamper their "personal well-being"
((b)) did not cause them to work less hard
((c)) did not cause them to worry

(5) Officers worried more about their dependents than did airmen.
(6) The over-all view seems to point to the wisdom of an "all or none" policy (i.e., the majority of married personnel would benefit if all wives are permitted in the theatre or none is permitted)

Human Factors Affecting the Air War Effort, A Brief Summary of a Study of FEAF Personnel at a Critical Period in the Korean War. Classified. 1952 (Pub.)

This is a report on the findings of the Air University Far East Research Group on its visit to Japan, Korea and Okinawa during December, 1950 and January, 1951. Some of the topics investigated were:

(1) Commitment to war aims
(2) Dependents in the war zone
(3) Job satisfaction
(4) Intra- and Inter-unit Cooperation
(5) Morale

505-039-0001

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. 1, Human Relations. Floyd L. Ruch. January, 1953. (Pub.)

This is a report on a series of incidents demonstrating effective and ineffective leadership by Air Force officers in the Far Eastern combat zone (Korean War). Incidents were grouped into

(1) Backing up subordinates or standing by superiors
(2) Attending to welfare of subordinates
(3) Showing consideration for feelings of others
(4) Showing impartiality
(5) Keeping promises

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. II, Communication. Floyd L. Ruch. Classified. February, 1953 (Pub.)

This is a report on a series of incidents demonstrating effective and ineffective leadership by Air Force Officers in the Korean War. Incidents were grouped into

(1) Giving information
(2) Seeking information
(3) Accepting suggestions or information from others
(4) Teaching men how to perform duties

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. III, Personal Conduct. Floyd L. Ruch. Classified. February, 1953 (Pub.)

This reports a series of incidents demonstrating effective and ineffective leadership by Air Force officers in the Korean War. Incidents were grouped into the following categories:

(1) Letting drink affect performance of duty
(2) Behaving in disorderly manner
(3) Violating military ethics
(4) Assuming undue authority
(5) Exhibiting courage or cowardice

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. IV, Organization and Planning. Floyd L. Ruch. June, 1953 (Pub.)

This is a report on a series of incidents demonstrating effective and ineffective leadership by Air Force officers in the Korean War. Incidents were grouped into the following categories:

(1) Organizing and coordinating activities
(2) Planning ahead
(3) Originating new methods and devices
(4) Adjusting to situation
(5) Making decisions

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. V, Administration and Supervision of Duties. Floyd L. Ruch. June 1953 (Pub.)

This reports on a series of incidents demonstrating effective and ineffective leadership by Air Force officers in the Korean War. Incidents were grouped into the following categories:

(1) Utilizing materiel and personnel
(2) Delegating authority
(3) Administering punishment or corrective action
(4) Employing verbal devices to effect harmony and motivation

Incidents of Leadership in Combat, Vol. VI, Execution of Duties. Floyd L. Ruch. June, 1953. (Pub.)

This is a report on a series of incidents demonstrating effective and ineffective leadership by Air Force officers in the Korean War. Incidents were grouped into the following categories:

(1) Demonstrating proficiency in flying assignments.
(2) Demonstrating proficiency in non-flying assignments.
(3) Volunteering for or neglecting duty.
(4) Performing duties with dispatch.
(5) Persevering on the job.
(6) Participating in activities of unit.
(7) Failing to observe established lines of authority.
(8) Disregarding orders given specific to an occasion, mission, or task.
(9) Disregarding established orders generally in force in unit.
(10) Standing by ethical and legal principles in carrying out duties.

Air Force Operational Records as Criterion Sources. Jean Maier. (MS)

The two major problems in using operational records are (a) their inaccuracy, and (b) their incompleteness. Among specific difficulties are (1) lack of agreement in records between different levels or echelons; (2) subjectivity in reporting such items as (a) reasons for aborts, (b) per cent of cloud cover, (c) severity of enemy resistance; and (3) inadequacy of historical records for personnel sampling purposes. Eight specific recommendations are made for improving the data-collection and data-handling jobs.

Situational Elements in Combat Leadership. Bruce Pringle (MS)

Air Force officers were asked in interviews to recall incidents of effective and ineffective leadership on the part of fellow officers in the combat theatre. Analysis of these incidents revealed certain situational elements which were related to effectiveness and type of leadership behavior, chief of which were:

(1) social characteristics of the leader
(2) kind and number of people involved in the incident
(3) emergency and morale conditions at the time

Criteria of Military Leadership: I. A Factor Analysis of Rating Scale Variables. Norman E. Willmorth and Wallace B. Lindelien. (MS)

The work reported here stemmed from the hypothesis that military leadership is a complex of behavior rather than one generalized way of behaving. Content analyses of the critical incidents collected in FEAF of good and poor leadership in combat produced 34 critical requirements. These requirements were factor analyzed, producting the following six measures

(1) Proficiency in leadership activities
(2) Military service
(3) Interpersonal Relations
(4) Responsiblèness
(5) Ethical officer conduct - Self-discipline
(6) Command presence

Avoiding Spuriousness in Biserial Correlations Used as Coefficients of Internal Consistency. J. W. Holley and E. W. Taylor. (MS)

This is a report on methods for eliminating the spurious effect in an item test correlation caused by leaving the item in the total test score. The two methods suggested, each involving less labor than that of re-scoring the test to omit the given item, are:

(1) A simple device involving the relationships between total score distribution of those who "pass" an item and those who "fail" it.
(2) Adjusted biserial and point-biserial formulas which require only those preliminary values ordinarily obtained for the computation of item-test biserial correlation.

A Systematic Procedure for Categorizing Descriptive Material. Bruce Pringle. (MS)

The methodological technique for classifying descriptive data reported in this paper differs from traditional content analysis in two ways:

(1) The categories used are derived directly from the materials themselves instead of being set up on an a priority basis.
(2) The judgments of several individuals are used in order to increase the objectivity of decisions, in contrast to the one or two persons ordinarily used in content analysis.

The Establishment of Critical Requirements for Air Force Combat Leadership Through the Use of the Critical Incident Technique. Robert Reveal, Jr. (MS)

The aim of the study was to describe Air Force combat leadership in terms of behavior associated with effective and ineffective leadership performance on the part of officer personnel. This report should

(1) provide valuable hypotheses for developing selection devices.
(2) furnish items useful in evaluating combat leadership performance.
(3) provide valuable material for the training of future combat leaders.

Analysis of FEAF Critical Incidents with Emphasis on Situational Variables. Bruch Pringle. (MS)

This reports on an analysis of the critical incidents of combat leadership collected from officers in FEAF to determine whether certain situational and personal elements in the incidents were associated with effectiveness and type of leadership.

Significant differences in frequency between effective and ineffective incidents were associated with thirteen variables, and significant differences in type of behavior were found to be associated with nineteen variables.

The study uncovered certain variables that need to be considered in the selection of Air Force officers and the evaluation of their leadership performance. The results also suggest areas and factors that might be emphasized in the training of future Air Force leaders.

Incidents of Organizational Confusion in Combat. Floyd L. Ruch. (MS)

This is a list of 189 incidents of confusion in combat reported by officers on active duty in FEAF in October, 1951. These incidents are grouped into the following categories:

(1) Inadequate organization and coordination
(2) Poor planning
(3) Faulty communication
(4) Inappropriate personnel policies
(5) Insufficient or incorrect supplies and equipment
(6) Wrong number of personnel
(7) Inexperienced or unqualified personnel
(8) Inadequate training

Bibliography on Military Leadership, Annotations of Selected Studies from Scientific, Technical and Related Publications. Floyd L. Ruch. (MS)

This is an annotated bibliography resulting from an extensive review of the literature in areas related to combat leadership in the Air Force.

505-036-0001

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. I, Summary of Findings: An Interim Report of the First Year's Work. Delbert C. Miller. Classified. October, 1952. (Pub.) Reports outlined in this report are:

(1) Major Personnel Problems.
(2) Morale and Personnel Problem Scales and Relationships.
(3) Effective Military Performance with Aircraft Control and Warning Stations.
(4) Personal History (of Air Force Personnel)
(5) Job Adjustment.
(6) Group Integration.
(7) Leadership.
(8) Organization and Communication.
(9) Family and Community.
(10) Description of Over-All Problem of Project.
(11) Research Design of Project.
(12) Description of the Research Population.
(13) Suggestions for Improvement of AC&W Stations.

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. II, Personnel Problems. Delbert C. Miller. Classified. December, 1952. (Pub.)

The major personnel problems facing an ADC Division in May and June of 1952 were

(1) Leisure time spending.
(2) Career
(3) Living conditions off site.
(4) Work activity.

Isolation of base site was found to be related to frequency of certain types of problems, such as:

(1) Transportation, recreation (both on and off the site) and living conditions off the site. All these pose more serious problems in isolated areas than at non-isolated sites.
(2) Promotion. Promotion is held to be a more serious problem at non-isolated sites than at isolated ones.

Problems whose intensity did not vary with degree of site isolation were:

(1) Air Force's interference with civilian career
(2) Job classification
(3) Job dissatisfaction
(4) Job assignment
(5) Extra duties
(6) G. I. regulations

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. III, Needs of Site Personnel. Delbert C. Miller. Classified. December, 1952 (Pub.)

This is a follow-up to the report on "Personnel Problems" (immediately above) and sets forth recommendations for improving ADC sites. Chief suggestions are these:

(1) Increase the opportunities for creative and divertive activities while minimizing the opportunity for disintegrative activities.
(2) With the accomplishment of this in mind as a goal, attention needs to be paid to the type of community an AC&W site should be to provide maximum performance. The five types discussed were:

((a)) limited purpose organization
((b)) symbiotic community
((c)) marginal community
((d)) small isolated community
((e)) regimented community

(3) Select only those personnel for assignment to AC&W sites who can adjust satisfactorily to the characteristic "deprivations"

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. IV, Development of Efficiency Criteria of Air Surveillance Crews. Charles D. McGlamery. Classified. December, 1952. (Pub.)

The time required for the complete operation of the communication net from scope operator to recorder was made and used as a measure of crews efficiency. The rationale in support of this holds that speed in communicating essential information is one element of crew efficiency which is related to the degree of cooperation among members of the crew. Holding constant traffic loads and other condition variables, crews are compared on efficiency by this time factor, which is recognized, of course, as being only one of many criteria needed for evaluating crew performance.

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. V, A Study of Small Group Integration. Edward Gross, Herman J. Loether and L. Wes Wagner. (MS) The study was designed to answer such questions as:

(1) What are the characteristics of groups with high integration?
(2) What are the characteristics of groups with low integration?
(3) How do these two types of groups differ?

It should shed light on

(1) factors making for conflict and cooperation and how these factors operate
(2) informal organization in structures of all kinds
(3) the dynamics of social change

It should assist the Air Force

(1) in dealing with the problem of lack of pride in organization, especially the seemingly serious ones at AC&W sites
(2) by helping commanders understand and deal with intra-group and intra-work section conflicts, and, in turn,
(3) by helping commanders build their work groups into coherent, cooperative units.

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. VI, Organization and Communication. Orvis Collins, Alvin S. Lackey and David S. Bushnell. (MS)

This project is an exploration of the relationships between administrative action and morale and motivation. The level of morale and motivation is regarded as being related to the manner in which administrative actions are carried out. The assumption is made that every administrative action may be viewed both in terms of the immediate objective toward which it is directed and in terms of its total impact upon the effectiveness and efficiency of the organization. Specific findings to date are:

(1) Conformity to Air Force values in the areas of Customs of the Service and Rights and Privileges is positively correlated with rank.
(2) There is a certain optimum time period between promotions within which satisfaction with the promotion system is at its peak. That is, the waiting time of a man's next-to-last promotion seems to have a distinct significance: attitudes toward the promotion system grow more unfavorable as total time since the next-to-last promotion is increased.

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. VII, Leadership. F. James Davis. (MS)

The general thesis of this project is that leader-follower interaction is influenced by the expectations each brings to leader-follower situations. The researchers seek to answer the question: Do persons in officially designated leader roles agree with their followers as to how the leader should act? Next they related the degree of this agreement between leader and follower to follower adjustment, and the actual behavior of leaders to their own role-conceptions.

Human Relations at AC&W Sites, Vol. VIII, Family Adjustment to Military Life. Shirley Willis. January, 1953. (MS)

The primary objective of this study was to describe military family life with respect to three specific problems:

(1) marital adjustment.
(2) the relation of marital adjustment to morale.
(3) marital adjustment and personal adjustment.

Early analysis of the data collected indicated that the effects of Air Force life on ten areas of family living in which problems frequently arise ranged from "good" to "bad". The needs most frequently mentioned were:

(1) adequate housing facilities.
(2) medical treatment for their families.
(3) commissary.
(4) stability of assignment.

Development of an Index of Work Group Efficiency. Charles D. McGlamery. (MS)

Speed and accuracy of communication in the process of radar detection of aircraft at AC&W sites were selected as factors or criteria to be measured in the development of a work group efficiency index. Speed of communication was determined by measuring with a stop watch the time required for information to travel through two of the three communication circuits involved in the radar detection process (one of the circuits was omitted because of its simplicity: It included only two positions in the communication chain). Accuracy was measured by comparing the number of aircraft movement calls made by radar operators during a specified time interval with the number of those calls which were recorded in the log.

Rate of Promotion Functioning of An Administrative Arm of AC&W. Orvis Collins. (MS)

The problem here is to evaluate the functioning of the promotion system in AC&W in terms of its fulfillment of the following generally accepted characteristics of an adequate promotion system:

(1) Sufficient differentiation among individuals so that members of the organization will believe that a process of selection is taking place.
(2) Assurance that men are selected for promotion on the basis of their contribution to the mission of the organization.
(3) Elimination of possibilities of bias in promotions due to individual sponsorship, social prejudice, or to "accidents" in the functioning of the organization.

Measuring Followers' Perception of Leaders' Human Relations-Mindedness in a Military Organization. Nahum Z. Medalia. (MS)

This paper reports on the development of an instrument for measuring one's perception of his leader's human relations-mindedness, and discusses some test results which bear on its validity and reliability. Two interrelated emphases of the human relations approach to leadership are: (1) to obtain spontaneous (i.e., uncoerced) cooperation from followers, and (2) to achieve adequate communication with followers.

Conceptions of Official Leader Roles in the Air Force. F. James Davis. (MS)

This study follows the assumption that interaction between officially designated leaders and their followers is influenced by situational factors, one of the most important of which is role-conception and, particularly, the extent of agreement between the occupant of a role and his subordinates regarding how the role should be played. The basic question is: Do persons in official leader roles agree with their followers as to how the leader should perform his duties, and is the degree of agreement associated with follower adjustment? Results indicate some agreement between follower adjustment and consistency of definition between leader and follower regarding the leader's role.

Career Choice and Job Satisfaction: A Study of the Military Man. David S. Bushnell. (MS)

Six demographic variables, ten additudinal questions concerning general Air Force experiences, and six items about one's job were related to career intent of 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Class Airmen, as a preliminary to designing a more rigorous study of the factors associated with, and perhaps causing, one's plans to remain in or leave the Service.

This exploratory study indicated that, insofar as demographic factors were concerned, the recruit most likely to make the Air Force his career would

(1) have entered the service at an early age.
(2) have less than twelve years of formal education.
(3) be now between 20 and 25 years of age.
(4) be married rather than single.
(5) have had an original intent to make the Air Force a career.
(6) have a positive feeling toward his daily activities.

JADF Survey (A Report on the Findings of a Research Team Survey of Human Relations at Japan Air Defense Force Sites in the Summer of 1952). Edward Gross and Orvis F. Collins. (MS)

This report describes an AC&W contingent stationed in Japan on a variety of items, some of the more interesting ones being:

(1) social backgrounds and experience
(2) attitudes toward "deprivation" variables
(3) attitudes toward air site variables
(4) attitudes toward the Japanese and their relations with the Japanese.

Anthropological Survey of Neah Bay, Washington, November, 1951. Richard D. Daugherty. (MS)

This is a report of the results of a three-day investigation into the attitudes and grievances of the Indians at Neah Bay, Washington, toward the Air Force Personnel stationed on their reservation at that time (November, 1951). Primary findings are:

(1) Possession of liquor on the reservation by Air Force personnel, when it was prohibited for the Indians, is perhaps the greatest single source of friction between Indians and military people.
(2) The Indians felt that U.S. Government payments for land leased to the Air Force were too low.

(3) The Indians were upset by soldiers' carrying firearms on the reservation and firing them "for kicks".
(4) A recreation program is badly needed for both Indians and Air Force personnel.
(5) Air Force personnel shifts at this site should be staggered: changes in the past on an entire-group basis have resulted in tensions and "incidents" related to adjustment of incoming new personnel.

Attitudes of Men at AC&W Sites in Japan. Edward Gross and Orvis F. Collins. (MS)

This is a report on a survey of attitudes towards various aspects of living expressed by a sample of Air Force personnel stationed at six AC&W bases in Japan in the Fall of 1952.

Favorableness of attitudes toward the Air Force was related to such factors as:

(1) rank (the higher the rank, the more favorable the attitude).
(2) career plans (choosing the Air Force as a career is positively associated with favorable attitudes).
(3) length of time overseas (those who had just arrived or had been overseas a long time were most negative).
(4) rural-urban origin (men with rural backgrounds were more favorable).
(5) marital status (married men were more favorable).
(6) isolation of site (the more isolated the site, the more favorable).
(7) size of site (the larger the site, the less favorable).
(8) age of site (the older the site, the less favorable the attitude toward the site).
(9) change of CO at site (the more often changed, the more favorable the attitude toward the site).
(10) extremes in weather (the more extreme the weather the more favorable the attitude toward the site).

Favorableness of attitudes toward the Japanese people was found to be related to:

(1) rank (the higher the rank, the more favorable).
(2) career plans (those planning a career in the Air Force had more favorable attitudes toward Japanese).
(3) length of time overseas (the longer overseas, the less favorable the attitude toward Japanese).

A Method for the Analysis of Small Samples. Edward Gross, Herman J. Loether and Duane N. Strinden. (MS)

This is a description of the way the binomial expansion can be used to determine the chance distribution of groups of different size and composition. This is important when one must deal with small samples and decide whether or not the distribution he finds empirically is significantly different from that which could appear by chance.

Some Functional Consequences of Primary Controls in Formal Work Organization. Edward Gross. (MS)

This study advances the theme that primary (i.e., informal) controls may have a constructive and even necessary place within formal organizations and that they make their appearance, in fact, when formal controls prove inadequate.

It is pointed out that formal control manifests itself in three ways, and discussion revolves around how each of these three instituted controls may break down or prove inadequate, and how, in each case, primary controls then make their appearance. Examples are drawn from a manufacturing plant and an air site in the Air Defense Command.

A Survey Report on Military Management Problems in Aircraft Control and Warning Stations in the Air Defense Command. F. James Davis, Edward Gross and Delbert C. Miller. (MS)

This is the report of a survey, lasting six weeks and employing interviews and observation, made at seven AC&W Sites in the 25th Air Division of the Air Defense Command between July 23, 1951 and September 1, 1951.

The major operating problems are defined by the site personnel are (1) recreation; (2) job dissatisfaction; (3) transportation off site; and (4) job malclassification.

The most frequent needs are defined by site personnel are (1) recreation; (2) better leaders; and (3) career needs.

On the bases of research areas uncovered, the major sectors of research in the areas of military management problems are: (1) career and job requirements; (2) organization and communication; (3) leadership; and (4) morale and motivation.

The Shaping of Research Design in Large Scale Group Research. Delbert C. Miller. (MS)

This paper examines some of the problems and opportunities in the shaping of research design posed by a large scale group research project. The four major factors which were discussed are: (a) the characteristic imperatives of group research, which include the restrictions of interdependent research relationships and the demands of a strict time schedule; (b) the personal wants of researchers, their motivations and the role of the research director; (c) the demands of education; and (d) the accumulation of research and theoretical knowledge.

505-044-0004

Behavior Standards of USAFE Personnel. Nathan Maccoby. Classified. August, 1952. (MS)

This report describes and attempts to analyze and explain the behavior of USAF personnel in England, France and Germany, in three areas--blackmarketing, drinking, and sex.

Behavior Standards of USAFE Personnel (Summary). Nathan Maccoby. Classified. September, 1952. (MS)

This is a summary of the August, 1952, report bearing the same title (see report immediately above). Suggestions are made for needed further research in this area, the two chief ones being:

(1) Study of differences in behavior standards of USAF personnel in the ZI and abroad, to discover why these changes occur when personnel are sent overseas and how they can be controlled.
(2) Study of the roles of certain staff officers--Chaplain, Surgeon, Air Judge Advocate, Inspector General -- in controlling these behavior changes.

Attitudes and Adjustment Problems of a Sample of Newly-Commissioned AFROTC Officers Assigned to Maxwell Air Force Base, Summer 1951. Fred R. Crawford. Classified. (MS)

Career and non-career oriented officers differ basically in many significant attitudes and opinions:

(1) The career officer accepts the Air Force culture; the acceptance by the non-career man is only nominal.
(2) The career man places great value on the Air Force and the opportunities it offers; the non-career officer feels that his opportunity lies in civilian life.
(3) The career officer is generally satisfied with his job; the non-career person is not.
(4) The career man is interested in flying; the non-career officer is not.
(5) The career officer is not bothered by possible overseas assignments; the non-career man dislikes overseas assignments and the possibility of combat.

(6) The career man feels that he has much to offer the Air Force; the non-career officer feels that his abilities are not being properly utilized.

505-037-0001

The U.S. Air Force in England. Richard L. Simpson and N. J. Demerath. Classified. (MS)

This is an analysis of stress in USAF-RAF relations at air bases in England in terms of:

(1) clashing personalities of USAF and RAF commanders.
(2) faulty communication.
(3) inadequate administrative preparation of both organizations for SAC TDY missions.
(4) lack of intercultural understanding.
(5) relatively unrestrained behavior of USAF personnel.
(6) economic status differences between the two groups.

Some Experiences with the Group Interview. James D. Thompson and N J. Demerath. (MS)

This paper reports experiences of the authors and other social science researchers in interviewing people in groups rather than individually. Among the advantages the group interview appears to offer are:

(1) It makes for economy of time and manpower.
(2) It tends to produce more precise answers.
(3) It helps uncover hidden assumptions on which statements are based.

Among its disadvantages are:

(1) Its inability to tap private attitudes of group members towards each (i.e., the referent must be external to the group).
(2) Difficulty of scheduling and holding it together long enough for an adequate data collection job to be done.

Friendship Cliques in U.S. Air Force Wings. Richard L. Simpson. (MS)

This is a study of how friendship cliques form and the part they play in organizational performance. On the positive side, friendship cliques make for

(1) satisfaction with the Air Force through the feeling of belonging to an important organization.
(2) desire for esteem, which amounts to one's placing a high value on performing his job well.
(3) efficiency through informal work routines.
(4) essential informal communication.

On the negative side, cliques can result in

(1) favoritism
(2) disturbing rumors
(3) impairment of upward communication
(4) resultant lower morale

Social Stratification of a U.S. Air Force Base. Ramond W. Mack. (MS)

This is a description of the stratification system on a U. S. Air Force base and how it is functionally related, through morale and integration, to performance. Specifically, the analysis has three parts:

(1) Description of the hierarchy of positions in terms of four elements of the stratification system: authority; influence; prestige; esteem.
(2) Discussion of areas of stress within and between these four elements.
(3) Reduction of these stresses and integration of functions through ((a)) the balance of these elements with each other, and ((b)) such adjustment mechanisms as social mobility.

The Family Life of Officers and Airmen in a Bomb Wing, Ruth Lindquist. October, 1952. (MS)

This is a study of the interrelatedness of the work situation, family life, and community facilities of personnel in a bomb wing in the Strategic Air Command. Some of the more important factors studied were:

(1) In the work situation: the status system command patterns
TDY policies promotion policies
(2) In family life: intra - and inter-family relationships family values
child-bearing attitudes and practices child-rearing attitudes and practices financial planning, spending, saving

(3) In air base and host community facilities: recreation
housing transportation consumer buying

Status Classes, Morale, and Performance in the USAF. James D. Thompson and Richard L. Simpson. October, 1952. (MS)

This is a description of how allocation of personnel, rewards and authority make for status class distinctions--regular-reservist; military-civilian; top three graders-lower enlisted men; flying personnel-ground personnel; old-young; married-single; officer-airman-and how resulting cleavages deleteriously affect morale and performance.

The First Sergeant in the USAF. Kenneth Karcher, Jr. Classified. October, 1952. (MS)

The job of the first sergeant is defined by three personnel components: the sergeant himself and his peers; his superiors; and his subordinates; and analyzed to determine the extent of potential role conflict in the position. The relationship of position adequacy is studied, defined in terms of the extent of agreement or contradiction between the demands or expectations of one's superiors and subordinates, to one's perception of the role requirements of his job. Some of the more suggestive findings were:

(1) Officers tended to favor less authority for the first sergeant than did others.
(2) There was considerable disagreement among the first sergeant's peers, superiors, and subordinates regarding the relationship of the first sergeant to the adjutant.
(3) First sergeants displayed greater concern for the personal needs of the airmen than other expected.
(4) Role conflict in a position such as that of the first sergeant actually is related to the structure of the organization.
(5) Evidence was found that perception of role requirements must be thought of in terms of specific role areas and not in terms of a general ability to perceive any and all requirements of a position.

Host Community and Air Force Base. Floyd Hunter. November, 1952. (MS)

This is a study of the power structure of a community in which is located an Air Force base. It points up how an understanding of community power structure is helpful in appraising the mutual impact of a base and its host community. The techniques for studying community power structure are set forth and constitute the principle methodological contribution of the project.

The Organization of Executive Action: Authority, Power and Wing Integration. James D. Thompson. (MS)

Differences in the power structures of two wings in the Strategic Air Command were found to be due primarily to personal attributes of the executives. The wings were alike in deviations from the authority structure: the directors dominated the wing commanders, which contradicted the formal authority structure. Traditionally the power nucleus has been composed of generalists; with these two wings, however, it was composed of specialists (staff) -- except for the wing commanders.

Implications of the fact that the bomb wing is not a self-contained system were examined, with the following conclusion: wing headquarters is no more than a "message center", from which higher headquarters can obtain only partial reports for evaluation. Consequently, every report, regardless of kind, is an abstraction from reality.

Some Latent Functions of an Executive Control Device: A Sociological Analysis of a Social System Under Stress. Kenneth Wagner. (MS)

The problem tackled here was to observe and analyze the unanticipated consequences of a rating device (the SAC Unit Performance Rating System for Bomb Wings) which was intended by higher headquarters to be used principally as an instrument for evaluating training but which actually served mainly as an incentive device.

The major finding is as follows: A performance rating instrument had been introduced in the bomb squadrons studied in a manner that subjected the operations officers extreme pressure. To protect their positions these operations officers had to resort to means which deviated from accepted norms. This deviation, in turn, produced norms, value and role conflicts for various individuals, which affected adversely the morale, performance, and integration of the squadrons.

Prestige Structure of an Air Base: Squadron Rankings and Morale. Raymond W. Mack. (MS)

When airmen ranked squadrons according to prestige, the highest ranking squadrons were operations squadrons, next came command squadrons, then support squadrons, and last, service squadrons--which proved to be the order hypothesized in terms of distance from the primary mission of the base, the actual dropping of bombs.

No relationship was demonstrated between the prestige of a squadron and the morale of the men in it, but a statistically significant association was found between morale and several personal background characteristics: enlisted grade, length of time in Air Force, membership in the regular Air Force, and intention to reenlist.

Initiating and Maintaining Research Relations in a Military Organization. N. J. Demerath. (MS)

This paper describes the experiences and problems encountered by a team of research personnel from a university doing research for the Human Resources Research Institute. Topic discussed are:

(1) Establishing the social position of the research.
(2) Explaining research objectives and methods.
(3) Obtaining necessary support services.
(4) Definition of roles of researchers.
(5) Executing the research tasks.
(6) Building good will for social research.

Off-Duty Activities and the USAF Mission: A Survey of Ten USAF Bases and Their Host Community Settings. Raymond F. Gould and Ernest A. T. Barth. (MS)

The aim of this project was to learn the relationship of airmen's off-duty activities to their morale, to certain other attitudes on various conditions on and off base, and to the quality of their work performance. Some typical findings are:

(1) Top leaders usually showed high motivation and skill, dedication to the mission of the base and of the Air Force.
(2) Many of the rank and file, particularly reserve officers, seemed to be preoccupied with trying to get out of the Air Force and to evade responsibility whenever possible.
(3) Some sections on some bases were overmanned to the point where many individuals felt that they did not have enough work to do.

A Manual for the Survey of Off-Duty Activities and Off-Duty Needs of Airmen. Raymond F. Gould. (MS)

This manual sets forth a method for collecting and analyzing data on such a problem as: What are the relationships between the background and personality of U. S. Air Force airmen and their off-duty needs and activities?

It contains a procedure for drawing an appropriate sample, for constructing a questionnaire and administering it, and instructions for analyzing the data the questionnaire collects.

Obviously this is an instrument product of the project reported immediately above.

Air Force Base Participation Project: Report on Turner Air Force Base. Raymond F. Gould. (MS)

This is a case study of one of the bases of the strategic Air Command characterized by substantially better than average relations between the base and the community in which it is located. Morale, reenlistment intention, and various types of performance are examined against this configuration of favorable base-community factors. Certain comparisons are made between this base and nine others surveyed almost simultaneously with it.

505-036-0002

Squadron Human Relations Problems: What They Are and What They Mean to Squadron Operations (With Illustrative Case Materials). George W. Baker. (MS)

One hundred two officers in the Squadron Officers Course at Maxwell Air Force Base were interviewed in one-hour sessions to learn their experiences with human relations problems interfering with squadron efficiency. The problems described by these officers fell into seven broad categories:

(1) chain of command
(2) organizational
(3) civilian community environment
(4) manpower
(5) physical facilities
(6) personnel policy
(7) multiple factors

Some of the findings are:

(1) These problems usually affect not just a few of the personnel but all of them, with resultant lowering of squadron morale.
(2) Almost 70% of the officers felt that ineffective or poor leadership was responsible for the human relations problems.
(3) More than half of the problems were related to personality conflicts.
(4) More than half of the problems stem from a failure at a higher echelon level.
(5) Relatively few problems arose out of interaction taking place in mixed racial, nationality, or military-civilian work groups.
(6) In one-fourth of the problem cases, the squadron officials did nothing about them.

Some Preliminary Findings from the Study of Human Relations Problems of Squadrons. George W. Baker. (MS)

This is a report on further developments in the Squadron Human Relations Problems project described above. From the early interviews, 40 different human relations problems were identified. These problems were incorporated in a questionnaire which was given to 999 students attending the Squadron Officer Course at Maxwell Air Force Base during the winter and spring of 1952. 865 useable questionnaires were analyzed, giving the following findings:

(1) All 48 items were regarded as "a very important problem" and only two (numbers 14 and 36) failed to be rated by at least some of the officers as "the most important problem".
(2) "Insecurity created by frequent assignment changes" and "promotional policy of the USAF" were adjudged "the most important problem" more often than any others.
(3) "Conflicts between personnel of the USAF and foreign military personnel within a unit" was one of the two items getting the fewest votes as a "very important problem"

Subsequent analysis of these data will locate these problems by:

(1) type of squadron.
(2) squadron duty assignment.
(3) command.
(4) location of squadron (i.e., in ZI or overseas)

505-036-0003

Internal Orientation in a Large Military Organization. Theodore Caplow, Leo G. Reeder and George A. Donohue. (MS)

This is a short paper describing research on the relationship of orientation to performance in Air Force units. By orientation of an individual is meant his knowledge of the formal structure of the unit he is working in, and his ability to respond within this structure. Operationally defined, orientation is the identification of message sources and destinations. When individual orientation scores for unit members are averaged to get a unit orientation score, it is found that units with high orientation are in general those units which are high also in performance as measured by ratings of staff officer.

Internal Orientation of Squadrons in an Air Division of the Air Defense Command. G. A. Donohue, Leo G. Reeder, and Theodore Caplow.

Internal orientation is defined as the understanding or knowledge of the structure and function of the organization to which an individual belongs. This project is designed to do three principal things:

(1) To measure the importance, for efficiency and morale, of having the members of a unit understand the structure and function of their unit, and to know who is who among their superiors, peers and subordinates.
(2) To identify the crucial points of stress in a unit, especially as they hamper effective communication.
(3) To conduct experiments on changing the acquaintance of members of work units with the job of their units and the people in them, to see what changes take place in their individual performance, in unit performance, and in morale.

Personnel Turnover in Relation to Orientation and Morale in a Division of the Air Defense Command. Leo G. Reeder and Theodore Caplow. (MS)

For the Division as a whole, personnel turnover rate the lower the orientation score) and with morale. However, in AC&W units alone, there was no association between turnover rates and orientation scores.

505-036-0004

General Factors Influencing the Effectiveness of the Staff Process: A Survey of the Opinions of Experienced Staff Officers. Morton L. Deutsch and Harold Gerard. (MS)
This project presents problems which occur in normal staff functioning and provides commanding officers with a kind of informal check list for determining for themselves how effectively they are using their staffs. The findings here should prove to be of substantial help also to those persons who teach the staff process.

Each member of a substantial sample of Air Force officers was asked to describe and evaluate his staff experiences. The factors which these officers felt made for effective staff functioning were:

(1) Competence in staff officers - measured in terms of ability, motivation, and social maturity.
(2) Proper attitudes by the commanding officer toward ((a)) giving his staff officers a sense of personal security.
  ((b)) giving his staff officers a sense of personal worth.
  ((c)) using his staff as a policy formulating group.
(3) Coordination of staff activities through appropriate procedures, both formal and informal.
(4) Clear definition of individual responsibilities.
(5) Skillful handling by commanding officers of disagreements.

The most serious problems in staff functioning were found to be

(1) Lack of clarity of the mission.
(2) Coordination and communication difficulties.
(3) Over-coordination in some types of situations.
(4) Under-coordination in some types of situations.

Case Studies of Two Air Force Staffs. Harold Gerard (MS)

The case studies reported here were undertaken as part of the initial phase of a study of the staff decision process, and represent the next step in the project reported on immediately above, "General Factors Influencing the Effectiveness of the Staff Process." The staffs chosen were those of an air base wing and the air base group immediately under the wing. Items focused on were:

(1) Staff effectiveness.
(2) Command-staff relations.
(3) Key personnel.
(4) Communication and coordination.
(5) Morale.

Fourteen major suggestions were made for future research in this area.

Some of the Assumptions Underlying Administrative Theory -- A Bibliographical Survey. Robert Ellenbogen, Philip Lichtenberg and Morton L. Deutsch. (MS)

This report attempts to make explicit some of the assumptions underlying the writings of administrative theorists. There are five sections:

(1) Rationale for organized rather than individual effort.
(2) Factors related to specialization and organization structure, especially aspects of work division and of vertical organization.
(3) Unity of organizations, emphasizing coordination and communication problems in the initiation and maintenance of unity.
(4) Unity of motivation, considering characteristics and problems associated with the initiation and maintenance of this type of unity.
(5) Congruence between the objectives of organizations and the motives of the individuals composing the organization (including efficiency measures, concern with efficiency, and informal organizations).

The Effects of Status Differentials Upon Cooperation. Morton L. Deutsch. (MS)

Commanders differ in both the manner and the extent to which they utilize the services of subordinate staff members in the formulation of policy and plans, and the execution of the staff process. This project focuses on the basic question: Is the effectiveness of staff functioning related to those differences in utilization of staff services? If so, since these differences in commanders' handling of staff subordinates are fairly common and often large, as well as modifiable, what can be done in this particular area of behavior in the cause of greater cooperative spirit and performance on the part of junior people?

Experimental Investigation of the Effect of Group Properties Upon Individual and Group Recall. Morton L. Deutsch. (MS) The two hypotheses investigated were:

(1) The type of group leadership - content control or process-procedure control - has an effect upon individual and group recall.
(2) Group recall is significantly greater when the group members cooperate than when they compete with one another.

Consequently, four different group situations were examined:

(a) leader-centered, cooperative groups
(b) leader-centered, competitive groups
(c) group-centered, cooperative groups
(d) group-centered, competitive groups

The utility of this research for the Air Force seems to lie chiefly in two areas:

(1) Differences in net recall, both individual and group of having, on the one hand, a group leader who controls conference content, and, on the other, a group leader who controls only conference process or procedure.
(2) Recognition of the effect on staff procedures of leaders or staff members who are oriented toward personal goals.

The Effects of Different Probabilities of Success Upon the Group Problem-Solving Process Under Varying Conditions. Morton L. Deutsch. (MS)

This is a study of two types of groups, those with high probability of success at a given task and those with low probability of success at the task, and how this variable of probability of success is related to level of productivity and cohesiveness of these groups.

505-036-0010

Experiments Dealing With Group Conditions Making for Conformity: An Analysis of Group Decision and Attitude Change. Edith Becker Bennett (from her doctoral dissertation). (MS)

This project tested the relative effectiveness of group discussion and lectures in influencing the opinions and attitudes of individuals in groups and failed to confirm an earlier claim that group discussion was superior. The two variables found to be significantly related to social action were:

(1) the individual's perception that there was high group agreement on the issue.
(2) the individual's commitment, either private or public, to take action.

Experiments Dealing with Group Conditions Making for Conformity: The Nature of Group Norms and Attitude Change. Edith Becker Bennett (from her doctoral dissertation). (MS)

This experiment was designed to emplore differences in effects of presenting norms to a group (a) with a rationale for the norms being what they are: and (b) without any explanation or rationale being given. The conclusion reached was that the effect of majority opinion (group norm presentation) is greater when the majority opinion is presented with the rationale behind it than when it is presented merely as the norm of the group.

Experiments Dealing with Group Conditions Making for Conformity: Perception of Group Consensus and Tolerance for Own Non-Conformity. Martha Sturm White (from her doctoral dissertation). (MS)

This is a study of the relationships among an individual's tolerance for non-conformity, his perception of group consensus, and his attitudes. A major conclusion is that individuals who perceive their views as identical or almost identical with the group norm tend to change more under the influence of majority opinion than do people who see themselves as more distant from the group norm.

Experiments Dealing with Group Conditions Making for Conformity: The Nature of Conformity. Martha Sturm White (from her doctoral dissertation). (MS)

This is a study of differential change in the direction of an announced norm under four different conditions, ranging from a discussion of the occupational goals of people and the methods by which they expected to achieve them, all the way down to no experimental influence. The conclusion reached was that one's attitudes can be predicted from a knowledge of that individual's hierarchy of values and his perceptions of the way in which the object of the attitude aids or hinders the achievement of these values.

Attitudes as the Perceived Means for Attaining Individual Goals: Predicting Attitude Position as a Function of Value. Milton J. Rosenberg (from his doctoral dissertation). (MS)

The major hypothesis tested was that the favorableness of one's attitude toward an object or phenomenon depends upon the combined effects of (1) the perceived importance of the attitude-related object as a source of satisfaction for the individual, and (2) the individual's judgment about the degree to which the attitude object is a factor in blocking or facilitating the attainment of a given value.

The conclusion was that the attitudes can be changed by changing the perception people have of the degree to which the attitude-object aids or hinders the attainment of their values.

Personality Determinants and Ego Defensiveness in Relation to Attitude Change: Rational Persuasion Compared with Authoritarian Suggestion. Walter Hobson Crockett (from his doctoral dissertation). (MS)

This was an experiment to test the proposition that different personality types respond differentially to various kinds of change procedure: non-authoritarian people are more affected by rational persuasion than are authoritarian people, whereas the authoritarian personality is more responsive to suggestion from power figures than is the non-authoritarian person.

The conclusion reached was that attempts to influence people need to take into account their basic way of responding to the social world, and that people who are more influenced by authoritarian suggestion show a characteristic pattern of rigidity, stereotyped thinking, and status orientation.

Personality Determinants and Ego Defensiveness in Relation to Attitude Change: Rational Persuasion Compared with Self-Insight. Walter Hobson Crockett (from his doctoral dissertation). (MS)

As the title partially indicates, this project is a test of the relative effectiveness of rational persuasion (i.e., a method of giving the individual an opportunity to restructure his beliefs in relation to factual and logical materials) and direct interpretation (i.e., a combination of logic and suggestion; patients are confronted with psychological explanations of their behavior) in effecting attitude change.

Typical hypotheses to be tested (in abbreviated form) are:

(1) The rational persuasion approach is more effective in changing attitudes, say toward the Negro, the less the individual shows a pattern of repression and projection.
(2) The direct interpretation approach for giving insight
  (a) is more effective with people showing low or moderate patterns for repression-projection compared with those showing either high or negligible patterns;
  (b) will produce more negative change among the highly defensive group than among the low defensive group;
  (c) will induce positive changes which will be more stable over time than those produced by the rational approach.

A Method for Determining Dispersion Scores in Attitude Measurement. Stewart E. Fliege. (MS)

In this report, the author points up some weaknesses of usual attitude measurement, raises some questions about the Guttman scaling technique, and compares the Likert and Thurstone scaling methods.

"Crystallization" is defined as the degree to which an attitude area is integrated into a functional unity within the individual and its consistency in application. Crystallization hypotheses explored were:

(1) The amount of spread around the mean scale position will indicate the degree of crystallization of the attitude.
(2) For a highly crystallized attitude, ((a)) the person will act in a relatively shorter time in an area where action is based on having this attitude, and ((b)) the person will be more resistant to having his attitude changed.

An Index of Crystallization. Stewart E. Fliege. (MS)

A scale, focussing on the structure of attitudes, was constructed to control content over the basic positions in a scale of religious attitudes. The five basic positions were: deistic, pantheistic, naturalistic, agnostic, and atheistic; the content areas used were: beliefs: about the nature of man, the place of prayer, the ultimate power of the universe, after-life, miracles, and the place of religious discussion. This research assisted in arriving at the following conclusions:

(1) Highly consistent belief structures are better predictors of practices and behavior than are less consistent belief patterns.

(2) The more elaborate the belief structure and the more intense the feeling accompanying it, the more difficult the attitude is to change.

505-036-0011

Attitudes and Judgments of Some Lieutenants Related to Present Active Duty Intentions. George W. Baker. (MS)

The study was designed to learn why a large percentage of the ARDC officers who came on active duty in 1951 as AFROTC lieutenants are not requesting an additional tour of duty after the expiration of their required minimum tour. It was found that officers who intend to remain in the Air Force can be distinguished from those who do not intend to extend in several attitudes and judgments:

(1) The majority of the officers never intended either to make a career of the Air Force or remain on active duty longer than the required minimum tour.
(2) Officers in general were satisfied with their assignment but criticized the administration in the Command on the following counts:

((a)) lack of research stimulation.
((b)) lack of opportunities for professional development.
((c)) low quality of its civil service personnel.
((d)) interference from civil service regulations.

(3) Wives and girl friends were more potent influences on officers' intentions to request further active duty than were parents or work associates.
(4) Economic security and fringe benefits of the USAF had less appeal to many than civilian job opportunities. In fact, many felt that their present USAF assignments were contributing less to the national defense program than they might contribute in civilian life.
(5) Most officers felt at the time of the interviews that those of their number who would extend their tour of duty would not be the most capable officers of their group.
(6) In general, officers felt that they would be better satisfied performing their present job in the role of a civilian rather than in a military uniform.

Influence of an Indoctrination Course on Active Duty Attitudes. H. M. Henkin and George W. Baker. (MS)

The Service-associated attitudes of 236 squadron grade officers at WADC who attended the 1951 Indoctrination Course were significantly more favorable to the Air Force than a comparable group of 26 officers who did not take the course. The experimental group excelled the control group on

(1) Feeling that the Indoctrination Course contributes to their professional development.
(2) Belief that they have an opportunity in the Air Force to develop their professional interests.
(3) Judging the professional facilities at the research centers as being adequate.
(4) Liking military life in ARDC.
(5) Feeling that their civilian background had been utilized in ARDC

The Active Duty Intentions of Some ARDC Lieutenants (AFROTC) Related to Several Service-Associated Variables. George W. Baker. (MS)

This study was designed to meet the following four major objectives:

(1) To identify and describe reasons why some of the Lieutenants in the Air Research and Development Command requested continued active duty in the Command and why others rejected the opportunity.
(2) To compare and contrast supervisor (civil service or military) and worker (lieutenant) judgments on a number of aspects of the Research and Development work situation and relate these to extension and rejection intentions.
(3) To collect from both workers and supervisors case materials and/or critical incidents related to the new officer's acceptance or rejection of another immediate tour of duty in ARDC.
(4) To obtain from both the workers and supervisors recommendations for improvements in the use of newly commissioned AFROTC personnel in ARDC.

Differential Definitions of Situations, Commitments and Actions, Richard Conrad. (MS)

In this study varying definitions of situations, commitments, and actions of engineering employees of a large-scale military research organization were compared with their analogous expressions about equivalent private civilian engineering research organizations. The hypotheses tested were:

(1) The greater proportion of engineers in a military organization will define comparable private civilian organizational situations more favorably than they do the military situation.
(2) Favorable and unfavorable definitions of both private civilian and military research situations find expression in the engineers' intended action of staying in or leaving the organization.
(3) Identifications with or commitments to a military research organization find expression in decisions by engineers regarding staying in or leaving the military organization.

Factors Affecting The Performance of Leadership Among Air Force Non-Commissioned Officers, Angelo R. Orlandella and Abbott L. Ferriss. 1952 (Mimeo.)

This brief summary of hypotheses relating social factors to NCO performance is supported by 84 quotations from officers and airmen. Qualitative statements are classified into the following areas:

(1) rank inconsistent with responsibilities;
(2) lack of proper respect, privileges and prestige standards for rank and position;
(3) equalization of NCO and Officer privileges and present officer and NCO relationships;
(4) NCO leadership;
(5) training in discipline and leadership;
(6) "backing-up" NCO's;
(7) NCO's as disciplinarians;
(8) leader selection policy;
(9) rate of promotion;
(10) leadership and chain-of-command.

NAME INDEX

Name and Page

Adams, Stuart N., iv
Baker, George W., iv, 35, 36, 43, 44, 45
Barth, Ernest A. T., 34
Beers, Robert L., iv
Bennett, Edith Becker, 40
Bushnell, David S., 23, 26
Boylan, James J. Jr., iv
Camp, Daniel L., iv, 15
Caplow, Theodore, 37
Carroll, F. O., iv
Collins, Orvis, 23, 25, 26, 27
Conrad, Richard, 45
Crawford, Fred R., 29
Crockett, Walter Hobson, 42
Croker, George W., iv
Cureton, Edward E., iv
Daugherty, Richard D., 26
Davis, F. James, 24, 25, 28
Demerath, N. J., 30, 34
Deutsch, Morton L., 37, 39, 40
Di Vesta, Francis J., 15
Donohue, George A., 37
Ellenbogen, Robert, 39
Esch, Frederick H., iv
Ferriss, Abbott L., iv, 15, 46
Fliege, Stewart E., 43
Folger, John K., 15
Gerard, Harold, 37, 38
Gould, Raymond F., 34
Gross, Edward, 23, 26, 27, 28
Henkin, H. M., 44
Herman, Louis M., iv
Hites, Robert W., iv
Holley, J. W., 19
Hunter, Floyd, 32
Karcher, Kenneth Jr., 32
Lackey, Alvin S., 23
Lichtenberg, Philip, 39
Lindelien, Wallace B., 19
Lindquist, Ruth, 31
Loether, Herman J., 23, 28
Maccoby, Nathan, 29
Mack, Ramond W., 31, 33
Maier, Jean, 18
McCollum, Ernest L., iv

■ This is what happened when racial segregation was abolished in the Charleston Navy Yard

Negroes Now Eat Upstairs

By Clarence Mitchell

THE ending of segregation in the Charleston, S. C., Navy yard cafeteria was page one news in Charleston. A newsreel of the event was shown in South Carolina theaters and possibly other southern cities.

The Washington Bureau this month [November 9 NAACP board meeting] devotes its entire written report to a discussion of the elimination of racial segregation at the Charleston Yard. We are doing this because the situation may be an indication of what will happen in the South when segregation is eliminated in other more extensive aspects of community life. As of Monday, October 19, the Charleston yard ended segregation in its cafeteria. Previously, segregation in the use of drinking fountains had been abandoned by the Navy on September 15. The Yard has not yet eliminated segregation in restroom facilities, although, it is anticipated that this will be done in the near future.

On the first day of integration a crowd of whites blocked the entrance to the cafeteria. Colored employees were formerly confined to the first floor of the building and whites used the second floor. Also, industrial employees of the Yard eat at 12:00 noon and clerical employees eat at 12:30. Most of those in the crowd were industrial workers and they prevented other whites from entering the cafeteria by shouting and insulting them. However, newspaper reports said that the crowd was in a joking mood. At 12:30 the "industrials" went back to work and the white clerical employees used the cafeteria in numbers approximating the normal crowd. Fifteen colored employees used the upper floor formerly reserved for whites. They sat at sepaate tables.

Thaddeus G. Fraser, an employee at the Yard, initiated action against segregation and he was supported in his effort by the Washington Bureau.

CLARENCE MITCHELL is director of the NAACP Washington Bureau.

* This article was originally the report of the NAACP Washington Bureau to the NAACP board of directors meeting in New York City on November 9, 1953.

He has provided us with a chronological report on what happened when segregation ended in the cafeteria. It is as follows:

"Tuesday (20th), about 600 to 700 spectators gathered immediately after the whistle blew for dinner, all white. Since, I understand that the captain of the Yard returned and called a meeting of the masters, and must have informed them that people entering the cafeteria must not be interfered with. This message had been passed along to the white workers, and on this day, though a greater number assembled, they were orderly, and did in no way interfere with anyone.

OFFICERS IN EVIDENCE

"There were many naval officers and many police officers in evidence this day, and all through the rest of the week. Approximately 40 Negroes ate this day upstairs. The white industrial workers fell off to about 20, with about 30 white clerical workers. About 100 colored workers also congregated after they ate their dinner.

"Wednesday (21st), the crowd of spectators fell off to about 400. The spectators are always industrial workers. The white industrials still boycott the cafeteria, only about 20 industrials, and about 60 clericals using the facilities this day. An official picture was taken of the crowd today. A few white women appeared in the crowd of spectators today. Everyone is peaceful, but everyone is also very tense. There's no fault to be found with cafeteria service at anytime.

"Thursday (22nd), only about 300 spectators today. No disorder whatever. Lots of officers still in evidence. Approximately 60 Negroes ate upstairs, approximately 75 whites, mostly clericals, ate. Boycott still on. Tenseness slightly relaxed today.

"Friday (23rd), about 100 Negroes ate upstairs. The colored people seem to be taking the situation in stride. Not overdoing nor shy. About 20 white industrials, and about 80 white clericals. This being pay day, and everyone going to cash their checks, only about 150 congregated today."

The Charleston News and Courier interpreted the action of the 15 colored employees who ate on the first day as a move to force white people to eat with colored at the same tables. In an editorial on October 21 the News and Courier said: "Although in the past equal dining facilities had been provided for whites and Negroes, there had been no integration of the races at mealtime—which apparently is one of the goals of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People."

DIRECTOR'S LETTER

The Washington bureau answered this editorial in a letter which was prominently published promptly in the Courier on October 27. The text of the Director's letter is as follows:

"It is interesting to note that although your editorial took the colored people to task for eating at different tables and did not say anything about the large number of whites who imposed their will on fellow workers by congregating at the building's only entrance. Your own news story of October 20 states 'the second shift, apparently unaware of the earlier disturbance, ate as usual.' Thus it would appear that the drop in the use of the cafeteria could in a large part be attributed to the presence of a derisive crowd using the deadly weapon of ridicule.

"The state of South Carolina does not exist in a vacuum. As you well know, the governor of South Carolina, is representing this country at the U.N. and Congressman James P. Richards of your state is the ranking member of the House of Foreign Affairs Committee. You also invited General Mark Clark to come to Charleston to head The Citadel. I am sure General Clark could tell you that in Korea the Communists constantly used racial discrimination in the United States as a weapon of war. I am sure that Governor Byrnes and Mr. Richards are aware of this also, although they might not admit that they are.

"Hence, South Carolina cannot afford to have patterns of segregation which make any person from your state appear ridiculous in a world discussion on human rights. Even if there are people in the state who think they can afford the dubious luxury of racial segregation, it is unfair for them to make the rest of the country suffer for their myopia."

EMPLOYEE LETTER

A letter from Mr. Charles H. Monson, a white employee at the Yard appeared in the Courier on October 24. The text is as follows:

"When I first came to Charleston last February, it was with the preadvised knowledge of the racial situation in the South . . . and with much additional advice on how to get along in relation to it. Being a native Californian and unfamiliar with the issue as it now stands, I came with a firm determination not to involve myself or argue my views in the matter. After all, I hadn't been out of the state 20 years . . . so I made the trip with an open mind, deciding to keep my mouth shut and my eyes and ears open so that I might gain a firsthand impression of this so-called 'problem.'

"So far I've withheld comment and put off writing this, but the article on page one October 20 headed 'Non-Segregated Dining Cuts Navy Yard Cafeteria Trade' made it impossible to keep my views to myself any longer.

"I was brought up in a neighborhood which was composed of a fair number of Negro families; I went to school and church with their children—all with the child's unconcerned outlook. I grew up with that same attitude, remembering my father's advice 'Judge a person for what he is, and not for the color of his skin or shape of his eyes.'

"So you have a problem out here. I doubt it, but let's examine the issue squarely. You shove your Negro population to the rear of your buses, segregate them in your theatres, ball parks, and by social pressure, generally force them into the slum districts (and some I've seen here can't be any worse than those of Los Angeles or San Francisco; which is comparable to some of the best pigsties I've seen) . . . and to what end? I fail to see what you think you're solving by all this, and haven't had anyone yet explain it to me to any degree of satisfaction.

"As for this asinine demonstration put on by some of the 'superior' whites at the Navy Yard, nothing would please me more than to learn at a future date that some of them fainted at their workbenches from acute and prolonged malnutrition."

PUBLISHER COMMENTS

A few other South Carolina publishers commented on this incident and one editorial appeared in the Anderson Independent on October 24:

"Segregation ended in the cafeteria at the Charleston Navy Yard Monday.

"Nothing of this kind was tried during the Roosevelt administrations.

"President Truman didn't seek to intermingle the races at Navy Yard eating places.

"It remained for President Eisenhower to order the end of segregation at the Navy Yard.

"When Candidate Ike spoke in Columbia, after a glowing introduction by Gov. James F. Byrnes, he overlooked telling the people he planned to end segregation in the Navy Yard. The governor didn't have a word to say about it either.

"Wonder if the 'Ike Boys' hereabouts—tackers up of signs, distributors of GOP propaganda, etc.—are happy now that their President has chased white people out of Navy Yard cafeterias so Negroes may eat there?"

This provoked a reply from the Charleston News and Courier in an editorial on October 26. It was as follows:

"The News and Courier, like the Anderson Independent, opposed the forced mixture of races in eating places. But the record should be set straight.

"President Roosevelt, by his Executive Order No. 8802, prohibited 'discrimination' in the the employment of workers in defense industries or by the Government. This set the whole pattern for what has followed.

"President Truman ended separation of the races in the armed forces. Long before President Eisenhower took office, whites and Negroes were eating in the same mess halls and sleeping in the same barracks.

"Under President Truman, the government successfully backed legal action which required many white graduate schools to admit Negroes. The Truman administration also backed action to force ALL public schools to mix the races and to force EVERY SINGLE EMPLOYER in the country to mix the races.

"White Fair Dealers in the South accuse Mr. Eisenhower of being pro-Negro, Fair Dealers in the North accuse Mr. Eisenhower of being anti-Negro—since he would not support the FEPC. The Fair Dealers can't have it both ways at once."

The record should also include a letter from a colored woman which was published in the News and Courier on the same day that the Washington Bureau's letter appeared. One of the disturbing "quotes" in this letter is as follows:

DISTURBING QUOTATION

"I have read about the non-segregated cafeteria at the Navy Yard and the thing that aroused my interest most is the fact that those 14 or 15 Negroes dispersed themselves about the room occupying some 14 of the eight-place tables in the dining hall.

"What those white employees did was no more than what I, personally, siderable nature, for there is much truth; but there is less art, for there is nothing new. Like young Biblical Ahimaaz whose story Mr. Baldwin has recounted on page 156, he has seen the great tumult. Whether he knows what it is is a matter of conjecture.

(Continued on page 638)

HENRY F. WINSLOW

Poesia Negra de Expressao Portuguesa (Negro Poetry in the Portuguese Tongue).* Compiled by Francisco Tenreiro and Mário Pinto de Andrade. Lisbon, Portugal: Livraria Editora, 1853. 18 pp.

The six poets represented are Alda do Espírito Santo and Francisco José Tenreiro from São Tomé; Agostinho Neto, Antonio Jacinto, and Viriato da Cruz from Angola; and Noemia de Sousa from Mozambique.

Their inspiration, however, seems to be derived more from books (Léon Damas' Poétes d'Expression Française, for example) than from the pulsating life of their native soil. Despite their stylized and often stereotyped themes, several of the poems are interesting and one or two are movingly lyrical.

NEGROES UPSTAIRS

(Continued from page 588)

would have done if the situation were vice versa. Even if there were no segregation in the beginning, it would still be wrong to act in the manner in which those Negroes did. I do believe that everyone, regardless of race, is entitled to some privacy of their own. If I were sitting in that cafeteria, with or without a relative or friend of mine, I would not appreciate a white person or even a Negro with whom I did not associate to be so rude as to intrude at the table at which I am dining, for if I am in the position to leave that place I would do so.

"The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is, and has been for a long time, fighting for what they call 'equal rights.' Well, what do you consider as being equal rights? No one is holding the Negroes back from doing anything that they want to among themselves. There are Negroes who have just as much or more than some white people. If they were fighting for this non-segregation business, well, it was granted at the Navy Yard, but what happened. A pitiful few acted like hoodlums.

"What difference does it make what color you are? I am a Negro and I'm proud to be one. Does anyone know what color soul he has? God doesn't look for color. He looks to see whether or not the soul is clean." Mrs. Emma Ophelia Smalls, Station A. Box 6."

In Washington, the director of the bureau maintained contact with the Navy Department and the White House on the Charleston situation to make certain that every possible precaution was taken to avoid any physical violence. It appears that the federal authorities were alert, although, we do not believe that the Navy Department should have permitted the crowd to congregate in front of the cafeteria. The Navy said that an attempt to disperse the crowd would probably have "bad reactions." It was the significance in the News and Courier editorial which we quote. In speaking of the Navy's move to end segregation the Courier said: "The Federal order, which we deplore, appears to be here to stay."

The Director of the bureau believes that the following conclusions can be drawn from this incident.

1. The Navy Department made a serious error in gradually eliminating segregation. If all segregation had been ended when bans on the use of drinking fountains were moved the opposition would not have had an opportunity to build up the kind of following which caused the demonstration at the cafeteria entrance. It is still possible that the ending of segregation in the restrooms may provoke further demonstrations.

2. The prominence given to the Bureau's letter seems to indicate that this channel to favorable public opinion would be very useful when other integration occurs. Perhaps we should study a plan of stimulating correspondence in such situations to make certain that both sides of the questions are properly aired.

3. The editorial reply of the News and Courier to the Anderson Independent's charge that the ending of segregation was an Eisenhower venture rather than a continuation of existing policies of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations is a healthy sign. It is another reminder that those who wish to promote race prejudice in national elections may find that their schemes backfire after the election is over.

RICHARD ALLEN

(Continued from page 607)

colored men in the night and lash them until they were willing to say they wanted to go to Africa, out of self-protection the Negroes of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland began to think in terms of a permanent organization to protect themselves from such indignities. The ever increasing enactment of laws "abridging the liberties and privileges of the Free People of Color" alarmed them, too.

In 1830 a committee which included Bishop Richard Allen met in Philadelphia and constituted itself the first Colored Convention. Allen was elected president. It was agreed that the Convention would, "divise and pursue all legal means for the speedy elevation of ourselves and brethren to the scale and standing of men." The Negro people were urged by their leaders to be diligent, buy land, work to achieve unity, and to take advantage of "every opportunity placed within our power by the benevolent efforts of the friends of humanity in elevating our condition to the rank of freemen." It became obvious that these Negroes wanted full citizenship for themselves, freedom for their enslaved brethren, and a place as citizens in America where they were born, not in Africa. The constitution of this first Colored Convention was signed by Bishop Richard Allen.

Long before his death, Allen was recognized as one of the most distinguished citizens of the City of Brotherly Love. Today he is remembered chiefly as the founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church one hundred and sixty years ago. This denomination has now well over a million members. It owns hundreds of beautiful churches, has established a number of accredited colleges, controls a great publishing house, and is a national force for good throughout America.

US Armed Services

OPINIONS ON INTEGRATION

in the

A-R-M-E-D S-E-R-V-I-C-E-S

As Reflected In Comments, In Book Reviews, And In

Editorials Appearing In The National Press

Reproduced For Departmental Use

James C. Evans - June 1954

QUOTATIONS FROM THE PRESS ANENT "BREAKTHROUGH ON THE COLOR FRONT"
BY LEE NICHOLS, AS PUBLISHED 15 FEBRUARY 1954

WASHINGTON POST - 14 Feb 1954

"..... a silent revolution which has taken place in the Armed Forces of the United States in the last few years. This perhaps more conservative segment of our national life has performed a social about-face and wiped out national segregation ..... the news is that it works."

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE BOOK REVIEW - 14 Feb 1954

"The impact on civilian life is yet to be measured ..... this book, filled with the drama of official fact rather than exhortation and oratory, is a significant contribution to the continuing effort to build a dynamic and meaningful democracy in terms of human relations."

NEW YORK TIMES - 14 Feb 1954

"..... one of the biggest stories of the twentieth century. Per se it warrants no lesser description. There is insufficient recognition that the problem was vast indeed, that time has had to provide part of the solution, and that the retarded past was due less to mean prejudice within the military structure than to the mountainous social obstacles which lay without."

PITTSBURGH COURIER - 27 Feb 1954

"Lee Nichols has written one of the most gallant and hopeful reports of how democracy can be implemented which has yet been done ..... The important point from this commentator's standpoint is that the author produces the records and the facts to prove that segregation is gone. Nor will it ever return. It is dead beyond resurrection, because it has already given shape to a new kind of life ..... Mr. Nichols' story of integration in the military services raises an important question: What effect will such integration have upon civilian life? Mr. Nichols is confident that the white and colored men who have been the beneficiaries of integration in the armed services are going to become new salesmen for democracy when they have taken off the uniform. Military integration will further weaken the foundations of civilian segregation."

ARKANSAS GAZETTE (LITTLE ROCK) - 11 Apr 54

"The drumming of Jim Crow out of the armed services is a significant story in many ways ..... once the decision was taken to abandon the segregated units in which Negroes had traditionally served the change came fast, and with remarkable smoothness."

THE COURIER-JOURNAL, LOUISVILLE - 11 Apr 54

"While the success of color integration is of tremendous importance to the War Department the obvious implications appear far more significant ..... There is an almost miraculous absence of friction ..... Detailed studies by the author reveal an easy social acceptance by Negroes and whites alike. He finds this true of the servicemen's families also ..... Such a state of affairs must be almost unthinkable to some segments of our population. Yet here it is, working smoothly, an accomplished fact ..... In this excellent book there is potent ammunition for the battles of tomorrow."

NEW YORK POST - 7 Feb 54

"This quietly dramatic little book is going to shock a lot of Americans. But Happily ..... it may elate more Americans than it shocks. Bits and pieces of the story have leaked out here and there .....and the progress has been so rapid that even Defense Secretary Wilson did not know that several of the 21 military posts where he ordered school segregation ended this week had already abandoned such practices two years ago..... For "Breakthrough on the Color Front" unveils one of the best kept secrets of the last decade - the rapid and almost complete integration of the Negro into the country's Armed Forces And, as the author claims, it may well turn out to be "one of the biggest stories of the twentieth century." Surely one of the most significant."

TIME MAGAZINE - 22 Feb 54

"On the bases the wives of Negroes and white men chatted casually over their clothesline. An Army post commander described the situation simply 'there are no problems.' But there is a problem: the civilian world now lags far behind the military ....." (Copyright Time Inc. 1954)

NORFOLK VIRGINIAN-PILOT - 14 Feb 54

"Nichols toured many bases to study the integration program....."Breakthrough on the Color Front" presents arguments, pro and con, in the long debate over segregation in the Armed Forces, and cites conditions as they prevailed before and after integration to establish the conclusion that the new policy is sound. To a newsman, as is Nichols, objectivity is a virtue to be carefully protected. It does not appear here that, in his enthusiasm for integration, he has lost the virtue."

CHICAGO DEFENDER - 27 Feb 54

"Neither a crusader nor a conformist, Lee Nichols has quietly and perceptively watched and recorded the ebb and flow of racial patterns and .... For this reason his exciting story of how segregation in the Armed Services has been almost wholly eliminated during the past decade, "Breakthrough on the Color Front," ..... is one of the most important books not only of 1954 but of this era ..... Lee Nichols has written one of the most gallant and hopeful reports of how democracy can be implemented which has yet been done."

DES MOINES TRIBUNE - 4 Feb 54

"It came about so gradually, so naturally, and with such little fanfare that few people, even those most socially minded, realized that it was taking place ..... perhaps, most of all, it is a story of the coming of age of the American Negroes, of Negroes who battled through nearly two centuries for the "right to fight" for their country; of Negro men and women who, despite grave abuses, generally kept their sense of natural loyalty and dignity, and, when the white races of the military parted to receive them, marched in and took their places - proudly, and for the most part, quietly."

DETROIT NEWS - 2 Feb 54

"The whole story is told in a book currently published by Random House which we commend to the thoughtful reading of Americans - "Breakthrough on the Color Front" written by Lee Nichols of the United Press Bureau in Washington ..... It relates of the one substantial and unheralded American victory of the Korean war - how under the pressures there, the American services eliminated racial discrimination and arrived at a brave new policy which is now almost of universal application ..... Here was a real achievement for the United States, an item of far greater political significance to the free world than the overly publicized repatriation exchanges in Korea ..... But it went almost unmarked until a reflective and socially mature newsman drew the threads of the story together and then, in effect, said to the country: let's look at ourselves; maybe we are doing better than we thought."

AFRO-AMERICAN - 19 Feb 54

"But perhaps "most of all" as the author says, this "is a story of the coming of age of the colored American" in the armed services ..... "Breakthrough on the Color Front" is as stirring an American story as one can find."

WASHINGTON EAGLE - Mar 54

"The book also gives its author's views on the probable effects of this integration on social change at home and abroad ..... The author has done a bang-up research job, and has been commendably objective in his treatment of personalities."

RANDOM HOUSE (PUBLISHERS) - 15 Feb 54

"Nichols, who tells for the first time the behind-the-scenes story of how this remarkable transformation occurred literally unknown to the public at large, was given access to hundreds of long-secret military documents never before divulged ..... Nichols says - leading officials of all services who have seen it work said almost unanimously, "we will never go back to segregation" ..... Some officials even reported heightened morale among their once all-white units after Negroes were added. Nichols says the military shift has "far-reaching implications for the future, not only in the military realm but in America's total race pattern and its relations with the rest of the world" .....

Nichols also reports that the tide of integration was inexorably seeping into the civilian world ..... One of the most significant findings of both the author and the survey teams was a sharp change in attitude toward Negroes among Southerners who has experienced military integration ..... This is the first complete authentic story of one of the most significant racial developments in modern American history - an achievement in human relations that has up until now been shrouded in strict military secrecy."

WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD - 18 Feb 54 & 3 Mar 54

"This racial about-face is unparalleled by any similar development in modern history, according to Nichols ..... The story of this achievement Lee Nichols tells in his sprightly written, well-documented book. ..... So much for the small f'rinstance in human relations. The big one was recently documented in a book by Lee Nichols, a Washington newspaperman, and issued by Random House under the title, "Breakthrough on the Color Front." It tells the all but secret story of how, in a few short years, the Armed Forces of the United States have almost completed a total about-face on the Negro question."

FERGUS FALLS (MINN) JOURNAL - 25 Feb 54

"From the beginning of American history, Negroes have fought in American forces, and a runaway slave was the first to fall at Boston in 1770 ..... The Negroes wish that the distinction between races could be as effectively dissolved in civilian life as it is in the armed services."

NATCHEZ (MISS) TIMES - 21 Feb 54

"The United States Armed Forces have ended segregation in a "racial about-face unparalleled by any similar development in modern history," according to a new book, "Breakthrough on the Color Front" (Random House)."

TERRE HAUTE (IND) TRIBUNE - 20 Feb 54

"The practice of segregation began tapering off after World War II, Nichols said, and the first real integration of Negro soldiers with white soldiers occurred in Korea. It was recorded a great success."

KNOXVILLE NEWS-SENTINEL - 21 Feb 54

"Nichols said the end of segregation actually began during the last World War when Negro platoons were used among white platoons in Europe. The plan, a daring experiment at the time, was sanctioned by General Dwight D. Eisenhower, then Supreme Commander."

BURLINGTON (VT) NEWS - 21 Feb 54

"A dozen years ago segregation of Negroes was the rule in virtually all branches of the service ..... Yet in 1953 segregation has been officially discarded ....."

HOT SPRINGS (ARK) NEW ERA - 20 Feb 54

"You can read about other serious topics, too, like the Negro in the U. S. Armed Forces in "Breakthrough on the Color Front" by Lee Nichols ....."

SAN BERNARDINO (CALIF) SUN - 21 Feb 54

"The United States Armed Forces have ended segregation in a "racial about-face unparalleled by any similar development in modern history," according to a new book, "Breakthrough on the Color Front" (Random House)."

LOS ANGELES SENTINEL - 25 Feb 54

"An article in Time Magazine's Feb 22 issue comments on a laudable piece penned by Lee Nichols, one of the nation's better journalists, titled "Breakthrough on the Color Front." The book deals with what Nichols describes as the "unknown war" against military segregation, and the effect of President Truman's 1948 order for armed services equality ..... It is good that the military has arrived at a happy solution to the problem of the races, and it is regrettable that civilians lag far behind on the race relations front. The military admits there are many "bugs" to be ironed out, but they have a system - and it works. That is more than can be said for the home front."

PORTLAND (ORE) JOURNAL - 28 Feb 54

"..... Even the most casual reader will finish it with a feeling of restored faith in human nature ..... Across Breakthrough's pages march men, both great and unknown, who have fought for the 'unbunching' of Negroes in the Armed Forces ..... Parents of boys and girls now in military service will find this volume of considerable help in understanding what the services are doing in the way of integration. Young people awaiting their call to military service will find Breakthrough's contents of deep interest."

NEWARK STAR-LEDGER - 12 Mar 54

"..... a book is out now called "Breakthrough on the Color Front." It is by Lee Nichols, a Washington newspaperman ..... Air Force, Army and Navy have virtually completed the integration program. It has proven astonishingly successful ..... This book should be translated, filmed. It can do us a world of good at home and in the world."

BIRMINGHAM NEWS - 14 Feb 54

"Lee Nichols is a United Press reporter in Washington, who, interested in the flow of news across his desk about segregation and its elimination in the services, decided to make a more detailed study of the problem. His book is not shocking, but it is a sound chronological study from the earliest days in America of the uses of Negro soldiers and sailors ..... But Mr. Nichols shows that a number of professional officers were instrumental in making the policy work. The book discusses the problem of non-segregation on posts, and segregation off, in the South ..... This is a brief volume, but it says what it sets out to say. Some will contend, undoubtedly, that it proves nothing as to the matter of segregation outside the Armed Forces, but to me it says a great deal."

CALDWELL (IDAHO) NEWS-TRIBUNE - 17 Feb 54

"If you intend to read but one book in 1954, you could do worse than to read this one ..... If this work gets the readership it deserves, and it is hoped it will, it could prove to be a decisive document in contemporary writing. It could help to break down stupid, long-standing barriers; it could help to show that an American is an American regardless of his skin and that pigmentation does not mean any loss in feeling, bravery, intelligence or passion. A recommended book. And, we will add, exciting to read. The author, the publisher and the Armed Forces should be congratulated."

CHICAGO SUNDAY TRIBUNE - 28 Feb 54

"Now comes a report, compiled by a former United Press correspondent, Lee Nichols, that by 1953 segregation had been officially discarded, and integration of all servicemen of whatever race or nationality was the firm policy of every branch of the military service ..... The story of this achievement Lee Nichols tells in his sprightly-written, well-documented book. A seemingly casual Army press release and the guarded words of a Pentagon official started him on the trail that led to what he describes as one of the biggest stories of the twentieth century."

NEW YORK MIRROR - 7 Mar 54

"Integration of Negro troops into the Army ranks is a reality, result of Korean action, and newsman Lee Nichols' book, "Breakthrough on the Color Front" ..... tells the story of that development with a proper perspective on military history. This is Americana with true importance for our position abroad and should debunk Red propaganda."

JUSTICE (NYC) - March 1954

"Mr. Nichols tells a story of profound importance. He presents the documented record of how the Armed Forces, tradition-bound and ruled by discipline, have in a very short period achieved the virtual abolition of Negroes in their ranks. He gives the measure of what this has meant in improving the fighting efficiency not only of the Negroes but also of the whites with whom they are now mixed in ranks worthy of the combat force of a democratic nation fighting to preserve freedom for all ..... This is an exciting book that tells with restraint and subdued pride the story of a major victory for freedom won in our own country."

NEW REPUBLIC - 22 Mar 54
The Races: USA (Phillee Nash)

"Lee Nichols' book will be a restorative for any who have lost faith in human progress ..... Racial integration of the armed forces of our country is one of those truly great events, so inclusive in its effect and so powerful in its sweep that it dwarfs all the individuals concerned, whatever their roles may have been."

STATION WFIN, PHILADELPHIA - 22 Mar 54
(David Hayeman)

"For instance, the color barrier has finally been completely broken down in the United States Armed Forces ..... This has been a long, hard pull ..... When one realizes that the Negro as a soldier has fought most capably in every one of our nation's wars, it becomes a sad commentary to have to admit that it took almost 200 years for integration to become a fact."

CEDAR RAPIDS (IOWA) GAZETTE - 14 Mar 54

"So gradually and successfully has integration of Negro with white servicemen been manipulated in training camps and in Korea the last three years that the public in general scarcely realizes the significance of the change."

WICHITA (KANSAS) EAGLE MAGAZINE - 14 Mar 54

"..... the Negro today finds less discrimination practiced in the armed forces than in any other organized level of American society. ..... even the generals are convinced the two races are getting along with a minimum of friction, leaving little doubt as far as the military are concerned that integration is here to stay."

THE NEWS AND OBSERVER (RALEIGH, N.C.) - 9 Mar 54

"This timely book telling the hitherto closely guarded story of the integration of the Negro into the U. S. armed forces is definitive, objective, and fascinating ..... one of the great stories of our time ..... without the least perceptible trace of whatever preconceptions the author may have entertained concerning racial segregation ..... Lee Nichols a social historian of high calibre ....."

THE FREEMAN (NYC) - 22 Mar 54
(George S. Schuyler)

"That those virtues* cannot be underrated is evidenced by Lee Nichols' dramatic account of the complete repudiation of the segregationist philosophy by the Armed Forces of the United States. In less than a decade, and in the face of powerful traditions, the Army, the Navy, the Marines, and the Air Force completely abandoned segregation.

*America's basic christian virtues

"Today Negroes serve in every branch of the Armed Forces on equal basis with whites, and so far there has been neither friction nor any "incidents." In view of the pre-draft backgrounds of these youths, and the generations of racist indoctrination which had conditioned them, this is truly remarkable."

COLUMBUS (OHIO) DISPATCH - 28 Mar 54

"This is a factual and informative account of what has been taking place in the United States Armed Forces in recent years to integrate the Negro into the life and pattern of the various branches of the service."

PRESBYTERIAN LIFE - 3 Apr 54

"You put down the book satisfied that you have learned how it really happened and excited to know that Christian idealism, as well as military necessity, forced our government at long last to accept the Negro into the armed forces on an equal footing with the white man."

CLEVELAND (OHIO) PLAIN DEALER - 14 Mar 54
by Rey L. Gillespie

"One of the great stories of our times is the manner in which Negroes were integrated into the armed services ..... one of the most dramatic success stories in modern American history; that it is a story of changing times and attitudes ....."

SALT LAKE (UTAH) TRIBUNE - 7 Mar 54

"In many respects "Breakthrough on the Color Front" is an important sociological document.

"By accomplishing within a few years what many had predicted would take a century, the armed forces have opened the possibility that perhaps the civilian adjustment of the color problem would be a lot closer to reality if concrete steps were taken."

WILMINGTON (DELAWARE) SUNDAY STAR - 7 Mar 54

"..... the signs presently show where we shall all one day walk. For those who follow this pattern, Breakthrough on the Color Front has a special significance ..... For here is the story of integration in the armed forces, a unity accomplished, literally, in months ..... the quiet revolution which came to a climax in the last years of the Korean conflict ..... in a "conspiracy of silence ....."

"And the individual histories of the great sacrifices Negroes made for whites and whites for Negroes is the kind of experience which stirringly renews one's faith in this land and its noble principles. ....."Integration seems to lessen racial tension rather than increase it." There is a lesson for us all in this."

BOOKS ON TRIAL - 1 Apr 54

"This is the story of quiet heroics, of men who suffered insults and opposition but still continued the fight to prove that Negroes were not second rate citizens."

WEST SIDElights, YMCA (NY) - 12 Apr 54

"In a time when tension and misunderstanding are all too common, the recently published book Breakthrough on the Color Front comes as a welcome contribution to the cause of human relations."

NIEMAN REPORTS - Apr 54

"Jim Crow has been discharged from the armed forces of the United States, and an alert newsman has dug out the story to make a thorough, straightforward, and very hopeful book ..... He thinks defense department "Integration" may turn out to be one of the biggest stories of this century, and his book makes a good case for that judgment."

QUOTATIONS FROM INDIVIDUAL COMMENTATORS

SENATOR HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

"This book records the first thoroughly effective step that has been made in implementing the Emancipation Proclamation."

JOHN W. DAVIS

"The work of Nichols will give strength to the exponents of real democracy in America and the world. The Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines should be applauded on significant progress achieved to date in an important area of world concern."

JUDGE WILLIAM H. HASTIE
(Former Civilian Aide)

"It was thoughtful of you to bring Nichols' book to my attention. I have read it and have written to Nichols saying what a worthwhile job I think he has done."

JEAN BYERS SAMPSON
Author of "A Study of The Negro in Military Services" - 1947 Monograph

"I had been aware of the rapid progress being made by the services ...., but the speed and the success with which integration was accomplished were not impressed on me until I read Mr. Nichols' book. It is a wonderful story and such a heartening one. It is good to be able to feel proud of your country's accomplishments.....I hope it's not too much to expect that the inevitable integration in civilian educational facilities will occur as sensibly and amicably."

LESTER B. GRANGER

"I enjoyed reading Lee Nichols' "Breakthrough On The Color Front" from start to finish, for several reasons. It is well written and immensely readable. It is closely documented. Its coverage is broader than that of any previous volume on the subject. It includes the human interest part of the story by going into personalities and motives, as well as facts and figures. Lee Nichols has made a tremendous contribution to the whole movement of interracial integration."

LT. COLONEL DAVID A. LANE

"I have just finished reading Lee Nichols' Breakthrough On the Color Front. I like it very much and I hope it will receive wide circulation.....the simple truth up to now is rather staggering."

WALTER WHITE - NAACP

"Lee Nichols' book does two important things. It makes one proud to be an American. And it proves that refusal to compromise with evil pays off in a democracy.....but I learned a lot from his exciting story of how the armed services tackled and licked the job of making those services truly democratic."

MARY McLEOD BETHUNE

"The Breakthrough on the Color Front is very stimulating and interesting. The walls are truly crumbling."

GEORGE S. SCHUYLER
(In Pittsburgh Courier, 6 Mar 54)

"Lee Nichols' excellent book "Breakthrough on the Color Front" tells of the revolution in the armed forces which banished racial segregation forever. It is really something to read and preserve."

BILLY ROSE
(In Times Herald, 3 Mar 54)

"So much for the small f'rinstance in human relations. The big one was recently documented in a book by Lee Nichols, a Washington newspaperman, and issued by Random House under the title, "Breakthrough on the Color Front." It tells the all but secret story of how, in a few short years, the armed forces of the United States have almost completed a total about-face on the Negro question."

JAMES C. EVANS - CIVILIAN ASSISTANT DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

"We feel that in publishing this report, Random House is making a contribution to national defense through solidarity."

L 0220

King, Martin Luther, Jr. Stride Toward Freedom. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1958.

Pages 43-44

"There was to be much speculation about why Mrs. Parks did not obey the driver. Many people in the white community argued that she had been "planted" by the NAACP in order to lay the groundwork for a test case.... So persistent and persuasive was this argument that it convinced many reporters from all over the country...."

"But the accusation was totally unwarranted, as the testimony of both Mrs. Parks and the officials of the NAACP revealed. Actually, no one can understand the actions of Mrs. Parks unless he realizes that eventually the cup of endurance runs over, and the human personality cries out, 'I can take it no longer'.... She was not planted there by the NAACP or any other organization; she was planted there by her personal sense of dignity and self respect."

Page 103

"... The tension is, at bottom, between justice and injustice, between the forces of light and the forces of darkness. And if there is a victory, it will be a victory not merely for fifty thousand Negroes, but a victory for justice and the forces of light..."

Page 93

"To deprive man of freedom is to relegate him to the status of a thing, rather than elevate him to the status of a person."

Wright, Richard. "12 Million Black Voices". New York: Viking Press, 1941.

Page 15

"Captivity under Christendom blasted our lives, disrupted our families, reached down into the personalities of each one of us and destroyed the very images and symbols which had guided our minds and feelings in the effort to live. Our folkways and folk tales, which had once given meaning and sanction to our actions, faded from consciousness. Our gods were dead and answered no more. The trauma of leaving our African home, the suffering of the long middle passage, the thirst, the hunger, the horrors of the slave ship - all these hollowed us out, numbed us, stripped us, and left only physiological urges, the feelings of fear and fatigue."...

"In the latter part of the 18th century, however, the conduct of most of the Lords of the Land began to alter toward us. To evade the prevailing Christian injunction that all baptized men are free, and to check our growing record of revolt, , they culled from the Bible a thousand quotable verses admonishing us slaves to be true to our masters. Thereupon they felt that they had squared conscience with practice, and they extended Christian salvation to us without granting the boon of freedom. This dual attitude, compounded of a love of gold and God, was the beginning of America's paternalistic code toward her black maid, her black industrial worker, her black stevedore, her black dancer, her black waiter, her black sharecropper; it was a code of casual cruelty, of brutal kindness, of genial despotism, a code which has survived, grown, spread, and congealed into a national tradition that dominates, in small or large measure, all black and white relations throughout the nation until this day."

Page 41

"Always we said what we thought the whites wanted us to say."

Hall, Prince
Negro founder of the African Lodge of Masons. 1797, Boston.

"Patience, I say, for were we not possessed of a great measure of it, you could not bear up under the daily insults you meet within the streets of Boston; much more on public days of recreation, how are you shamefully abused, and that at such a degree that you may truly be said to carry your lives in your own hands....

"My bretheren, let us not be cast down under these and many other abuses we presently labor under; for the darkest hour is before the break of day. My bretheren, let us remember what a dark day it was with our African bretheren six years ago in the French West Indies.... But blessed be to God, the scene is changed, they now confess that God hath no respect of persons, and therefore receive them as their friends and treat them as brothers. Thus doth Ethopia begin to stretch forth her hand from a sink of slavery to freedom and equality."

CHARACTERISTICS OF CHILDREN RECEIVING CHILD WELFARE SERVICES ON JANUARY 1, 1947

Administrative Report, Series 3

Special Study No. 171

April 24, 1947

Austin, Texas

CHARACTERISTICS OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE IN TEXAS

Personal Characteristics

The State Department of Public Welfare through its 16 child welfare units and nine regional child welfare offices was giving case work services to 3,312 Texas children on January 1, 1947, an increase of 48 children over the number receiving service a year ago. The number of boys and girls receiving service was evenly divided; the ratio of 50 per cent boys and 50 per cent girls was essentially the same as that reported on January 1, 1946. This same sex ratio was approximated for each race-nationality group.

Race Nationality	Total		Number		Per Cent
	Number	Per Cent	Boys	Girls	Boys	Girls
Total.....	3,312	100%	1,651	1,661	50%	50%
Anglo-American..	2,138	65	1,049	1,089	49	51
Latin-American..	713	21	346	367	49	51
Negro-American..	450	14	250	200	56	44
Other.....	11	*	6	5	54	46

* Less than 1 per cent.

Since Latin-American constitute a relatively large element of the population in El Paso, Hidalgo, Nueces, and Webb Counties in which child welfare units are located, this group was tabulated separately from other whites in order to provide a more complete analysis of the caseload. The distribution of the caseload by race-nationality reflected only slight variations from that of a year ago, the percentage of Anglo-Americans decreased by five while the percentages of Latin-American and Negro-American increased by two and three respectively. The 1940 census, which does not separate Latin-Americans from other white persons, showed the Texas population to be 85.5 per cent white and 14.4 per cent Negro.[1] The child welfare caseload as of January 1, 1947 was 86.1 per cent white and 13.6 per cent Negro while corresponding percentages 12 months ago were 88.6 and 11.2.

1/ 16th Census of the United States, 1940, Population, Second Series, Texas, Table 4.

Over half of the children receiving service (56.8 per cent) were under 10 years of age while slightly more than one-third were five years of age or less and 5.4 per cent were under 12 months. Approximately 38 per cent of the boys were between the ages of 10 and 16 inclusive and 40 per cent of the girls were between the ages of 10 and 17 inclusive while 97 per cent of the boys were under 17 years of age and 98 per cent of the girls under the age of 18. The median age of both boys and girls under 21 was eight years while the mean age for each sex group approximated the same figure.

Location

Nearly two-thirds of the number of children receiving service were living in their own homes while 78 per cent were receiving service either in their own homes or in the homes of relatives. The percentage distribution of children by their location at the end of the month varied only slightly throughout the year. A comparison of January 1, 1947 data with those of a year ago indicates a decrease of 4 per cent in the number of children living in their own homes and an increase of 3 per cent in the number living in foster-family homes.

Location	Number of Children		Per Cent of Children
	1-1-47	1-1-46	1-1-47	1-1-46
Total.....	3,312	3,264	100.0%	100.0%
Own home.....	2,131	2,233	64.3	68.4
Relative's home..	391	378	11.8	11.6
Foster home
Boarding.....	255	202	7.7	6.2
Adoptive.....	160	91	4.8	2.8
Free.....	86	101	2.6	3.1
Work or wage..	5	6	0.2	0.2
Institution
Private.....	187	137	5.6	4.2
Public.....	70	78	2.1	2.4
Elsewhere.....	27	38	0.8	1.2

Since the aim of case work is to keep families intact whenever possible, the high proportion of children in their own homes and with relatives is, on the whole, a healthful manifestation. The increase in the number of children living in foster-family homes may be indicative of an expanding foster-home program. It is realized that the continued development and expansion of the foster-home program for those children who need a substitute home is desirable.

The 257 children in public and private institutions represent only those children who were receiving direct case work service through the Department and not the entire institutional population of Texas. The distribution of boys and girls by their location at the end of the month showed no significant variation between the sexes.

Status of Case

Eighty-three per cent of the cases reviewed were new, 10 per cent were reopened, and 7 per cent were recurrent; corresponding percentages a year ago were 85, 8, and 7. A reopened case is one which had been known to the agency but had not been active within the 12-month period preceding the new request for service. A recurrent case is one in which the child received service within the 12-month period but the case had been closed and reopened within this period.

Service was initiated within the year in nearly two-thirds of the cases, which indicates that the child welfare units deal with cases of relatively short duration. It is significant to note that similar studies show that service was initiated within the year in 67 per cent and 66 per cent of the cases receiving service on January 1 of 1945 and 1946 respectively. Of the 2,119 cases in which service was initiated during 1946, 39 per cent were opened during the last quarter, 26 per cent during the third quarter, and 35 per cent during the first half of the year.

Year Service Was Initiated	Per Cent of Cases Receiving Service
	1-1-47	1-1-46	1-1-45
Total.....	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
1946.....	64.0	XX	XX
1945.....	20.4	66.4	XX
1944.....	7.7	20.4	67.2
1943.....	3.4	7.1	20.0
1942.....	2.1	3.1	7.4
1941 & earlier..	2.4	3.0	5.4

The child welfare units were organized at different times as local community interest and need developed. The Nolan and Taylor County units were established in 1936, the Nueces County unit in 1937, the Victoria and Smith County units in 1938, the Brown County unit in 1941, the Bowie, El Paso, McLennan, Midland, and Potter County units in 1942, the Grayson, Jefferson, and Webb County units in 1943, the Ector County unit in 1944, and the Hidalgo County unit in 1945. In the latter part of 1945 and during 1946 nine child welfare regional offices were established. These regional supervisory offices were introduced in order to extend, develop, and strengthen child welfare services to counties having neither child welfare units nor local public or private agencies, to give consultative service to public assistance workers, to supervise child welfare workers, and to carry out community development work.

Percentage variations of status of case among race groups were slight. The percentage of new cases for each of the three major race-nationality groups approximated that of the total caseload while each of the 11 cases classified as "other" were new cases.

Status of Case	Total		Anglo-American		Latin-American		Negro-American
	Number	Per Cent	Number	Per Cent	Number	Per Cent	Number	Per Cent
Total..	3,312	100.0%	2,138	100.0%	713	100.0%	450	100.0%
New.....	2,744	82.8	1,731	81.0	610	85.6	392	87.1
Recurrent.	227	6.9	153	7.2	43	6.0	31	6.9
Reopened..	341	10.3	254	11.8	60	8.4	27	6.0

Reason for Request

As has been true in previous years the greater portion of reasons for request for service fell within the dependency and neglect classification. Sixty-seven per cent of the requests for service came within this classification while the percentage a year ago was 71. It should be noted that the reason tabulated is the one given by the source of referral and does not represent the diagnosis of the case by the child welfare worker.

The reasons for request, which were stated in the terms used by the sources of referral, were grouped into six broad classifications: dependency and neglect, behavior problems, court cases, handicapped children, unmarried mothers, and other type cases. Dependency and neglect include all cases where a plan was requested for a child and all foster-home placements, as well as the more technical phases of dependency, neglect, or abuse. Behavior problems include runaways, truants, and those cases in which the reason for the request was given as delinquency, unless information on the schedule indicated that the case had been taken to court. In the last instance, delinquency cases were included in court cases, together with custody and parental support cases. Services for unmarried mothers or their children were classified under the separate heading "unmarried mothers," even though such services usually involve child placement and could be considered as pertaining to dependency cases. Handicap cases include service to children with physical or mental handicaps. The latitude allowed in these classifications does not permit complete reliance upon the findings.

The distribution of dependency and neglect cases as between boys and girls approximated the 50-50 distribution of a year ago. Behavior problems were distributed on nearly the same 60-40 basis as a year ago with boys again predominating. Handicapped cases showed an increase from 81 to 107 cases with an increase of 10 in the percentage of girls.

Reason for Request	Total		Number		Per Cent
	Number	Per Cent	Boys	Girls	Boys	Girls
Total.....	3,312	100%	1,651	1,661	50%	50%
Dependency and neglect.....	2,226	67	1,080	1,146	49	51
Behavior problems.....	312	10	193	119	62	38
Handicap cases.....	107	3	58	49	54	46
Court cases.....	57	2	35	22	61	39
Unmarried mothers.....	46	1	10	36	22	78
Other.....	564	17	275	289	49	51

No significant distribution of reasons for request by race was indicated. For each of the three leading race-nationality groups the distribution of reasons for request for service approximated that for the total caseload.

Marital Status of Parents

The larger proportion of children in each major race group came from homes broken by divorce, separation, or desertion: 40 per cent of the Anglo-Americans, 27 per cent of the Latin-Americans, 46 per cent of the Negro-Americans, and 38 per cent of all children. One-fourth of the children receiving service came from homes in which the marriage was still intact and 7 per cent from homes in which the marriage of the natural parents had been broken by death or divorce but one (or both) of the natural parents had remarried another person and this marriage was intact. Thus 32 per cent of the children came from families in which marriage was intact. The third largest number of children, 530 or 16 per cent, came from homes broken by death of one or both parents.

Comparable data for prior periods are not available since the marital status of parents reported in this study was the status as of January 1, 1947 while in previous reports the status was given as of the time service was initiated. On January 1, 1945 and 1946: 39 per cent and 37 per cent of the children receiving service came from families in which the marriage was intact at the time service was initiated; 33 per cent and 35 per cent respectively from homes broken by divorce, separation, or desertion at the time service was initiated; 19 per cent and 17 per cent respectively from homes broken by death of one or both parents.

The variations in the percentage distribution of children by the marital status of the parents by race on January 1, 1947 are partially explained by the mores of the races.

Marital Status of Parents	Total		Per Cent Distribution by Race1/
	Number	Per Cent	Anglo-American	Latin-American	Negro-American
Total.....	3,312	100.0%	2,138	713	450
Divorced, separated or deserted.....	1,252	37.8	39.8%	27.1%	45.8%
Married.....	838	25.3	28.9	20.9	14.7
Unmarried.....	341	10.3	7.1	14.2	19.6
Mother dead.....	230	6.9	5.1	12.2	7.6
Father dead.....	228	6.9	5.7	13.2	2.7
Remarried.....	217	6.6	7.9	3.9	4.7
Both parents dead...	72	2.2	1.3	4.9	2.0
Other.....	49	1.5	1.2	2.4	1.5
Not reported.....	85	xx	xx	xx	xx

1/ "Other" omitted because of insignificant numbers.

TABLE NO. 1.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN
RECEIVING SERVICE ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY AGE AND SEX

Age	Total		Sex
	Number	Per Cent	Male	Female
Total.....	3,312	100.0%	1,651	1,661
Less than 1 year...	178	5.4	92	86
1 year.....	172	5.2	87	85
2 years.....	198	6.0	106	92
3 years.....	205	6.2	105	100
4 years.....	201	6.1	91	110
5 years.....	217	6.6	105	112
6 years.....	190	5.7	94	96
7 years.....	185	5.6	84	101
8 years.....	158	4.8	84	74
9 years.....	171	5.2	97	74
10 years.....	175	5.3	88	87
11 years.....	183	5.5	100	83
12 years.....	182	5.5	93	89
13 years.....	181	5.5	86	95
14 years.....	197	5.9	89	108
15 years.....	160	4.8	83	77
16 years.....	125	3.8	57	68
17 years.....	63	1.9	28	35
18 years.....	30	0.9	10	20
19 years.....	6	0.2	4	2
20 years.....	3	0.1	0	3
21 years and over..	4	0.1	0	4
Not reported.....	128	x.x	68	60

TABLE NO. 2:--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY RACE AND CHILD WELFARE UNIT

Unit	Total	Number of Children by Race
		Anglo-American	Latin-American	Negro-American	Other
Total.....	3,312	2,138	713	450	11
Bowie.....	149	131	0	18	0
Brown.....	148	145	1	2	0
Ector.....	31	31	0	0	0
El Paso.....	244	61	161	21	1
Grayson.....	71	69	0	2	0
Hidalgo.....	223	70	153	0	0
Jefferson...	622	461	10	145	6
McLennan....	295	175	23	97	0
Midland.....	151	83	35	33	0
Nolan.....	127	117	8	0	2
Nueces.....	252	111	111	29	1
Potter.....	195	178	11	6	0
Smith.....	252	166	0	85	1
Taylor.....	114	107	5	2	0
Victoria....	177	81	94	2	0
Webb.....	100	11	89	0	0
Region 1-C..	7	5	0	2	0
Region 2-C..	15	15	0	0	0
Region 3-C..	21	18	1	2	0
Region 4-C..	45	39	4	2	0
Region 5-C..	29	23	5	1	0
Region 6-C..	21	20	1	0	0
Region 7-C..	4	4	0	0	0
Region 8-C..	17	15	1	1	0
Region 9-C..	2	2	0	0	0

TABLE NO. 3.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN
RECEIVING SERVICE ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY LOCATION AND CHILD WELFARE UNIT

Unit	Total	Number of Children by Location
		Own Home	Relative's Home	Foster Home	Insti-tution	Other
Total.....	3,312	2,131	391	506	257	27
Bowie.....	149	91	17	33	8	0
Brown.....	148	105	22	10	8	3
Ector.....	31	23	2	6	0	0
El Paso.....	244	114	25	61	43	1
Grayson.....	71	44	15	9	3	0
Hidalgo.....	223	161	26	23	9	4
Jefferson....	622	401	50	107	61	3
McLennan.....	295	214	25	29	25	2
Midland.....	151	122	11	9	3	6
Nolan.....	127	95	14	11	6	1
Nueces.....	252	132	55	55	10	0
Potter.....	195	111	25	37	22	0
Smith.....	252	171	33	41	7	0
Taylor.....	114	63	23	15	9	4
Victoria.....	177	149	4	4	20	0
Webb.....	100	51	20	14	13	2
Region 1-C...	7	3	0	3	1	0
Region 2-C...	15	5	5	4	1	0
Region 3-C...	21	10	1	10	0	0
Region 4-C...	45	22	11	9	3	0
Region 5-C...	29	20	0	7	1	1
Region 6-C...	21	15	1	3	2	0
Region 7-C...	4	4	0	0	0	0
Region 8-C...	17	4	5	6	2	0
Region 9-C...	2	1	1	0	0	0

TABLE NO. 4.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY LOCATION AND SEX

Whereabouts	Total	Sex
		Male	Female
Total.....	3,312	1,651	1,661
Own Home.....	2,131	1,044	1,087
Relative's Home.....	391	188	203
Foster Home
Boarding.....	255	136	119
Adoptive.....	160	83	77
Free.....	86	44	42
Work or Wage.....	5	2	3
Institution
Private.....	187	101	86
Public.....	70	42	28
Elsewhere.....	27	11	16

TABLE NO. 5.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE
ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY STATUS OF CASE AND CHILD WELFARE UNIT

Unit	Total Children	Status of Case
		New	Reopened	Recurrent
Total.....	3,312	2,744	341	227
Bowie.....	149	132	6	11
Brown.....	148	122	19	7
Ector.....	31	27	2	2
El Paso.....	244	190	37	17
Grayson.....	71	61	5	5
Hidalgo.....	223	211	6	6
Jefferson.....	622	535	45	42
McLennan.....	295	249	17	29
Midland.....	151	139	5	7
Nolan.....	127	75	49	3
Nueces.....	252	204	17	31
Potter.....	195	163	19	13
Smith.....	252	195	33	24
Taylor.....	114	86	20	8
Victoria.....	177	149	19	9
Webb.....	100	75	23	2
Region 1-C....	7	7	0	0
Region 2-C....	15	11	3	1
Region 3-C....	21	19	1	1
Region 4-C....	45	40	0	5
Region 5-C....	29	14	14	1
Region 6-C....	21	19	0	2
Region 7-C....	4	4	0	0
Region 8-C....	17	15	1	1
Region 9-C....	2	2	0	0

TABLE NO. 6.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE
ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY AGE AND REASON SERVICE WAS REQUESTED

Age	Total	Reason for Request
		Dependency and Neglect	Behavior Problems	Handi-capped	Court Cases	Unmarried Mothers	Other
Total.....	3,312	2,226	312	107	57	46	564
Less than 1 year..	178	90	0	3	4	24	57
1 year.....	172	129	0	3	3	2	35
2 years.....	198	154	2	3	7	1	31
3 years.....	205	162	1	4	4	1	33
4 years.....	201	158	5	5	5	1	27
5 years.....	217	178	5	7	4	1	22
6 years.....	190	146	9	2	9	0	24
7 years.....	185	142	11	4	3	0	25
8 years.....	158	109	10	10	2	0	27
9 years.....	171	117	20	6	1	0	27
10 years.....	175	118	20	10	2	1	24
11 years.....	183	115	26	7	1	1	33
12 years.....	182	107	37	10	3	1	24
13 years.....	181	90	43	6	2	2	38
14 years.....	197	111	50	7	4	0	25
15 years.....	160	85	41	6	1	1	26
16 years.....	125	65	12	3	0	5	40
17 years.....	63	49	8	3	0	1	2
18 years.....	30	22	4	2	0	0	2
19 years.....	6	4	0	0	0	1	1
20 years.....	3	1	0	0	0	2	0
21 years and over.	4	0	0	0	0	1	3
Not reported.....	128	74	8	6	2	0	38

TABLE NO. 7.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE
ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY MARITAL STATUS OF PARENTS AND REASON SERVICE WAS REQUESTED

Marital Status of Parents on 1-1-47	Total	Reason For Request
		Dependency and Neglect	Behavior Problems	Handi-capped	Unmarried Mothers	Court Cases	Other
Total.....	3,312	2,226	312	107	46	57	564
Divorced, separated, deserted...	1,252	875	97	19	7	25	229
Married.....	838	535	113	55	9	18	108
Unmarried.....	341	253	5	9	25	4	45
Mother dead.....	230	155	27	10	3	2	33
Father dead.....	228	158	28	5	2	1	34
Remarried.....	217	139	25	5	0	6	42
Both parents dead.....	72	41	12	1	0	1	17
Other.....	49	25	5	3	0	0	16
Not reported.....	85	45	0	0	0	0	40

TABLE NO. 8.--PER CENT DISTRIBUTION OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE
ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY MARITAL STATUS OF PARENTS AND REASON SERVICE WAS REQUESTED

Marital Status of Parents on 1-1-47	Total	Reason For Request
		Dependency and Neglect	Behavior Problems	Handi-capped	Unmarried Mothers	Court Cases	Other
Total.....	100.0%	67.2%	9.4%	3.2%	1.4%	1.7%	17.0%
Divorced, separated, deserted....	37.8	26.4	2.9	0.6	0.2	0.8	6.9
Married.....	25.3	16.2	3.4	1.7	0.3	0.5	3.3
Unmarried.....	10.3	7.6	0.2	0.3	0.8	0.1	1.4
Mother dead.....	6.9	4.7	0.8	0.3	*	*	1.0
Father dead.....	6.9	4.8	0.8	0.2	*	*	1.0
Remarried.....	6.6	4.2	0.8	0.2	0.0	0.2	1.3
Both parents dead.....	2.2	1.2	0.3	*	0.0	*	0.5
Other.....	1.5	0.7	0.2	*	0.0	0.0	0.5
Not reported.....	2.5	1.4	0.0	0	0.0	0.0	1.2

* Less than 0.1 per cent.

TABLE NO. 9.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE
ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY RACE AND MARITAL STATUS OF PARENTS

Marital Status	Total		Number By Race
	Number	Per Cent	Anglo-American	Latin-American	Negro-American	Other
Total	3,312	100.0%	2,138	713	450	11
Divorced, separated, deserted	1,252	37.8	850	193	206	3
Married	838	25.3	618	149	66	5
Unmarried	341	10.3	152	101	88	0
Mother dead	230	6.9	109	87	34	0
Father dead	228	6.9	121	94	12	1
Remarried	217	6.6	168	28	21	0
Both parents dead	72	2.2	28	35	9	0
Other	49	1.5	25	17	7	0
Not reported	85	2.5	67	9	7	2

TABLE NO. 10.--NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE
ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY LOCATION AND MARITAL STATUS OF PARENTS

Marital Status of Parents on 1-1-47	Total	Location of Children
		Own Home	Relative's Home	Foster Home	Institution	Elsewhere
Total	3,312	2,131	391	506	257	27
Divorced, separated, deserted	1,252	829	160	158	92	13
Married	838	710	31	63	30	4
Unmarried	341	123	40	156	19	3
Mother dead	230	92	64	29	41	4
Father dead	228	153	28	24	23	0
Remarried	217	146	28	19	22	2
Both parents dead	72	10	23	27	11	1
Other	49	26	9	8	6	0
Not reported	85	42	8	22	13	0

TABLE NO. 11.—NUMBER OF CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE ON JANUARY 1, 1947, BY MARITAL STATUS OF PARENTS AND CHILD WELFARE UNIT

Unit	Total	Number of Children by Marital Status of Parents on 1-1-47
		Divorced, Separated, Deserted	Married	Un-married	Mother Dead	Father Dead	Re-married	Both Parents Dead	Other	Not Reported
Total.....	3,312	1,252	838	341	230	228	217	72	49	85
Bowie.....	149	54	29	17	15	22	5	3	3	1
Brown.....	148	40	47	5	10	11	27	1	7	0
Ector.....	31	10	3	3	0	5	6	0	0	4
El Paso.....	244	74	53	51	20	28	7	2	6	3
Grayson.....	71	31	22	10	6	1	0	0	0	1
Hidalgo.....	223	78	54	19	22	27	4	9	6	4
Jefferson.....	622	300	135	52	22	21	41	7	17	27
McLennan.....	295	114	83	23	15	9	38	7	3	3
Midland.....	151	53	58	13	12	6	5	0	0	4
Nolan.....	127	27	67	3	10	2	14	2	1	1
Nueces.....	252	68	38	40	17	19	48	15	3	4
Potter.....	195	116	38	15	17	4	1	2	0	2
Smith.....	252	102	68	33	20	12	5	4	0	8
Taylor.....	114	57	24	3	14	8	0	3	0	5
Victoria.....	177	40	75	12	10	24	11	4	0	1
Webb.....	100	28	8	19	9	19	0	12	0	5
Region 1-C.....	7	0	1	2	0	0	2	0	0	2
Region 2-C.....	15	9	2	3	0	0	0	1	0	0
Region 3-C.....	21	8	9	2	0	1	0	0	0	1
Region 4-C.....	45	22	3	7	4	4	0	0	0	5
Region 5-C.....	29	4	12	4	5	1	3	0	0	0
Region 6-C.....	21	12	1	1	1	3	0	0	2	1
Region 7-C.....	4	1	3	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Region 8-C.....	17	4	4	4	0	1	0	0	1	3
Region 9-C.....	2	0	1	0	1	0	0	0	0	0

18-Juvenile Delinquency

SUMMARY REPORT OF YOUTH SECTION
Citizens Crime Prevention Committee
201 Wesley Memorial Bldg.,
Feb. 19th., 1948

The following is a summary of results of the Youth Section meeting held January 16 and of subsequent telephone and personal conferences and special meetings

1. The Atlanta School Board has made available one of the Portables at Crew St. School, providing heating, lighting and janitorial services after school hours.

2. The Atlanta Recreation Dept. is starting with an every-afternoon and 2 night a week Recreation program for all age groups at the Crew St. Portable.

3. The Atlanta Lions Club is paying for a part-time trained recreation leader, secured and supervised by the Y.W.C.A. for a special teen-age program at Crew St. Portable.

4. The Painters and Carpenters Unions are donating the labor necessary and the Atlanta Paint, Varnish and Lacquer Dealers Association is donating the materials to redecorate Dr. Felton William's Atlanta's Mission on Pulliam St.

5. The Fifth District American Legion and its Ladies Auxiliary are paying for a part-time trained recreation leader, secured and supervised by the Y.W.C.A., for a special girls program at Atlanta's Mission.

6. A radio-phonograph combination was donated by the Women's Chamber of Commerce to the Crew St. School.

7. Mimeograph Machine was donated by Community Chest to the Carver Boys Club.

8. Books and Magazines for the Library of Carver Boys Club donated by the Women's Chamber of Commerce.

9. Set of reference books donated by Women's Chamber of Commerce to Girl Scouts.

10. Telephone Workers Club donating $150.00 to furnish small room at Atlanta's Mission Camp for Girls.

11. Booster Club paying $450.00 for furnishing one bedroom at Atlanta's Mission Camp for Girls.

12. A Commercial Artist, member of Fraternal Order of Eagles has volunteered to work with group of boys at Atlanta Boys Club.

13. A movie camera enthusiast, member of Eagles is giving volunteer time to Boys Club.

14. Two women volunteers are working with Public Affairs Committee of the Y.W.C.A. on improving movies shown to children.

15. Columbia Seminary Students have asked for a list of volunteer jobs they can undertake.

Julian Whatley, Chairman

SUGGESTIONS TO MINISTERS AND LAY CHURCH LEADERS from CHURCH SECTION, Citizens Crime Prevention Committee
201 Wesley Memorial Bldg. - La. 6391

TO HELP REDUCE CRIME AND DELINQUENCY, MINISTERS AND LAY CHURCH LEADERS CAN:

1. Help members of Congregation to become more aware of the causes of Crime and Delinquency and of the prevention measures which can be taken in the Home, School, Community.

2. Sponsor attractive, teen-age recreation programs for the youth served by the Church, permitting the boys and girls to plan and carry out their activities.

3. Sponsor Girl Scout, Boy Scout, Camp Fire troops, providing meeting space, necessary equipment and leadership.

4. Urge members to prepare themselves to serve as volunteers in Scout, Campfire, Y. W. C. A. and other similar programs, asking them to share their talents, hobbies, interests with boys or girls.

5. Organize and sponsor discussion groups of young people and adults on such subjects as Boy-Girl Relations, Preparation for Marriage, Family Life - Crime Prevention Committee can help find skilled and trained leaders, if Church desires such help.

6. Organize and sponsor discussion groups of parents, mothers and fathers on child guidance and training - Crime Prevention Committee can help as in 5 above.

7. Share with other Ministers and lay church leaders your knowledge of how to establish recreational, counselling, etc. programs, - Crime Prevention Committee will be glad to act as clearing-house for both those who will give much service and those who would like to receive it.

8. Help Congregation to develope keener interest in the well-being of others and of the community generally - urge their active interest and support of:

   School Programs, especially the further development of a specially skilled and trained visting teacher staff and the use of school buildings and facilities for community programs outside school hours;

   Public Recreation,, especially in sub-standard areas

   Slum Clearance Programs

   More adequate support of the Community Chest - so that the private social agencies can more nearly meet the needs of our children youth and adults.

   Public Welfare Department, Juvenile Court, Police - so that they can render the best possible service.

   Other Community Services

2-10-48

CITIZENS CRIME PREVENTION COMMITTEE - Fulton County & Atlanta

Why Needed - Purpose - Organization -Program

WHY NEEDED:

Records reveal that in 1927 and periodically since then, Judges, Grand Juries and civic and service organizations have "viewed with alarm" and passed resolutions about our "appalling crime and delinquency problem".

The latest nation-wide survey by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, shows Atlanta near the top among cities of like population in the incidence of crime -

There was a TWENTY-THREE percent INCREASE in serious crime in Fulton County in 1946 -

There was a TWENTY-NINE percent INCREASE in arrests of persons 16 to 21 years of age for serious crime in 1946 -

Records prove that the great majority of the criminals of today began their lives of crime by committing minor anti-social acts at a very early age -

It is well known that anti-social behavior is a composite program - the result of many influences on the individual -

Therefore the Citizens Crime Prevention Committee was organized to attack the causes of crime and delinquency and has the following purpose:

PURPOSE:

To marshall and unite the efforts of the entire citizenry of the Atlanta Area in action programs to attack and eliminate the causes of crime and delinquency -

To promote and support sound programs of crime prevention of existing agencies and organizations -

To secure more general understanding on the part of parents, teachers, church workers, civic club members and others - - of the causes of crime and delinquency - and of the preventive measures or services available.

ORGANIZATION:

The Citizens Crime Prevention Committee, composed of representatives of Business, Labor, Religious, Civic and Service Organizations, Schools, Police, Courts, Public and private Social Agencies - is the Governing Board.

The Board meets five times during the year, Sept., Nov., Jan., Mar., May, bimonthly except during the Summer and approves programs recommended by the Sections.

The Chairman is authorized to call emergency meetings of the Board when absolutely necessary.

The Executive Committee is elected by the Governing Board and is authorized to act between meetings of the Board. It approves section programs, secures necessary funds, supervises all expenditures and operations, sets qualifications, tenure and compensation of staff and reports its activities to the Board.

Sections, composed of Committee members and other citizens, meet as often as, in their discretion, is necessary to carry out their responsibilities.

PROGRAM:

Youth Section: Mr. Julian Whatley, Chairman, Mr. Pup Phillips, Vice-Chairman - assists youth-serving agencies to secure more adult leadership and - assists civic clubs to find practical and needed youth projects to sponsor.

Church Section: Dr. A. V. Gibson, Chairman, Mrs. W. B. Suddeth, Vice-Chairman, suggests and sponsors the development of specific crime and delinquency prevention programs by all Churches of the area, making its information and services available to all Ministers, Priests, Rabbis and lay Church leaders.

Protective Agencies Section: Mrs. Malcolm Bryan, Chairman, Mr. Parks Huntt, Vice-Chairman - help Schools, Police, Courts, Probation Service, Social Agencies, to secure a better understanding of each others' programs and services - so that early detection and treatment of delinquents and pre-delinquents may be more extensive.

Neighborhood Effort Section: Mr. Harllee Branch, Jr., Chairman, Mr. Hinton Longino, Vice-Chairman - assist residents of and agencies working in areas of high crime and delinquency incidence to find and identify neighborhood causes and develop specific and practical prevention programs.

Public Education and Information Section: Mr. Charles Yates, Chairman, Mr. Alex Miller, Vice-Chairman - plan and carry out campaigns to acquaint every citizen with the size, seriousness and cost of the crime problem - and with preventive measures available, utilizing press, radio, films, speakers, leaflets, etc.

Also promotes and arranges various educational opportunities for parents, such as classes, discussions, forums, etc., working with schools churches, P.T.A. and others.

Research Section: Mr. James W. Wiggins Chairman - secures and keeps up to date from all existing sources basic facts concerning crime and delinquency and obtains special information as needed by other Sections.

SOME CHARACTERISTICS
of
JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

The following are excerpts from intensive and extensive studies made over a period of 15 years by Drs. Sheldon and Eleanor T. Glueck, Professor and Research Associate in Criminology of Harvard Law School.

CHARACTERISTIC	DELINQUENTS
1. Parents had 5th grade or less education	50%
2. Separation, divorce or desertion	20%
3. One or both parents dead	25%
4. Families in marginal economic circumstances	68%
5. Families dependent on social agencies	8%
6. Mothers had to work	41.5%
7. Fathers unskilled, irregular workers	40%
8. Homes overcrowded, unclean, inadequate	62%
9. Neighborhood with corrupting influences such as street gangs, centers of vice or crime, no nearby playgrounds or parks, etc.	80%
10. Stopped school at 6th or 7th grade	46%
11. Stopped school at 8th grade	25%
12. Were gainfully employed	66%
13. Of those gainfully employed - those in street trades, newsboys, bootblacks, etc.	58%
14. Frequented streets, gambled or made other harmful use of leisure	93%
15. Never belonged to supervised playgrounds, Scouts, Y's, etc.	76%
16. Seriously delinquent prior to appearing before Juvenile Court	95%
17. Truants from school	67%
18. First symptons of maladjustment or misconduct shown at 6 years or less	14%
19. First symptoms shown at 10 years or less	63%
20. Continued to commit crimes during 5 years after appearing before Juvenile Court	88%

CITIZENS CRIME PREVENTION COMMITTEE - 9-11-47
201 Wesley Memorial Building
ATLANTA-FULTON COUNTY

18 - Juvenile Delinquency

OUR FUTURE CITIZENS

Proceedings

Community Conference on Juvenile Delinquency

APRIL 26-27, 1948
MUNICIPAL AUDITORIUM
ATLANTA, GA.

It Takes Many Things A Long Time To Make A Delinquent or Criminal

CHILDREN RECEIVING SERVICE FROM PUBLIC WELFARE AGENCIES,
BY STATE, DECEMBER 31, 1948*

State and Reporting Coverage[a]	Total
Total, 53 States	[c]223,187
Substantially Complete Reports:
Total.....	[c]213,491
Alabama	8,239
Alaska	611
Arizona	2,208
Arkansas	1,549
Colorado	[c]1,719
Delaware	[c]779
Dist. of Columbia	[c]2,800
Florida	1,685
Hawaii	[c]2,228
Idaho	261
Illinois	3,675
Indiana	13,660
Iowa	2,222
Kansas	[c]2,543
Kentucky	3,025
Louisiana	2,026
Maine	[c]3,233
Maryland	2,534
Massachusetts	9,654
Minnesota	[c]10,407
Mississippi	1,744
Missouri	5,096
Montana	843
Nebraska	1,608
Nevada	273
New Hampshire	[c]2,165
New Jersey	9,443
New Mexico	1,094
New York	41,506
North Carolina	7,510
North Dakota	1,005
Ohio	[c]16,417
Oklahoma	1335
Puerto Rico	6,806
Rhode Island	[c]1,996
South Carolina	3,984
South Dakota	578
Tennessee	886
Texas	3,631
Utah	908
Vermont	1,999
Virgin Islands	858
Virginia	7,070
Washington	6,472
West Virginia	~~5,959~~ 5,944
Wisconsin	6,993
Wyoming	269
Incomplete Reports:
Total.....	9,696
California	2,845
Connecticut	542
Georgia	1,593
Michigan	1,080
Oregon...	871
Pennsylvania	2,765

[a]The States classified as having substantially complete coverage reported 90% or more of the children served. Those classified as incomplete reported less than 90% of the children served.

[c]Includes a number of children for whom whereabouts are unknown (eg. not known whether they are in homes of parents or relatives, in foster homes, in institutions, or elsewhere)

* Source: Federal Security Agency, Social Security Administration, Children's Bureau (Division of Statistical Research, Social Statistics Section, June 1949), Washington 25, D. C.

	Total	Percent
Continental U. S.	212,684	100.0%
13 Southern States	44,277	20.8
Rest of U. S.	168,407	79.2

SRC computation

18 - Juvenile Delinquency

A SUMMARY OF THE MOST PRESSING NEEDS

EDUCATIONAL, HEALTH and WELFARE

OF AMERICA'S 46 MILLION CHILDREN

(17 YEARS and UNDER)

RECEIVED
APR 7 1949
Southern Regional Council

This statement was prepared by
THE AMERICAN PARENTS COMMITTEE
EDUCATION FUND, INC.

from reports of U. S. Government, National Education Association, American Academy of Pediatrics, National Child Labor Committee, National Citizens Council for Migrant Labor, National Commission on Children and Youth, etc.

THERE is great inequality of health, educational and welfare facilities among the States. In the poorer States the citizens have not enough income that can be taxed by the State or by the towns in which they live to provide adequate schools and health and welfare services. Furthermore, in the poorer States there are as many as 50 percent more children per 1000 adult population than in the richer States. So children unfortunate enough to be born in the poorer States are getting a particularly raw deal! They are growing up without adequate schooling, without proper health facilities and without decent welfare services such as are provided in the more prosperous communities and States. Even in the richer States many schools are overcrowded and unsafe, and the child health and welfare services pitifully inadequate. Can the United States afford such shocking neglect of children?

Children are our most precious and promising national asset. They alone can assure our future as a democratic people. And yet we are subjecting them to the conditions described below:

Educational Needs of Children

More than 4 million children of school age do not attend school at all either because there are no schools or because school attendance laws are laxly enforced. Many children go to school only six months a year. In many communities there is no schooling beyond the eighth grade. Many schools are fire-traps. There are still about 100,000 one-room wooden schoolhouses, where one teacher teaches children of all ages. 75,000 teaching positions remain unfilled; 110,000 "emergency teachers" are being employed without proper qualifications. Money for education is not only too little but is unequally distributed; some communities spend sixty times as much on education per child as others do.

Schools are already overcrowded. In some communities children have to attend two-shift, even three-shift schools. Because of the sharp rise in the birth rate during and since the war increasing numbers of children will be flooding the schools. In three years (1951) school enrollments will be up 2,400,000 more than in 1948; in eight years (1956) 8,000,000 over 1948. The estimated cost of needed new school construction between now and 1956 is $6,800,000,000 or $850,000,000 a year above present school expense budgets.

Health Needs of Children

Every hour 12 babies die! And many, many mothers also die needlessly. At least one-half the maternal deaths and one-third the infant deaths are preventable. Although the national death rate for babies under a year old has been reduced to 34 per 1000 births, yet in one State 28 babies out of 1000 died, while in the State at the other end of the list, 100 out of 1000 died. Nearly a quarter of a million mothers and babies have no medical care at childbirth and during the first few days of life.

Seventy-five percent of American school children need dental care; 10 million have defective vision; 4 million have hearing defects. Half a million have orthopedic and plastic defects. 175,000 have active tuberculosis. Rheumatic fever and diseases of the heart cripple half a million children.

Forty percent of our counties have no hospitals. Twenty-five percent of our children live in areas where no full-time public health services are available.

Only 50,000 out of the 200,000 school units have a school lunch program. Approximately two-thirds of school-age children do not benefit. Growing evidence proves that the school lunch program, by providing proper nourishment, if only for one meal a school day improves health, reduces absences from school.

One out of every 20 American children is destined, as conditions are now, to be a patient at sometime in a mental institution. Most mental difficulties begin in childhood, yet 25 States have no child guidance clinic in any community. Full time clinical service for child guidance is provided in only 27 of the largest cities.

Welfare Needs of Children

Nearly four million children are fatherless, motherless, or both. Yet six out of every ten such children neither receive public assistance (grants for aid to dependent children) nor Social Security benefits (as survivors of men who have died after being in covered employment). Some 564,000 children are receiving Social Security benefits as survivors. The average monthly benefit for a family, in which a single child receives a benefit, is $13.10. Half the children whose fathers died in 1946-47 did not qualify for even this meager benefit. For one million of the children receiving public assistance (23 out of every 1000 under 18 years) the average grant was only $24.21 per child per month. Five-sixths of all U. S. counties have no full-time child welfare workers paid from public funds one-half are concentrated in seven states, mainly in urban counties.

Other Needs of Children

Child Labor: More than 2,000,000 boys and girls 14 through 17 work, part or full time. This is twice as many as were gainfully employed in 1940. These figures do not include children under 14, many thousands of whom work in agriculture. 56% of these children are not attending school. Federal laws protect only about 20% of children against harmful employment, in industries which ship goods interstate.

Juvenile Delinquency: At least 250,000 youngsters annually come before juvenile courts.

Children in Migrant Farm Families: Hundreds of thousands of children in families of migrant farm laborers fail to receive the health, education, and welfare benefits available to children of fixed residence.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF THIS PAMPHLET can be obtained for: 1 copy 5c and a stamped addressed envelope; 6 copies — 25c postpaid; 50 copies — $1.00 postpaid; 100 copies — $2.00 postpaid. For larger quantities, write for prices.

AMERICAN PARENTS COMMITTEE
EDUCATION FUND, INC.
52 Vanderbilt Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

18-Juvenile delinquency

RECEIVED
APR 20 1949
Southern Regional Council

JUVENILE COURTS IN NORTH CAROLINA

By Wiley B. Sanders

Here is a book which explodes popular misconceptions and reveals shameful weaknesses in one of our most important social institutions. The medieval conditions of many North Carolina jails, for example, have become an old story, but how many people realize, for example, that as recently as 1944, 19.2% of all delinquents held in county jails were under fourteen years of age? Equally surprising are other findings: such as the recent decrease in delinquency hearings for boys and the increase for girls; and statistics on the nature of charges.

Any brief statement cannot even suggest the many startling and significant materials discovered and evaluated by Mr. Sanders, who the Asheville Times says has placed the state and its children in his debt for this competent volume. Presenting statistics and systematic information on 107 courts, the author concludes that much good has been accomplished, but he also asserts that only by focusing attention on such faults as he reveals can the system be improved.

"Every one who in any way has a sense of relation and responsibility for the conduct pattern of children will find it intriguing; that would seem to include teachers, preachers, doctors, social workers, intelligent parents, and those charged with public media interpretation. This book will serve as a guide for a new counter attack on a major problem in our State." -- The Durham Herald.

224 pages. Size 6" x 9". $4.00

- -

The University of North Carolina Press
Box 510
Chapel Hill, North Carolina

Gentlemen:

Please send me _____ cop___ of JUVENILE COURTS IN NORTH CAROLINA by Wiley B. Sanders, at $4.00 per copy.

Remittance enclosed _____ Name _____

Send C. O. D. _____ Address _____

Bill me _____ City and State _____

4/22/49

Dear Mr. Mitchell:

Dr. Hill has asked me to send these announcements to you because he feels that you are especially interested in this phase of the program. He would appreciate your passing them along to your constituency, friends and staff members.

Jeanette P. Cameron

J. P. Cameron
Secretary to Dr. Hill

18- Juvenile Delinquency

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY

DIVISION OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCES
DEPARTMENTS OF HISTORY AND PREHISTORY, POLITICAL SCIENCE, SOCIOLOGY AND ANTHROPOLOGY

Foundations of Social Science

Seminars in Crime and Delinquency
April 25, 26, 27, 1949

Dr. Mabel A. Elliott
Chairman, Department of Sociology
Pennsylvania College for Women

RECEIVED
APR 25 1949
Southern Regional Council

Seminars:
3:45-5:45 Monday, April 25 - "Theories of Criminality"

Tuesday, April 26 - "Types of Criminal and Delinquency Research and Special Needs for Further Research"

Wednesday, April 27 - "Treatment of Criminals and Delinquents"

PUBLIC FORUM:
8 P. M. Wednesday, April 27 - "Delinquent Behavior in Peoples and the Community's Responsibility for the Prevention of Delinquency"

The forum will be held in the Exhibition Room of the Atlanta University Library. Meeting place of seminars to be announced.

Dr. Elliott will be available for conferences with interested students and faculty. Arrangements may be made through the Office of the Department of Sociology, Room 209, Administration Building, WA. 7956.

THEORIES OF CRIMINALITY

Lecture I

I. Personality Theories
   A. Biological
      1. Heredity Factors
      2. Developmental Factors
      3. Race

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arthur E. Fink, Causes of Crime, University of Pennsylvania, 1938, p. 211.
M. F. Ashley Montagu, "The Biologist Looks at Crime", The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, September, 1941.
C. Lombroso, Crime, Its Causes and Remedies (translated by Henry P. Horton) Little Brown and Company, Boston, 1911.
Charles Goring, The English Convict, London, 1913.
Earnest A. Hooton, The American Criminal, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1939, Vol. I, Chapter VII.
Elliott and Merrill, "The Adult Offender", in Social Disorganization, Harper and Brothers, 1941.
W. A. Bonger, Race and Crime (translated by Margaret M. Horduk), New York, Columbia University Press, 1943.
Hans von Hentig, Crime, Causes and Conditions, Chapter VII, "Race and Crime" and Chapter VIII, "The Doctrine of Physical Determinism"

   B. Psychological
      1. Mentality
      2. Emotional
         a. Insecurity
         b. "Mental" illness

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Herman M. Adler and Myrtle R. Worthington, "The Scope of the Problem of Delinquency and Crime as Related to Mental Deficiency", Jl. of Psycho-Asthenics 30: 47-57 (1925).
Simon H. Tulchin, Intelligence and Crime, University of Chicago Press, Chicago, 1939.
Franz Alexander and William Healy, Roots of Crime, New York, Alfred A. Knopf, 1935.
William Healy and Augusta F. Bronner, New Light on Delinquency and Its Treatment, Yale University Press, 1936.

II. Specific Types of Offenders
   A. The Woman Offender
   B. Murderers
   C. Sex Offenders
   D. Embezzlers
   E. Conscientious Objectors, et. al.

Lecture II -"Types of Criminal and Delinquency Research and Special Needs for Further Research"

I. Monographic Research on Characteristics of Criminals and of the Causation of Crime

A. Single Explanation type, as treated for example by following and many others

H. H. Goddard, Juvenile Delinquency (feeblemindedness), New York, Dodd, Mead and Company, 1921.

Breckinridge and Abbott, The Delinquent Girl and the Home, Russell Sage Foundation, New York, 1912.

William Healy, The Individual Delinquent.

Thorsten Sellin, Crime and The Depression, Social Science Research Council, New York, 1937.

Dorothy S. Thomas, Social Aspects of the Business Cycle, London, George Rontledge & Sons, London, 1925.

Blumer, and Hauser, Movies and Delinquency, New York, Macmillan, 1933.

Edwin H. Sutherland, "White Collar Criminality", American Sociological Review, April, 1940.

B. Multiple Factors

Cyril Burt, The Young Delinquent.

Healy and Bronner, Delinquents and Criminals, Their Making and Unmaking, New York, Macmillan.

Sheldon and Eleanor Glueck, Five Hundred Criminal Careers.

_____, One Thousand Juvenile Delinquents, Harvard University Press, 1934.

Morris Ploscow, Some Causative Factors in Criminality, National Commission on Law Observance, Vol. I, 1931.

Hans von Hentig, The Criminal and His Victim, New Haven, Yale University Press, 1948.

C. Crime Surveys

The Missouri Crime Survey

The Illinois Crime Survey

The Reports of the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, 1931.

D. Institutional Surveys

The Report of the Kansas (Temporary) Public Welfare Commission 1933.

E. Crime Among the General Population

Austin L. Porterfield, Youth in Trouble, 1947.

F. Criminal Law

G. Texts - Compilatory Research

II. Research Needs for More Extensive Study of General Behavior Patterns.

A. Need for further study of relation between socio-economic-political status and criminal legislation, defining norms, etc.

Lecture III - "Treatment of Criminals and Delinquents

I. Socio-political aegis of criminal law and the conflicting viewpoints existing in our law.

Mabel A. Elliott, Conflicting Penal Theory in Statutory Criminal Law, University of Chicago Press, 1931.

II. Surveys of the after careers of ex-convicts and delinquents.

Glueck and Glueck, studies, previously cited.

Mabel A. Elliott, Correctional Education and The Delinquent Girl, Harrisburg, 1929.

III. Surveys Within Prisons

Mabel A. Elliott, Coercion in Penal Treatment, 1947.

IV. Parole Procedures

The Attorney General's Survey on Release Procedures, 1935-1939

"The von-Hentig-Bates Parole Controversy." (Elliott) Jr. Criminal Law, 1944, (July, August).

"The Four Million" in New York

By Samuel R. Milbank

*Chairman, the New York State Citizens' Committee of One Hundred for Children and Youth

The care and development of children is a responsibility of all the people, and I know that you will, therefore, go to the people of New York State for suggestions, ideas, opinions and facts to consider in your deliberations." With this charge Governor Thomas E. Dewey, on a memorable spring day in 1950, set the course to be followed by the New York State Citizens' Committee of One Hundred for Children and Youth.

Some fourteen months later the committee, having gone to the people, reported to the people. It had completed a painstaking study of services for the four million young people of the State. The report, entitled "The Four Million," is a 200-page document that is both an inventory and a blueprint. It is the embodiment of what was found, both good and bad, and what should be done to improve the spiritual, emotional, and physical development of the State's greatest resource: its younger citizens.

A few days after "The Four Million" appeared, The New York Times editorially expressed the hope that the report, "unlike many others which lie in dusty files, will become a living thing, a source of inspiration to community agencies and to the public, where, in the last analysis, responsibility rests."

Although this observation was prompted by an undertaking in New York, the concept of public responsibility quite obviously crosses all State borders, to apply with equal force everywhere in a democracy. The project in New York was paralleled, in one fashion or another, in every State and territory.

The nation-wide appraisal of child care and protection was made under the stimulus of preparation for the 1950 Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth. If one could call the roll of all who took part, directly or indirectly, in this vast enterprise, some 100,000 names would be sounded. Many of them would identify officials of State governments, for the studies generally were conducted by existing State youth agencies, or by specially appointed committees, assisted and supported by appropriate State departments and agencies.

The latter pattern was followed in New York. The ultimate purpose of the endeavors here, and in the other States, was to produce action for the benefit of children and youth. The project in New York was organized and executed to serve this objective in two rather definite and complementary ways: by bringing to public attention the information that is requisite to such action, and by presenting the information in such a manner as would sharpen the public's sense of responsibility for taking the action.

One of the strengths of the New York State Citizens' Committee of One Hundred for Children and Youth was that the Governor appointed it only after the greatest care had been taken to assure that the membership would be widely and strongly representative of the people of the State. To lay the groundwork for this, and to provide high level government support and cooperation, there was first appointed an Advisory Committee, under the chairmanship of the State Commissioner of Health. The other members were the State Commissioners of Agriculture and Markets, Correction, Education, Labor, Mental Hygiene, and Social Welfare, the Chairman of the State Parole Board and the Director of the State Youth Commission.

Three months later the Citizens' Committee was named. It was perhaps the most representative group of its kind in the State's history. Members were chosen from all sections of the State, from the larger religious groups, from management and labor, from the major political parties, from the fields of medicine, nursing, law, probation, social work, teaching, education, recreation, institutional care, etc. They came from the courts, the police, veterans' organizations, granges, women's clubs, scouting, 4-H clubs, the Y's and other groups.

To do the job of gathering and weighing the facts, the committee broke the problem into parts and organized sections on child care, child health, mental health, education, youth services, rural youth, industrial youth, and protective and correctional care. A member of the committee served as chairman of each section, and an official of the appropriate department of the State government served as secretary and technical adviser for the section.

The whole structure, as built in New York State,

*Mr. Milbank is President of the New York State Charities Aid Association, Vice-President of the Milbank Memorial Fund, a Trustee of the Community Service Society of New York City, and of Barnard College.

Reprinted from State Government, January, 1952.
Published by The Council of State Governments, Chicago, Illinois

therefore, rested on a foundation of partnership between government and private citizen. Each section, with members of the Citizens' Committee serving as a nucleus, took on additional members, both lay and professional, and before the organization of the sections was completed, the membership numbered more than 600.

As the work proceeded, hundreds of additional persons contributed by responding to questionnaires and otherwise providing facts and opinions on the needs of children and youth. Most of these persons were associated with cooperating organizations which already had available or could obtain material that was sought. The inquiry reached in many directions, into all facets of the subject and into all sections of the State. It was a grassroots study, searching and persistent, the most exhaustive of its kind ever undertaken in the State.

The mass of raw material thus acquired was analyzed and recorded so that each section could prepare a report. The section reports together comprised more than 2,500 typewritten pages of findings and recommendations. To prepare the final report of the Citizens' Committee, on the basis of these section reports, there was appointed a Steering Committee, consisting of the eight section chairmen, the State Commissioners of Health and Welfare, representatives of the three largest religious groups in the State, and the Chairman of the Citizens' Committee. This group, it will be noted, was large enough to be strongly representative, and small enough for a working assignment of this sort. The draft resulting from the Steering Committee's deliberations was then approved by the Citizens' Committee as a whole, and "The Four Million" went to press.

THROUGHOUT its 200 pages, "The Four Million" stresses the concept that child development must be viewed and nurtured as a whole, that growth embraces the emotions as well as the physique, and the spirit together with the intellect. A companion theme is that the home, school, church, and community all have an influence upon and a responsibility for the maturing of the child.

The report also reflects, through repeated emphasis, the conviction of the Citizens' Committee that religion is of the utmost importance in guiding children to maturity and throughout life.

To present the situation fairly and with validity, "The Four Million," of course, cites strengths as well as weaknesses in services for children. The report calls for improvements in many areas of child care and protection. But it points out that existing services are of a relatively high order. New York has, in general, sound laws relating to the health and welfare of its children, and sound policies and administrative practices. State budgetary provisions are reasonably adequate. By and large, too, the programs of local government agencies are basically sound, as are the programs of voluntary organizations.

The committee found, however, that services were inadequate, sometimes acutely so, in the rural areas of the State, where some 750,000 children and youth live. A large portion of these young people have not been provided with the more modern community benefits in health, education, social services, etc. In urban areas, too, there was found need for expansion and improvement of services.

To set forth here an adequate summary of 200 pages of findings and recommendations would consume a prohibitive amount of space. On the other hand, some of the more or less specific facts and conclusions of "The Four Million," it may be assumed, will be of interest to readers of STATE GOVERNMENT for purposes of comparison. The following paragraphs, therefore, are offered in the form of abstracts, but with some caution. They embrace only some of the findings and recommendations, and because of the need of compression, they cannot convey the more readable style of "The Four Million," which was intended expressly to reach laymen as well as professionals. Nor should they be read without bearing in mind that "The Four Million" necessarily turns the spotlight on those children who are distressed, underprivileged, handicapped, or in trouble, whereas the great mass of children are enjoying normal lives and are steadily advancing toward maturity. Because of space limitations, the many accomplishments of public and private agencies cannot be cited here, except in most general terms. The abstracted findings and recommendations are presented under the chapter headings employed in "The Four Million."

The Family: Many children today are denied the security and influence found in family unity, due to disruptions of the family, which often seem attributable to personality and emotional conflicts, heightened in many cases by economic need. The efforts of public and private agencies in helping families hold together have shown marked progress in the State, but additional efforts are needed to strengthen programs for the preservation of family solidarity. There is need for more parent education, more family life education in the schools, more of the fine influence to be found in religion, closer school-home relationships, better recreational programs, and more counseling and guidance services for parents and children. Also, more homemaker services seem to be required in many sections of the State, and a careful study should be made of the needs within various communities for day-care centers, particularly in view of the demands that may be made for the employment of mothers in defense industries.

There should be more teamwork within the community between individuals and agencies concerned with services to the family. It is also recommended that a statewide committee be appointed, to consist of members of the clergy and of the legal, medical, and social work professions, to develop a program for stabilizing family life.

Care Away from Home: When it is necessary for a child to receive foster care—care outside his own home for an extended period of time—it is desirable, in most instances although not in every case, to place the child with a family. A study of children in foster care in New York during the past ten years shows a decrease in the number of children in institutions, with a shift generally from institutions to family placements. Nevertheless, there are not enough foster homes, and the shortage is particularly acute for children with physical or emotional handicaps and those whose problems are complicated by delinquency.

The number of child adoptions in New York in 1949 was about two and one half times the number in 1940. More attention should be given, however, to the placement of older children, those with certain racial backgrounds, and those with physical handicaps. Furthermore, there should be greater recognition that adoption services are effective only when they are related to sound basic services for dependent and neglected children, such as good boarding home programs and adequate services for unmarried mothers.

Education: Schools in New York, like those all over the nation, have suffered from such problems as the bumper crop of "war babies" now beginning school; from overcrowded classes; from sometimes inadequate teacher personnel; from inadequate supplies and outmoded buildings in some instances; and from various economic and other pressures on teachers and other personnel.

The schools themselves must give training and education suited to the abilities, needs, and interests of the individual child. This requires a program that is broad and flexible, and the trend in the State is in this direction. Some elementary schools, however, still give attention almost exclusively to academic subjects, and in the secondary schools curricula are not sufficiently adapted to all students.

If the teacher is to have the necessary understanding of her pupils, she must be supported by a range of other school personnel, including school psychologists, professionally trained attendance workers, guidance counselors, visiting teachers, school nurses, dental hygiene teachers, etc. Many more of these workers are needed in the schools, particularly in the rural areas.

Good schools, like good communities, depend upon the support of the citizens, and it is recommended that school boards and administrators encourage more lay participation and interest in the schools, including the participation and interest of people who have no official or family connection with the schools, as well as those who are in parent-teacher associations and other groups.

Physical and Mental Health: Although a wide range of health services is available to children and youth in New York, there are various gaps which should be filled. The periodic medical examination, for instance, is an essential element in any health program for children; in New York infants up to one year old generally are receiving such examination, but many between the ages of one and five, for whom the regular examination continues to be important, are not. Greater effort should be made by physicians, nurses, teachers, and all others concerned with children to impress upon parents the value of health supervision after infancy.

The State has made progress in establishing county and city health departments with full-time personnel, but 40 per cent of the upstate residents still do not have the protection and benefits of locally coordinated health services.

Favorable legislation already exists and generous State financial aid is available for establishment of full-time local health departments; unprotected local communities are urged to take the necessary action through appropriate local governmental bodies.

Despite increased emphasis in recent years on the mental and emotional health of children, and the expansion of programs by official and voluntary agencies in the State, this aspect of child development should be promoted even more strongly. More attention should be paid to mental health principles and practices in the basic training of all individuals and groups working intensively with children and youth. Spiritual leaders, teachers, nurses, social workers, health educators, and many others must play more active roles in the field of mental health.

There is a widely recognized but serious need for more child guidance clinics, and here a primary problem is the finding of personnel to staff the clinics. More adequate and competent training should be given to personnel supporting the clinics, including social workers, teachers, nurses, and others.

Physically Handicapped Children and Youth: New York has more than 200,000 children whose development is impeded by physical handicaps, and although services for the handicapped have grown rapidly in recent years, many of these children still are not receiving full care and protection. Some are being educated in special school classes, but there are many children in smaller communities for whom such facilities are not available. More adequate allowance of State funds is recommended for the education of certain types of physically handicapped children.

Necessary medical services are unavailable to many handicapped children; it is particularly important for them to have the services of teams of specialists, all of whom may contribute to the children's special needs, including those of an emotional and social character. Steps should be taken to assure the earliest possible detection of handicapping conditions and the most effective diagnosis and treatment.

It is important that every effort be made to keep the handicapped in the main stream of social and educational growth so far as possible. It is also important to combat the tendency to concentrate too exclusively on the problems of the more seriously handicapped, and thus give insufficient attention to the larger numbers of children who are less seriously handicapped but who also need special assistance.

All the physically handicapped would benefit from further coordination between the various individuals and organizations having a special interest in one or another category of the handicapped.

Mentally Handicapped Children and Youth: Another group of handicapped children, the mentally retarded, requires many more services than are now being provided. Many of these children could be trained for effective citizenship if they had special education; many could be employed in some capacity, and many could be taught to take better care of themselves.

Knowledge about the extent and nature of the problem of the mentally retarded in New York is meager. But it is clear that there are severe shortages in nurseries, special school classes, and clinical facilities for them.

A legislative commission should be established to study the entire question of mental retardation in the State, and funds should be supplied for research into causes, prevention, and treatment.

Children and Youth in Trouble: A study of services and facilities for children and youth in trouble confirms the principle that prevention is to be preferred to cure, and that treatment in the community is to be preferred to the use of institutions. Many of the delinquents in public and private institutions in the State have become delinquent because the family has failed to give the necessary security, guidance, and training; or, in a larger sense, because the community has failed the family.

A general strengthening of community programs to combat juvenile delinquency is strongly recommended, although the State government has been giving assistance to many communities for this purpose in recent years.

In New York City, the children's courts have full-time judges, appointed by the Mayor. The wisdom of leaving the selection of these judges entirely in the hands of one "as busy, harrassed and subject to pressure as any mayor of New York City must be" is questioned. Consideration should be given to limiting the mayor to appointments from a list of candidates submitted by a panel, on which there would be a substantial representation of agencies interested in the field of child welfare.

Of the fifty-seven counties outside New York City only eleven have judges who devote full time to the affairs of children. The children's court judge must be concerned with dependent, neglected, abandoned, and physically handicapped children, as well as with those who may be delinquent. The need for more full-time children's court judges in this upstate area is obvious.

In both New York City and upstate, probation services, which are essential to any children's court, should be strengthened by raising standards of selection and training and by appropriate adjustments in salary. Of the fifty-seven upstate counties, eleven make no provision for any full-time salaried probation services, and in thirty-eight upstate counties probation services are being rendered to the children's courts by departments which generally serve all the other courts within the county. The question of a State subsidy to help meet probation costs should be considered.

State and private training schools for delinquents are showing progress in the individualization of treatment, education, and training; the concept that the institution has only a custodial mission is falling further into the discard.

Institutions for the youth group (16–21 years old), however, were found to be inadequate. The two State reformatories for males are overcrowded and, as units, are too large for effective, individualized treatment. Thus, there should be more and diversified institutions for the application of effective treatment and training methods to the various types of delinquent youth. There is also a need for more specialized personnel to staff the institutions.

A study of laws relating to youth in trouble, with particular reference to the Youthful Offender Law and the Wayward Minor Act, showed that there was wide variation in their administration by the courts. Clarification is needed as to whether both laws are required and, if so, how they should be applied.

Children and Youth in the World of Work: The child labor standards of New York, in the main, adequately serve the accepted principle that boys and girls, for a rounded development, must have enough time for both schooling and recreation, and that their work must not impair their physical or mental health or their morals.

New York's general legal maximum for working hours of children under 16 is 44 hours a week, and for children from 16 to 18, 48 hours a week. It may be time now to bring the 44-hour and 48-hour limits on children's employment into conformity with prevailing industrial practice, which is the 40-hour week. More restrictive measures, of course, already apply to children who are carrying the double burden of school and of work and thereby need special protection.

As regards the employment of children in hazardous occupations, it was found that for 40 years there has been no substantial change in the State law forbidding such employment. Most of the law's provisions apply to children under 16, but 18 is becoming the accepted minimum age in the United States for working at hazardous occupations. New York State accordingly should consider setting a higher minimum age for such employment.

The Child and the Community: In many communities of the State cooperative planning for recreation should be accelerated, so that children may take advantage of existing recreation opportunities and additional facilities may be effectively developed.

All communities should determine what youth-serving programs are in operation locally, and a central agency should integrate this information into an accurate statewide directory of youth services. Steps should be taken to promote better public understanding of the achievements and needs of youth-serving agencies.

Experience has shown that councils of social agencies and similar community-wide groups provide effective coordination leading to community betterment. Citizen advisory committees should be developed throughout the State for community services, and these committees should unite in planning with the boards of directors of private agencies.

NOW, WHAT of the response to "The Four Million?" What of follow-up action? These questions quite naturally have long been in the minds of all who participated in the project. Indeed, there was established, following the White House Conference, a national voluntary organization to encourage, guide, and coordinate follow-up activities through the country. Known as the National Midcentury Committee for Children and Youth, with headquarters in New York City, the group reports that almost every State is "doing something definite to put into effect the recommendations developed in its study."

The question of whether a follow-up organization was needed in New York was carefully weighed. Two facts were clear. First, the State already has many strong and experienced agencies, both official and private, which are devotedly concerned with the well-being of younger people. Secondly, through the years there has developed a close and fruitful cooperation between government and voluntary efforts in this field, as in others.

Against this background, it was decided that existing agencies generally suffice for the work, although they need more public understanding, public support, and public participation. It was also recognized that each agency could take up certain of the new tasks outlined by the Citizens' Committee; for most of the tasks, indeed, had been suggested, directly or indirectly, by the agencies themselves during the period of gathering material for the report.

Nevertheless, there appeared to be need for a group which would serve in the role of coordinator. The Governor, therefore, has appointed a coordinating body under the chairmanship of the State Commissioner of Education and composed of the same State officials who constituted the Advisory Committee that worked with the Citizens' Committee of One Hundred. To provide additional continuity, and even more importantly, to assure that the public would be directly represented by private citizens, the Governor named the chairmen of the eight sections of the Citizens' Committee to advise with the coordinating body. The State Youth Commission serves as the secretariat, and the Citizens Committee of One Hundred, having completed its assignment, has disbanded.

Thus the Governor wisely preserved, for the follow-up program, the public-private partnership that characterized the studying and reporting phases of the enterprise.

AT THIS writing, some four and a half months have elapsed since "The Four Million" appeared. It is, of course, too early to measure the report's impact in terms of new or expanded programs for children and youth. But, to date, "The Four Million" has been received with enthusiasm. The first printing of 5,000 has been exhausted, by distribution to key individuals and organizations, public and private, and by filling of requests for additional copies. To fill 1,500 more requests, it was necessary to reprint, and additional requests still are being received daily.

Throughout the State there have been many productive meetings on how various recommendations of "The Four Million" can best be put into effect. Some of these discussions have been held by statewide organizations, like the New York State Association of Councils of Social Agencies and the State Charities Aid Association, both voluntary groups. Others have been of a more local nature. In many instances the leadership has been taken by prominent individuals who participated in the study as members of the Citizens' Committee or of its sections.

In this connection, it is noteworthy that at least two of the section reports, on child care and youth services, are being reproduced for wide circulation with the assistance of the State Department of Social Welfare and the State Youth Commission, respectively. Another report, based to a considerable extent on the findings and recommendations of the child health section, is being published cooperatively by the section, the State Health Department, the State Medical Society, and the American Academy of Pediatrics.

The more detailed information of all these reports, which may be considered supplementary to "The Four Million," accordingly, is being made available to State and local agencies which are in a position to take action. There is a good deal of evidence, therefore, that "The Four Million," directly and indirectly, is in fact fulfilling its purpose of informing and stimulating those who can and should act for the benefit of the State's four million young people.

This, then, has been the story of New York State's participation in a great national movement on behalf of children and youth. In the light of the reaction to "The Four Million," New Yorkers are justified in expecting that services for children will expand and improve until all the State's young people receive the best which current knowledge affords.

"The Four Million," as Governor Dewey has pointed out, has implications even beyond the prospect of such benefits. In accepting the report from the Citizens' Committee of One Hundred, the Governor said:

"This document is further evidence of the practical operation of a free republic. Our citizens do not look upon their government as something separate and apart from their lives but as a living social force of which they are creative components. It is in a nation composed of such citizens that our children can thrive and grow and, in the foreseeable future, achieve a world of lasting peace."

(Mat - Law enforcement Las ✓ Ben Alm

DADE COUNTY COURT HOUSE

SHERIFF'S OFFICE

DADE COUNTY

BUREAU OF JUVENILE AID & EDUCATION

MIAMI 32, FLORIDA

J. B. "SONNY" HENDERSON
SHERIFF
POST OFFICE BOX 3038
MIAMI 30, FLORIDA

December 24, 1952

Dr. Frederick B. Routh
Asst. Professor of Human Relations, Univ. of Miami
Coral Gables 34, Florida.

Dear Dr. Routh:

Hereinafter are set forth the policies, aims and objectives of the Bureau of Juvenile Aid & Education, an office recently established pursuant to directives of the Sheriff's Department:

The alarming, unremitting and quasi-universal increase, in violence as well as incidence, of juvenile crime and delinquency, deplorable condition particularly accentuated in the metropolitan area of Greater Miami by an ever-growing influx of new residents, transients and tourists of heterogeneous origins, and aggravated by widespread family dislocations directly or indirectly stemming from the Korean emergency, has confronted the chief law enforcement authority of Dade County—the Sheriff's Department—with the compelling urgency of establishing a permanent Bureau of Juvenile Aid and Education.

This newly-constituted office has been commissioned with the duties and responsibilities of planning and organizing the creation and supervising the execution of county-wide programs of action, whose over-all objective is the speedy and effective curbing, and possibly ultimate reduction to a point of relative insignificance, of that malignant by-product of our times—rampant adolescent crime and delinquency—in this urban conglomeration of South Florida.

The accomplishment of this worthy, admittedly ambitious, goal entails and fervently envisages the active and generous cooperation of the highly civic-minded men and women of Dade County, who—whether individually, severally, or in existent organizations, including those whose activities only tangentially appertain to law-abiding, as well as delinquent, minors—have long distinguished themselves and earned the abiding gratitude of their beloved community by the rendering of selfless, invaluable, humanitarian services.

To this end, the Bureau has been designated to function as a central authority, coordinating related tasks of disparate local youth-serving agencies, private and public: educational, religious, social welfare, civic, public information, juridical, and law enforcement; singly and together engaged in tackling the essential problem of accurately re-evaluating the underlying pathological, psychological, sociological and economic factors contributing to or causative of youthful irresponsibilities and transgressions. Upon the basis of exhaustive findings derived therefrom, proceed with appropriate means to assist the juvenile's

(Please Turn to Page 2)

DADE COUNTY COURT HOUSE

SHERIFF'S OFFICE

DADE COUNTY

BUREAU OF JUVENILE AID & EDUCATION

MIAMI 32, FLORIDA

J. B. "SONNY" HENDERSON
SHERIFF
POST OFFICE BOX 3038
MIAMI 30, FLORIDA

CONTINUED:

re-integration into the normal patterns of society; and, as corollary thereto, recommend the institution of incisively deterrent measures or laws designed to minimize the occurrence of juvenile lawlessness within the county.

Inasmuch as the Statutes of Florida specifically provide, through the creation of county juvenile courts, for the juridical assistance and rehabilitation of those juvenile delinquents of both sexes under seventeen years of age, the mission of the embryonic Bureau of Juvenile Aid and Education manifests itself as being two-fold: Firstly, the inauguration of a systematically planned program of referral casework, affording professional assistance on an individual basis to those youthful offenders between seventeen and twenty-one years of age. The reconditioning and aspired-after permanent readjustment of these minors—whose incipient deviations have not progressed into stages of hardened, irreformable criminality and, therefore, still capable of being checked and removed, by public-spirited scientists utilizing the latest concepts and techniques of socio-psychiatric interviews, examinations and treatments found economical as well as successful—is to be sedulously attempted. The ultimate result, sanguinely anticipated from this project, shall be the enduring re-assimilation of inchoate juvenile criminals with the mainstream of life, thereby acquiring thereto decent and productive adherents, instead of perennially tax-absorbing, community-menacing adult reprobates.

The second, and concluding, mandate assigned to the Bureau of Juvenile Aid and Education consists of activating, spearheading, and becoming the centrifugal force of a county-wide, sustained drive, animated and staffed by zealous collaborators recruited from all segments of community life, whose dynamic function shall be the instigation and execution of preventive actions aimed not only at eradicating causes and iniquitous sources corrupting youth, but also improving facilities and services indispensable to their healthful physical, mental and spiritual development.

Of the varied programs, already devised or projected by the Bureau, to combat juvenile delinquency with preventive measures, the one to which it has accorded its paramount consideration, and from which it anticipates the most productive results, is the Junior Deputy Sheriff's League of Dade County, an organization, operating under the official sponsorship and guidance of the Sheriff's Department, closely modeled after the renown

(Please Turn to Page 3)

DADE COUNTY COURT HOUSE

SHERIFF'S OFFICE

DADE COUNTY

BUREAU OF JUVENILE AID & EDUCATION

MIAMI 32, FLORIDA

J. B. "SONNY" HENDERSON
SHERIFF
POST OFFICE BOX 3038
MIAMI 30, FLORIDA

CONTINUED:

and highly successful Police Athletic League of New York City-County, financially supported by general public donations.

Recently charted, and just emerging from its fledgeling state, our Junior Deputy Sheriffs' League has already succeeded in enrolling a membership of nearly two thousand, attesting to its inherent popular appeal, and to its pressing necessity, in this area.

Implicit in the general framework of aims and objectives of the Bureau of Juvenile Aid and Education, described hereinabove, are the following subsidiary functions necessary to their proper implementation:

(1)--Effectuation periodically of thorough local surveys of conditions in Dade County, conducive to juvenile waywardness, and of machinery available to cope with it; and its prevention corollary, the

(2)--Initiation of research and study projects, in association with the aforementioned parties civicly-actuated, of local facilities and services, alloted to youth, and to ascertain from these findings, the extent to which the latter's needs are being adequately satisfied; and, its requisite supplementary action, the

(3)--Constant re-orientation of youth-ministering activities both, to avoid duplication of services, and to fill gaps in programs, as they appear and are recognized.

(4)--Establishment and maintainence of contact with local, state, federal and national officials and agencies, whose affairs affect juveniles, by entering upon exchanges of correspondence.

(5)--Institution of statistical, nation-wide studies, from time to time, of other comparative metropolitan areas, experiencing similar dynamic social problems.

(6)--Reformation of traditional detention practices prevailing in the County Jail, in reference to minors therein committed, e.g., the absolute segregation of youthful offenders from the vitiating influences of older, more habituated criminals.

(7)--Inauguration of a speakers' panel—composed of outstanding officials and specialists in youth guidance—to acquaint local adult groups

(Please Turn to Page 4)

DADE COUNTY COURT HOUSE

SHERIFF'S OFFICE

DADE COUNTY

BUREAU OF JUVENILE AID & EDUCATION

MIAMI 32, FLORIDA

J. B. "SONNY" HENDERSON
SHERIFF
POST OFFICE BOX 3038
MIAMI 30, FLORIDA

CONTINUED:

with the personnel, aims, objectives and achievements of the Bureau, and, additionally, to lecture before school children on topics susceptible of broadening the areas of understanding between youth and the law enforcement authority.

(8)--Preparation of articles and reports reviewing the progress, both in research and administration, accomplished by the Bureau—on special request, and for general publication.

(9)--Buttressing of the existent strict law enforcement policies of the pitifully underbudgetted and understaffed State Racing Commission, State Highway and County Road Patrols, Sheriff's Department, and State Beverage Department in the investigation of race tracks, frontons, poolrooms, or alcohol-dispensing establishments either absolutely forbidden or conditionally accessible to minors, and of the State Industrial Commission in the inspection of workshops employing juveniles under eighteen years of age.

My able associate, Mr. Murray S. Meyerson, Director of the Bureau, and myself, humbly accepted our difficult task, in the hope of receiving the moral support of all interested parties, not only within the confines of our county and State, but also from each and every private and public agency engaged in similar activities throughout our land. It shall be our turn, in the more or less distant future, to happily and significantly reciprocate your kindnesses. Any literature and data on the subject of juvenile crime and delinquency, ways and means of handling cases, results obtained, knowledge gained through experience, and your valued opinions and suggestions regarding the policies of our Bureau, hereinabove related, shall be immensely appreciated. You would, in effect, render our enthusiastically undertaken work exceedingly more productive.

Trusting this initial letter may mark the launching of a mutually interesting and beneficial correspondence, I remain, thanking you in advance for your kind and early reply, with cordial greetings and good wishes,

Sincerely yours,

A. Richard Finchell

DR. A. RICHARD FINCHELL
Executive Director.

ARF: tgp.

18 - Juvenile delinquency

AN APPEAL TO YOU

ON BEHALF OF

Georgia Boys and Girls

A Special Message to Men and Women Members of Civic Clubs Church Leaders

By The

Georgia CITIZENS COUNCIL

20 IVY ST., S. E. ATLANTA 3, GA.

1. Do You Know - -

The F. B. I. reports a tremendous increase in crime. Largest increases are in the 17 to 21 year old age group.

Georgia has 94% more males over 14 in prison than the national average—based on population. (According to 1940 U. S. Census.)

Today with an even larger prison population 10 per cent is composed of boys and girls 12 to 18 years of age—and half of these are first offenders. In addition, our training schools for delinquents are filled and have long waiting lists.

Crime is costing Georgia taxpayers millions of dollars. In just ONE county last year over THREE MILLION DOLLARS was spent on crime, detection, detention and trials.

Specific programs to build good citizenship and character—to prevent crime—receive much less money and much less effort. Prevention can lower the "treatment" costs and build productive valuable human resources for our State.

Home, School, Church

Test surveys reveal the average boy or girl between 13 and 17 years of age is awake 5,840 hours each year —about 16 hours a day.

The average school term consumes 1,080 hours of those waking hours. Twice a week in church—102 hours.

The average time spent in the home (awake) is 1095 or about three hours every day all year long.

This leaves 3,600 hours the boy or girl is not in the home, school or church.

If the average is too high or low for your community, adjust it to suit conditions. Add 1,000 hours to the home, school and church if the national averages do not apply in your case.

Nearly 50 per cent of those waking hours will still NOT be spent in the home, school or church.

What is provided in your community to attract boys and girls during the hours they are not in the home, school or church?

⅔ Youth "Unreached"

There are more than 708,000 boys and girls between seven and 17 years of age in Georgia. Only one-third are members of ANY of the 13 well known statewide character building agencies.

The agencies supported with private funds reported to the Georgia Citizens Council a combined membership last year equal to only 15 per cent of the total population seven to 17. This group includes Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A., Camp Fire Girls, Boys Clubs, etc.

The agencies supported with tax funds, including 4-H Clubs, Future Farmers, Future Homemakers, etc., report a combined membership equal to 19 per cent of the total eligible.

There are conceded to be duplications in instances where a boy or girl belongs to two or more agencies and is therefore included in both membership totals.

TWO-THIRDS of Georgia's boys and girls between seven and 17 are not being reached by any of the fine character building programs of these agencies.

Lack of Civic "Doers"

"We can not secure sufficient adult leadership and support to reach more boys and girls." That is the answer from Scout, Y', 4-H and all the leaders.

"If we had sufficient adult leaders who would volunteer their time and effort to our programs we could reach ALL the boys and girls between seven and 17 in Georgia."—that is the combined answer from the leaders of all these agencies serving youth.

BUT SEE HOW FEW THEY ARE ABLE TO REACH TODAY

Total membership as reported to the Georgia Citizens Council in May, 1947 for the latest reporting period.

Boy Scouts	28,272
Girl Scouts	10,058
Boys Clubs	4,901
Camp Fire Girls	2,688
Y.M.C.A.	53,235
Y.W.C.A.	4,124
Jewish Community Centers	816
Salvation Army	2,909

Total Privately Financed	107,003	(15%)
4-H Club	113,026
Future Farmers of America	10,768
Future Homemakers	6,760
New Homemakers	4,166
New Farmers	2,893
Total Tax Supported Agencies	137,613	(19%)
Total All Youth Serving Organizations	244,613	(34%)
Total Number Boys and Girls (Age 7-17) (1940 Census)	708,133

* * *

IN LIGHT OF THESE FACTS THE GEORGIA CITIZENS COUNCIL IN ITS MONTHLY MEETING MAY 23 ISSUED THE FOLLOWING STATEMENT AND APPEAL TO CIVIC CLUB MEMBERS AND LAY CHURCH WORKERS.

"A great and challenging opportunity to put into practice the teachings of our religions and the principles of our Democratic way of life faces the civic club and church members of Georgia.

"Crime is increasing every month. Census reports show Georgia has nearly twice as many men in prison as the national average, based on population. Ten per cent of our prison population is composed of boys and girls twelve to eighteen years of age. Our training schools for delinquents are filled and have long waiting lists. . . ."

"There are more than 708,000 boys and girls between seven and seventeen in Georgia. Two-thirds of them were not members of any of these character building agencies last year.

". . . This situation is not a reflection on the splendid programs of these youth serving agencies. It is an indictment of the complacency behind which all of us are hiding—we are shirking our responsibility which we assume when we join our civic clubs or churches. Too many of us want to discharge our community responsibility with the donation of a little money. Volunteer leadership is the great need, if all boys and girls are to have the opportunity to come under the influence of these character building programs.

"Every member of a men's civic club, or a women's club should serve—should actually give time and energy —to a youth program. We should dedicate one or more hours a week to real community service in a program to develop our youth into productive, healthy future citizens.

"The Georgia Citizens Council, which numbers among its members two former District Governors of Rotary; two leading Lions; a former Kiwanis President; two past presidents of the State Federation of Women's Clubs; a past president of the State Parent-Teacher Congress; two ministers and two college presidents—sends this appeal directly to the presidents of every civic club and lay church organization in the State—an appeal that we all put into practice the teachings of our religions and the codes of our civic organizations.

*"Industrial, agricultural and commercial progress depends on strong, capable human resources. The record of past development of our human resources is found in our high prison population; our crime rate; our Selective Service rejection rates; our mental hospitals and juvenile training schools.

"The results of this survey by the Junior Citizenship Section of the Citizens Council should serve as a challenge and an opportunity for all of us. Georgia must have more adult leaders, more adult support of all youth programs.

"In many communities we have become too busy with our own club or church program to take time to learn of the whole community need. We are working separately, as it were, nibbling at little segments of an overall youth development job which cannot be adequately done unless we coordinate our efforts and work together."

MEMBERS OF THE

Georgia CITIZENS COUNCIL

June 1, 1947

DR. ALLEN D. ALBERT, EMORY UNIVERSITY
Head of the Department of Sociology

W. MORGAN BLAKE, ATLANTA
Columnist, Religious and Civic Leader

JULIAN V. BOEHM, ATLANTA
Life Insurance Executive, Civic Leader

MRS. RALPH BUTLER, DALLAS
Former State President, Federation of Women's Clubs

DR. HARMON W. CALDWELL, ATHENS
President of the University of Georgia

MRS. STEWART COLLEY, GRANTVILLE
President N. Ga. Women's Society of Christian Service

ROBERT COWART, DOUGLAS
Auto Dealer, Past District Governor of Lions Club

DR. JOSIAH CRUDUP, GAINESVILLE
President of Brenau College

ED DAVIDSON, COLUMBUS
Nehi Executive, Youth Leader, Civic Leader

W. ELLIOTT DUNWODY, JR., MACON — President
Architect, Past District Governor of Rotary Clubs

MRS. FRANCES C. DWYER, ATLANTA — V.-President
Attorney, Y.W.C.A. Leader, "Woman of Year 1946"

WILLIAM D. ELLIS, ATLANTA
Manufacturer, Past President Atlanta Rotary Club

MRS. R. C. FRYER, MANCHESTER
Past State President Federation of Women's Clubs

W. C. HENSON, CARTERSVILLE
Attorney, President Georgia Municipal Association

PARKS HUNTT, ATLANTA
Insurance Executive, Civic and Church Leader

WILMER D. LANIER, AUGUSTA
Attorney, Coordinator of Attacks on Social Problems

MRS. ROBERT A. LONG, ATLANTA
Past President Georgia Congress of Parents and Teachers

MRS. C. C. SAPP, ALBANY
Church and Civic Leader

DR. HERMAN L. TURNER, ATLANTA
Presbyterian Minister, Past President Planning Council

DR. L. M. TWIGGS, GAINESVILLE
Methodist Minister, Member State Board of Corrections

WILLIAM A. WATT, THOMASVILLE
Building Supply Dealer, Past District Governor of Rotary Clubs

WILL THE NEWBURGH PLAN WORK IN YOUR CITY?

Materials - Welfare

Tell under social myths or allegations about the negro

IN every city of the United States, people have read about the controversy over public assistance in Newburgh, New York, and asked themselves: "Would the Newburgh Plan work here?" or "Would it help reduce my taxes?" or "Would it hurt helpless people?"

These questions deserve your serious thought as a citizen concerned with the well-being of your neighbors, particularly those not in a position to defend themselves.

You should know that the Newburgh Plan is built not only on false claims but on concepts as old and as harsh as the Poor Laws in the time of Queen Elizabeth of England. They have been argued and rejected by the American people over and over again in the evolution of our present public welfare programs. Such programs are aimed at giving constructive assistance to those honestly in need, with full protection for their dignity and rights as human beings.

Newburgh's Welfare Code is not working — not even in Newburgh. A New York State Court has issued a temporary injunction against application of 12 of the 13 points in the Code — and, in an answer to the court, Newburgh officials have submitted a softer interpretation of them. Yet, the Code is still being discussed in many places as though it offered some new short-cut to progress. It is easy to rail against high welfare costs but the rational citizen will also want to take into account the facts about jobs. Of 150 major labor force areas, 101 have been in the past year "depressed employment areas."

This facts sheet, prepared by an organization representing 30,000 professional social workers, is designed to inform you and other citizens interested in knowing "the other side" of the Newburgh picture as it might apply to the public welfare programs in your own State or city.

We invite you to read it and to pass the facts on.

Norman V. Lourie, President
National Association of Social Workers

NEWBURGH'S 13 POINT WELFARE CODE—A FUTILE GESTURE

Newburgh's new "welfare code" purports to reduce "excessive" relief costs, eliminate "chiselers" from the welfare load, and relieve the community of some costs by denying relief to those who do not meet certain "moral" standards, whether or not they qualify in other ways.

Can such codes accomplish these aims?

Supporters of this approach doubtless think of themselves as being upholders of the American way of life, and profess a concern for their fellowmen which is equal to that of their critics. Yet a simple examination of such code provisions reveals them as being punitive, without rehabilitative value, and in violation of many commonly-accepted principles and ethical values inherent in a democratic, free-enterprise way of life.

Here are some key provisions of the Newburgh code and some comments on the concepts behind them:

Newburgh Code: "ALL ABLE-BODIED ADULT MALES ON RELIEF . . . ARE TO BE ASSIGNED . . . FOR WORK."

Comment: If these work-for-relief jobs are bona fide jobs, why aren't they simply offered at prevailing rates and paid in cash wages? Procedures like Newburgh's obviously are a form of forced labor, imposed on persons not in a position to make a free decision. They are in line with a chain-gang, workhouse philosophy, degrading both to the recipient and the administrator. As presently constituted, there is no stated wage for stated hours of work in the Newburgh code.

There is a place for work relief, and it is provided for under present regulations of New York and most other states. It is safeguarded, however, by medical determination of work fitness and non-competitiveness with private industry. Work relief can be constructive if it applies these standards, and is even better when combined with needed vocational rehabilitation and realistic job training in accordance with local opportunities.

Most people want real jobs rather than work relief or welfare subsistence. A major factor in high welfare costs has been continuing hard-core unemployment. We have had some 2,000,000 persons continuously unemployed for periods up to 16 weeks and 800,000 who have not been able to find work for a half-year or more. Of every 20 employable workers one is an unskilled laborer and it is among the unskilled that unemployment has been by far the highest.

Newburgh Code: ALL CASH PAYMENTS . . . SHALL BE ISSUED IN VOUCHER FORM HENCEFORTH.

Comment: Voucher relief payments tend to break down, not reinforce, an individual's self-respect and ability to handle his own affairs. Vouchers tag people as inferior to their neighbors, even though they may be without funds through no fault of their own. Vouchers lend themselves to abuses. When tried during the depression years, they invited chiseling by merchants who cashed them at a discount and profited by the difference.

Sound public welfare practice provides fully for direct payment of medical and other expenses in individual cases, when necessary, and when people are unable to handle their own funds properly for the appointment of a public representative to manage for them. The general use of voucher procedures, however, is unnecessary, punitive, and destructive to morale.

Newburgh Code: "ALL RECIPIENTS ...WHO ARE OFFERED A JOB BUT REFUSE IT, REGARDLESS OF TYPE OF EMPLOYMENT . . . TO BE DENIED," and "ALL APPLICANTS FOR RELIEF WHO LEFT JOB VOLUNTARILY . . . SHALL BE DENIED RELIEF."

Comment: These provisions, like forced work-for-relief, tend to lower general work standards and to compel acceptance of hazardous jobs, or jobs not in the persons' regular line of work, causing loss of skills in the long run. Such provisions can be used for strike-breaking or work for substandard pay.

Under existing public welfare regulations, registration with employment offices, as well as use of unemployment and other benefits, is strictly required before assistance or work relief is granted. Obviously, therefore, the offer of employment on a "take-it-or-leave-it" basis regardless of suitability, as in Newburgh, can only harass and punish recipients, without beating "chiselers."

Newburgh Code: "AID TO PERSONS EXCEPT THE AGED, BLIND AND DISABLED . . . LIMITED TO THREE MONTHS IN ANY ONE YEAR" . . . "THE ALLOTMENT FOR ANY ONE FAMILY UNIT

Claims and Facts about Newburgh's Welfare Problems

Claim No. 1: Newburgh's City Manager and Council have claimed that the city bears an unusually heavy welfare burden, which costs the city 31 to 33 percent of its budget, because five percent of the population are living on relief.

The Fact: The cost to the city is only 13 percent of its budget, and only 2.9 percent of the population are on relief. Newburgh actually has the lowest percentage of population on relief of the five upstate New York cities of comparable size.

Claim No. 2: Newburgh's taxpayers are being victimized by widespread fraud in its relief caseload.

The Fact: No authenticated case of fraud has been found in Newburgh's welfare caseload. One accusation was made in 1960, under the regular welfare policy, and was referred to the legal authorities, but not prosecuted.

Claim No. 3: There are many able-bodied persons on relief, perhaps 60, who do not wish to work and should be forced to work for their relief payments.

The Fact: One able-bodied person has been found in the Newburgh caseload — a steel worker between jobs, and it was agreed that he should stay at home because his wife was in the hospital and there was no one else to care for their five children.

Claim No. 4: The relief rolls are loaded with "undesirable newcomers," mainly "migrants from the South."

The Fact: Sixteen percent of Newburgh's citizens are non-white, and 40 percent of those on relief are Negroes who in past years were recruited as temporary agricultural workers. They stayed on, found slum housing, and were caught by the city's inability to absorb them in other work, due to generally diminishing economic activity. Only $205.00 was spent in 1960 for relief to residents who had been in the state less than one year. And this cost is met by the state, not the county.

Who will feed the children? Many children would go hungry under Newburgh provision which limits aid to three months in a year.

Photo by Daniel J. Ransohoff

SHALL NOT EXCEED THE TAKE HOME PAY OF THE LOWEST PAID CITY EMPLOYEE WITH A FAMILY OF COMPARABLE SIZE" . . . "ALSO NO RELIEF . . . TO ANY FAMILY WHOSE INCOME IS IN EXCESS OF THE LATTER FIGURE."

Comment: It is self-evident that as long as people are without means of self-support, they must eat, be clothed and have shelter. The problem is not solved by arbitrarily ending relief at some stated date. Such regulations are punitive and restrictive in that they limit the duration of public assistance regardless of the reason (except for certain groups); they set an arbitrary maximum relief allowance regardless of size of family or actual need; they peg relief allowances arbitrarily to the salaries of workers who may themselves be underpaid, or supplementing their income from outside sources. They establish the dependent as a special group not entitled to minimum decent living standards. In addition to arbitrariness and punitiveness, the regulation is unethical and inhuman, by any of our commonly accepted standards.

Newburgh Code: "ALL APPLICANTS NEW TO THE CITY MUST SHOW EVIDENCE THAT THEIR PLANS IN COMING . . . INVOLVED A CONCRETE OFFER OF EMPLOYMENT."

Comment: Is it realistic to assume that people will ordinarily provide themselves with evidence of job offers when moving into a community, in order to keep themselves eligible for relief? This regulation seems to be an invitation, not a hindrance to chiseling, for chiselers would be most likely to prepare themselves with such "evidence."

From the days of the early pioneers, Americans have been a mobile people. Our present economy requires a mobile labor force as much as ever. To restrict the right to move freely about the nation for any economic or personal reason denies a fundamental right; such denial has been held unconstitutional. To enforce it generally would also stunt and hamper our economic and social system.

Newburgh Code: "ALL RECIPIENTS . . . NOT INCAPACITATED, SHALL REPORT TO THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WELFARE MONTHLY . . . REGARDING THE STATUS OF THEIR CASE. . ."
"ALL FILES OF AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN CASES . . . TO BE BROUGHT TO THE CORPORATION COUNSEL FOR REVIEW MONTHLY . . ."

Comment: The way this regulation already has been enforced, recipients have been ordered to appear in police courts to receive their checks, have been photographed, and have been threatened with publication of their names. Spread of these methods, thus far confined to Home Relief and Aid to Dependent Children recipients, has been promised for other programs.

This kind of procedure completely denies not only the right to human dignity and self-respect, but also thwarts a basic goal of public assistance, namely the rehabilitation of the individual and the family receiving assistance. Public assistance is a social service; as such, it should be administered by social workers who help recipients solve their problems and become independent. Solution of public assistance problems does not lie in legalistic inspections and police-type procedures. Degrading and humiliating relief recipients, aside from its cruelty, is not calculated to restore their earning capacity, health and social responsibility, or to save taxpayers money, either. Funds saved through harassment methods — if any — will be paid in other ways—through increased costs of correctional, mental hospital and other tax-supported services.

Newburgh Code: "ALL MOTHERS OF ILLEGITIMATE CHILDREN . . . SHOULD THEY HAVE ANY MORE . . . TO BE DENIED RELIEF" . . . "PRIOR TO CERTIFYING OR CONTINUING ANY MORE AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN CASES, DETERMINATION SHALL BE MADE AS TO THE HOME ENVIRONMENT. IF . . . NOT SATISFACTORY, THE CHILDREN . . . SHALL BE PLACED IN FOSTER CARE."

Comment: Far from solving the problems involved, such policies may well press mothers into further illicit relationships or actual abandonment of children, because of the increased economic pressures they create. Policies like these clearly aim to punish, rather than to solve or prevent recurrence of a social problem. Furthermore, they attempt to convert a program which has the responsibility to alleviate poverty into one which will police private morals. Actually, placement of children will not save money even if strictly carried out, because foster care (when available) costs four to six times as much per child as Aid to Dependent Children.

Opposition to this approach to "solving" illegitimacy problems in the ADC caseload does not imply approval of widespread immorality, or changes in our sexual standards and morals. Realistically, the fact is that illegitimacy has increased nation-wide, among ADC and non-ADC populations alike.

Standards of family suitability for children aided through ADC should not be different from those prevailing in the general community. Only 13 percent of out-of-wedlock children in the nation receive ADC, even though this group is the most disadvantaged, socially and economically. Regardless of its economic level, if a home is unsuitable for a child, the community already has ample machinery through established law enforcement and social agencies, to improve home conditions and to protect children. Children in need must receive help in their own families, wherever possible. Because of the problems that surround them, they are especially vulnerable to social ills such as delinquency, crime, dependency, mental illness, etc. Their problems should not be compounded by punitive treatment from policy making officials. Rather should these children receive increased casework and other services to alleviate their problems and prevent future repetition of the difficulties to which they are being exposed as children. There are 2½ million American children on ADC, whose welfare must be safeguarded in the national interest.

ADC children need the same helpful influences as do all others, rich or poor, illegitimate or legitimate, namely: good neighborhoods, economic stability for their families, decent housing, religious guidance and wholesome opportunity for leisure time activities. Indeed, these are responsibilities that no American community can ethically and morally abdicate.

MANY CITIES SHARE NEWBURGH'S PROBLEMS . . . HOW CAN THEY BE SOLVED?

Like many other American cities, Newburgh has developed a hard core of unemployment which, it is not surprising, is reflected in certain welfare problems because the basic issues have not been met. As elsewhere, the greatest impact of unemployment is felt by those citizens, mostly Negroes, who must find their livelihood from marginal work — unskilled factory and maintenance jobs, temporary farm work, domestic jobs. (This is equally true of white marginal workers, but there usually is a smaller percentage of them.) In the past,workers have been actively sought from other communities, to work as migrant "pickers"; inevitably, some have stayed on and become permanent residents of the city. As elsewhere, Newburgh in post-war years has seen an exodus of older residents from the central city to the suburbs, with lowest income families remaining to live in slum areas characterized by overcrowding, inadequate sanitation services, and all the social ills which accompany such conditions.

Meanwhile, the city has fallen behind economically. Its needle trades, its resort employment, its function as a regional economic center, have dwindled and the city has not kept pace with the changes. Newburgh's welfare problems are a symptom, not a cause of its troubles.

The answers to Newburgh's problems lie in a many-sided, constructive program of economic and social re-awakening, not in a "crackdown" on its relief population. The national limelight thrown on Newburgh by its welfare "code" hopefully may shake the complacency of those who can change things, and stimulate them to renew the city through a positive, constructive program, as other communities have done.

What can a city like Newburgh do to reconstruct itself as a healthier city and economy?

Newburgh, like other American cities, can embark on a program of physical, economic and social renewal. It can survey its assets and go about attracting industries to replace those which have dwindled. It can take advantage of Federal and State aid to wipe out slums, renew the "downtown" section, provide decent public housing. It can improve present conditions by reducing overcrowding through building-control measures — team inspection of housing for safety and sanitation, reduction of overcrowding, elimination of hazardous and unsanitary dwellings. Like other cities, Newburgh can embark on a true "better Newburgh" campaign to reawaken civic pride and stimulate voluntary free enterprise in the many small ways that go to make a decent, self-respecting, and responsible community.

Newburgh certainly can analyze its welfare caseload, not for "chiselers" but for persons who can respond to social and vocational rehabilitation in order to become self-supporting again. On the basis of such analysis, it can institute a welfare administration of quality and skill that will aim toward the physical, social and moral rehabilitation of those welfare recipients who need and can respond to such services. This suggestion is not a pious wish; other localities (Washington, D.C.; San Francisco and Marin County, Calif.; Cook County, Ill.; Niagara County, N. Y.; Westchester County, N. Y., and various communities in Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Pennsylvania and Florida) have demonstrated that intensive professional social work services can reduce relief rolls and restore families to financial independence. Public welfare programs need a philosophy of rehabilitation toward independence through skilled services — not harassment for the sake of temporary case "closing." The latter method creates more problems than it solves.

Additional copies are available at 5c each or, in quantity, at $4.00 per 100 from:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SOCIAL WORKERS, INC.
95 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 16, NEW YORK

L437

18 - Juvenile Delinquency

BAD HOUSING BREEDS CRIME, IMMORALITY AND DISEASE, DESTROYS CHARACTER

Crime, juvenile delinquency, tuberculosis and other diseases breed in the slums of our rural and city areas, Lon Sullivan, Georgia Citizens Council director told the West End Civitan Club at their regular meeting July 22nd.

"Many of the reasons for Georgia's Selective Service rejection rate being 49% higher than the national average for physical, mental and educational deficiencies; many of the reasons for Georgia having 94% more men in prison, based on population, than the national average; many of the reasons for our big increase each year in crime, our high disease rates—stem from the slums of our cities and rural areas," Sullivan said.

"The recently publicized slum clearance program in Atlanta will fail unless the civic and church people rally behind those who are leading it and give them support and active interest. There will be opposition. There has always been opposition because someone is getting a good income from the slums with a minimum investment. If someone was not getting a good income you would not hear the shouts of "communism," "socialism" and "interference with free enterprise" which always come when someone cries out against this uneconomical and inhuman condition which exists in our city.

"Free enterprise, private capital, should do the job of providing decent housing at a price which all people can afford. It must be done and if there is not enough profit to attract free enterprise, then the government should do it because our slums are costing every single taxpayer money and at the same time depriving us of valuable, useful human resources.

If you and I lived in a house that was dirty, with cracks between the boards and the cold winds whistling in, with no toilets or baths, with filthy surroundings, I doubt if you and I would care too much about our children and what they are doing when they get out of the neighborhood—about their education, their health. It would just be too depressing. Living would be a mere existence.

The environment — physical and personal environment—of a human being has a great deal to do with determining the ambitions, the honesty, the physical and mental abilities, the emotional stability, and the regard the human being has for Democracy, Religion and the American way of life.

In Atlanta there are 137,000 people living in dirty, overcrowded, unsanitary, unhealthy, miserable slums. This is 39 per cent of our population which lives in 20 per cent of the land area of the city.

There are 22,000 housing units in this area, both white and Negro, which have no toilets. There are 26,000 without baths.

Fifty-nine per cent of the crimes, 72 per cent of the juvenile delinquency cases, and 69 per cent of the tuberculosis comes from this 20 per cent area in which the city spends 53 per cent of all it spends on protective services such as fire, police and health protection. The tax revenue from this area comprises only five per cent of the city's revenue.

These averages are similar to those throughout the nation. Charles S. Palmer, President of the Atlanta Rotary Club and a National authority on housing, recently pointed out that "there are twenty-four million Americans living in slums which cover 30 per cent of the areas of our cities but house 33 per cent of our people. These areas produce 60 per cent of the juvenile delinquency, 50 per cent of the arrests, 60 per cent of the tuberculosis, 50 per cent of all disease, and 35 per cent of all fires."

While Mr. Palmer's averages are national, with 33 per cent of the people living in 30 per cent of the areas—in Atlanta 39 per cent live in 20 per cent of the area. It is interesting that Atlanta's crime and disease figures from these areas are comparably higher than the national average.

It would seem that any taxpayer with a desire for long range economy would see the value of eliminating the areas which breed these costs in services and provide so little revenue in return.

The Atlanta Public Housing Authority has provided approximately 5,000 low-cost decent housing units. In spite of this splendid little start there are still 137,000 people, one-third of our population, living in filthy slums.

If the National Real Estate Board, the Savings and Loan League, and the National Home Builders Association would spend just half the energy and money trying to help meet such community problems intelligently as they spend lobbying and propagandizing against government subsidized housing — they could have eliminated the need. If they would assume this responsibility they would be strengthening the fibre of our free enterprise system that we treasure so rightly.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE SHOULD

If they would take the leadership so that all community resources could be pooled, local private enterprise could eliminate the slum areas and provide decent, low-cost housing for all people. It would not be a "quick return" investment. Nobody would get their dividends in great amounts. But the long range dividends to themselves and to the community and all its people would be of inestimable value.

History tells us that 'Isms and violent action always stem from people who have long, deep-seated dissatisfactions and frustrations.

HISTORY OF 'ISMS

Show me a group of people in dark, dirty houses, with cracks between boards, broken windows, cold winds sweeping in, no toilets, no nearby playgrounds, no opportunity for living in even decent ordinary comfort—and I will show you a people who are ripe for the first demagogue who comes along and promises them a better life if they will follow him. They will follow, regardless of the soundness of his promises or the threat he may be to the American way of life.

Free enterprise, Democracy, the American way of life—these mean very little to those people, because Democracy is not working for them. Democracy, to them, can be summed up in the words—might makes right. Hitler started in a beer garden and rose with his fanatical crackpots to almost destroy the world on the issue that his people are a "supreme race." Stalin spent many years in jail, a political prisoner, his people oppressed by the Czarist regime. Loomis, Burke and their Columbians had started on Garibaldi street in Atlanta, offering so-called "protection and relief" for people who have been dissatisfied and frustrated for many years. It has been the same through the ages.

Everything that you do in your civic work, in your business, in your home, in this community to raise the standard of living and improve the opportunities for all of the people—is strengthening the American way of life, and insuring the preservation of our own form of Democracy.

The dividends will come back to all of us in the form of higher purchasing power, in the form of more capable human resources on which to build the economic future of our community and Georgia."

Guide Available

Are you planning to organize a committee of citizens to meet a community need?

Are you interested in finding the needs of your community and stimulating action to meet those needs?

If so—the Guide to the Establishment of Community Coordinating Councils—entitled "United Citizens Action to Improve Our Human Resources"—is again available to community leaders without charge. The original supply was recently exhausted but a revised copy is now available to any community leader who writes for it. Write GEORGIA CITIZENS COUNCIL, 20 IVY STREET, S. W., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

Solicitor Forms Crime Prevention Committee

(Continued From Page 1)

All information as to location of crimes, location of homes from which criminals come, conditions in those homes, etc., is being gathered from existing sources.

A subcommittee was named at the first meeting to prepare a recommended plan of action to be launched near the end of the summer.—By the Fulton County Citizens Crime Prevention Committee.

Some of the facts already developed by the committee about crime in the county are as follows:

TWENTY-THREE percent INCREASE in serious crimes, 1946 over 1945.

The above and the following received from Identification Bureau of Fulton County. (Excludes College Park—Includes Hapeville, East Point)

TWENTY-NINE percent INCREASE in serious crimes by those 16 thru 21 years old.

9005 arrested for serious crimes —38% were Negroes.

49,261 — TEN percent INCREASE—were arrested in 1946 by Atlanta police for offenses settled by the Recorders Court—(less serious assault, prostitution, offenses against family or children, drunkenness, disorderly conduct.)

37,973 of above 49,261 were for drunkenness—about 30% Negroes.

1390 boys and girls adjudged delinquent in 1946 by the Juvenile Court—40% Negroes.

439 additional boys and girls under 16 were neglect cases—22% were Negroes.

154 additional children handled by Juvenile Court (custody cases and Superior Court Referrals).

1983 total children served by Juvenile Court came from 1212 families.

540 or 45% of the 1212 families had been known to Juvenile Court prior to 1946 (Social Service Index reports).

672 families served by Juvenile Court for first time in 1946.

59% of these 672 "new" families were known to and had received some service from one or more of our health or welfare agencies before coming to attention of Juvenile Court (Social Service Index reports).

PERCENT OF BOYS AND GIRLS AGED 7-17 BELONGING TO YOUTH-SERVING ORGANIZATIONS

(1946)

Lack Of Adult Leadership Is Reason

In only 12 of Georgia's 159 counties are as many as 50 per cent of the boys and girls seven to 17 years of age members of ANY of the well known youth serving character building agencies, reports by 13 agencies to the Georgia Citizens Council reveal. Throughout the state two-thirds of the boys and girls are not members. The reports included total membership of Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., Boys Clubs, 4-H Clubs, Future Farmers, Future Homemakers and others.

Georgia has 94 per cent more males in prison, based on population, than the national average. Ten per cent of the prison population is between 12 and 18 years of age. In addition Georgia's training schools for delinquents are filled and have long waiting lists.

"The splendid character building programs of these youth agencies are being denied two-thirds of our boys and girls solely because of lack of adult leadership, interest and support. The organizations could easily reach three times as many as they do if enough adult leaders would volunteer their services," a statement by the Citizens Council says.

The above map shows counties, in white, where more than 50% of the boys and girls seven to 17 belong to any of these agencies; in black those which from 25 to 50 per cent belong, and in grey those in which under 25 per cent are members. The reports of the 13 youth agencies to the Citizens Council were based on the latest reporting period. The survey included only the agencies with statewide contacts.

Social Science Research Council
230 Park Avenue
New York 17, N.Y.
and
726 Jackson Place NW
Washington 6, D.C.

Not for release until further notice

MEMORANDUM OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH COUNCIL ON THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

October 1945

Social Science Research Council
230 Park Avenue
New York 17, N.Y.
and
726 Jackson Place NW
Washington 6, D.C.

Not for release until further notice

MEMORANDUM OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH COUNCIL ON THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

October 1945

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE RESEARCH COUNCIL is convinced that the federal government for purposes of national interest should aid in promoting scientific research in both the natural and social fields, in the application of science to practical affairs, and in the training of scientific personnel. This conviction is based upon the Council's long experience with research related to national welfare and government and upon recent careful review of the issues involved. At its September, 1945, meeting the Council expressed agreement with the principles relating to research set forth in the President's message of September 6, 1945, to the Congress and voted unanimously to offer its aid in planning the specific steps required to accomplish the President's purpose and in facilitating the operation of the proposed agency to carry out the government's program.

The Social Science Research Council is gratified by the public and official recognition of the role that science has come to play in human affairs. Research holds promise of still greater contributions to the betterment of man's lot. Changes of wide scope appear to be impending in productive activity, in standards of consumption, in the leisure and energy available for other activities besides merely existing. These changes are largely unforeseen consequences of past research; to turn them to good account calls for further research. More knowledge than we now possess is needed regarding our physical environment, our bodies and minds, our social organization, our cultural potentialities. The pace of change seems to be accelerating while its scope is extending, so that the gap between what we know and what we need to know grows wider.

The United States and the modern world are dependent upon scientific research to meet their material needs, security and future development. The startling series of successes achieved by the cooperative efforts of scientists and technologists in contributing to the effectiveness of combat forces in World War II have inspired faith that the resources of nature can be manipulated for the purposes of men in war or peace in ways and on a scale not yet comprehensible. There is, however, anxiety that the mastery of nature achieved through science will be exercised in directions which either through malice or, more probably, through ignorance will jeopardize human welfare. There is grave danger that man will find that he does not have the wisdom to guide his tremendous control over the forces of nature for his own greatest benefit. Fears exist not only that the powers of science will be misused in wars of unspeakable destructiveness but also that impending fundamental technological innovations cannot be made without serious internal social disorders. Scientists themselves perhaps more than the public are uneasy about potential evil uses of their inventions. It is obvious that man's inventions are in themselves of neutral character and that their value to humanity depends on the purposes which they are made to serve. The hazards to national and world interest created by new inventions can not be evaded by checking the powers of invention even were such a proposal not too fantastic to merit serious discussion. Dependence for security and order must rather be on the improvement of the foundations of human relations.

The knowledge needed to understand and reinforce these foundations will be won only through the cooperative efforts of all branches of investigation concerned with man and the universe in which he lives. Extension of the federal government's interest in the planning, conduct and practical application of research in all the sciences which can contribute to this end is necessary and proper.

Every problem of national concern has its human as well as its material aspects. Public health is both a matter of medical knowledge and also a matter of knowing how to bring about the effective use of available knowledge and facilities. There are diseases which could be practically eliminated if it were known how to obtain general application of the existing findings. Security from external aggression requires continuing research on the weapons of war but is dependent equally upon research with respect to economic, governmental, psychological and other social factors. This was fully recognized by all the war agencies, including the Army and Navy, which came to make extensive use of social scientists and their accumulated knowledge in the war which has just ended. The need for the best research obtainable on the human aspects of innumerable matters of national interest and welfare is no less in times of peace. Although dramatic developments in a few fields such as aviation, electronics and atomic power naturally win the widest general attention, recent years have seen unprecedented appreciation and recognition of significant contributions from the entire range of science with little respect for the traditional distinctions between the physical, biological and social fields.

The present inadequacy of knowledge of human relations is a source of danger which can be greatly reduced by more adequate applications of scientific techniques in the study of human problems. Social science personnel, research procedures and facilities are underdeveloped in terms of the tasks which must be undertaken. It has been demonstrated, however, that the earnest and objective investigation of problems of human relations can produce results of inestimable practical value when properly trained research workers imbued with scientific detachment and integrity are given opportunity to apply themselves with adequate resources. The fact that it cannot be claimed that the social sciences have reached a stage comparable to that of some of the other scientific disciplines is considered the strongest possible reason for advancing their development by every effective means. The problems with which they deal are urgent. The advances in research planning, techniques and organization which have been achieved during the war and the immediate prewar years offer promise of a period of unusually fruitful progress if adequate support is made available.

A considerable part of the research supported by the proposed federal research agency will and should be carried on through the government's own research staffs. The Social Science Research Council is convinced, however, that in addition to the research done directly under government supervision, funds should be available to qualified universities and other nongovernmental research institutions for work on specific problems or specific areas of work whenever this will advance mutually advantageous objectives. Research institutions free of governmental commitments and administrative responsibilities, and under responsibility to exercise their own judgment with respect to techniques and standards of work, have been and will continue to be an outstanding source of contributions of a basic character and of types which less frequently develop within the governmental service itself.

The needs for research, and especially for the types of research which nongovernmental research organizations are peculiarly fitted to contribute, are so large that they far outrun existing financial resources on the scale on which these have heretofore been available. Research in the social sciences has been financed by a diversity of private, state and federal funds. The increase in support required to realize as quickly as can well be done the potential values of social science research to our society and to the government has little likelihood of materializing unless it is supplied by the national government. Precedents for government aid to research carried on by independent institutions are well established, notably in the field of agriculture and for war purposes.

The Council has been gravely concerned whether participation of the social sciences in a federal research agency would provide the best means for assuring their maximum contribution to the national security and welfare. Fears have been voiced in some quarters that the social sciences will come to be subjected to government control, and in others that in dealing with disputatious issues it may be difficult to hold clearly in sight the line between fact and opinion. It is clear to the Council that sufficient safeguards against either of these dangers are practicable. The greatest safeguard rests in the constant concern for scientific integrity which must control the federal agency's actions at every step if it is to be faithful to the trust vested in it.

For many years it has been the federal government which has financed and administered several of the major agencies which have successfully conducted social science research on matters of vital public interest. Their experience, the precedents already established, and the judgment of the social scientists who have collaborated with these agencies afford sufficient knowledge to provide any protections which may be needful. The specific operational problems which may arise are in any event small and easily soluble when compared with the problems of defense, of welfare, and of the national interest generally with which the federal research agency will be dealing.

Questions of specific mechanisms whereby government support for work in the social sciences can be provided under mutually satisfactory conditions have been and are continuing to be carefully considered by the Council. One satisfactory mechanism consists of the development of contractual relations with universities or other research institutions for individual research projects or work on a specified series of problems. Definite and mutually-agreed objectives can be set, projects can be kept within manageable limits, and arrangements can be stipulated for the suitable termination of contracts. The government is enabled to draw upon knowledge and experience in particular types of research extending far beyond those which it would be economical to provide within its own staff. It is likewise entirely feasible to devise grant-in-aid programs covering research on particular problems conducted either by selected institutions or by specially chosen individuals. Applicable precedents exist in the government's agricultural research programs and in other fields of work. The definition of suitable areas of work involving matters of national interest, and the specification of proper and effective terms governing the conduct of the work to be done present no insuperable difficulties.

All scientists are necessarily constantly concerned with the maintenance of the freedom of inquiry and the independence of the spirit of research. There is some evidence that on occasion major advances have been achieved under conditions offering little individual freedom to the research worker. These are overshadowed, however, by the progress which has been made under conditions of liberty. In the social sciences restraints on objectivity of inquiry by any agency, public or private, tend to debase research into the preparation of apologia and rationalizations for the courses of those under whose dominance research is undertaken. Social science, under these circumstances, ceases to be scientific in spirit.

The first and most effective safeguard against improper interference and restraint consists in making certain that an earnest insistence upon preserving the freedom of research guides the thinking and action of all those who may have the power to direct and influence the spending of research funds. Beyond this, as long as diversity of public and private support is maintained research institutions and workers have a powerful lever with which to resist domination by any one interest. The preservation of a diversity of institutions and auspices under which research can be conducted is also essential. The limits of human wisdom and motivation are such as to make it highly inadvisable that any one agency or group of persons be permitted to establish a hegemony over research.

The development of a more adequate supply of research personnel in the social sciences requires that a larger number of superior students have opportunity for training in the various fields that contribute to research competence. The inadequacy of the present supply of superior graduate students in the social sciences is a consequence both of the limited number of such students who are able to bear the costs of research training and also of the limited number of superior students who are able to bear the costs of undergraduate education. Investigations in several states have shown that high school graduates who do not go to college include large numbers who are intellectually as competent as those who go to college. A large number of potentially superior students are lost to the scholarly fields in which they could be of great service because they cannot meet the costs of undergraduate education.

The Social Science Research Council favors a program of government scholarships for superior undergraduate students and of fellowships for unusually promising graduate students. Such a scholarship and fellowship program should be planned to meet the needs for research personnel in the several scholarly fields, the natural sciences, the social sciences and the humanities. This joint program is essential because if scholarship aid is made available in some fields but not in others, superior students would be attracted to the former and drained away from the others. Choices of subjects of study would in part necessarily be made on the basis of the availability of scholarship funds rather than in terms of the student's aptitudes and interests.

It is, of course, essential that the scholarship and fellowship program utilize valid methods for identifying superior students. The experience of the armed forces, of the universities and of other professional groups has demonstrated the possibility of doing this job with a high degree of effectiveness. It is also essential that valid and impartial methods be used in the selection and appraisal of institutions and training programs for which scholarship and fellowship aid is given.

The Council's position concerning the government's research program rests upon the fact that a decision to support basic scientific research would fall far short of reaching its avowed objectives if by failure to include the social sciences it neglected to take advantage of the urgent need for greater knowledge in the social fields. If the government's program is concerned with national defense and security, with national health and welfare, and with the nation's prosperity any research agency which may be established inevitably will find itself dealing with research in the social sciences.

The traditional lines of demarcation between the natural and the social sciences have little meaning when confronted with the research problems involved in the safeguarding of the human aspects of every major problem of national interest. Collaboration and cooperation among the sciences rather than an intensification of past rivalries and competitions is essential if the contemplated program is not to worsen the existing situation instead of achieving the goals set for it. The proposed research agency will be concerned with social science problems whether it so wishes or not; the only relevant and essential question is whether it will from the outset be able to deal competently with these problems.

Great opportunities, accompanied by grave hazards, have been opened by victory in war, international organization for keeping peace, and man's recently demonstrated ability to produce goods in unprecedented variety and volume. Responsibility for making wise use of the opportunities must be laid upon and accepted by all the sciences to the full extent of their powers.

5- Church & Social Action

Reprinted from the October 24, 1946 issue of the Michigan Christian Advocate

Chaplain to Organized Labor

Note: For the first time Mr. Webber states his own case relative to his appointment as a chaplain to organized labor. White Methodists in the south have vigorously opposed the appointment as an embarrassment to them. The Council of Bishops, meeting at Grand Rapids recently, set up a special committee to study the matter. The case may necessitate General Conference action and has caused widespread interest throughout the church and labor groups. Mr. Webber's statement is released this week through Zions Herald and the Michigan Christian Advocate.

By CHARLES C. WEBBER

MY RECENT appointment as a "Chaplain to Organized Labor," heralded as "unprecedented," was not in fact unprecedented. It was grounded in the traditions and practices of the Roman Catholic, Anglican and Methodist churches.

In medieval times, the officials of the Catholic church appointed chaplains to the guilds, forerunners of our modern trade unions.

John Ball, the principal leader of the Peasants' Rising in England in 1381, was a chaplain. John Wycliffe, the priest who was called the Morningstar of the Reformation, sent out "poor priests" to the common folk of England with instructions to proclaim the individual man's right to judge for himself, and to be provided with his fair share of the goods of life.

John Wesley, the Anglican founder of Methodism, "was persuaded of the necessity of field preaching as a means of reaching the toiling masses." "He supported fair prices, a living wage and honest, healthy employment for all." "Repeatedly, at election times, he convened the enfranchised members of his Societies and urged them to vote for the candidate of nobler character who would support humanitarian and Christian principles." (See "This Freedom —Whence?" by J. Wesley Bready.)

Wesley's local and itinerant preachers followed in his steps as we find Jack Lawson, a member of the British House of Parliament, writing in his autobiography. "A Man's Life," "The first fighters and speakers for Unions, Cooperative Societies, political freedom and improved conditions were Methodist preachers. That is beyond argument."

Three of the six "Tolpuddle Martyrs" of the early English Trade Union movement were Methodist local preachers. (See Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam's "Labor and Tomorrow's World.") They were sent as prisoners to Australia simply because they dared to organize a union of "farm hands" and in the process had administered a "secret oath."

A strong petition of protest was circulated shortly after their imprisonment and on April 21, 1834, according to Bready, "not less than 30,000 organized workers (in London) bearing thirty-three trade banners and the petition with over a quarter of a million signatures, marched from Copenhagen Fields to Whitehall. . . At the head of the procession, wearing full canonicals, including the scarlet hood of a Doctor of Divinity, rode the "chaplain to the Metropolitan Trade Unions, Rev. Dr. Arthur Wade."

Within the last decade the Catholic church in the United States has been taking the lead once again in assigning members of its clergy to active work among Catholic Trade Unionists both as chaplains and as directors of Workers' Education projects.

In view of these precedents in ecclesiastical tradition and practice for the appointment of a "Chaplain to Organized Labor," why, you ask, has the Council of Bishops of The Methodist Church appointed a committee of bishops to make a study of "special appointments" such as mine?

The answer, as far as my case is concerned, briefly stated is as follows:

In May, 1944, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, then the presiding bishop of my Annual Conference —the New York East—appointed me—a Methodist minister with a record of over twenty years' service as a pastor, as a member of the faculty of Union Theological Seminary and as a secretary of the Methodist Federation for Social Service—field secretary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (CIO).

The following year, 1945, Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam renewed the appointment with the concurrence of the necessary two-thirds majority of the members of my Conference.

When Bishop McConnell first appointed me to the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (CIO), I was stationed in Knoxville, Tennessee. When Bishop Oxnam renewed the appointment I was stationed in Chambersburg, Pa.

In November, 1945, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America (CIO), transferred me to Richmond, Va., where I was given the primary responsibility of organizing the employees of the Crawford Manufacturing Co.

This last April, 1946, I was elected president of the Va. State CIO and director of the Va. CIO-PAC. This election brought a protest from a Methodist layman and made it necessary for me to go before the Conference Relationships Committee of my Conference at its May, 1946, session to face a request that I accept the supernumerary ministerial relationship.

After I presented my reasons for being kept in the active relationship, the Committee unanimously adopted a motion that they would approve Bishop Oxnam's continuance of me in an active ministerial relationship. Whereupon Bishop Oxnam appointed me as a "Chaplain to Organized Labor."

Immediately thereafter vigorous protests were made by conservative Methodists to Bishop Oxnam and to Bishop W. W. Peele (the Bishop of the Virginia and North Carolina white Conferences) to the effect that my "appointment would do The Methodist Church in Virginia more harm than good," and requesting Bishop Oxnam to move me back to the New York East Conference and to keep me there.

A few days later, after I had gone to Smithfield, Va., at the request of the Secretary of the Va. State CIO, to help protect the right of our Negro CIO members to vote without being intimidated in an N.L.R.B. election for a CIO union to represent them in collective bargaining with the management of a Smithfield ham packing house, I was denied permission to speak even during the discussion period in the Wesley Bible Class at the Trinity Methodist Church.

The moment I introduced myself as a Methodist minister and as president of the Va. State CIO, the presiding officer of the class said they did not allow any discussion of controversial issues (even though the scripture lesson for the day contained Jesus' statement, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of God"), and I was unable to point out that "The Methodist Church stands for the right of employees and employers alike to organize for collective bargaining and social action and for the protection of both in the exercise of this right."

My aiding and protecting unorganized Negro and white workers in the exercise of their right to organize, together with my directing the CIO-PAC campaign against the re-election of Senator Harry F. Byrd who, during his thirteen years in the Senate of the United States, has voted against the major progressive social welfare bills, caused Dr. George S. Reamey, editor of the Virginia Methodist Advocate, to suggest to Bishop Oxnam that he take prompt and appropriate action because I had devoted my "chief attention to the work of a labor organizer," and that I either surrender my credentials as a Methodist minister or confine my work to the spiritual activities as a labor chaplain and resign as CIO-PAC head in Virginia.

Bishop W. W. Peele took the position that my appointment had proved to be a very great embarrassment to him personally, and he appealed both to Bishop Oxnam and to me to relieve him of this embarrassment. (In 1943, when I was representing the ACWA in Martinsville, Va., while on a leave of absence from the M.F.S.S., Bishop Peele unsuccessfully requested Bishop McConnell to withdraw me from Virginia on the grounds that my life had been threatened. Bishop Peele asked me to leave, however, not because my life was endangered but because my union organizational work was, as he said, hurting the reputation of our Methodist Church.)

Bishop Alexander P. Shaw, the Bishop of the Negro Methodist Churches in Virginia, on the other hand has not been embarrassed by my appointment as a "Chaplain to Organized Labor" because our CIO unions have both Negro and white workers in their locals and are practicing economic and political brotherhood in their day by day activities in the shop, mill, factory, union hall and at the ballot box on election day.

They are ending Jim Crow discrimination, and are fighting for the abolition of the Poll Tax and for the adoption of a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission. In consequence, our Negro Methodists, agreeing with Bishop Oxnam's statement, "I see more religion in ending Jim Crow than in preaching abstractions about brotherhood," are of the opinion that the CIO and some of its leaders are a genuine religious force in the Southland.

If I were to appear before the Committee of Bishops, I would appeal to them to recommend to Bishop Oxnam and to the New York East Annual Conference that they continue my appointment as "Chaplain to Organized Labor" at the 1947 session of the Conference for the following reasons:

My appointment gives me a unique opportunity to aid the Crusade for Christ movement which has for its goal the establishment of the Kingdom or Commonwealth of God and man upon the Earth—a commonwealth without man-made depressions and wars.

Many economists are convinced that unless the American workers, farmers, and members of the middle-class are able to purchase a sufficient amount of the goods that our agricultural resources and our mass-production industries are capable of producing, we—the people of the United States—are in for another major depression which may precipitate another world war.

In the light of this conviction I am fully persuaded that when I, as a "Chaplain to Organized Labor," bring to unorganized Negro and white workers the moral sanction of The Methodist Church of their efforts to organize, and when I aid them, through collective bargaining, to end Jim Crowism, and to secure a more equitable amount of the products of agriculture and industry, I help prevent another world-wide calamity—a calamity that may well bring destruction upon us all, irrespective of whether we are workers or farmers, or whether we secure our living primarily through the ownership of property. (During the last eighteen months I have helped over 2,300 workers, through what I call Parable of the Day of Judgment activities, to organize and to secure an annual increase in wages of over $620,000.)

I am also of the conviction that when I, as a "Chaplain to Organized Labor," bring to the potential voters, not only of Virginia—because I do not consider my appointment as being limited to any state or nation—but also of other states, the moral sanction of The Methodist Church of their efforts to become qualified voters; and when I bring to them the moral sanction of The Methodist Church of the obligations of good citizens to vote for socially-minded legislators and governmental officials at all levels of government who have shown by their records that they are working for the common good, I help working men and women (especially those who are ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-housed and confronted with rising costs of living) to rely on ballots, not bullets, for the solution of their religious-socio-economic and political problems; and these activities further the Crusade for Christ.

My appointment as a "Chaplain to Organized Labor" has also enabled me to be a living demonstration that The Methodist Church not only believes in, but also practices its Social Creed at the point where it hurts—namely, at the risk of loss of financial support from its anti-union members.

This has made a profound impression upon thousands of working class men and women, many of whom have been indifferent, if not hostile, to the program of the Church; and has made it possible for me to give an interpretation of the life and teachings of Jesus to persons who otherwise would have been unwilling to listen with an attentive and receptive mind.

Some have objected to my appointment on the grounds that I am on the payroll of a labor organization. They contend therefore that I may be required to carry out activities contrary to the policy and program of our Church.

My answer to this objection is found in the requirement of my Annual Conference that all ministers who have "Special Appointments" must report every year to the Bishop on their activities. It is to be assumed that, if he finds that the activities of a "Chaplain to Organized Labor" are contrary to the policy and program of our Church, he will take the necessary steps to correct such a situation.

I am more than willing, if the Committee so desires, to appear before it with a detailed report on all my work since I have been appointed a "Chaplain to Organized Labor." I am positive that none of my major activities have been contrary to the policy and program of The Methodist Church.

A recommendation on the part of the Committee that bishops in the future refrain from appointing active ministers as "Chaplains to Organized Labor" with the knowledge that organized labor, like the U.S. government, is paying the salaries of the chaplains, and my being required to either "locate" or accept a "supernumerary" appointment, would, in my judgment, and that of working-class Methodists, greatly handicap our Church in bringing the full Gospel of Jesus to bear upon the major religious-socio-economic-political problems of our day.

Congress of Industrial Organizations

718 Jackson Place, N. W. • Washington 6, D. C.

C
O
P
Y

RECEIVED
SEP 13 1947

September 10, 1946

The Reverend G. Bromley Oxnam
Bishop of the Methodist Church
150 Fifth Avenue
New York 11, N. Y.

Dear Bishop Oxnam:-

Yes, indeed, I know of Charles Webber's work. He does an excellent job for the CIO wherever he goes. The precedent of a Methodist minister being elected to the presidency of a state industrial union council is a unique one, and it seems to me that it indicates how important it is for men of goodwill to work within organizations and also points to possible avenues of advance.

I am sure that our country could feel much more secure in regard to its future, if more Christians translated their ideals into specific action.

I have a great deal of confidence in Charles Webber, and I can assure you that my support is back of him in his work of projecting Christian concepts into practical action.

Sincerely yours,

Philip Murray

Congress of Industrial Organizations

718 Jackson Place, N. W. • Washington 6, D. C.

EXECUTIVE 5581

Office of
KERMIT EBY, Director
Department of Education and Research

RECEIVED
16 1948
Southern Regional Council

March 9, 1948

DEAR FRIEND:

This is a call to action in behalf of a constructive and long-needed educational undertaking—the Labor Extension Service Bill.

Senate hearings on the Bill have just ended and the Committee will probably make its decision in two weeks. Won't you, after reading the enclosed leaflet, simply write to the following Senators and urge that they take favorable action on S. 1390, the Labor Extension Service Bill?:

ROBERT A. TAFT (R) Ohio
GEORGE D. AIKEN (R) Vermont
H. ALEXANDER SMITH (R) New Jersey
FORREST C. DONNELL (R) Missouri
IRVING M. IVES (R) New York
ALLEN ELLENDER (D) Louisiana
ELBERT D. THOMAS (D) Utah
LISTER HILL (D) Alabama

We are still waiting for hearing dates in the House. Won't you help us by also writing to the following Congressmen, simply indicating your interest in H. R. 4078 (the Bill's House number), its right to be heard, and the importance of setting immediate dates for a hearing?

FRED A. HARTLEY (R) New Jersey
JOSEPH W. MARTIN (R) Massachusetts
CHARLES A. HALLECK (R) Indiana
EDWARD O. MCCOWEN (R) Ohio

Letters should be addressed to the Senate or House Office Buildings, Washington 25, D. C. If you are short on stamps, won't you please write to any on the list who may be from your own state first and get to the others as soon as possible?

The Labor Extension Service Bill is supported by all branches of organized labor. It is our suggestion for a positive program to help resolve industrial disputes by the use of facts and reason rather than picket lines. Your good will and pen can help us now.

Sincerely yours,

Kermit Eby.

KERMIT EBY, Director
Department of Education and Research

WORKERS!!

A WORLD OF NEW SERVICE FOR YOU

IF... S-1390

THE LABOR EXTENSION SERVICE BILL IS PASSED....

DO YOUR PART

THIS IS IT: LABOR EXTENSION SERVICE A NEW LABOR PROGRAM

A bill to promote a better AMERICA

S-1390

Labor Extension Division to be created in U. S. Department of Labor to serve workers as Agriculture Extension serves farmers.

Colleges and Universities will provide labor extension services at the request of labor organizations.

$ 10 MILLION	1948
$ 20 MILLION	1949
$ 30 MILLION	1950

Government funds to be divided among states on quota basis.

HERE'S WHAT IT WILL MEAN . . . TO YOU . . .

EDUCATIONAL BROADCASTS

LABOR LIBRARY SERVICES

LABOR INSTITUTES

FILM SERVICES

EXHIBITS

YOU CAN HELP . . .

S-1390

SEND CONTRIBUTIONS

PASS RESOLUTIONS

WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMEN

Send contributions, resolutions, requests for information and materials, letters telling what you think of the Bill

TO

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR THE EXTENSION OF LABOR EDUCATION

3117 PENN AVE., N. W., WASHINGTON 7, D. C.

THE PLAN FOR A LABOR EXTENSION SERVICE IS ENDORSED BY ALL OF LABOR

THIS IS WHAT LABOR SAYS:

AFL

"Such a service would give workers the material and tools with which to meet their educational needs."

Unanimously adopted, 65th Convention. AFL Chicago, Illinois, October 1946

CIO

"All affiliated International Unions, Councils, and Local Industrial Unions are urged to support this program, by resolution, publicity, financial assistance and communications to their respective members of Congress, and cooperate with the Committee for the Extension of Labor Education towards this end."

Unanimously adopted, 8th Constitutional Convention CIO, Atlantic City, New Jersey, November, 1946

RAILROAD LABOR

"Our Association endorses the principle and objectives of this proposed legislation."

A. E. Lyon, Executive Secretary, Railway Labor Executives' Association, January 14, 1947

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
Wednesday, May 20, 1953

Communism and Conformity

By George F. Kennan

Following are excerpts from the text of an address delivered by Mr. Kennan, former Ambassador to Russia, at a University of Notre Dame convocation on May 15.

THE sense of warmth and reassurance that flows from this occasion means all the more to me because I cannot forget that there are forces at large in our society today that do not inspire me with this same feeling—quite the contrary. These forces are too diffuse to be described by their association with the name of any one man or any one political concept. They have no distinct organizational forms. They are as yet largely matters of the mind and the emotion in large masses of individuals. But they all march, in one way o another, under the banner of an alarmed and exercised anti-Communism—but an anti-Communism of a quite special variety, bearing an air of excited discovery and proprietorship, as though no one had ever known before that there was a Communist danger, as though no one had ever thought about it and taken its measure, as though it had all begun about the year 1945, and these people were the first to learn of it.

I have no quarrel to pick with the ostensible purposes of the people in whom these forces are manifest. Surely, many of them are sincere. Surely, many of them are good people. Surely, many of them have come to these views under real provocation and out of real bewilderment. But I have the deepest misgivings about the direction and effects of their efforts. In general, I feel that what they are doing is unwise and unfortunate, and I am against it.

They distort and exaggerate the dimensions of the problem with which they profess to deal. They confuse internal and external aspects of the Communist threat. They insist on portraying as contemporary realities things that had their actuality years ago.

AND having thus incorrectly stated the problem, it is no wonder that these people consistently find the wrong answers. They tell us to remove our eyes from the constructive and positive purposes and to pursue with fanaticism the negative and vindictive ones. They sow timidity where there should be boldness; fear where there should be serenity; suspicion where there should be confidence and generosity. In this wa they impel us—in the name of our salvation from the dangers of Communism—to many of the habits of thought and action which our Soviet adversaries, I am sure, would most like to see us adopt and which they have tried unsuccessfully over a period of some thirty-five years to graft upon us through the operations of their Communist party.

I would not mention these things if I felt that they were only my personal concern and had no relation to the undertaking which we have gathered today to celebrate. But I fear that there is here a serious relevance which we cannot ignore.

Thanks to the vision of wise and generous people, this university is now adding one more important unit to the number of those facilities in our country in which men can cultivate their own understanding, and extend the boundaries of knowledge, in the field of arts and letters. Certainly there could be no finer undertaking, and none more needed. But I feel that this undertaking, too, will have to deal at some point with the forces I have just described.

I feel this first of all because these forces are narrowly exclusive in their approach to our world position, and carry this exclusiveness into the field of international cultural exchanges.

The remote pasts of foreign artists and scholars are anxiously scanned before they are permitted to enter our land, and this is done in proceedings so inflexible in concept and offensive in execution that their very existence often constitutes a discouragement to cultural interchange.

A SECOND reason why I think you will have to concern yourselves with the forces to which I have pointed is that within the framework of our society, as in its relations to external environment, the tendency of these forces is exclusive and intolerant—quick to reject, slow to receive, intent on discovering what ought not to be rather than what ought to be. They claim the right to define a certain area of our national life and cultural output as beyond the bonds of righteous approval. This definition is never effected by law or by constituted authority; it is effected by vague insinuation and suggestion. And the circle, as I say, tends to grow constantly narrower. One has the impression that if uncountered, these people would eventually narrow the area of political and cultural respectability to a point where it included only themselves, the excited accusers, and excluded everything and everybody not embraced in the profession of denunciation.

I recall reading recently, twice in one day, the words of individuals who proclaimed that if certain other people did not get up and join actively in the denunciation of Communists or Communism, they would thereby themselves be suspect. What sort of arrogance is this?

I have lived more than ten years of my life in totalitarian countries. I know where this sort of thing leads.

In these forces I have spoken about, it seems to me that I detect a conscious rejection and ridicule of intellectual effort and distinction. They come together here with a deep-seated weakness in the American character: a certain shy self-consciousness that tends to deny interests other than those of business, sport, or war. There is a powerful strain of our American cast of mind that has little use for the artist or the writer.

WHAT is it that causes us to huddle together, herdlike, in tastes and enthusiasms that represent only the common denominator of popular acquiescence rather than to show ourselves receptive to the tremendous flights of creating imagination of which the individual mind has shown itself capable? Is it that we are forgetful of the true source of our moral strength, afraid of ourselves, afraid to look into the chaos of our own breasts, afraid of the bright, penetrating light of the great teachers?

It may not seem to many of us too dangerous that we should all live, dress, eat, hear, and read substantially alike. But we forget how easily this uniformity of thought and habit can be exploited, when the will to exploit it is there. We forget how easily it can slip over into the domination of our spiritual and political lives by self-appointed custodians who contrive to set themselves at the head of popular emotional currents.

There is a real and urgent danger here for any one who values the right to differ from others in any manner whatsoever, be it in his interests or his associations or his faith.

THE forces of intolerance and political demagoguery are greedy forces, and unrestrained. There is no limit to their ambitions or their impudence. They contain within themselves no mechanism of self-control.

It is for these reasons that I feel that you, in setting up at this time within this great academic community a center for liberal arts, are taking upon yourselves a great, though honorable, burden. You are going to have to swim against the tide of many of the things I have been talking about. You are frequently going to find arrayed against you, whether by intent or otherwise, the materialists, the anti-intellectuals, the chauvinists of all sizes and descriptions, the protagonists of violence and suspicion and intolerance, the people who take it upon themselves to delimit the operation of the principle of Christian charity, the people from whose memories there has passed the recollection that in their Father's house there are many mansions.

Reprinted by permission
AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION
170 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

THE CHURCHES and the
EUROPEAN RECOVERY PROGRAM

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, 297 Fourth Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

c1950 -?

Reli

Signposts for Christians

v.6

REPORT OF THE
STANDING COMMITTEE ON SOCIAL EDUCATION AND ACTION

ORGANIZATIONAL STRUCTURE OF HISTADRUT

EXECUTIVE BUREAU
GENERAL SECRETARY

DEPARTMENTS

- FINANCE
- CENTRAL FEES — STATISTICS
- ORGANIZATION
- LEGAL — MUNICIPAL
- EDUCATION — CULTURE — INFORMATION
- TRADE UNION

DEPARTMENTS

- IMMIGRATION
- MUTUAL AID
- FOREIGN RELATIONS
- ARABS
- VOCATIONAL TRAINING
- TOURISM

- GENERAL COUNCIL → EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
- GENERAL CONVENTION
  - CENTRAL COURT
  - CENTRAL CONTROL BOARD
- SHOP COMMITTEE
- LOCAL LABOR COUNCIL
- NATIONAL TRADE UNION

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS
BUILDING & BUILDING MATERIAL WORKERS
PROFESSIONAL AND CLERICAL WORKERS GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES
CIVILIANS IN ARMY TRANSPORT WORKERS
TEXTILE WORKERS
METAL WORKERS
PRINTING & CARDBOARD WORKERS
LEATHER WORKERS
FOOD AND BAKERY WORKERS
CARPENTERS SEAMEN ELECTRICAL WORKERS
TEACHERS
ARTISTS NURSES DOCTORS
ENGINEERS & ARCHITECTS
WATCHMEN
SOCIAL WORKERS
PHARMACISTS LABORATORY WORKERS

- WORKING WOMEN'S COUNCIL
- NOAR OVED — Working Youth
- HAPOEL — Sports
- LABOR EXCHANGES
- SCHOOLS
  - Nurseries
  - Elementary
  - High Schools
  - Vocational
  - Farm Schools
- CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS
  - "DAVAR" daily
  - "OMER" daily for new immigrants
  - "OHEL" Theatre
  - "AM OVED" Book Publishing
  - Hebrew Classes
  - Workers College
  - Professional and Cultural Periodicals
- SOCIAL SECURITY
  - Kupat Holim (Sick Fund)
  - Invalidity Fund
  - Old Age Pension Fund
  - Family Security Fund

490

SOLEL BONEH
Building Contractors

SHIKUN
Co-op Housing

CRAFTS AND INDUSTRY

WORKERS' BANK

HASSNEH
Insurance

TRANSPORT & SERVICE CO-OPS

HEVRAT OVDIM
COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION

AGRICULTURAL SETTLEMENTS

MEKOROT
Water & Irrigation

TNUVA Marketing

HAKAL
Agricultural Contracting

HAMASHBIR
Co-op Stores

Civil Liberties

JUSTICE WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS

Civil liberties:

"the direct and daring course" excerpts from an address on the occasion of the 100th Anniversary of Governor Altgeld of Illinois by Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the Supreme Court of the United States at Chicago, Illinois, December 30, 1947

John P. Altgeld
Governor of Illinois 1893-1897

Sleep softly . . . eagle forgotten . . . under the stone,
Time has its way with you there and the clay has its own.
Sleep on, O brave-hearted, O wise man, that kindled the flame —
To live in mankind is far more than to live in a name,
To live in mankind, far, far more . . . than to live in a name

— VACHEL LINDSAY

(From: GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH ENTERS INTO HEAVEN AND OTHER POEMS. Copyright, 1913 by The Macmillan Company and used with their permission)

Civil liberties: "the direct and daring course"

JOHN PETER ALTGELD is probably unknown to most Americans. . . . His name has not yet become, as it should, a force which we call American idealism . . . .

But as Vachel Lindsay nobly said of him, "To live in mankind is far more than to live in a name." Altgeld does, I believe, "live in mankind." It was the cause of mankind which he pleaded. . . . Those who would not have seen eye to eye with him on many of the contentious issues of his era nevertheless gain inspiration from the character of his advocacy.

He feared no man. As a lawyer, his clients did not cause him to stand mute when his conscience urged him to speak out. As a politician, he did not follow the safe course of indecision or of ambiguous pronouncement when his instinct for justice told him to meet an evil head on. As a private individual, he did not turn his back and withdraw to the ease and comfort of his wealth when the victims of an industrial system cried out against its inhumanities.

THE powerful social forces of his age moved him to action. . . . He lost almost every major cause he pleaded. But those were the skirmishes and the battles which were mere episodes in a larger and more far-flung campaign. His failures caused new recruitments. A full generation later men who never knew his name were summoned by the ideas which he had generated or espoused. They marched to great victories of which he perhaps had never even dreamed . . . .

Altgeld came to maturity during the days of our Robber Barons. The great industrial and financial strength of the East had won a war and had grown stronger in the process. A large productive capacity, a huge reservoir of capital awaited new ventures. Men of vision saw untold opportunities in the exploitation of the western two thirds of the Continent. . . .

Banker, industrialist, builder, and speculator were the driving forces in that tremendous undertaking. Some maintain that, at least in days of peace, the job never could have been done so fast any other way. However that may be, it is clear that it was extravagant in its cost, inhuman in its methods, corrupt in its influence. . . .

The nation had just rid itself of chattel slavery, renouncing for all time the idea that men could be bought and sold and exploited like cattle. But it seemed to many that the nation was on the verge of embracing a form of industrial slavery, which in its consequences was almost as vicious as the slavery which had just been abolished. . . .

A GREAT restlessness swept the country. There was a depression in the early '90's and millions were unemployed. They swept over the Cascades and the Rockies on the move to Washington for currency reforms, for a public works program. Some stole trains and were jailed. So were the hitchhikers who rode the boxcars. Strikers, too, were jailed. Contempt of court became a weapon in industrial warfare. It was a powerful weapon. It aligned the forces of government — the courts, the marshals, the troops — on the side of industry and against the workers. Government was there not to adjudicate the justness of the claims, not to mediate or to arbitrate the disputes, but to crush and suppress those who protested against the injustices of the new industrial era. . . . The enormous injustices which he (Altgeld) saw violated his sense of social justice. He first wrote and spoke his protests; then he moved to action, giving and expecting no quarter.

As governor of Illinois he put through a law aimed at sweatshops, at the employment of children who were under 14, and at the employment of women over eight hours daily or more than 48 hours a week. The latter provision was held unconstitutional on grounds which reflected the dominant political philosophy of the age — that it violated both the employer's and the worker's freedom of contract.

He put through a law in aid of collective bargaining, which made it a crime to dismiss an employee because of membership in a labor union, and thus sowed one of the first seeds out of which the National Labor Relations Act grew a generation or more later. He inaugurated a system of mediation and arbitration of labor disputes. He put through a law that outlawed limitation of production, price fixing, pooling agreements, and other restraints of trade. He got an inheritance tax law passed. . . .

He protested vigorously against the use of Federal troops to break strikes. He resisted the use of the injunction in industrial disputes. . . .

As governor he put his influence behind the development of a strong, progressive university. He feared that monopoly capital might spawn its own seats of learning and dominate the minds of men as well as their bodies. . . .

Altgeld knew what we are apt to overlook or forget, that the procedural safeguards of the Bill of Rights were designed to protect the citizen against the tyranny not only of legislatures and of executives but of judges, too. . . .

The framers of the Constitution, knowing that, designed the constitutional requirement of a fair trial to protect the accused not only against the police and the prosecutors, but against the judges as well. . . .

WHEN Altgeld became governor, four of the men found guilty in the Haymarket riots had been hanged. Three were still in prison. Altgeld reviewed their cases and granted them pardons. The pardon was for him a simple, uncomplicated act. . . . Unfair attitudes of both judge and jury had in his view, infected the trial.

The reaction was violent. . . . He at once experienced what many both before and after him experienced — that he who calls for the application of the Bill of Rights to unpopular minorities, as well as to other groups of the community, often becomes himself suspect. Thus when Altgeld insisted that even anarchists were entitled to due process of law, he was dubbed an anarchist.

But a man whose devotion to our system of government was so great that he did not want it to become the tool of a capitalist oligarchy was not even remotely related to the anarchists. He was merely seeking to apply the philosophy of Jefferson to the workaday world of the '90's — due process of the law for every man, whatever his race or creed or political faith; social justice for those at the bottom, as well as those at the top, of the economic pyramid. . . . Altgeld's philosophy has relevance to current American problems in at least two respects:

FIRST, Altgeld placed human beings higher than the dollar in the national scale of values. A nation's industrial plant represents not only the daring of capital and the imagination of executives, but the blood and sweat of men. The men and women who compose a nation are its greatest natural resources — greater than its mines or forests or rivers.

The nation is healthy only if its people are strong. The state must concern itself with their economic disasters. For the greater share of their troubles is due not to laziness but to economic forces beyond their control. There is in most men a lively sense of decency, of good will, of fraternity. The poor have those instincts, as well as those blessed with more worldly goods. The powers of government should be directed to protect them in their struggle to survive and in their efforts to live in dignity and to share the fruits of freedom. . . .

We will be wise if we carry that philosophy into the world problems which confront us today. There are active bidders for the good will and support of the common people of the world. There are emissaries of totalitarian regimes in the capitals of the world, bargaining with bags of wheat for the souls of men. They are our competitors; but we need not emulate their example.

THE victims of war in Europe and Asia need and ask our aid. But these people must not be treated as if they can be purchased with the dollar. We must not manage this great crisis of democracy as if it were an auction; as if the peoples of the world were on the block and going to the highest bidder.

The sensitiveness of people increases with their suffering. The peoples of the world have suffered beyond our comprehension. If we so manage this crisis as to leave the impression that our standards are mercenary, we will have generated a revulsion to our system which may well be irreparable.

As a result of their struggles all peoples of the world are closer together. Their common interests have made them parts of something which is bigger than their own country. That is true of us, too. We have wider horizons, greater obligations. So when we come to the aid of the distressed people of the world, we act not out of charity alone but in answer to a responsibility to support in peace the ideal for which we were willing to wage a war.

Someway, somehow, we must let the people of the world know that. We must reach behind the façade of ministers and cabinets and commissions and let the common people feel our warm handclasp. We must let them know that we understand their suffering. We must make sure they know that our desire is not to make them our satellites but to meet them as equals in a world where standards of decency and justice prevail.

My remarks are not directed to agencies of government. I refer more particularly to the role which all groups — civic, cultural, and religious — can play in keeping close ties with the peoples of the world.

Behind even the iron curtain of eastern Europe are human beings whose thirst for freedom is as great as our own. We must manage to let them feel the warmth of our understanding and friendship. We must not let them become the forgotten people of the world. They must know that their problems are our concern too, that we respect their worth as human beings, that they also are part of the brotherhood which we have come to symbolize in the world.

Governments may be imposed on these people. But the people themselves are the ultimate source of political power in every state. The pattern of an enduring peace will be found only in their hopes and aspirations.

Altgeld once said that "all great reforms, great movements, come from the bottom and not the top." That is true in the international as well as the national field. Thus it is doubly important that we do not lose the link which we have with all peoples whose dream is political, intellectual, and religious freedom.

SECOND, there is another current problem to which Altgeld's philosophy is relevant. On the domestic scene his courage and steadfastness of purpose are needed for protection of the civil liberties of our people.

We are apt to leave that task to the faraway court in the state or national capital. Those courts, by their examples, exert a great influence. But the great percentage of the grist is found in the lower courts. A more accurate measure of the vitality of our Bill of Rights is not in the sporadic rulings of our highest tribunals but in the day to day attitudes of the lower courts.

Moreover, it is not in the courts alone that the strength of our civil liberties is to be ascertained. The executive and legislative branches of government also have responsibilities for enforcement of the Bill of Rights. The administration of the voting booths, the habits of the police in law enforcement, the nature of the city's ordinances — these all are indexes of the vitality of the Bill of Rights in the life of the community. So is the attitude of the community. For an indifferent community, like a misguided one, will surely breed disrespect for the standards embodied in the Bill of Rights.

We may never reach perfection in our practice of the ideals of the Bill of Rights. But there is no earthly reason why with education and organization it cannot become an increasingly potent force in the everyday lives of our people. The extent of a community's respect of the human rights of all of its citizens is in fact the measure of its program in civilization. Altgeld broke the trail — making it easier for every man of conscience who followed.

The creation of a healthy community attitude is not the exclusive task of any one group. The task starts in the homes, in the schools, and in the churches. But city and state officials, editors, lawyers, and other groups of citizens have an important share of the responsibility.

I remember recent instances where tyrannical judges sitting in local courts rode roughshod over the civil liberties of defendants charged with crime. In one case it was a doctor, in another an editor who thundered personal disapproval and started campaigns to rid their cities of those oppressive practices. They were indeed the ones that alerted the local bar associations and caused civil liberties committees to be formed to patrol the local scene.

THESE are not always easy steps to take. When Altgeld insisted that even anarchists were entitled to due process of law, he himself was labeled a subversive influence. That will often be said today when one insists that the safeguard of the Bill of Rights be extended to all groups, including any minority group in our midst that may be at the whipping post or the subject of temporary hysteria.

Yes, it takes courage to stand between an unpopular minority and the community, insisting that our Bill of Rights was designed for the protection of all people whatever their race, creed, or political faith.

The lawyer may feel uneasy when it seems that important clients may slip away because of his attitude. The editor may be tempted to stand mute by reason of the views of important advertisers. Even the clergyman may be under pressure to hold his tongue because of the influence of some of his parishioners.

But those who are devoted to the democratic ideal expressed in our Bill of Rights will take the direct and daring course. Once they are sure of their facts and know they are doing right they will, like Altgeld, espouse the cause of the victims of ignorance, prejudice, or passion. They, too, may be pilloried or cursed. But institutions become great by the greatness of the men who champion them, by the greatness of the advocacy that defends them.

A PEOPLE indifferent to their civil liberties do not deserve to keep them, and in this revolutionary age may not be expected to keep them long. A people who proclaim their civil liberties but extend them only to preferred groups start down the path to totalitarianism. They emulate either the dictatorship of the right or the dictatorship of the left. In doing this they erase a basic distinction between our system of government and totalitarianism.

To allow that to happen is to lose by default. Far better to lose pleading the cause of decency and justice. Then we win greatness even in defeat, and leave behind a rich heritage for those who later rebuild on the ashes of our lost hopes. But there will be no failure if we adhere steadfastly to our faith. For the goal of people of all races is toward a system which respects their dignity, frees their minds, and allows them to worship their God in their own way. None has yet designed an article of political faith more suited to those ends than our own Bill of Rights.

For Additional Copies, Write to:
SOUTHEASTERN REGIONAL OFFICE
ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
11 Pryor St., S. W. - ATLANTA, GA.

FOR ADDITIONAL COPIES, WRITE TO

Community Relations Service

386 FOURTH AVENUE · NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

181 PRINTED IN U.S.A.

For Additional Copies, Write to:
SOUTHEASTERN REGIONAL OFFICE
ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
11

The Southern Regional Council
Guy B. Johnson, Exec. Dir.
63 Auburn Ave., N. E.
Atlanta 3, Ga.

1- Civil Rights

U. S. POSTAGE
1c PAID
CHICAGO, ILL.
Permit No. 8460

CIVIL LIBERTIES NEWS

A Monthly Summary of the Struggle for Human Rights

The Secret of Liberty Is Courage

Published by the Chicago Civil Liberties Committee
Affiliated with the American Council for Human Rights and the International Committee for Human Rights

Wm. Scott Stewart, Chairman
21 East Van Buren St., Chicago 5, Illinois
Telephone Harrison 8460

EDITOR—IRA LATIMER

572

Entered as 2nd Class Matter, March 2, 1948, at the Post Office at Chicago, Ill., Under the Act of March 3, 1879.

VOL. 4, No. 12 | OCTOBER 1, 1948 | $2.00 ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION $1.00 FOR MEMBERS

Illinois Law a Blind Alley - U.S. Supreme Court

Illinois was dealt a blow by the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision No. 93, October Term 1947, in Marino v. Ragen 332 U.S. 561. The unanimous decision of the court, in the light of confession of error by the Illinois Atty. Gen., and the undisputed facts, concluded "that petitioner was denied due process of law which the Fourteenth Amendment requires . . . and the judgment below is vacated and remanded to the Circuit Court."

However Justice Rutledge (who specializes on Illinois law for the court), joined by Justice Douglas and Justice Murphy, wrote a concurring opinion which condemns Illinois justice. They say: "If the federal guarantee of due process in a criminal trial is to have real significance in Illinois, it is imperative that men convicted in violation of their constitutional rights have an adequate opportunity to be heard in court. This opportunity is not adequate so long as they are required to ride the Illinois merry-go-round of habeas corpus, coram nobis, and writ of error before getting a hearing in a federal court. Consequently, as far as I am concerned, the Illinois remedies are exhausted here, apart from the state's confession of error. I also think that, until that state affords a reasonably clear and adequate means for presenting and disposing of such questions as Marino's case involves, this court should no longer require exhaustion of its present scheme of ineffective and inadequate remedies before permitting resort to the federal district courts sitting in Illinois. We should neither delay or deny justice, nor clog its administration, with so useless and harmful a procedural strangling of federal constitutional rights."

Behind this tongue-lashing of Illinois justice is the steady fight on Illinois criminal procedure carried on by a handful of able criminal lawyers and more particularly a group of prisoners at Statesville Prison. The rawest cases became known to the self-educated prisoner "lawyers" who assist these best cases to draft petitions to the U.S. Supreme Court alleging deprivations of due process and other constitutional rights. "Thus in the 1944 term, out of a total of 339 petitions filed in forma pauperis, almost all by prisoners, 141 came from Illinois; in the 1945 term, 175 out of 393 were from Illinois; and in the 1946 term, 332 out of 528 came from that state. With mechanical regularity petitions for certiorari to review Illinois' refusals to grant relief, often even to grant a hearing, have been denied." Of the 322 petitions filed in the 1946 term, only two were granted. The Court has tried the policy of requiring petitioners to "exhaust his state remedies."

Chairman Stewart Asks Representation For Criminal Lawyers in Law Revision

Chairman Wm. Scott Stewart has written President Jas. P. Carey, Jr., of the Chicago Bar Assn., comments on a law revision commission for Illinois. "When reforms are considered," writes Mr. Stewart, "in the law relative to property and business, both sides are represented. The lawyers see to it that neither side gains an advantage. I am afraid that in my branch of the law the defense is defaulted too often. Pressure groups prevail because the individual lawyer cannot keep up."

"The lawyer in civil business would not knowingly give the prosecution an advantage, in the guise of reform, but he cannot be expected to keep up with the probable effects of new legislation—any more than I can know of the real meaning of proposed reforms in the law of trusts, taxes or insurance. Those of us who know a little about the criminal law, know also that if we oppose the pressure groups, we open ourselves to personal attack. I am not complaining of this particularly for such is life. My objection to any new commission, such as you propose, is that it will operate as a departure from our form of government."

UNITED NATIONS DAY DINNER TUES. OCT. 26, AMBASSADOR EAST

The International Committee for Human Rights will hold its second annual fund-raising banquet Tuesday, October 26, at 7:00 P. M., in the Sarah Siddons Walk banquet room of the Ambassador East Hotel. Guests are limited to those contributing $25 or more to the ICHR work for the coming year.

Invited speakers include: Dr. Petre Zenkl, former chairman of the former Socialist (Benes) Party of Czechoslovakia, just arrived this month from Europe; Dr. Josef Lettrich, former chairman of the former Democratic Party of Slovakia, a political exile now living in Chicago; Prof. Herman Finer, Univ. of Chicago Political Science Dept., and former Londoner; and Judge John J. Gutknecht, Municipal Court of Chicago, who spent the past summer in Europe. President Wm. Scott Stewart will preside.

Send reservations to the office—guests limited to 150.

ENROLL ONE NEW MEMBER IN OCTOBER

CCLC MEMBERS WHO ARE CANDIDATES NOV. 2, 1948

At each election the CCLC has for a decade listed members of the Committee who are candidates for public office. The Committee is non-partisan and has never endorsed any candidate or even recommended appointees.

The following candidates for Judge of the Municipal Court: Judge Harry P. Beam, Judge Oscar S. Caplan, Judge Chas. S. Doughtery (Adv. Bd.), Judge Leon Edelman, Judge Wendell E. Green, Judge Erwin J. Hasten, Judge Justin F. McCarthy, Judge John V. McCormick, Judge George L. Quilici, Judge Jay A. Schiller, Judge Michael Tremko, Judge John T. Zuris, Joseph Pope (Adv. Bd.) and Fred (Duke) Slater (Adv. Bd.).

The following candidates for Congressman: Cong. William L. Dawson, Cong. Adolph J. Sabath, Cong. Thos. J. O'Brien, Cong. Thos. S. Gordon (all on Adv. Bd.); John Haderlein (Acting Postmaster), Cong. Martin Gorski, Cong. Robt. J. Twyman, Cong. Ralph E. Church, Earl B. Dickerson.

The following candidates for state offices: Senator C. Wayland Brooks, Gov. Dwight H. Green, Hon. Edward J. Barrett, Hon. Wm. G. Stratton, Hon. Arthur C. Lueder, Hon. George F. Barrett, Curtis MacDougall.

The following candidates for city and county offices: Hon. Albert J. Horan (Adv. Bd.), Chief Justice Edward S. Scheffler, Hon. Joseph L. Gill, Hon. A. L. Brodie (Adv. Bd.), Hon. John E. Conroy, Hon. Henry Sonnenschein.

The following candidates for members of the General Assembly: Sen. Wm. G. Knox, Sen. Frank McDermott, Sen. Frank Ryan, (The even numbered districts elect state senators in 1948.) Rep. Jas. J. Adduci, Rep. Stanley C. Armstrong, Rep. H. R. Blomstrand, Rep. John F. Boyle, Rep. Corneal A. Davis (Adv. Bd.), Rep. A. L. Auth, Rep. Louis G. Berman, Rep. Alan Best, Rep. John D'Arco, Rep. Jos. L. De La Cour, Rep. Andrew A. Euzzino, Rep. Wm. S. Finucane, Rep. Matt Franz, Rep. John J. Gorman, Rep. Wm. J. Gormley, Rep. Peter C. Granata, Rep. Michael E. Hannigan, Rep. John O. Hruby, Rep. Peter J. Jezierny, Rep. Arthur M. Kaindl, Rep. John C. Kluczynski, Rep. Stanley R. Kosinski, Rep. Frank Kuklinski, Rep. Noble W. Lee, Rep. Vito Marzullo, Rep. Walter McAvoy, Rep. Ragnar G. Nelson, Rep. George Noonan, Rep. Edward P. O'Grady, Rep. Thos. A. Patton, Rep. Robert Petrone, Rep. Anthony C. Prusinski, Rep. Paul J. Randolph, Rep. Jos. L. Rategan, Rep. Michael A. Ruddy, Rep. Elroy C. Sandquist, Rep. James J. Ryan, Rep. John G. Ryan, Rep. Edward Schneider, Rep. Pierce L. Shannon, Rep. Chas. M. Skyles, Rep. Fred J. Smith, Rep. Chas. H. Weber (Adv. Bd.), Rep. Jos. Zientek.

Dear Member:

CCLC income has dropped due to inflation, political campaign, overseas appeals and confusion. Your membership is doubly appreciated. If you can afford to join the International Committee for Human Rights this month ($2 for CCLC members) please do so. The ICHR United Nations Day fund-raising dinner Oct. 26 will help carry the office overhead till spring — and provide some funds for projects on the international level. A conference to consider holding a second world congress on human rights is being held Nov. 14-15 in London. The international front has become the most important civil rights issue.

The citizens committee to advise the Police Commissioner on comic books will meet in the City Council chambers Oct. 11 at 2 P. M. CCLC has offered to secure the RKO "This Is America" featurette No. 6 "The Funny Business" to show the civic leaders the pros and cons on comic thrillers. CCLC has invited the Comics Publishers executive secretary to come to Chicago and explain the new Code to the advisory committee.

The CCLC was not permitted by Asst. Coroner Ingalls to present witnesses from the neighborhood at the inquest into the death of Robert Mayes. The Jury decided the death was "justifiable homocide." The Mayor said that the Police Commissioner would make an investigation. No word has been received of any action by Prendergast to get the true facts about how Robert Mayes was shot to death by policemen. A civil suit for wrongful death on behalf of the boy's estate is being filed.

CCLC Adds 300 Gift Members in August

Chairman Wm. Scott Stewart raised $900 to help tide the Committee over August and gift memberships were sent to aldermen, judges, legislators, police captains, H.S. principals and other public officials. Several police captains went to Police Commissioner Prendergast to ask what they should do about their gifts and he told the Tribune, which printed a story and a facsimile of Mr. Stewart's letter, that captains could accept or decline. Eight of the 40 captains of police districts have declined our gift memberships. Nearly a score of other officials to date have also declined, mostly with regrets because of their official positions. New gift memberships have been sent to replace those declining. The purpose of our gifts is to maintain our numbers, educate public officials on civil rights issues through the CLNews, increase the number of available advisory board members, and secure added income from renewals and special contributions. Criticism to the effect that making police captains members will tie the hands of the Committee is apparently not familiar with CCLC history. John Knight took note of the CCLC gifts in an inspired News editorial.

CCLC Urges Civil Rights Ordinance

In this election year the Committee has high hopes of having the City Council adopt the first municipal civil rights ordinance in the country. The CCLC had the Illinois state civil rights statute drafted as an ordinance and had it introduced in the Council by Ald. Harvey. It has gathered dust in committee but action is promised by Democratic leaders before election.

CCLC Works for Teaching Democracy in Schools

The Committee is cooperating with Supt. Herold C. Hunt in an old project of the CCLC—the teaching and practice of democratic principles in the public schools as a major activity. CCLC has urged a uniform program of student government in all high schools, mock elections of city and county officials for one-day-in-office experience, student assemblies to celebrate all U.S. holidays of democracy and emphasis on "the American Heritage" in social studies, English, and civics. Supt. Hunt this summer attended a special conference on this subject with President Eisenhower at Columbia University. Asst. Supt. Butler Laughlin in charge of high schools is appointing a committee to draft a new course of study for Civics teachers to use as a result of the Noack case and the lack of attention to this subject under the Johnson-McCahey regime. The CCLC Exec. Dir. attends Board of Education meetings regularly and all visitors note the atmosphere of freedom of expression and debate of the "new board."

CCLC Prints "Your Rights if Arrested"

Chairman Stewart, noted criminal lawyer who fills the shoes of Clarence Darrow, is the author of "Trial Strategy" and "Criminal Trial Procedure in Federal Court." Since the CCLC has again turned its attention increasingly on problems of due process of law the Committee is fortunate to have the interest and leadership of Wm. Scott Stewart. He has contributed a new printing of a revised Committee leaflet and poster on "Your Rights If Arrested." If you wish copies for distribution send a postal card with the number you can use.

Chairman Stewart is currently appealing for a new trial, as a public service, the 22 year sentence of 11 year old Howard Lang for murder on a plea of guilty. Defense counsel and defendant allege that they were under a misapprehension as to sentence when they agreed to plead guilty. He is also appealing to the Illinois Supreme Court, at his own expense, the refusal of Warden Ragen and the Circuit Court of Winnebago Co. to release Tony Marino who has served 25 years of a life sentence which the U. S. Supreme Court declared was a denial of due process of law. The U. S. Supreme Court in the Marino case denounced the criminal law of Illinois as a denial of due process. The decision said: "In short, the effect of the state's confession of error in this case is not to clarify, it rather is to confuse further, a situation already so muddled that only one rational conclusion may be drawn. It is that the Illinois proceedural labyrinth is made up entirely of blind alleys, each of which is useful only as a means of convincing the federal courts that the state road which the petitioner has taken is the CCLC members will receive as a gift of the Committee a pamphlet reprint of two addresses by Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas: one delivered Oct. 1947 "Proceedural Safeguards in the Bill of Rights" and the other delivered March, 1948 "The Way to Win Without War." These and 28 other addresses of Justice Douglas have just been published in book form "Being An American" (John Day, $2.75, 214 pp).

To better understand current trends you may want to purchase from the Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C.: "Espionage Laws," 29 p. 10c 1943 Catalog No. Y 1.2: Es 6/943; "Foreign Agents Registration Rules and Regulations" 1942, 38 p. 10c, Catalog No. J 1.8: F 76; "Communism in Action" (Free from CCLC office —Govt. price 25c)—courtesy Chicago congressmen; "Strategy and Tactics of World Communism" — Foreign Affairs Subcommittee report—1948, 430 p., 75c, Catalog No. 80-2: H. doc. 619; "Nazi Conspiracy & Agression" 1947, 190 p., 45c, Catalog No. W 1.2; N 23/2.

—IRA LATIMER, Editor

Solicitor General Warns Chicago Bar on Communism

In a one hour address U.S. Solicitor General Philip Pearlman warned the June 29 annual meeting of the Chicago Bar Assn. of the necessity to resist Communist infiltration into the vitals of the nation. The Solicitor General again expressed his regrets to the Exec. Dir. at not being able to speak for the May 20 CCLC banquet. Since this address might have been made for the Committee it is reported here in some detail.

Mr. Pearlman is the lawyer for the people of the USA and his brief and oral argument before the U.S. Supreme Court helped win the decision against racial restrictive covenants. He called on the Chicago Bar Assn. to help draft legislation and work out methods of controlling the subversive activities of Communists and yet not impair civil rights. The Attorney General opposed the House version of the Mundt-Nixon bill because it was unconstitutionally written — but recommended 8 amendments to existing statutes to strengthen the power of the government to act against subversive groups.

The Solicitor General said that the Communist dictatorship is actively attempting to destroy every other form of government in the world, using the methods of espionage, sabotage, internal disruption, and psychological warfare, which Nazi Germany brought to a high stage of perfection. There is a remorseless extension of one-man rule, dictatorship and police inquisition today throughout the world which the U.S.A. must resist.

He praised the great care taken to protect the constitutional rights of federal employees in the Loyalty Investigation. He stated that of 3,000,000 government workers screened only 4,000 required field investigations, of which 1,300 are completed and 1,100 will have hearings before the Dept. Loyalty Board (230 having resigned under fire). If the Dept. board finds these employees guilty of advocating or engaging in "disloyal acts" they may appeal to the Dept. head and then to the 23-man President's Loyalty Review Board. On this board from Chicago are Prof. Chas. Merriam, Dean Aaron Brumbaugh and Prof. Harry Biglow all of the University of Chicago. Greater protection is given government employees charged with disloyalty to their government than to those charged with other offenses before the U.S. Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Pearlman also pointed out that membership in or association with organizations designated by the Attorney General as "subversive" was only one small factor in the charge of "disloyal acts" and there has been no attempt to establish the principle of guilt by association. The 103 "subversive and totalitarian organizatons" listed by the Attorney General were very carefully investigated by the FBI and checked by the highest legal talent in the Justice Dept. The list was condemned by ultra-conservative MCs as being too small and by Communist sympathizers as being too large.

The Solicitor General then reminded the Bar Assn. that under our government of laws, any excesses in subversive activities control procedures now being adopted for the first time, will and should be resisted in the courts. There should be no unnecessary invasion of privacy and there must be tolerance of personal opinions. Yet the facts cannot be ignored that Russia and the USA have been unable to make peace anywhere, the USSR and satellites have raised interminable obstacles to the functioning of the United Nations, and the Cominform parties have announced their intention to destroy democracy everywhere.

Lack of Home Rule Is Termed Greatest Stumbling Block to Municipal Progress

By MAYOR deLESSEPS S. MORRISON
President, American Municipal Association
(Written for NEA Service)

New Orleans.

A PESSIMIST COULD LOOK at America's cities and towns today and report: Expenses high. Income inadequate. Debt increasing. Problems mushrooming. Authority often hamstrung. The typical major's face usually has a worried look.

Last year three cities the size of New Orleans could have been formed from the nationwide increase in urban population.

These new city dwellers need police and fire protection, streets, schools and a thousand other municipal services.

The key problem of American cities is to make up for construction deferred by the depression and World War II, and then to provide entirely new facilities and services for a war-swollen population.

This is the dark side of the picture. Yet there are no lasting grounds for pessimism. City governments are moving ahead as never before. Item: The 397 largest communities in 1948 invested 50 per cent more in capital improvements than in 1947.

This means steamrollers in the streets, the banging of pile drivers and the hammering of carpenters in the building of new highways, schools, youth centers and the like.

BIGGEST STUMBLING BLOCK

Uppermost in the thinking at the American Municipal Assocation meeting will be the greatest single stumbling block to municipal progress in the United States—lack of home rule.

Most communities are at the whim and mercy of state legislatures, which frequently reduce local revenues while increasing local e[illegible] frustrate local attempts to meet pressi[illegible] lems and meddle in every conceivable [illegible] affairs.

[illegible] tide of home rule sentiment is sw[illegible] on. The next few years will see a[illegible] states to make local self-governm[illegible] constitution.

[illegible] will also be an all-out attack [illegible] ipally through the [illegible] which the A[illegible] the taxpayers' bill for crime, disease and social unrest.

We are also seeking a "little Hoover Commission" to make sense out of the overlapping, duplication and competition between governments in finding revenues and performing services.

The cities are squeezed in a financial vise between federal and state taxes. At a time when cities need more money to serve more needs, their chances of getting it are not good.

One particularly sore spot is the division of revenues from street and highway user taxes.

FEDERAL-MUNICIPAL PROBLEM

Then there is the federal-municipal problem created by the fact that Uncle Sam now owns one-fifth of the nation's land, tax-exempt. Yet cities derive most of their income from taxes on property.

Our Association will consequently support to the fullest plans now being developed by the Federal Government for payments to cities of sums in lieu of taxes on federal property.

Some people say the surest way to bring on a decline is to talk about it. Yet, facing the tremendous responsibility of meagre revenues and potentially tremendous relief demands, few officials wish to blind themselves deliberately to the dangers.

Besides, the new spirit of resolution and leadership within the city halls of the nation demands that we see ahead and plan ahead and be prepared to act in any emergency—be it economic or atomic.

There is a stirring within the people across the land that augurs well for the future of municipal government.

ADL SOUTHERN OFFICE
11 PRYOR ST., S. W.-ATLANTA, GA.

For your information

Justice Terrell's statement is worth reading.

Alex Miller

6 - Court Decisions

RECEIVED
MAR 12 1951
Southern Regional Council

CACCIATORE et al. v. STATE
Cite as 49 So. 2d 588

Supreme Court of Florida, en Banc.

Dec. 22, 1950

Rehearing Denied Jan. 16, 1951.

Phillip Cacciatore, Bennie Calderone and Salvatore T. Tarallo were convicted in the Circuit Court for Citrus County, F. R. Hocker, J., of stealing a calf, and they appealed. The Supreme Court, Per Curiam, affirmed the judgment as to the defendant Cacciatore and reversed the judgment for new trial as to defendants Tarallo and Calderone.

Judgment affirmed as to defendant Cacciatore and reversed for new trial as to defendants Tarallo and Calderone.

Adams, C.J., Sebring, Terrell, Chapman and Hobson, J.J., dissented in part.

Criminal law 1182, 1189

In prosecution of three defendants on a charge of stealing a calf, conviction of two of the defendants was reversed for a new trial, while conviction as to the third defendant was affirmed.

- - - - - -

Whitaker Brothers and W.N. Burnside, Tampa, for appellants.
Richard W. Ervin, Atty. Gen., and Murray Sams, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellee.

Per Curiam.

Appellants were tried and convicted on an information charging that they did unlawfully take, steal and carry away a calf of the bovine species, the property of Ruth E. Smith. As a prelude to the trial the court called two bailiffs and instructed them to take charge of the jury, one of whom was a Negro, and keep them together. The sheriff was directed to make provision for their feeding and lodging during the trial. At the conclusion of the State's case a motion for directed verdict in favor of defendants was overruled. Defendants offered no evidence. The jury returned a verdict of guilty as to each, a motion for a new trial was overruled and a sentence of two years in the State penitentiary was imposed.

This appeal is from that judgment.

The record and the briefs have been thoroughly considered and Mr. Chief Justice ADAMS, Mr. Justice THOMAS, Mr. Justice SEBRING and Mr. Justice ROBERTS are of the view that the judgment should be affirmed as to the defendant Phillip Cacciatore. Mr. Chief Justice ADAMS and Mr. Justice

SEBRING are of the view that the judgment should be affirmed as to defendant, Salvatore T. Tarallo and Mr. Chief Justice ADAMS is of the view that the judgment should be affirmed as to the defendant Bennie Calderone. Mr. Justice TERRELL, Mr. Justice THOMAS, Mr. Justice CHAPMAN, Mr. Justice HOBSON, and Mr. Justice ROBERTS are of the view that the judgment should be reversed as to defendants Tarallo and Calderone, Mr. Justice TERRELL, Mr. Justice CHAPMAN and Mr. Justice HOBSON are of the view that the judgment should be reversed as to all three defendants because the confession as to Cacciatore was unlawfully secured and the constitutional guaranty of fair trial was denied them.

It follows that the judgment is affirmed as to defendant Cacciatore and it is reversed for a new trial as to defendants Tarallo and Calderone.

ADAMS, C.J., and TERRELL, CHAPMAN, THOMAS, SEBRING, HOBSON and ROBERTS, JJ., concur.

TERRELL, Justice (concurring).

I concur in the order of reversal but I think it unfortunate that it fails to discuss the questions raised, particularly the charge that discrimination was practiced on the Negro juror during the trial. The major portion of appellant's brief is devoted to this point. The record shows that there was confusion as to the applicable law and I think we are on notice that the trial courts will be confronted with the question in the future. When this is the case it should be adjudicated in order that the error may not again recur. The law requires the jury to "sit together" and hear the pleadings, proof and other aspects of the trial. The court in his discretion, may order the jury placed in charge of a bailiff to keep them together and see that no one from the outside communicates with them. When this is done the bailiff is required to make provision for their meals and lodging during the trial.

It is not denied that the jury sat together and heard the pleadings, proof, and charge of the Court but it is contended that they were separated when provision was made for lodging, in that they were required to sleep in separate rooms and that when meals were provided the Negro juror was required to eat in a "cubbyhole" separated from the dining room where the white jurors ate. I do not think the fact that the jury slept in separate or adjoining rooms with a door open between them, as the record shows, violated the requirement that they be kept together during the trial. The purpose of this requirement is to remove the danger of outside communication with the jury or any member of it and the number of rooms they occupy is not material so long as they are under the supervision of the bailiff and are not communicated with. The task imposed on the bailiff is to treat all jurors alike, keep them together and exercise such supervision over them as to prevent outside communication with them.

As to the charge that the Negro juror was required to eat in a "cubbyhole" separated from the dining room where the white jurors ate, it is pertinent to point out that the alleged "cubbyhole" was a corner or sector of the dining room. It was created by setting up a buffet to isolate the Negro juror from the white jurors and others who might be in the dining room at the time. I find nothing in the record that convinces me that this procedure affected the verdict in this case, but I think it was bad practice and in many instances might have a serious effect on the verdict. Whether or not it does so would depend on the Negro juror's intelligence and emotional reaction. If he is stupid and untutored such discrimination would likely make no difference, if he is intelligent enough to be a competent juror it would make plenty of difference.

There are practical considerations that will confront the bailiff in every community where he meets this question. If the county has made no provision for such a contingency, I think he can do so within the law by providing such dining and lodging facilities as will enable him to keep supervision over the jury and prevent outside communication with it. I do not think the Negro juror should be required to eat in anything that savors of a "cubbyhole," neither should he be placed in an environment that in any manner tends to humiliate or otherwise subtract from the place of importance his station as a juror clothes him with. Serving on a jury is a civil responsibility that the law imposes on white and colored alike so we are concerned here only with the law regulating such service. The law of segregation as defined in this State is in no way involved. Segregation in Florida is in the main concerned with separate schools for whites and coloreds and the prohibition of intermarriage between members of the two races. Social taboos are in another category, but neither has any more place in this case than Newton's law of gravitation.

The verdict of a jury is the composite judgment of six good and true men as to which party to the controversy offered the more convincing legal proof. I have serious doubt of its being a composite judgment if the Negro juror is isolated during part of the trial in such a way as to arouse personal resentment at his treatment. If fact, I doubt that the weight of his judgment contributed anything to the verdict under such restraint. The very gist of our constitutional tradition is equality before the law, trial by jury, the worth and freedom of the individual and justice by due process of law. To insinuate taboos in the trial of a case that are calculated to arouse racial or emotional resentment is contrary to every concept of fair trial and may destroy confidence in that phase of the administration of justice.

In this country jury duty is one of the many aspects in which democracy works. Making democracy work is the business of every citizen. It is not partial to any race, creed or color because all have had a part in its creation. In respect to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, the state and Federal constitutions make no distinction between white and colored citizens. Every racial and religious group that came to this country has contributed greatly to the stability, vigor and effectiveness of the freedoms that constitute democracy. We should be the last to embarrass or discriminate against any of them in the performance of jury duty. Unless it be tinkering with the ballot, corrupting a jury's verdict is the surest way I know to destroy confidence in democratic processes.

As for the Negro juror he has a claim for fair treatment to himself. He was not indigenous to this country, neither did he come here voluntarily.

He was yanked out of Africa by the white man and brought here against his will. The early ancestors of the present Negroes were here breaking new ground and ploughing tobacco and cotton when the Mayflower landed at Plymouth. The first white men they ever saw were the ones that shackled and brought them to this country. They were pagans, unschooled in moral precepts. Their belief in God, their language, their morals and their religion were imbibed from the white man. The seed of their vices and virtues were sown by the white man. Every phase of his culture is a product of the white man's teaching. He has hewn his share of wood and he has drawn his share of water. He spent 250 years as the white man's slave, he was manumitted 87 years ago and has excelled in many lines of endeavor. Some of them were revolutionary soldiers and they have played a part in every war this country has been engaged in. History records that the first man killed in the revolution was a Negro. I think he has established his right to sing the Star Spangled Banner, to claim this as his country and feel a just pride in the performance of every civic duty the law imposes on him.

In fine, the question sums up to this: The law in explicit terms prohibits discrimination, on racial grounds, in the selection of a jury. The law also requires that when a jury is selected every precaution shall be observed to aid it in reaching a fair and lawful verdict. The Court may designate a bailiff to see that such precautions are observed. When the jury is composed of whites and Negroes all should be treated alike but this does not mean that they must be fed from the same table or required to sleep in the same room. The bailiff may exercise a reasonable discretion in this and may fit that discretion to the circumstances with which he is confronted but in doing so he is not permitted to impose conditions on a Negro juror that tend to humiliate or embarrass him or that in any wise detract from his responsibility as a juror. His concern is that everything be done to encourage a righteous verdict and that nothing be done to impede it.

I therefore concur in the judgment.

6- Court Decisions

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Arnold Forster and Edwin J. Lukas

DATE: March 14, 1951

SUBJECT: Cacciatore v. State, 49 So. 2d. 588

We believe you will be interested in certain sidelights contained in a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Florida involving an appeal by three white defendants from their conviction for theft.

The appeal was based, in part, on the ground that the one Negro in the jury was required to sleep in a room separate from the white jurors, and also was required to eat in a "cubbyhole" separated from the dining-room where the white jurors ate.

The appellant's brief claimed that this segregation was a violation of the Florida law which requires that juries "sit together" while hearing the case, and while in the charge of a bailiff in the period during which they were reaching their verdict.

While the majority opinion of the court did not discuss this argument raised by the convicted defendants, Mr. Justice Terrell, in a separate concurrence, discussed the question at length. Regarding the segregation of the Negro juror in the dining-room, he stated that he thought "it was bad practice and, in many instances, might have a serious effect on the verdict", since it would affect the Negro juror's intellectual and emotional reactions. He went on to say:

> "Serving on a jury is a civil responsibility that the law imposes on white and colored alike so we are concerned here only with the law regulating such service. The law of segregation as defined in this State is in no way involved. Segregation in Florida is in the main concerned with separate schools for whites and coloreds and the prohibition of intermarriage between members of the two races. Social taboos are in another category, but neither has any more place in this case than Newton's law of gravitation.
>
> "The verdict of a jury is the composite judgment of six good and true men as to which party to the controversy offered the more convincing legal proof. I have serious doubts of its being a composite judgment if the Negro juror is isolated during part of the trial in such a way as to arouse personal resentment at his treatment. In fact, I doubt that the weight of his judgment contributed anything to the verdict under such restraint. The very gist of our constitutional tradition is equality before the law, trail by jury, the worth and freedom of the individual and justice by due process of law. To insinuate taboos in the trial of a case that are calculated to arouse racial or emotional resentment is contrary to every concept of fair trial and may destroy confidence in that phase of the administration of justice.

"In this county jury duty is one of the many aspects in which democracy works. Making democracy work is the business of every citizen. It is not partial to any race, creed or color because all have had a part in its creation. In respect to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship, the State and Federal constitutions make no distinction between white and colored citizens. Every racial and religious group that came to this country has contributed greatly to the stability, vigor and effectiveness of the freedoms that constitute democracy. We should be the last to embarrass or discriminate against any of them in the performance of jury duty. Unless it be tinkering with the ballot, corrupting a jury's verdict is the surest way I know to destroy confidence in democratic processes."

Mr. Justice Terrell then pointed out that the law is explicit in prohibiting discrimination on racial grounds in the selection of the jury, and that the law also requires that, when a jury is selected, every precaution should be observed to aid it in reaching a fair and lawful verdict. He concluded that, when a "jury is composed of whites and Negroes, all should be treated alike". But he went on to point out that this did not mean that they must be fed from the same table or required to sleep in the same room. It meant, he contended, merely that the bailiff in whose custody the jury is, may exercize a reasonable discretion adapted to the circumstances with which he is confronted, but he may not, in so doing, "impose conditions on a Negro juror that tend to humiliate or embarrass him, or in any wise detract from his responsibility as a juror".

meeting on

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

NEW STATE DEPARTMENT BUILDING
JUNE 4TH, 5TH AND 6TH, 1947

Office of Public Affairs
DEPARTMENT OF STATE
Washington, D. C.

A Constitution for World Trade

THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The Problems of European Revival

AND

German and Austrian Peace Settlements

ADDRESS BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Office of Public Affairs
Department of State

The following script was prepared for broadcast over the Columbia Broadcasting System's Country Journal from 2:30 to 3 pm on Saturday, January 24th, 1948. Mr. Willard Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, represented the Department of State.

ANNOUNCER: What will the European Recovery Program cost in terms of tractors and fertilizer?

THORP: The program calls for 545 million dollars of farm machinery over a period of four years and 136 million in the first 15 months. That sounds like a lot, but actually, that means we will send to Europe less than 10 per cent of our total production. It is only about one half the amount the European countries requested. The European program calls for 71 thousand tons of nitrogen from the United States in the coming crop year. That is about what we exported during the last crop year. The second year of the plan calls for about half that amount, and nitrogen shipments will be entirely discontinued after that. Actually, the program puts great emphasis on reconstructing the nitrogen and farm machinery plants in Europe, itself.

ANNOUNCER: Mr. Thorp, before any more questions are put I'd like to get clear what the European Recovery Program is. Among the questions I have received from farmers are some like: "Is the European Recovery Program more than just a foreign relief measure, and how do we know what we send Europe will be effectively used?"

THORP: The distinguishing feature of the European Recovery Program is that it is a plan for recovery. It is not a relief program, merely to keep things going. It was planned by sixteen European countries, and worked over here in Washington by the government. It is specifically intended to help Europe get on its feet, so that it can pay its own way again. Europe has to buy goods abroad, but until her production is up and she can export, she can't do it. Now as to control. First, the European countries will control each other through a central organization. Then, in addition to pledging the most efficient use of their own resources and the commodities we send them, each of the European nations will be asked to commit itself in formal agreements with the United States Government to fulfill other conditions. These probably will include an undertaking to expand production, to cut government expenses and increase taxes, to restore confidence in national currencies and to take measures to expand trade. In addition the program for administration of the European recovery plan calls for on-the-spot checks by our representatives abroad on the distribution and utilization of our assistance, supervised by an Ambassador-at-large. If they don't do their share, we can always stop any further aid.

ANNOUNCER: Will an effort be made to export commodities which are in surplus supply, and on the other hand, will we refrain from exporting commodities that are in limited supply?

THORP: Obviously, the task of the Administration will be to match up Europe's needs with our own requirements. The Government has already revised Europe's estimates of assistance from this country, on the basis of production and demand here. Some European calculations were cut sharply, others were increased.

ANNOUNCER: What does this all mean for specific commodities?

THORP: First let's take items more or less in surplus. Our fruit industry, which formerly did a large export business, is in trouble today because its European market has, in large measure, dried up. The same is true to a lesser extent of the demand for our tobacco, and many specialty products. Europe must have dollars to buy these things, and the only way it can obtain them is by producing and exporting things that other countries are ready to buy for dollars. Normally, western Europe is the world's largest market for foodstuffs. More than sixty percent of our food exports used to go to the countries of western Europe. That's why it is important to support that market today, and build it up to full operation as quickly as we can. It is not only the producers of export crops that are affected, however. Our farmers have an interest in building up foreign markets for our manufactured goods as well, since an increase in industrial exports means an increase in industrial buying power, and a larger market for all farm produce.

ANNOUNCER: What about the commodities in short supply? Will meeting Europe's requirements place in excessive strain upon our own economy?

THORP: There is no doubt that we shall need to export some foods which are in demand in the domestic market, and that the prices of these commodities will be somewhat higher than if there were no foreign exports. However, the quantities which we expect to provide under the program decrease each year. During the current year we expect to export approximately 450 million bushels of wheat. Next year we estimate - and this is just an estimate - that our exports to all countries, including Western Europe, can be reduced to 300 million bushels. And during the last two years of the Recovery Program our proposed wheat shipments go down to 250 million bushels, which approaches the level of good soil conservation practice. The Secretary of Agriculture says that these amounts not only make ample allowance for feeding our own population and for seed and livestock feeding but probably represent a fairly good estimate of the amounts which we want to export with our present high levels of production. We anticipate exports of feed grains amounting to about 100 million bushels during each year of the program. Half of this will probably be corn. With a normal yield of about 3 billion bushels from the anticipated corn acreage, it is clear that our feed exports would have very little effect on the amount of feed available here, or on the domestic meat supply. As to meat, we do not expect to export any meat to Europe during the program except horsemeat. The only other commodity in serious short supply is fats and oils, and although we do plan to ship certain types of oils from the United States, the quantities will be more than offset by anticipated imports, primarily of copra from the Philippines. Supplies available to domestic users will probably increase from here on. Actually, you see, the amounts we plan to export will be less than last year. But they are a great deal more than if there were no plan at all.

ANNOUNCER: What does all this food do to the European standard of living?

THORP: I'm sorry to have to say that even at the end of the period, when the Europeans have built up their production again, they will still be below 1938. Remember, there are 28 million more people to feed in Western Europe today than ten years ago.

ANNOUNCER: What effect will the sending of food and raw materials to Europe have on the farm picture here? Is one of the purposes of the Marshall Plan to maintain farm prices? As a Kansas wheat farmer, for instance, how does the Marshall Plan affect me?

THORP: This is a plan for European recovery. It didn't start as a program to help the American farmer. But it definitely will do so. It is intended to maintain the European market temporarily, and puts it on its feet permanently. That certainly should help farm prices.

ANNOUNCER: Will ERP tend to ruin our own future markets? Will we be building up European agriculture at the expense of our future normal share of the European market?

THORP: ERP will not ruin our future markets. It tries to build them on a sounder basis and on conditions which will enable other countries to pay directly for the products they receive from the United States without any more help. Even after recovery has been achieved, Western Europe will still need to import food, just as it did before the war.

ANNOUNCER: How does Eastern Europe come into the picture?

THORP: No one knows the answer to that one. Eastern Europe before the war was a source of supply for much of Western Europe's food requirements. Eastern Europe refused, or was forced into refusing, to participate in the European Recovery Program. We hope that as recovery progresses, trade between Eastern and Western Europe will increase just because they each will have things to sell to the other. But that one, I can't predict.

ANNOUNCER: As a farmer, will I have to expect higher taxes, or government controls?

THORP: Certainly no higher taxes are to be expected. Both Congress and the President have indicated the desire to have some tax relief this year. The European Recovery Plan should cause no additional pressure on domestic prices since exports will be somewhat less than last year, and probably will decrease in subsequent years as Europe recovers. Our high domestic prices are due primarily to the tremendously increased demand by Americans, who have more money to spend than at any time in our history. As to government controls, they may be necessary in some instances to assure the most effective utilization of our assistance and in the mechanics of export control. There won't be controls unless they are really needed.

ANNOUNCER: Some farmers feel that we should send mainly farm machinery, fertilizer and technical help and then Europeans could get by with less farm products from us. Others are afraid that sending such items will deprive us and hurt our own production. Is there a satisfactory answer to these two differencnt views?

THORP: Both food and farming supplies will be required. Europe is hungry. She is still suffering from the war and two disastrous harvests. Her crops will not yield nearly enough to prevent starvation at home without assistance from the United States. So food is needed. But farm machinery, fertilizer and technical help are also needed to get Europe back on her feet. Even after the result of such assistance is evident, she will still need food imports. So it takes both elements to do the trick.

ANNOUNCER: How much thought is being given to maintaining our own soil fertility, that is, how much longer will farmers be asked to continue to overwork the soil?

THORP: This question was answered to some extent by the committee headed by Secretary of Interior Krug, which studied the natural resources of the United States in relation to foreign assistance. The Krug report made clear that, with or without a foreign aid program, this country must expand conservation practices "such as those for preserving the fertility of its soil." It added that such conservation and utilization of our resources can "far exceed the drains that might result from a foreign aid program."

ANNOUNCER: Obviously the Recovery Program will entail cost and sacrifice to the farmer and all other Americans. What would be the cost of not carrying out the Program?

THORP: No one can calculate the cost for us of a disorganized and disturbed Europe. It is a risk without limit. Europe now is under tremendous strain and stress, but the evidence is clear that those countries are fighting hard to keep on the list of democracies. But hungry people and masses of unemployed cannot be expected to maintain social discipline and order. They need help to get back their economic independence and protect their political independence. If they lose the fight, the costs for us will be much greater than the cost of the Recovery Program. As Secretary Marshall once said: "This program is an economy; not an expense." But this is more than a cold calculation in dollars and cents. If we really believe in freedom and democracy, it means more than that we should practice it ourselves; we should help others who believe as we do. Secretary Marshall called it "friendly aid", and that is the spirit in which we should support the European Recovery Program.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

MARCH 25, 1948
NO. 242

The Department of State announced the signing of the Final Act of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment at Habana, Cuba, marking the completion of a Charter for an International Trade Organization. The representatives of about 60 nations participated in the preparation of the final draft of the Charter.

The Charter is a momentous achievement and one from which the whole world will benefit. It is the product of more than two years of constant and conscientious labor by experts and representatives of the many nations who worked long and weary hours to reach agreement on a code of international economic activity which would be acceptable to all. First, the United States issued in December 1945 its Proposals for the Expansion of World Trade and Employment which suggested the formation of an International Trade Organization. This was expanded by the United States into a Suggested Charter in September 1946. The following month a Preparatory Committee of 18 nations established by the United Nations modified this draft at London, in February 1947 further changes were made at a meeting at Lake Success, and in August 1947 a fourth draft was drawn up at Geneva. Finally, at Habana from November 21, 1947 to March 24, 1948, the present Charter was prepared. Through this series of conferences the proposed Charter received the fullest possible consideration and the utmost care in its formulation.

The Charter will now be submitted to the various countries for acceptance according to the constitutional procedures established by each country. In the United States it will be submitted to the Congress for approval.

The completion of the Charter is a clear and unmistakable demonstration of the ability of a major part of the world to work together for the common good. It goes far beyond study and recommendation. It contains numerous and detailed commitments which are mutually beneficial to the Members. It is broader in scope and greater in detail than most, if not all, previous agreements between nations on economic relations.

Many of the changes and modifications made in subsequent drafts of the Charter were suggested by interested groups in this country. The Charter includes provisions recommended by the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, by business, labor, farm and other organizations. As a result the Charter is a live and meaningful document concerned with practical rules for encouraging the flow of international trade.

The main objective of the Charter is the raising of living standards throughout the world. It proposes to do this by promoting the expansion of international trade on a basis of multilateralism and general nondiscrimination, by fostering the growth of production and employment, and by encouraging the economic development of backward areas. Its substantive chapters set forth a series of international commitments with respect to national policies regarding tariffs, customs administration, hidden restrictions on trade, import and export quotas, exchange controls, preferences and other forms of discrimination, state trading, subsidies, restrictive business practices in international trade, intergovernmental commodity agreements, the international aspects of domestic employment policies, economic development, and international investments. Other chapters outline the structure, functions, and procedures of the International Trade Organization.

The Chapter on Employment and Economic Activity emphasizes the fact that employment, production, and demand for goods and services are not only of domestic concern but are necessary for the well-being of all countries. Members agree to take action designed to achieve and maintain full and productive employment through measures appropriate to their political, economic and social institutions.

The Chapter dealing with Economic Development and Reconstruction was, as it had been in the previous conferences on the Charter, one of the most hotly debated sections at the Habana Conference. Under the provisions of this Chapter, Members agree to cooperate with other countries through the Medium of international agencies for the purpose of promoting general economic development as well as the reconstruction of those countries whose economies have been devastated by the war. The Chapter specifies the principles which shall apply to the promotion of economic development and reconstruction and the treatment of international investment. It indicates the conditions and specifies the procedures under which particular measures, otherwise inconsistent with the Commercial Policy provisions of the Charter and with trade agreements made pursuant thereto, may be used to promote economic development and reconstruction. Similarly, the Chapter delineates the particular conditions and procedures under which preferential agreements for economic development and reconstruction may be employed.

Almost a third of the Charter is devoted to provisions on commercial policy. Under the provisions of the Charter dealing with this subject Members agree to extend to each other general most-favored-nation treatment and to undertake negotiations directed toward the reduction of tariffs and the elimination of preferences on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis. In general, the Charter also prohibits the imposition of discriminatory internal taxes and regulations on foreign products. In view of the peculiar features of moving pictures as a commodity in international trade, special provisions were included to deal with cinematograph films.

Since quantitative restrictions on imports and exports can have an even more limiting effect than tariffs, taxes, or other similar charges, it was agreed that basically such quantitative restrictions would not be allowed. It was recognized, however, that under certain conditions and with regard to certain commodities it might be advisable to allow exceptions. The permitted exceptions are carefully enumerated and circumscribed, with safeguards to prevent their possible abuse. These exceptions include the use of import quotas on agricultural and fisheries products if they are necessary in connection with governmental programs restricting domestic marketing or production. Import quotas are also permitted for the purpose of safeguarding a Member's balance of payments.

Safeguards are also included to ensure that the interests of other Members are not unreasonably prejudiced by the indiscriminate use of subsidies. A modification of considerable interest to the United States was made in the provisions dealing with export subsidies. Such subsidies may now be used without the prior approval of the Organization, as had been previously required under the Geneva Draft over the objection of the United States. They, however, must not be employed by a Member to acquire more than its equitable share of world trade in the particular commodity.

Since state trading has become of growing importance in recent years, the Charter has included a section dealing with this aspect of commerce. This section provides that countries carrying on trade through state enterprises should conduct their commerce in accordance with the general principles of nondiscriminatory treatment which are applicable under the Charter to private trade. In particular, state trading enterprises are required to make their purchases and sales solely in accordance with commercial considerations and to give the enterprises of other Member countries adequate opportunity to compete for such purchases or sales.

The Charter also contains general commercial provisions dealing with freedom of transit, anti-dumping and countervailing duties, customs valuation, documents and other formalities in connection with importation and exportation, marks of origin and the publication and administration of trade regulations. These provisions are designed to reduce or eliminate the many burdensome restrictions imposed on trade through administrative devices, including the so-called "invisible tariffs", which often prove to be more of an impediment to trade than the usual form of tariffs.

A final section of the Chapter on Commercial Policy contains a number of special provisions. Of particular importance are the provisions which permit a Member to withdraw tariff concessions in the event that they should lead to such relatively increased imports as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers. This is the so-called "escape clause" which the United States has included in previous trade agreements, notably the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade recently concluded at Geneva, to ensure that domestic interests are adequately safeguarded. Also of interest in this section are provisions permitting the formation of customs unions and similar arrangements. Finally, the section lists a number of general exceptions to the obligations of the Charter so as to permit measures for the protection of public morals, health, safety, and the like and to meet certain temporary exigencies arising as a result of the war, such as measures for the acquisition or distribution of commodities in short supply.

Closely related to the commercial policy provisions of the Charter is the Chapter on Restrictive Business Practices. This Chapter requires that Members shall take appropriate measures to prevent business practices, whether on the part of private or public enterprises, which restrain competition and foster monopolistic control whenever such practices have harmful effects on the expansion of production or trade. The Charter sets up various consultative and investigative procedures to implement this obligation for the prevention of restrictive business practices.

The Charter recognizes that primary products such as agricultural commodities and minerals, are sometimes subject to special difficulties which necessitate special treatment of the international trade in such commodities through intergovernmental agreements. The Charter therefore defines the general principles which are to govern intergovernmental commodity agreements, the circumstances under which they are to be used, and the procedures for developing and administering them. These provisions seek to safeguard the interests both of producer and consumer countries and to afford an effective solution to the particular commodity problem involved.

The remaining articles of the Charter deal with the structure and functions of the International Trade Organization, procedures for the settlement of differences, and a number of general matters including relations with non-members, general exceptions for national security reasons, methods of amending the Charter, procedure for withdrawal of a Member from the Organization and for termination of the Charter, and requirements to be met for entry of the Charter into force. The principal organs of the Organization will consist of a Conference, an Executive Board and a Secretariat, including a Director-General and his Staff. Differences may be settled by consultation or arbitration between the Members or by reference to the Executive Board or Conference or to the International Court of Justice under certain circumstances. The Charter prohibits a Member from entering into a preferential arrangement with a non-Member which prevents the latter from according to other Members any benefit of such an arrangement. In general, Members are prohibited from according to non-Members treatment which, being more favorable than that accorded to other Members, would injure the economic interests of the latter. Members are free under the Charter to discriminate against non-members if they so wish.

The Charter is to enter into force when a majority of the countries which signed the Final Act of the Habana Conference have approved the document. However, if a majority fail to approve at the end of one year after the signature of the Final Act, then the Charter may come into force whenever 20 countries approve the Charter. If the Charter has failed to come into force by September 30, 1949, those countries which have approved the Charter may consult among themselves as to whether and on what terms to bring the Charter into force.

The Department of State

REPRINT FROM

bulletin

RECEIVED
APR 11 1951
Southern Regional Council

AN ANALYSIS OF THE SCHUMAN PLAN

OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS • DEPARTMENT OF STATE

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
Publication 4176

European and British Commonwealth Series 23
Released April 1951

Reprinted from the Department of State Bulletin
April 2, 1951

DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS
OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS

AN ANALYSIS OF THE SCHUMAN PLAN

Introduction

On May 9, 1950 Robert Schuman, the French Foreign Minister, announced his Government's proposal to merge the coal and steel industries of France and Germany, together with those of any other European country, in a single market. His announcement was a major development in the political and economic life of Western Europe.

Mr. Schuman's invitation to develop a treaty was extended to all European nations. Five nations accepted his invitation—Belgium, the Netherlands, Italy, Luxembourg, and Western Germany. These five nations, together with France, have now developed a detailed treaty in implementation of the original proposals; except for a few remaining issues which have been held in abeyance for negotiation among ministers of the six countries, the treaty is now ready for ratification by national parliaments. The treaty proposes that any necessary governmental powers over these industries be vested in new institutions akin to those of a federal government. The keynote in the administration of these industries would be the elimination of national barriers to trade and of private restrictive agreements. The discriminatory devices heretofore frequently employed in the sale of coal and steel in member country markets would be removed. Coal and steel products and coal and steel workers would move freely among the member countries. When critical shortages or other crises required governmental controls, these emergencies would be developed and administered by the new supranational institutions.

The single market, created by these provisions, would not be isolated from the rest of the world. Nonmember producers would also have access to the market, without any increased trade barriers being interposed to the import of their products. Furthermore, countries which import from producers in the single market would be assured equitable treatment and reasonable prices.

Statement by Secretary Acheson

[Released to the press March 21]

The United States Government welcomes the action taken by the six Western European countries in initialing the provisions of the Schuman Plan treaty last Monday in Paris. In developing this unprecedented agreement, the six countries have provided dramatic evidence of their will to merge their national interests in order to contribute to the peace and well-being which are the objectives of the free nations of the Western World. The United States is confident that, in the same spirit, the six countries will be able to settle any remaining issues on which agreement must be reached before the Schuman Plan can be put into actual operation.

These revolutionary agreements and institutions deserve the most careful study. The summary which follows indicates the chief provisions of the plan and how it can be expected to operate.

Historical Background

Throughout the present century, the coal and steel industries of France and Germany have had an important effect on their political and economic relations. One reason why these two basic industries have figured so prominently in French-German relations has been their location. The bulk of the coal and steel industry of France and Germany lies in a compact area close to the border dividing the two countries, an area which includes Lorraine, the Saar, and the Ruhr.

Within this small area, divided by the French German border, lie the raw materials essential for the development of a modern steel industry. The iron ore on which the French and German industries were originally built lies largely in Lorraine, an area which was a part of France until the Franco-Prussian War of the 1870's, which Germany controlled until World War I, and which France thereafter regained. The coal deposits which initially led to the creation of the French and German steel industries lie largely in the Ruhr area, and to a lesser extent in the Saar region; both of these areas are close by the western German border, and the status of the latter area has frequently been in dispute between the two countries.

The explosive nature of French-German relations in the past century led each of these countries to use her possession of raw materials, which the other needed, as a prime bargaining weapon and retaliatory device.

From the end of World War I until the time of Mr. Schuman's proposals, the one development which might have been characterized as French-German cooperation in the field of steel production was the creation of the European Steel Cartel in the middle 1920's, an organization which enjoyed a checkered but increasingly significant role up to World War II. The European Steel Cartel, however, was basically a negotiated truce among the steel industries of the Western European countries. Particularly in its later versions, it was an agreement among producers and sellers of steel on the terms under which each national group would sell in the markets of any other group and in the market of third countries. The emphasis was primarily on avoiding market situations that would cause a decline in the price of steel. Far from promoting increased efficiency and wiping out national barriers, the cartel froze Europe's steel industry and national markets into a rigid mold, which was a major reason for the inefficiency which has handicapped the industry since. After the initial enthusiastic reactions to the cartel, which were expressed in 1926 and 1927, little was heard of its contribution to political harmony between France and Germany.

Schuman's proposals were broached at a time when, with a revival in her industrial capacity, Germany was seeking to be freed of any restraints imposed upon her freedom of action. Meanwhile, most of the Western World was becoming increasingly convinced that the long-run solution to the German problem lay in the closer integration of the German economy with the West, rather than in isolation and restraint. Accordingly, Schuman's proposals, which are based upon the principle of a pooling of German resources on a basis of equality with other Western European countries, were greeted by large segments of the Western World as a welcome and courageous development in French national policy.

Schuman Plan Principles

The principles of the Schuman Plan, as enunciated in the French Foreign Minister's statement of May 9, 1950, were without precedent. A group of supranational institutions would be created and would be endowed with broad powers of a sovereign nature over the coal and steel industries of the member countries. The basic purpose of these institutions would be to achieve the elimination of all elements of nationalism in the conduct of the coal and steel industries of the member countries; among other things, this arrangement would mean the elimination of all barriers to trade among the member countries. The new institutions also would have the means of encouraging the modernization and improvement of mine and plant facilities. They would also be charged with improving and equalizing the living standards of coal and steel workers. Finally, provision would have to be made for transitional measures to ease the shock of merging into a single market area the coal and steel economies of countries with widely varying cost structures.

INSTITUTIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

The constitution of the Schuman Plan reflects the delegation of sovereignty through a number of basic provisions. An executive body will be created under the agreement with power to enforce most of the substantive provisions. The members of this executive body, known as the High Authority, will be elected for a 6-year tenure by the member governments acting together, from a slate of nominees drawn up by them; and no member of this Authority would report to or receive instructions from the national Government of any participating country.

The powers proposed for the High Authority are extensive. They include the right to tax the production of enterprises under their jurisdiction; to issue directives relating to coal and steel which are binding on the individual enterprises and states to which they are addressed; to fine enterprises in violation of their orders and to offset the effects of any illegal acts by member states by fines on the production of the enterprises in their area; to borrow and to lend; and to make studies and suggestions to the enterprises and states under their jurisdiction. Member states are bound to use their respective police powers to enforce the directions of the High Authority.

The High Authority will report periodically to a Common Assembly, made up of representatives drawn in agreed proportions from each of the member countries. The Assembly will review the Authority's work annually. By a two-thirds vote, the Assembly will be able to censure the Authority and compel its members to resign. The Assembly also will have the right to review and approve, as a whole, an annual budget proposed by the High Authority.

A third institution basic to the Plan is the special Council of Ministers. The concept of a Council arose out of a need to find some means whereby the work of the High Authority in the coal and steel sectors of the economies of the member countries could be tied in closely with the measures being taken by these Governments in the rest of their economies. The impact of actions by the High Authority in coal and steel upon such national problems as the maintenance of an adequate defense, the control of inflation, the balance of external accounts, and similar problems, was recognized early in the negotiations.

Accordingly, the Council of Ministers, which is to consist of ministers drawn from the Governments of each of the signatory countries, will be endowed with the powers necessary to insure this coordination. For example, the Council will have the right to initiate proposals and will have a voice in the determinations of the High Authority whenever the question of market control is involved, such as the possibility of the fixing of maximum prices or allocations to meet a shortage situation. The Council of Ministers also will be directly concerned in the process whereby the tariff rates of the six countries applicable to coal and steel shipped in from outside sources are set.

Another element in the structure created by the Schuman Plan is the proposed Court of Justice. In most typical intergovernmental agreements, differences over interpretation ordinarily are settled by agreement among the signatory Governments, with provisions sometimes included for the right of appeal by Governments to the International Court. The Schuman Plan provides for its own Court to deal with the juridical problems arising out of the relations among the constituent organs created by the Plan and arising out of complaints by aggrieved Governments, enterprises, or individuals. The Court's membership will be determined by very much the same process as that provided for the membership of the High Authority. The Court's most important power is the right to nullify the decisions of the High Authority, in much the same way and on much the same grounds as the courts of the United States may declare laws of Congress unconstitutional or nullify the decisions of administrative bodies of the Government. In short, if the Authority were exceeding its powers under the treaty or were acting capriciously, the Court would have a basis for reversal. The Court could also nullify acts of the Council of Ministers or the Common Assembly, where these bodies were exceeding their powers.

The system of institutions is completed with one final organ, the Consultative Committee. The Committee is to provide a direct link between the High Authority, on the one hand, and producer, labor, and consumer groups, on the other. It will consist of 30 to 50 representatives, drawn in equal numbers from the three groups, and will have advisory functions of a general character.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR REMOVING TRADE BARRIERS

The dominant principle of the Schuman Plan is that the coal and steel industries of the member countries are to be treated as if no national boundaries existed among them. The countries of Western Europe are to abandon their efforts to be self-sufficient in coal and steel and are to allow these industries to develop in a common market embracing all the member countries.

Accordingly, the principal operative provisions of the plan deal with the elimination of existing national barriers to trade. They call for the immediate suspension of virtually all tariffs applicable by any member country to the coal and steel products of any other member country. The provisions also require the suspension of quantitative restrictions on imports and exports of coal and steel products among the member countries, and the elimination of various other restrictive or discriminatory devices.

These proposals, which are not unlike those typically associated with a customs union, are supplemented by more revolutionary provisions with respect to restrictive arrangements among producers of coal and steel. Any agreements among producers which restrict competition, whether by fixing prices, allocating customers, limiting the introduction of new technology, or other means, are outlawed. Joint selling agreements or agreements among companies to promote specialization in the manufacture of particular products may be permitted in some circumstances; however, any such agreements would require the prior approval of the Authority, which is only to be granted if the Authority has found that the agreement would make a positive contribution to the efficiency of the enterprises in question and would not significantly affect the degree of competition in the markets concerned.

Additional provisions are aimed at reducing the possibility on the part of enterprises in the single market, through stock ownership, interlocking directorates, and similar devices, to circumvent the prohibition against restrictive business practices. Transactions which, in effect, would merge or affiliate previously independent enterprises in the area under the Authority's jurisdiction, require the prior approval of the High Authority, which must act under standards similar to those by which it judges joint selling and specialization agreements.

Under the High Authority's general powers to prevent or offset governmental measures which have a discriminatory effect upon the coal and steel enterprises in its jurisdiction, the High Authority can bring about a change in discriminatory freight rate structures imposed by the public carriers operating in the area. The negotiating countries intend that the High Authority would exercise this power early in its life, thereby ending a long-standing source of friction.

Once the provisions were in force, it is expected that producers in the common market would be exposed to a considerable degree of price competition. The expectation is that the long-run impact of this release of competitive forces would be to increase productivity, cut costs, and lower prices of coal and steel in the single market. Unless some safeguards were provided, however, the danger would exist that producers might develop pricing practices which generally fall under the head of "unfair competition." They might, for example, seek to drive competition out of a local market by selling temporarily in that market alone at a greatly depressed price. Another possibility is that producers might follow the practice of favoring customers of one nationality over those of another. Possibilities such as these have led to provisions vesting in the Authority the power to impose rules which would govern the pricing practices (not the prices) of the producers in the area. The general objective of the Authority would be to enforce a nondiscriminatory pricing pattern without unnecessarily inhibiting price competition and price flexibility.

The provisions of the agreement also allow for more direct intervention by the Authority in the market for coal and steel under certain special circumstances. Current European thinking on the subject of coal and steel is, of course, greatly influenced by the recurrent shortages of recent years and the strong inflationary pressures which such shortages have created. Accordingly, provision has been made for dealing with such situations; the agreement would permit the High Authority, acting in concert with the Council of Ministers, to impose price controls or to initiate a system of allocations for coal and steel in periods of shortage. At the other extreme, the Authority, acting together with the Council of Ministers, is empowered to limit production and to introduce minimum prices in a period of "manifest crisis."

Relations With Outside Countries

At present, each of the prospective members of the pool has undertakings to many countries outside the pool to grant the latter most-favored-nation treatment in trade matters; that is to say, each of the prospective participants is now bound by agreements which require them, for example, to apply the same tariff rate to coal or steel imported from the United Kingdom or the United States as is applied to coal or steel imported from other countries participating in the Schuman Plan. The participating countries will have to negotiate for the modification of these commitments in order to be able to eliminate coal and steel tariffs among themselves while continuing to apply them to imports from nonparticipating countries. Until the negotiations associated with these waivers are completed and the terms of the waivers are known, any discussion of the commercial relations of the Schuman Plan countries with outside countries is bound to be tentative in nature. Meanwhile, the High Authority is not empowered to take any measures inconsistent with the international obligations of the participating countries.

Despite the unresolved state of the trade relations between the six countries and the outside world, a few basic points are clear. Although the dominant theme of the Schuman Plan is the creation of a single market among the participating countries, the agreement also stresses the principle that the single market should not be an area which enjoys heavy protection from the coal and steel exports of the rest of the world. This intention will be put to the test initially in connection with the process of harmonizing the tariff structures of the participating countries. This problem of harmonization is an unavoidable consequence of the agreement to suspend tariffs on coal and steel among the participating countries. If Germany imposed a very much higher tariff rate on imports of British steel than Belgium imposed on its imports of British steel, German importers of British steel would be likely to bring their products through Belgium and thereby avoid the high German tariff. Similar problems would arise if the countries had very different policies regarding other types of import restrictions. To deal with these problems, therefore, member countries would have to develop arrangements whereby the import restrictions which each of them applied to outside countries were not sufficiently different to encourage needless transshipments among them.

The member countries would reserve one important right to the High Authority, however, which might in some circumstances reduce the import of the products of other countries. In the event that a "manifest crisis" developed, justifying the imposition of production quotas on coal or steel in the single market area, and, in the event that imports were being effected in such relatively increased quantities and under such conditions as seriously to injure producers of competitive coal and steel products in the single market, the Authority would be authorized to impose import quotas. This power, it should be noted, is directly analogous to the so-called escape-clause rights which participating countries reserve to themselves under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

The treaty says little regarding the treatment to be accorded by the pool to outside countries which import their coal and steel. Such provisions as exist, however, are of a constructive nature. The objective of the group is to be the development of sales practices which would produce equitable prices for exported coal and steel. Among other things, the Authority will have the means of preventing companies in its jurisdiction from "dumping" coal or steel abroad, that is, selling these products at a price below their sale price in the single market or below their cost of production.

Influencing Coal and Steel Investment

In general, competitive forces are expected to determine the location of coal and steel facilities in the single market and to encourage the expansion and modernization of these facilities. The High Authority will have no direct power to close down high-cost mines or steel plants, nor can it compel investments in added coal or steel facilities; in these fields, the Authority will have to rely upon market forces to bring about the results it desires.

On the other hand, the Authority could influence the pattern of investment in several other ways. To begin with, the Authority could veto a proposed investment in coal or steel facilities which a company proposed to finance from funds other than its own reserves, if the Authority concluded that the proposed facilities could not be expected to survive without subsidies or other artificial means of support. In addition, the Authority could make loans to enterprises to help in the expansion of their facilities. Finally, the Authority will have the obligation of making continuing studies of the coal and steel facilities of the complex, to point out the needs and opportunities for added investment in the area.

Protecting Labor's Interests

In the course of negotiating the provisions of the Schuman Plan, it became increasingly apparent that the project for a single market might well involve shifts in coal and steel facilities among the participating countries. These shifts, in turn, might require the migration or displacement of some workers engaged in those industries. Accordingly, the High Authority was given responsibility for assisting workers in the readjustments which might be involved. This assistance may take any of several forms. It may include liberal separation pay, retraining courses, or payment of resettlement expenses and similar payments. It might also include the financing of new industries in the affected areas which could absorb the displaced workers.

The High Authority's obligations with respect to labor also have certain more positive objectives. One of the High Authority's major purposes is to eliminate the deliberate use of wage reductions as a technique of competition. One provision of the treaty prohibits any reduction in wages, except in certain defined circumstances, such as when living costs also had declined. In addition, the Authority may enter into consultation with Governments with a view to correcting abnormally low wage situations already in existence.

The treaty also contains other commitments which have few precedents in international labor history. The participating countries will be committed to the development of a detailed agreement to eliminate virtually all restrictions in the hiring of experienced steel and coal workers who are nationals of any of the other countries. Particular efforts are to be made to eliminate barriers to the reemployment of workers displaced in other countries. Any discriminations practiced against coal or steel workers of other member countries, whether they are experienced or not, also will have to be eliminated by the treaty.

Transitional Measures

From the first, the drafters of the plan considered that certain special measures would have to be taken, during a relatively short period at the outset of the plan's operation, in order to deal with the differences in costs which existed among the coal and steel industries of the various nations. It appeared that free trade among the coal and steel industries of the six countries might force shifts in production in the merged area on so large a scale as to be intolerable for some of the countries concerned. The most difficult problems in this category are those presented by the relatively high cost Belgium coal industry and by the Italian steel industry.

To deal with the Belgian coal problem, provision is made for the operation of a so-called coal equalization fund which would operate during a transitional period of 5 years. The fund would be raised by levies on the coal and steel production of the low cost producers in the area and would be paid to the highest cost segment of the Belgian producers. These subsidies would taper off at a rapid rate, the exact pace depending on the speed with which Belgian industry can adjust itself to the situation.

The solution for Italian steel takes a different form. The negotiators concluded that for technical reasons it was not practicable to operate an equalization fund for the steel industry. Accordingly, if the High Authority considers it necessary, the Italian industry can be protected by tariffs during the transitional period. However, the duties involved cannot in any case be higher than those which prevailed at the beginning of the plan and would be reduced by some fixed percentage in each of the transitional years, until the duty was eliminated.

Next Steps

Six countries have participated in the development of the Schuman Plan treaty—Belgium, France, Western Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, and Luxembourg. Ratification by the parliaments of the signatory Governments will put the plan in operation. The discussions on ratification will raise political issues of the first importance in most of the countries concerned. Each country is bound to test the plan for its impact on its domestic economy and to explore the effects of participation on other international issues.

Ratification of the plan will be a tribute to their imagination and courage. It will represent an experiment in new concepts of sovereignty and of international organization, which will help to knit the free nations of the world with stronger and more enduring ties.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1951 O - 938957

Concerning Freedom of Information

★

THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

INTERRACIAL TRENDS

R. B. Eleazer March 27, 1945

****

"Of all the problems confronting American democracy none is more crucial than that of race relations. Left to pressure groups and revolutionary organizations it can be fraught with more danger than any other problem with which we must deal. The fellowship of Christians called the Church must play a major role in its solution, if peace, good will, and understanding are to characterize our future. This is our problem now and in the days to come."--Dr. M.S. Davage.

****

DARK PEOPLES AT UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE

According to a statement from Washington, the San Francisco Conference of the United Nations, meeting on April 25, will be attended by representatives of a number of countries populated by dark peoples, among them Ethiopia, Liberia,Haiti, Santo Domingo, Costa Rica, Cuba, Egypt, India and the Philippines. It is not yet known, however, to what extent the problems of dependent peoples will be included in the discussions.

Meantime the National Association for the Advancem ent of Colored People has addressed to Secretary Stettinius a strong appeal, asking that the conference affirm the legal equality of the great racial groups of mankind, and that dependent peoples be accorded immediate voice in their governments, be protected in the ownership and use of their natural resources, and be given assurance of ultimate choice of full citizenship or political independence. To safeguard their rights the appeal calls for an international mandates commission.

- 0 -

NEW YORK ENACTS FAIR EMPLOYMENT LAW

The New York legislature has enacted and Governor Dewey has signed a bill intended to prevent racial and religious discrimination in employment, and providing for a five-man commission to administer the law. The Indiana legislature has passed a similar, but weaker law placing upon the State Department of Labor the responsibility for preventing such discrimination.

Meantime legislation for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee for the nation is still pending in Congress, and the Massachusetts legislature is considering a number of bills directed to the same end. Speaking for a commission appointed to investigate the need for such legislation in Massachusetts, L.M. Friedman reported that "Not a public utility in Massachusetts employs a Negro in any job higher than janitor and elevator operator; only one Boston department store hires Negroes as clerks; not a hospital in the State will train a Negro girl, and insurance companies do not hire Negroes as solicitors."

- 0 -

CONCERN FOR DENVER'S SPANISH AMERICANS

Plans are under way in Denver for an extensive survey of conditions affecting the city's Spanish-American population. It is said they are suffering from lack of employment opportunities, discriminatory treatment by the police, and poor housing. The survey, it is hoped, will result in remedial action. (over)

"A CUP OF COLD WATER"
Dr. Ernest F. Tittle

Last summer a Japanese girl just released from a concentration camp in Arizona came to Chicago looking for work. Almost immediately upon her arrival she was stricken with appendicitis and was sent to a hospital for an operation. Sick, a stranger, a Japanese, with no job yet in sight, she viewed the future with no little apprehension. What, then, was her surprise when certain young people from a Christian church came to the hospital to see her, offering friendship and practical help. Brought up a Buddhist, she decided that if Christianity made people think and act like that, she herself wanted to be a Christian, and she is now a loyal and most grateful disciple of Christ.

- 0 -

A GRAND OLD MAN LOOKS BACK

Ten years a slave in Georgia, fifty years a school teacher and college president in that state, and now at 91 still active as president of a two-million-dollar bank in Philadelphia, Major R. R. Wright in an article in February Negro Digest pays tribute to America as a "country that allows one to hope, to dream, to lift himself by his boot straps, to petition, to protest, as well as to pray." After modestly surveying his remarkable career, which has included personal acquaintance with twelve United States presidents, Gladstone, Clemenceau, and many other notables, he writes:

"If I had youth and a long life before me, I would attempt to live a better and more useful Christian life, and would endeavor to translate my Christianity into developing and cementing friendship and good will between the races.... This finding a way for all Americans to live to their fullest and highest, regardless of racial or cultural differences, is to me the greatest challenge facing the nation. I would want personally to accept this challenge as a life work, interwoven into all I did and thought."

- 0 -

RACE RELATIONS SUNDAY IN ST. LOUIS

In the citywide observance of Race Relations Sunday in St. Louis, Dr. O. E. Woolfolk, pastor of Union Memorial Church, (Central Jurisdiction), was chosen as one of the speakers. Mayor Kaufman was so favorably impressed with his address that he requested a copy as resource material for the city's official Interracial Commission.

AND IN ABINGDON, VIRGINIA

Writes Rev. W. M. Bunts, of Abingdon, Virginia: "We had a splendid service in our church on Race Relations Sunday, with the largest attendance we have had this conference year. About one third of the congregation were colored people, who furnished the speaker and the music."

- 0 -

Department of General Church School Work
The Division of the Local Church
General Board of Education of The Methodist Church
810 Broadway, Box 871
Nashville 2, Tennessee

United States of America

Congressional Record

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 80th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

The Battle for World Peace and Stability

SPEECH

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 1, 1948

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, for the sake of continuity I respectfully ask my colleagues to permit me to conclude my general statement on the pending bill without interruption.

Mr. President, with the unanimous approval of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I report the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 in its perfected text. In the name of peace, stability, and freedom it deserves prompt passage. In the name of intelligent American self-interest it envisions a mighty undertaking worthy of our faith. It is an economic act—but economics usually control national survivals these days. The act itself asserts that "disruption following in the wake of war is not contained by national frontiers." It asserts that "the existing situation in Europe endangers the establishment of a lasting peace, the general welfare and national interest of the United States, and the attainment of the objectives of the United Nations."

Every Senator knows that these dangers are even greater than they were when those words were written only two short weeks ago. The fate of Czechoslovakia, where any semblance of democracy has just been gutted by subversive conquest, underscores this solemn thesis. The kindred fate of brave little Finland may be adding to the ominous score this very afternoon even while we debate an axiom, namely, that aggressive communism threatens all freedom and all security, whether in the Old World or in the New, when it puts free peoples anywhere in chains.

The act asserts sound doctrine when it says that it is "the policy of the people of the United States to sustain and strengthen principles of individual liberty, free institutions and genuine independence through assistance to those countries of Europe which participate in a joint recovery program based upon self-help and mutual cooperation." Mr. President, this act may well become a welcome beacon in the world's dark night, but if a beacon is to be lighted at all it had better be lighted before it is too late.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the decision which here concerns the Senate is the kind that tries men's souls. I understand and share the anxieties involved. It would be a far happier circumstance if we could close our eyes to reality, comfortably retire within our bastions, and dream of an isolated and prosperous peace. But that which was once our luxury would now become our folly. This is too plain to be persuasively denied in a foreshortened, atomic world. We must take things as they are.

The greatest nation on earth either justifies or surrenders its leadership. We must choose. There are no blueprints to guarantee results. We are entirely surrounded by calculated risks. I profoundly believe that the pending program is the best of these risks. I have no quarrel with those who disagree, because we are dealing with imponderables. But I am bound to say to those who disagree that they have not escaped to safety by rejecting or subverting this plan. They have simply fled to other risks, and I fear far greater ones. For myself, I can only say that I prefer my choice of responsibilities.

This legislation, Mr. President, seeks peace and stability for freemen in a free world. It seeks them by economic rather than by military means. It proposes to help our friends to help themselves in the pursuit of sound and successful liberty in the democratic pattern. The quest can mean as much to us as it does to them. It aims to preserve the victory against aggression and dictatorship which we thought we won in World War II. It strives to help stop World War III before it starts. It fights the economic chaos which would precipitate far-flung disintegration. It sustains western civilization. It means to take western Europe completely off the American dole at the end of the adventure. It recognizes the grim truth—whether we like it or not—that American self-interest, national economy, and national security are inseverably linked with these objectives. It stops if changed conditions are no longer consistent with the national interest of the United States. It faces the naked facts of life.

Within the purview of this plan are 270,000,000 people of the stock which has largely made America. These are 26 percent of all the literates of the earth. Before the war they operated 68 percent of all the ships that sailed the sea. They grew 27 percent of all the world's cereals. They produced 37 percent of the world's steel. They sold 24 percent of the world's exports and bought 39 percent of the world's imports. They are struggling, against great and ominous odds, to regain their feet. They must not be allowed to fail. The world—America emphatically included—needs them as both producers and consumers. Peace needs their healthy restoration to the continuing defense of those ideals by which free men live. This vast friendly segment of the earth must not collapse. The iron curtain must not come to the rims of the Atlantic either by aggression or by default.

I wish, Mr. President, swiftly to sketch the chain reaction of events responsible for the issue we here confront. It is a significant narrative which speaks for itself in behalf of the need and justification for this heroic adventure, the greatest ever initiated by any one nation for the sake of peaceful humanities. In the background, of course, is the war itself; the military defeat of the Axis; the utter prostration of postwar Europe amid the ashes of its victory; the resultant tragedy of far-flung human want and suffering; the paralysis of the peace that has not yet come; the rise of new aggression reaching out for ominous conquest amid distraught and disintegrating peoples. I do not here assess whatever mistakes in statesmanship may have helped precipitate or prolong these catastrophies. It is enough, for the present consideration, that the tragedies occurred and that they still threaten the peace, stability, and security of this whole earth, the United States again emphatically included.

In the sanctuary of our relative good fortune where not one bomb fell during all those desperate days when the skies of Europe were raining death, we promptly and willingly went to the postwar aid of our prostrate friends. We literally leaped with them from one crisis to another. Bill after bill went through Congress for their relief, and billion after billion went from us to them. Two years of this went by. Often the efforts failed of the desired results—although, despite all debits, I hesitate to think what would have happened in the absence of the efforts. But it became clear that the process could not indefinitely go on, first, because western Europe could not wait longer for real emancipation; second, because America could not longer afford to underwrite futility. We were both near the ends of our ropes.

Then came June 5, 1947. Secretary of State Marshall made a speech at Harvard. Just as at neighboring Concord in an earlier century, it proved to be "a shot heard round the world." At the moment it was just a few sentences in a quiet sequence. I quote:

> It is already evident that before the United States Government can proceed much further in its effort to alleviate the situation and help the European world on its way to recovery, there must be some agreement among the countries of Europe as to the requirements of the situation and the part those countries themselves will take in order to give proper effect to whatever action might be undertaken by this Government. The initiative, I think, must come from Europe.
>
> The role of this country should consist of friendly aid in the drafting of a European program and of later support of such a program so far as it may be practical for us to do so. The program should be a joint one, agreed to by a number, if not all, of the European nations.

Mr. President, the responsive effect in Europe was electric. History wrote with rushing pen. It was a new call to the colors—this time a peace call to mobilize for self-help and cooperation in quest of mutual survival. The British Bevin and the French Bidault promptly summoned a European conference. They consulted the Russian Molotov. He met with them in Paris on June 27. As usual, his demands were impossible; and, as usual, treacherous Moscow propaganda charged us with iniquitous American "imperialism," a charge shockingly echoed by some of our own citizens. The Soviets vetoed concerted action, but Bevin and Bidault went ahead. They invited 22 European nations—all of them—to meet in Paris. All Soviet-dominated countries sent their refusals, including Czechoslovakia, which, after a hasty summons to the Kremlin, withdrew its previous approval and now finds itself forcefully communized against any further expressions of self-will. Sixteen nations accepted the invitation. Here they are: Austria, Greece, Norway, Switzerland, Belgium, Iceland, Portugal, Turkey, Denmark, Ireland, Sweden, United Kingdom, France, Italy, Luxemburg, Netherlands.

They met on July 12 and organized the Committee of European Economic Cooperation, known as CEEC. They met to coordinate the independent nations of Europe in a self-help effort to seek stability and preserve freedom in response to the dynamic impulse of what was then called the Marshall plan. They met to plan hopeful cooperation that might justify American assistance. And they met bravely, Mr. President—"bravely" because it was in virtual defiance of the Russian Bear, which promptly showed its teeth.

Within 4 weeks Moscow dictated new reprisal agreements and tighter affiliations with all her satellites, and quickly organized the Cominform, through which the Communists of nine nations speak for the Communist world. The "iron curtain" took on more "iron." The Cominform is a modern version of the supposedly defunct Comintern, which was communism's prior agent of world violence and revolution. It frankly calls upon Communists everywhere to wreck the Marshall plan and condemns it and us with a new intemperance of invective and distortion. It is indeed "cold war." It is pressure war against the independent recovery of western Europe. Obviously, it is also aimed at us. It is a conspiracy to prevent the emergence of order out of chaos, stability out of confusion, and western freedom out of hopelessness. Communists everywhere have responded. The great sabotage is under way. Let me make it completely plain that I do not suggest, even by the remotest inference, that all opponents to the plan are Communists. I have already expressed my complete respect for the honest opinions of citizens who disagree. I simply point out, as part of the record, that while every critic is not a Communist, every Communist is a critic, and the orders from the Kremlin are to wreck this enterprise. Thus, the postwar pattern continues in familiar and consistent form.

I said that the 16 cooperating nations in CEEC acted bravely, as I hope we, too, may do. I have in mind not only the implications of the Cominform, but also such threatening statements as that by Mr. Molotov saying:

> The Soviet Government considers it necessary to caution the Governments of Great Britain and France against the consequences of such action.

Yet, Mr. President, there is nothing in this plan which threatens the Soviet police empire with any sort of consequence which she does not herself choose voluntarily to invite. It is not a plan against eastern Europe, unless the independent survival of free peoples is on the blacklist. It is a plan for western Europe. It is not external conquest. It is not dictation. It is internal recuperation by self-chosen methods. Eastern Europe was invited in. It was her own decision that keeps her out. It seems obvious that at least three of these countries behind the curtain would have joined if left to their own free wills. But, Mr. President, there are no free wills in police states.

East-west flow of trade in Europe is necessary to both. Its resumption will be profitable to both. There is nothing in this plan which retards this resumption, unless Moscow itself so elects. The healthy recuperation of western Europe should facilitate this resumption for the good of all concerned, if we can have a peaceful world. All poisoned propaganda to the contrary notwithstanding, both at home and abroad, this is America's incentive and her dearest wish.

The honorable release of east-west tension would be the greatest boon of modern times. It can be released whenever there is mutual east-west fidelity to the objectives of World War II asserted by the united Allies on January 1, 1942, and whenever there is mutual east-west fidelity to the principles and purposes of the United Nations. It can be released whenever there is mutual east-west respect for the rights of free peoples to order their own lives. There is no consistent effort which the Government of the United States should withhold in pursuit of this objective. We must always be ready for any discussion to this end. Peace with justice is our utterly paramount concern. Any thought of another war is abhorrent to our souls. But peace and appeasement are not on speaking terms, and they have not been since Munich, after World War I, and Yalta, in World War II.

But let me resume the narrative. The CEEC met for 10 weeks in Paris, concluding on September 22. It has been cynically said that they met just to total up a bill to present to Uncle Sam. Nothing could be more cruel or further from the truth. They met to see what they could do to meet the Marshall self-help specifications, and they concluded mutual pledges of amazing portent and vitality. We did not dictate their ticket. They wrote it for themselves. They volunteered their pledges—to use all efforts to develop production up to agreed targets—to apply all necessary measures leading to the rapid achievement of internal financial monetary and economic stability—to cooperate in all possible steps to reduce barriers to the expansion of trade—to set up a joint organization to follow these objectives through and to insure them to the fullest possible extent. All these, and many other obligations, they offered to assume. It was a historic moment. Someday the United States of Europe may look back upon it as we do to the Annapolis Conference which preceded the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia. It was a courageous and constructive answer to the United States. It offered the best chance for stable peace and for peaceful stability that there is on earth today—outside of a reinvigorated United Nations which it would immensely further. For myself, Mr. President, I assert the deep conviction that it is worth the wholehearted cooperation of the United States as the cheapest and most promising peace investment in our own self-interest that we face. What we can "afford to do" is one thing—and never to be minimized. But what we cannot afford not to do is just as vital in the estimates of prudent statesmanship.

I comment, in passing, that these were not idle words at Paris. Our friends meant exactly what they said. They have already begun to prove it. "Benelux" already joints three of these countries in a customs union. Others are ready to come in. France has already performed major surgery on her currency. Italy and France have faced powerful Communist subversion and survived the test—a feat that might well have been impossible without our present and prospective economic aid. They, too, are negotiating a customs union. Bizonia in Germany is now well likely to become Trizonia in the spirit of new unity at the heart and core of European recovery. Britain's Bevin, backed by the united spokesmanship of his country, is calling for western union. These are new signs of the new times, Mr. President. If these trends are thwarted, if these hopes are dashed, I confess that I tremble for the consequences in this foreshortened world. This is not hysteria. It is simple candor. In my view, the approaching Senate roll calls are that important—to them and to us.

Now, Mr. President, make note of this: All these CEEC promises and pledges—importantly, including, by the way, the acquisition of essential strategic materials for stock piling in the United States—are to be written into agreements as a condition precedent to our cooperation. There will be specific bilateral contracts between the United States and each beneficiary country. There will be specific targets. There will be multilateral contracts in which all countries underwrite the common aim and the common cause. The obligations will be set down in black and white. This is no mere wishing well. For one example, in respect to the most vital commodity of all, coal production is pledged to go from 398,000,000 tons in 1946 to 495,000,000 tons in 1949 and 586,000,000 tons in 1952.

Your Committee on Foreign Relations has made every possible effort to protect all these expectations. Indeed, this legislation which the Senate is asked to approve categorically asserts that—

> The continuity of assistance provided by the United States should at all times be dependent upon the continuity of cooperation among the countries involved.

The act categorically asserts that—> the Administrator shall terminate assistance under this act to any participating country whenever he determines that such country is not adhering to its agreement or is diverting from the purposes of this act assistance provided thereunder.

No law can guarantee its own success. No man has a right dogmatically to say that any plan will succeed in these dangerous days of flux. But here is a warrant for maximum confidence that we do not indefinitely undertake a failure. All the more it makes the chance worth taking.

Now let me return to the narrative again. The CEEC summoned its best minds abroad to the council table. They had been warned by the Harvard speech that America expected a self-contained plan which could reasonably progress toward the restoration of economic independence and the end of American assistance. They had been warned that a successful recovery program must take the place of everlasting relief programs. They set to work to meet the challenge. At the end of 10 weeks they produced the answer. It would take 4¼ years of intensive self-help and cooperation, with progressively decreasing American assistance during this term of years. Their original estimate was that it might require an over-all total of twenty-two and four-tenths billions of American aid for western Europe, including western Germany. Chiefly by the deduction of capital-equipment items, this figure came down to seventeen billions for 4¼ years. In other words, this peace investment might cost one-third as much in 4¼ years as we appropriated for war in just one bill that passed the Senate in 5 minutes and without a roll call one June afternoon in 1944. War has no bargains. I think peace has. I believe I am talking about one now.

I digress, however, to say that there is no seventeen billions or any other comparable figure in this pending legislation. It was in the first executive draft that came to us 2 months ago. I immediately asked for its deletion, and the State Department promptly acquiesced, because it could be no more than an educated guess of doubtful validity if we thus were to attempt to assess events and values so far in advance. Furthermore, it might be misconstrued abroad as a specific dollar commitment without their understanding that one American Congress cannot commit another. Yet the genius of the program, if we are to escape year-to-year relief, is sufficient continuity to encourage dependable long-range planning. We rightly demand continuity of performance from our friends as the price of continuity of aid. It is elementary and indispensable fair play, on the other hand, that continuity of aid similarly should follow continuity of satisfactory performance. It must be inherent and implicit in our purpose. Otherwise, I repeat, this is merely one more stopgap, "rat-hole" operation.

Your Committee on Foreign Relations has met this situation, Mr. President, by familiar statutory device. As is our standard practice when dealing with public projects overlapping into subsequent fiscal years, we have authorized to be appropriated from time to time for 4½ years such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act. But the only specific dollar authorization in the act is for 1 year, commencing next April. I shall discuss that later. Suffice it for the moment to point out that this has the effect of eliminating the necessity for subsequent annual authorizations. It thus simplifies the subsequent procedure. But it leaves each annual appropriation, as indeed it must, to the annual decision of the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate and to the annual discretion of the Congress. The net of it is that the recovery program will pass in annual review. It will be tested annually for its promised accomplishments and for the continuity of its performance. It will be tested annually for its impact on our own economy. Each Congress is free to decide these subsequent issues for itself. But they will do so in the presence of the declared attitude and opinion of the Eightieth Congress, as expressed in this act, that the program, if successful, should carry through to whatever conclusion it proves to deserve. To withhold an expression of this purpose would be to repudiate our own thesis and to pitifully reduce this act to the status of just one more sterile dole. It would be to rob the act of all the cumulative values upon which we depend for net results and which can infinitely bless us all.

Now, Mr. President, let the narrative deal with equally significant events on this side of the ocean here at home. As soon as it became evident that CEEC intended to act upon Secretary Marshall's suggestion, the President began complementary studies at this end of the line. In my responsibility as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, I asked for his immediate appointment of an independent civilian group of seasoned and widely experienced citizens to survey the field and to report what America might wisely and safely do—I repeat those controlling words, "wisely" and "safely"—in connection with the contemplated program. As a result, such a group was named by the President on June 22, 1947, under the chairmanship of Secretary of Commerce Harriman, who was the only Government official on the panel. Its bipartisan membership was completely independent of the Government and its judgments were likewise. It had as fine and as representative a personnel as was ever gathered together to do an unselfish, patriotic job; and it labored with spectacular and unremitting zeal upon its complex task. Its ultimate report is one of the most comprehensive ever made in respect to a public problem. These credentials are important because, as a result, I think it is of paramount importance to us that this Harriman committee, despite occasional disagreement respecting details, came to the over-all conclusion that this recovery program not only is well within our American capacity but also that it is essential to the best welfare of the United States. This, remember, was the verdict of representative American citizenship. I do not know how any great problem in public policy could have been submitted to more competent audit. I commend this thought to prejudicial critics who do not and could not have comparable access to all the facts.

I quote one sentence from the Harriman committee's findings:

> The committee is convinced that a sound program for western European recovery should be formulated and adopted by the United States with the same boldness and determination, and the same confidence in the worthiness of the democratic cause, which characterized our action in World War II.

That is the target of private citizenship mobilized through the high spokesmanship of the Harriman committee.

I quote one other sentence:

> The domestic consequences (of the fall of western Europe to Communist dominion) are such as no American could easily tolerate.

Does that require any application? I think not. But it is a timely reminder that the Senate cannot contemplate its decision on this pending act with complete and comfortable detachment, as if there may be no price for us to pay if we reject or emasculate this plan. We have no such complacent option. There is an alternative price. I simply suggest, in passing, for example, that Secretary of Defense Forrestal and Army Secretary Royall testified to our committee that in the absence of some reasonable prospect for the stabilization of western Europe they would find it necessary to urgently demand billions more for national military defense. That, however, is only a small part of what could be the alternative price in a Communist-dominated world. The Harriman committee says the total consequences could include, and I again quote the committee, the spokesmanship for the civilian population of this Nation, "the immediate and sweeping limitation of our economic and political life, perhaps extending even to our form of government."

Which might be the alternative.

But let me again take up the narrative. In addition to the Harriman report, we have the survey by Secretary of the Interior Krug on Natural Resources and Foreign Aid. I quote one sentence:

> The aggregate productive capacity of the United States appears ample.

In the same vein we had the so-called Nourse report, from the President's economic advisers. We also had the exhaustive studies of the executive departments through a large committee headed by able Under Secretary Lovett.

Now, Mr. President, I want to make it plain that all of this exploration dealt preponderantly with the most critical of all considerations, namely, the impact of this plan upon our own domestic economy. Nothing could be of more importance because we all agree that the maintenance of a sound and solvent United States is as indispensable to the hopes of the world as it is to us. It would be final blunder to jeopardize our stabilities at home. We shall not do so. I am glad to echo the warning of the Harriman report that "it is not wise to underestimate the steepness of the climb," and that "the aid which the United States gives will impose definite sacrifice on the United States." That is obvious. This is no happy picnic. Heavy post-war peace expenditures involve a burden, just as did the infinitely heavier expenditures of the war-that-was, or the expenditures of another war which we propose, with every resource at our command, to prevent. Any drain upon our commodities not in surplus also is a burden, although it is significant to note that the contemplated exports under this plan at its very peak are substantially less than our average exports for 1947. But all authorities agree that the plan can be managed to avoid serious interference with our domestic economy. They agree that it would not precipitate domestic controls which would not be required by the domestic situation alone. For example, there will be no competitive exports of meat under this plan for at least 2 years. There will be no exports of metal scrap. Petroleum products, by the explicit terms of the bill itself, must be purchased offshore to the maximum practicable extent.

Sound administration of the act, Mr. President, will hold all these impacts to a minimum. The bill itself is explicit in these directives. In general terms it lays down the fundamental rule that "no assistance to the participating countries shall seriously impair the economic stability of the United States." In specific terms it lays down the injunction that—

> The Administrator must provide for procurement in such a way as to (1) minimize the drain upon the resources of the United States and the impact of such procurement upon the domestic economy, and (2) avoid impairing the vital need of the people of the United States.

The proponents of this measure, in a word, are not riding rainbows. They recognize the calculated risk. They think it is worth taking in our own enlightened self-interest. They prefer it to the alternative risk. But they proceed with prudence. They recognize the priority which self-interest assigns to the protection of our own domestic situation. We are not to be committed beyond this legitimate boundary. But they believe that we can do both jobs—at home and abroad—and that we cannot afford not to take the preferable chance. In a word, they believe in America.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the act itself, which is unanimously endorsed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee after 5 weeks of public hearings and 10 days of continuous executive sessions. I cannot speak too gratefully of the friendly patience and bipartisan unity with which my committee colleagues cooperated. If something of their spirit imbues those for whom this legislation is intended, the Economic Cooperation Administration, as it will be called, has hopeful augury.

We confronted many serious perplexities involving wide divergence of opinion in and out of Congress. Perhaps the greatest of these was the question how this gigantic trust should be administered. It is the universal opinion that the success of the enterprise is largely dependent upon the character of its management. It is the universal opinion that its overriding economic purpose requires the highest available type of seasoned business experience and the widest possible autonomous authority for those who patriotically assume these vast economic responsibilities. It is equally the universal opinion that the highest considerations of foreign policy are constantly involved and that, as I said upon a previous historic occasion, we cannot have two Secretaries of State at the same time.

To fit these conflicting specifications into common pattern was, indeed, a jigsaw puzzle. We invited the Brookings Institution of Washington, one of the most respected research laboratories in the country, to make an objective study of this enigma. I express our great obligation to the Brookings Institution for the masterly job it did. The provisions in the pending bill largely follow its recommendations. I am happy to say the result already enjoys well-nigh universal approval in and out of Congress.

We are creating the Economic Cooperation Administration. At its head will be an Administrator with Cabinet status. In him, under final Presidential control, is vested the responsibility for operating this enterprise. The Administrator and the Secretary of State will keep each other fully and currently informed. Whenever the Secretary of State believes that any action of the Administrator is inconsistent with the foreign policy objectives of the United States, he will consult with the Administrator and, if differences of view are not adjusted, the matter will be referred to the President for final decision. This is a paraphrase of the formula which has worked so well in the Atomic Energy Act involving somewhat similarly mixed functions.

Behind the Administrator, and his Deputy, will be the Public Advisory Board, headed by the Administrator, organized on a bipartisan basis, and consisting of not more than 12 members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, "selected from among citizens of broad and varied experience in matters affecting the public interest." Its functions are advisory. But its utility is profound.

Overseas a special economic mission will be established by the Administrator and under his direction in each participating country; and the chief of each such mission will cooperate with our Ambassador or Minister under a general rule of conduct reflecting the contacts set up for the Administrator and the Secretary of State to avoid inconsistent decisions by either. Meanwhile what might be called a roving ambassador will represent us in dealing with any European organization of participating countries as insistently envisioned by the act. The creation of this post underscores our firm conviction that the salvation of western Europe lies in consolidated self-help and cooperation. Dollars alone will not save them. American assistance alone will not save them. All through the bill we bluntly assert these axioms. What they do for themselves will save them. What they do for themselves is the only possible vindication of our aid. But without a roving ambassador there would be no way for us to hold these governments to strict accountability for these relationships upon which they and we must depend for the final basic success of the undertaking.

To keep the House and Senate, here at home, in intimate touch with the evolution of all these plans, the bill creates the Joint Congressional Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation—again borrowing this device of proved utility from the Atomic Energy Act. It will consist of seven Senators and seven Representatives. It will be bipartisan. It is already familiarly known as the watchdog committee. Little added definition is required. It will make continuous studies of what goes on. It will provide continuous and intimate congressional liaison with all these undertakings. In general sense it will represent the taxpayers of the United States. It will greatly simplify the subsequent annual responsibilities of Congress when, once each year during the life of this arrangement, it must determine in what degree yesterday's performance warrants tomorrow's continuing cooperation.

I omit further needless details. This is the picture and the pattern of administration. It gives every promise that previous errors in foreign aid will be avoided. It fixes and implements clear and specific responsibilities. It umpires in advance functional conflicts between business management on the one hand and foreign policy upon the other. It is our best possible promise of efficient and effective results in restabilizing a broken world.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the specific figure asked by the President for the first authorization under this bill. It was $6,800,000,000 for 15 months from next April first. This was the result of rigorous screening by the executive authorities of the CEEC proposals for $8,400,000,000 and a realistic appraisal of domestic availabilities. It took full account of the Harriman, Krug, and Nourse reports. It was the composite judgment of diversified minds. Secretary Marshall said it was as near a precision figure as human judgments can foresee. Certainly it was sustained by the most complete studies and surveys I have ever seen in a congressional committee. It was further sustained by the independent investigation of the Harriman committee—composed, remember, of the best business brains available in our civilian life. The comparable Harriman figure was approximately the same. It was still further sustained by the head of the International Bank, who also examined the problem independently and concluded that the figure is a tight-fitting minimum. It was in no sense a stab in the dark. At the very least it is entitled to a presumption of relative dependability until more competent authority competently proves otherwise.

But I can fully understand, Mr. President, why this figure immediately became the subject of wide controversy. In the first place, there was a big gap between this figure and the President's budgetary estimate of actual cash disbursements for this purpose in the next fiscal year—a gap representing obligations and commitments which must be made in advance if our plans are to possess efficient continuity. In the second place, we have been overwhelmed with such a wealth and welter of supporting statistics that even our own experts—to say nothing of our committee members—have rivaled each other in their headaches. At such a moment it is dangerously easy to "lose sight of the forest for the trees." Busy pencils, playing with their decimals, can make objectivity impossible. The committee's unanimous recommendation escapes the horns of this dilemma by rooting itself in a few solid fundamentals which I commend to the common sense of my colleagues.

First. If this plan can succeed on the basis recommended by its authors, no well-wisher would allow it to fail at its inception through lack of original resources sufficient to its success. That would be "penny wisdom and pound foolishness." It could even be unwitting sabotage.

Second. Any estimate of these essential resources, in advance of experience with the plan, is problematical at best. In such circumstance we should start with figures which enjoy the preponderance of supporting evidence rather than to arbitrarily slice off what might be the difference between success and still-born failure.

Third. Therefore prudence recommends that we launch the plan with figures which offer no alibi for failure; but on a timetable which permits us to review the figures at the earliest moment when experience will permit us to deal with the realities.

On the basis of these sanities, the Committee on Foreign Relations unanimously cut the duration of this first authorization from 15 months to 12 and it reduced the figure from $6,800,000,000 to $5,300,000,000. This latter figure accurately reflects the estimated expenditures and commitments for the first 12 months of the original work sheet for 15 months. In other words, we have not undermined the resources for 1 year from April 1, 1948, which we are warned by the authors of this plan are essential to its success. We have not transferred from them to us the responsibility for a failure which might be charged to initial lack of funds. We have not impaired either the resources or the psychology upon which the plan depends. But we have made it imperative that the first task of the next Congress and the next administration next January shall be to resurvey this whole problem in the light of experience and reality; and thus we have reduced the first authorization by $1,500,000,000.

Mr. President, I attach the greatest importance to this change in the timetable. By next New Years we shall have had 9 months' experience with this enterprise. We shall then know the efficiency of its all-important administrative management; and we shall have the benefit of the Administrator's advice. We shall also have the first-hand judgments of our own joint congressional watch-dog committee. We shall know whether a good crop overseas has lightened the CEEC deficit. We shall know much more about the nature and extent—or perhaps even the suspension—of the sabotage campaigns of the wrecking crews. Most important of all, we shall know to what extent self-help and mutual cooperation in western Europe are giving promise of the vitality upon which this plan inseverably rests. We shall know many things upon which today we can only speculate.

It seems to me that we have everything to gain and nothing to lose—assuming that we are entering upon this high adventure in good faith—by launching this hopeful enterprise full-steam-ahead; and reserving our seasoned and informed judgments for next January, as contemplated by the committee's recommendation, when we shall know whereof we speak instead of gambling now with unknown destiny. I beg of Senators to take this concept to their hearts. This is more than a problem of mathematics; it is a problem in peace, stability, and human freedoms. It may not work. I think it will. But if it fails, let the responsibility rest elsewhere. I say again—as I have said so many times before—these recommended figures are not sacred. But in the light of the powerful credentials they possess, unless the Appropriations Committee can strongly prove them wrong, let us give them the benefit of any doubts for the time being. Next January is not long to wait for the accounting with so much at stake.

One thing more about this figure of $5,300,000,000. It goes for loans and grants. The division rests with the Administrator, counseled by his own board and by the National Advisory Council consisting of the highest officers of Government. The division will depend upon the beneficiary's ability to pay and upon the nature of the assistance. The loans will be serviced by the Export-Import Bank. It is roughly estimated that loans will represent from 20 percent to 40 percent of the grand total. Using the lower percentage in averaged application to the first year's authorization, its net cost to us is much nearer $4,000,000,000 than $5,300,000,000. It could be—we may hope it will be—even lower in its net effect.

At this point I interject another vital fact. While it is impossible to establish accurate categories at the moment, it is expected that 2 or 3 of these 16 countries in CEEC will be cooperators without any drain upon our dollar aid. They will pay their own way. It also is expected that three other countries will be exclusively on a temporary loan basis—without any grants. It is contemplated that only two countries will be exclusively on a basis of grants. The other eight countries will be on a variable scale of loans and grants. This is no loose give-away. In every instance the plan is geared to hardpan economics.

I now speak of the method used to arrive at this figure. It involves so-called balance of payments. For each country this is the difference between national income from exports, foreign services, and foreign investments, on the one hand, and essential imports of goods and services, on the other hand. This is the balance of payments, and when the former are insufficient to pay for the latter, and there is no gold or convertible currency to make up the difference, any such deficit country is in jeopardy. Under normal exchange conditions, surplus exchange with one country can be balanced against an exchange deficit with others. But this situation does not exist today, and will not until foreign currencies and international exchange are restabilized. This is one of the long-range objectives of this plan—important to every trading nation on earth, our own emphatically included. Meanwhile, the immediate and indispensable objective is to overcome these deficits in western Europe, including western Germany.

Current calculations accordingly were made by the following process: First, estimating each country's import requirements; second, deducting therefrom each country's exports and earnings from foreign services and foreign investments and from any other sources; third, deducting available imports from other Western Hemisphere areas. This final figure, translated into dollars, represents the amount of support from us to permit these 16 European countries, plus western Germany, to import from the Western Hemisphere the commodities essential to recovery. Import requirements of recipient countries were figured on a basis so close that they do not even restore full prewar living standards. In other words, the figures are down to bedrock.

Obviously, this brief description oversimplifies the process. There are many other factors influencing the net result. There are many imponderables, I say again and again. Only experience can demonstrate whether the realities will thrust upwards or push downwards the true evaluation. But this is generally accepted as the best measure of need. It was accepted by the Paris Conference, the executive departments, the Harriman committee, and the International Bank.

I do not undertake to demonstrate that the resultant 12-month figure of $5,300,000,000 in the bill is precisely accurate. I am content to point out that it is little short of amazing how close together all these estimates, independently made, proved to be. I am content to point out that the timetable in this act, as we have reported it, permits the earliest possible congressional review in the presence of reality. I am content to urge that the burden of proof falls heavily upon those who would argue that, pending this early review, the preliminary figure is too large. I have no sympathy with any "take this or nothing" attitude. But I do prayerfully believe that adequacy is the essence of what we do; and surely we can all agree that success with $5,300,000,000 in the first instance is preferable to failure with something less. I remind the Senate further that, under the bill's new timetable, we can balance out even the next fiscal year by the appropriations for the fourth quarter. If facts, as we will know them next January, require readjustments, we can make them in the final quarter. Then we can put them up or down with some degree of justified assurance. When we try to adjust them today, we play with danger to the lifeline of the plan.

Many other features of the pending bill will develop with the debate. At the moment I refer, finally, to only two.

First. Local currencies must be deposited by each beneficiary country to offset the value of any aid not furnished on terms of payment. The beneficiary country and the United States will agree on the local expenditure of these local currency accumulations in behalf of the purposes of this act. Thus our grants will not become a budgetary windfall in the beneficiary country but will virtually become a revolving fund to do double duty in behalf of the act's objectives.

Second. The investment of private American capital, in approved reconstruction projects in the 16 countries and western Germany, is encouraged by our guaranty of the subsequent convertibility of profits or original investment into dollars. This obviates the hazard most likely to prevent private investment. At the same time it is a highly practical invitation to American private initiative to join in this great adventure on a free-enterprise basis.

Now, Mr. President, with apologies to my colleagues for the length of this intrusion upon their good nature, I conclude. With a few desultory comments, I am done.

First. This act does not include some of our other unavoidable international obligations. We shall have to deal at this session with China, Greece, Turkey, and Trieste, and with the occupied areas for which we are responsible as a legacy from the war. These things must be remembered as we proceed. We must deal with over-all considerations. Particularly we must faithfully remember the superlative importance of effective solidarity in the Western Hemisphere in unhappy, uncertain days like these. Mutually happy and healthy Pan American relationships are indispensable. They must be conserved. It ought to be entirely possible to substantially improve these economical relationships through the triangular trade that should be possible of development in connection with this European recovery plan.

Second. This act largely depends for its success upon the quality of its administration. The choice of the administrator and his associates is one of the most solemn responsibilities that has ever confronted a President of the United States. I beg of the President to search for the best and to be satisfied with nothing less. This act is a challenge to the best brains and to the best experience in the Nation. They responded in the crises of war. I am sure they will respond in this crisis of peace. The cause is no less vital to our destiny.

Third. This act depends, again, for its success upon the prompt restoration of western Germany to an effective place in the economy of Europe and the world. It must be decentralized. It must be demilitarized for keeps. But it must be restored to decent hope and productivity. The western occupying powers must quit their indecision and put Germany wholesomely at work again without delay. The Ruhr alone could spell the difference between success and failure.

Fourth. This act depends also and equally upon the energy and devotion with which these western European nations pursue the integration which they have volunteered to seek. Our dollars cannot substitute, I say again, for their own will to make common cause for the mutual defense of their own welfare. We do not presume to dictate the formula. But we relentlessly recommend the objective. Standing together these nations can face every vicissitude with hope. Standing apart they may face collapse and even conquest. By its own warning, the wrecking crew awaits.

Fifth. This act seeks and depends upon peace. Peace requires the economic stabilities which are here addressed. Peace also depends upon security against aggression. Security depends upon preparedness. Preparedness depends upon rival arms until, dependably there is a better way. The better way is an undivided United Nations which is made to work in its present or some other form. Regional arrangements under its charter can promote security. Unselfish mutual defense pacts, such as we have repeatedly offered, can promote security. Global disarmament—on a basis of rigid, instant, and conclusive discipline against bad faith—is the best security guarantee of all. We and the peace-loving sectors of the world must struggle on toward these ideals.

Sixth. The act has the amazingly unified support, according to their official voices before our committee of practically all spokesmen in our own land for organized labor and capital and agriculture and industry, for veterans, for women's organizations, for American journalism and, by no means last, for the church. The friendly preponderance is overwhelming. I believe, Mr. President, that dynamic America is prepared to carry on.

Seventh. Whatever we are to do, Mr. President, let it be done without undue delay. Whatever our answer is to be, let it be made as swiftly as prudence will permit. The exposed frontiers of hazard move almost hourly to the west. Time is of the essence in this battle for peace, even as it is in the battles of a war. Nine months ago Czechoslovakia wanted to join western Europe in this great enterprise for stability and peace. Remember that. Today Czechoslovakia joins only such enterprise as Moscow may direct.

There is only one voice left in the world, Mr. President, which is competent to hearten the determination of the other nations and other peoples in western Europe to survive in their own choice of their own way of life. It is our voice. It is in part the Senate's voice. Surely we can all agree, whatever our shades of opinion, that the hour has struck for this voice to speak as soon as possible. I pray it speaks for weal and not for woe.

The committee has rewritten the bill to consolidate the wisdom shed upon the problem from many sources. It is the final product of 8 months of more intensive study by more devoted minds than I have ever known to concentrate upon any one objective in all my 20 years in Congress. It has its foes—some of whom compliment it by their transparent hatreds. But it has its friends—countless, prayerful friends not only at the hearthstones of America, but under many other flags. It is a plan for peace, stability, and freedom. As such, it involves the clear self-interest of the United States. It can be the turning point in history for 100 years to come. If it fails, we have done our final best. If it succeeds, our children and our children's children will call us blessed. May God grant His benediction upon the ultimate event. [Applause on the floor, Senators rising.]

779310—24184

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1949

11- Foreign Pol

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

FOR THE PRESS

MAY 14, 1948
No. 381

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE GEORGE C. MARSHALL ON WORLD TRADE WEEK

The observance of World Trade Week is to remind Americans that they are partners with other peoples in carrying on the world's business. Each of us is part of the network of world commerce through which we exchange the products of our labor with others. The more fully this universal system is developed, the greater will be the benefits to all.

No nation, no matter how generously endowed, is self-sufficient. Americans sometimes assume that because this country has great natural resources and a vast internal market for its products, we could proceed independent of the remainder of the world. That illusion was shattered by our recent experience when we were suddenly cut off from sources of vital materials.

We realize now, as never before, that this country is inevitably a part of a world-wide trading system. Other people need our products and we need theirs. This is more true today than ever before.

This country has a tremendous responsibility in utilizing its great influence in determining the course of world trade, with the fateful consequences for war or peace. Wise and constructive leadership on our part will influence others to act likewise. A retreat to the practices of economic nationalism could drive the world into another resort to economic warfare that would prove fatal to the peace.

These are some of the principal considerations that have caused the United States Government to take a leading part in an international program of economic cooperation, with emphasis on mutual help, increased productivity and the progressive reduction of trade barriers. The major effort along these lines, the European Recovery Program, was made necessary by the postwar distress the program is designed to remedy. Another chief element of our policy, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, antedates the war. It has been successfully employed for a number of years, and it remains the most important single factor in our long-range economic policy.

The future of mankind will depend to an important degree on how well society is able to satisfy the basic requirements of the people of the earth for food, shelter and the other necessities of life. The fullest possible development of world trade, with a minimum of restrictions and a maximum of opportunity for all is necessary. Our security as well as our prosperity is bound up in the ebb and flow of world trade.

* * *

11.- Foreign Policy

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

FOR THE PRESS

MAY 19, 1948
No. 392

The Department of State today made the following information available to the press in connection with the Stalin statement:

1. Reduction of Armaments

The problem of the regulation of conventional armaments was discussed in the 1946 General Assembly of the United Nations, and has since been under consideration in the Commission for Conventional Armaments of the Security Council.

2. Atomic Energy

In the field of atomic energy, agreement on an effective plan for international control has so far been blocked by the Soviet Union.

The presentation of the Third Report of the Commission marks the recognition of an impasse which has existed practically since the negotiations began almost two years and 220 meetings ago. Fourteen out of seventeen of the nations which are now or have been represented on the Commission are agreed on the basic and indispensable requirements of an international control plan; the Soviet Union, Poland and the Ukraine have been the only members of the Commission to disagree.

Despite its unceasing efforts, the Commission has now been forced to declare that: "It has been unable to secure the agreement of the Soviet Union to even those elements of effective control considered essential from the technical point of view, let alone their acceptance of the nature and extent of participation in the world community required of all nations in this field by the First and Second Reports of the Atomic Energy Commission." In this situation, the Commission has concluded that for the present no useful purpose could be served by carrying on negotiations at the Commission level and has referred the whole problem to the Security Council with a recommendation that it be forwarded to the General Assembly.

The conclusion that further work at the Commission level would be futile does not mean that the efforts to achieve international control of atomic energy are to be terminated, but it does mean that the Commission has recognized that factors necessary to bring about agreement on an effective system for the international control of atomic energy are outside the competence of the Commission. The United Nations is still confronted with the problem of international control of atomic energy and the United States Government is still ready to participate in genuinely effective control.

3. German Peace Settlement

By common agreement the question of a German peace settlement is one for the Council of Foreign Ministers. The Council has held two long meetings devoted to this subject. Soviet opposition to virtually every proposition put forward by the United States, Great Britain and France has thus far blocked all progress on this question.

4. Japanese Peace Settlement

In July 1947 the United States proposed to the ten other members of the Far Eastern Commission that a preliminary conference be held to discuss a peace treaty for Japan, the voting procedure of such a conference to be by two-thirds majority. Eight States indicated general agreement with this proposal. The Soviet Union held that the peace treaty problems should be considered by the Council of Foreign Ministers, composed in this instance of the United Kingdom, China, the U.S.S.R., and the United States. China proposed that the peace treaty be considered by a conference of the eleven Far Eastern Commission countries and that decisions be taken by a majority which must include the four powers named above. It has so far been impossible to resolve the conflict between these widely different concepts as to the basis on which the Japanese peace treaty conference should be convened.

5. Evacuation of Troops from China

As of March 31, 1948 there were stationed in China, of the armed forces of the United States, 1,496 army personnel and 4,125 navy and marine personnel. These forces remain in China at the request of the National Government.

6. Evacuation of Troops from Korea

With respect to the suggestion that United States and Soviet occupation forces be withdrawn from Korea, the United Nations General Assembly, by Resolution of November 14, 1947, recommended a plan for the early achievement of Korean independence, to be followed promptly by the withdrawal of all foreign armed forces.

The General Assembly constituted a United Nations Commission to assist in this program. The Ukraine was elected to membership on the Commission but refused to serve. The U.S.S.R. denied the United Nations Commission entry into the northern zone of Korea. It has not only refused to collaborate in any way in the implementation of the United Nations plan but has attempted to proceed unilaterally with a plan of its own which threatens to lead to civil war among the Koreans themselves.

7. Respect for National Sovereignty and Non-Interference in Domestic Affairs

The facts bearing on this subject are too voluminous for recapitulation here. The actions and policies of the two Governments in this respect are a matter of public record, and speak for themselves.

8. Military Bases

The policy of the United States in this respect has been governed by the unanimous resolution of the United Nations General Assembly of December 14, 1946, which makes the retention of armed forces on the territories of members conditional upon the freely and publicly expressed consent of such members. In accordance with Article 103 of the Charter, the United States has made it a practice to register with the United Nations the instruments of agreements. It is of interest to note that the United States has proposed in the Security Council that armed forces acting under the Security Council have unlimited rights of passage and rights to use bases wherever located. The U.S.S.R. has rejected this proposal.

9. International Trade

The representatives of twenty-three countries attended the session of the Preparatory Committee for the United Nations conference on trade and employment which was held in Geneva in the summer of 1947. The representatives of fifty-six nations participated in the final conference on trade and employment held in Havana, Cuba from November 1947 to March 1948. This Conference agreed upon the charter for an international trade organization, one of the main purposes of which is the elimination of all forms of discrimination in international trade. The Soviet Government declined to participate in either of these meetings.

10. Assistance to War-Devastated Countries

The aid being extended by the United States to other countries on a worldwide scale, through both United Nations channels and others, should be an adequate answer to this point. In the case of the European recovery program, in which the U.S.S.R. declined to participate, the proposal to create a new organization came from the participating European countries.

11. Human Rights

The United Nations turned to the question of human rights as one of its first tasks and its work in this field is well advanced. The Human Rights Commission, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, may shortly recommend a draft declaration and covenant on human rights to the Economic and Social Council and to the General Assembly. Since both the U.S.S.R. and the United States are active members of the Human Rights Commission, it is difficult to see how this matter could be advanced in any other forum. It lies in the nature of this subject that it is imminently a multilateral and international problem and both the Soviet Union and the United States have, in the United Nations Commission, a wholly adequate forum in which to put forward their views.

*****

May 19, 1948

RECEIVED
AUG 19 1948
Southern Regional Council

11- Foreign Policy

IMMEDIATE RELEASE JUNE 25, 1948

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

It is with very great reluctance that I have signed S. 2242, the Displaced Persons Act of 1948.

If the Congress were still in session, I would return this bill without my approval and urge that a fairer, more humane bill be passed. In its present form this bill is flagrantly discriminatory. It mocks the American tradition of fair play. Unfortunately, it was not passed until the last day of the session. If I refused to sign this bill now, there would be no legislation on behalf of displaced persons until the next session of the Congress.

It is a close question whether this bill is better or worse than no bill at all. After careful consideration I have decided, however, that it would not be right to penalize the beneficiaries of this bill on account of the injustices perpetrated against others who should have been included within its provisions. I have therefore signed the bill in the hope that its injustices will be rectified by the Congress at the first opportunity.

Americans of all religious faiths and political beliefs will find it hard to understand, as I do, why the 80th Congress delayed action on this subject until the end of this session, with the result that most attempts to improve the bill were frustrated.....

The 80th Congress certainly had ample time to produce a satisfactory bill. Eighteen months ago, in my State of the Union message, I stated that I did not feel that the United States had done its part in the admission of displaced persons. I pointed out that Congressional assistance in the form of new legislation was needed.

Six months later, on July 7, 1947, because the Congress had not yet acted, I sent a special message on the subject. I reminded the Congress: "We are dealing with a human problem, a world tragedy. . . . I urge the Congress to press forward with its consideration of this subject and to pass suitable legislation as speedily as possible." To my regret, the Congress adjourned last summer without passing any displaced persons legislation.

Again, on January 7, 1948, I urged the Congress "to pass suitable legislation at once so that this Nation may do its share in caring for homeless and suffering refugees of all faiths. I believe that the admission of these persons will add to the strength and energy of the Nation."

The Congress did not act "at once". The Senate Committee charged with the responsibility of rendering a report on January 10, 1948, asked for, and received, an extension to report on February 10. Instead of reporting on February 10 it reported on March 2. The bill which it finally reported, without a single public hearing, was roundly and deservedly criticized by all who were interested in achieving a fair solution of this problem. Through one device or another, debate on the bill by the Senate was postponed from the beginning of March until the end of May. The Senate bill was not passed until June 2. The House of Representatives in the meantime had delayed action and did not pass its bill until June 11. It was not until the last days of the session that the Senate and the House conferees met to put together a compromise.

The compromise

The compromise resulting from this hasty, last-minute action consisted largely of combining the worst features of both the Senate and House Bills.

I have analyzed closely the bill which was sent to me for signature. Its good points can be stated all too briefly: At long last, the principle is recognized that displaced persons should be admitted to the United States. Two hundred thousand displaced persons may be admitted in the next two years, as well as 2,000 recent Czech refugees and 3,000 orphans.

The bad points of the bill are numerous. Together they form a pattern of discrimination and intolerance wholly inconsistent with the American sense of justice.

The bill discriminates in callous fashion against displaced persons of the Jewish faith. This brutal fact cannot be obscured by the maze of technicalities in the bill or by the protestations of some of its sponsors.

The primary device used to discriminate against Jewish displaced persons is the provision restricting eligibility to those displaced persons who entered Germany, Austria, or Italy on or before December 22, 1945. Most of the Jewish displaced persons who had entered Germany, Austria, or Italy by that time have already left; and most of the Jewish displaced persons now in those areas arrived there after December 22, 1945, and hence are denied a chance to come to the United States under this bill. By this device more than 90 per cent of the remaining Jewish displaced persons are definitely excluded. Even the eligible 10 per cent are beset by numerous additional restrictions written into the bill.

For all practical purposes, it must be frankly recognized, therefore, that this bill excludes Jewish displaced persons, rather than accepting a fair proportion of them along with other faiths.

The bill also excludes many displaced persons of the Catholic faith who deserve admission. Many anti-communist refugees of Catholic faith fled into the American zones after December 22, 1945, in order to escape persecution in countries dominated by a communist form of government. These too are barred by the December 22, 1945, dateline.

It is inexplicable, except upon the abhorrent ground of intolerence, that this date should have been chosen instead of April 21, 1947, the date on which General Clay closed the displaced persons camps to further admissions.

The Jewish and Catholic displaced persons who found asylum in our zones between December 22, 1945, and April 21, 1947, who are wrongly excluded by this bill, fled their native countries for the same basic reasons as Balts who came before December 22, 1945, and Czechs who came after January, 1948, who are rightly included. I sincerely hope that the Congress will remedy this gross discrimination at its earliest opportunity.

There are many other seriously objectionable features in the bill. Some of these are as follows:

Except for orphans, the bill charges the displaced persons admitted under its provisions to future immigration quotas of their countries of birth, up to 50 per cent of the quota per year. Under this system, 50 per cent of some quotas will be "mortgaged" for generations. This is a most begrudging method of accepting useful and worthy people and will necessarily deprive many other worthy

worthy people of an opportunity to come to the United States in future years. Considering how few permanent immigrants were able to enter this country during the war, it would have been more equitable to admit the displaced persons as non-quota immigrants.

The bill requires that at least 40 per cent of the displaced persons allowed to enter this country must come from areas which have been "de facto annexed by a foreign power." This guarantees a disproportionately high percentage of persons from particular areas. It would have been fairer to provide instead for the admission of persons in proportion to the numbers of each group in the displaced persons camps.

The bill reflects a singular lack of confidence by the Congress in the capacity and willingness of the people of the United States to extend a welcoming hand to the prospective immigrants. It contains many restrictive requirements, such as prior assurances of suitable employment and "safe and sanitary housing," unnecessarily complicated investigation of each applicant, and burdensome reports from individual immigrants. I regret that the Congress saw fit to impose such niggardly conditions.

The bill submitted to me also emasculates the salutary provision of the House Bill which provided for the granting of permanent residence status to a maximum of 15,000 displaced persons who are already lawfully in this country. The bill now requires a concurrent resolution of the Congress in favor of each individual after his application has been approved by the Attorney General. This requirement has the effect of perpetuating the cumbersome practice of special action by the Congress to adjust the status of individual aliens.

I know what a bitter disappointment this bill is -- to the many displaced victims of persecution who looked to the United States for hope; to the millions of our citizens who wanted to help them in the finest American spirit; to the many members of the Congress who fought hard but unsuccessfully for a decent displaced persons bill. I hope that this bitter disappointment will not turn to despair.

I have signed this bill, in spite of its many defects, in order not to delay further the beginning of a resettlement program and in the expectation that the necessary remedial action will follow when the Congress reconvenes.

* * * * * * * *

United States Office
Preparatory Commission MIch. 8000.
INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION Ext. 7.
Room 819, 1344 Connecticut Avenue N.W.
Washington, D. C.

IRO NEWS DIGEST No. 13 30 June, 1948.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS OF THE DISPLACED PERSONS ACT OF 1948. (Public Law 774, 80th Congress.) AND DEFINITIONS OF ELIGIBILITY UNDER THE IRO CONSTITUTION

I. Number of Displaced Persons to be admitted

200,000 Displaced Persons and Refugees designated as eligible for IRO care under terms of the IRO Constitution.
2,000 Recent refugees from Czechoslovakia.
3,000 Displaced orphan children under the age of sixteen years.
15,000 Aliens now resident in the United States.

II. Eligibility Requirements

(a) Displaced Persons

To be eligible for admission to the United States a displaced person must:

1. Be included among those eligible for IRO assistance under terms of the IRO Constitution. (See IRO Definitions on Pages 4,5,6.)

2. Have entered Germany, Austria or Italy on or after September 1, 1939 and on or before December 22, 1945;

3. Have been in the Western Zones of Germany and Austria or in Italy on January 1, 1948; and

4. Be qualified for admission under immigration laws and regulations of the United States.

The spouse and unmarried dependent children of displaced persons eligible for admission will also be considered eligible for admission if they are otherwise qualified under immigration laws.

(b) Czech Refugees

To gain admission, the 2,000 Czech refugees included in the Act must:

Be natives who fled Czechoslovakia as a direct result of persecution or fear of persecution since January 1, 1948; and also have been in Italy or in the Western Zones of Germany or Austria on the effective date of the Act. In addition they must be qualified for admission into the United States under immigration laws and regulations of the United States. The spouse and unmarried dependent children of eligible Czech refugees may also be considered eligible if they qualify under the immigration laws.

(c) Orphan Children

Displaced orphan children to be admitted must:
1. Be under sixteen years of age;
2. Be qualified for admission under U.S. Immigration Laws;
3. Be orphaned due to the death or disappearance of both parents;
4. And, must have been in Italy or the Western Zones of Germany or Austria on the effective date of the Act.

(d) Resident

(d) Resident Aliens

Aliens now resident in the United States may be admitted to permanent residence if they:

1. Entered the United States prior to April 1, 1948;
2. Are otherwise admissible under the Immigration Laws;
3. Can establish the fact of lawful entry into the United States as non-immigrants or as non-quota immigrant students pursuant to applicable immigration laws;
4. Can establish the fact that they are displaced from country of birth or nationality or last residence as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of World War II and are unable to return to such countries because of persecution or fear of persecution on account of race, religion or political opinion.

Admission of aliens for permanent residence is dependent upon certification by the Attorney General to Congress that each individual is qualified for permanent residence under terms of the Act and is further dependent on passage of a Joint Resolution by Congress in each case, stating that Congress favors granting the status of permanent residence.

III. Conditions Governing Admission

In addition to eligibility requirements summarized above, the Act provides the following conditions which must be met before admission of a displaced person for permanent residence may be accomplished:

(a) Jobs and Housing

In the case of displaced persons and Czech refugees to be admitted under the Act, assurances must be given, in accordance with regulations of the Commission established to administer the Act, that each person admitted will be suitably employed without displacing some other person from employment, that each displaced person and his dependents will not become public charges and that they will have safe and sanitary housing without displacing some other person.

(b) National Origins

Forty per cent of all visas issued under the Act are available exclusively to eligible displaced persons whose place of origin or country of nationality has been annexed by a foreign power.

(c) Use of National Immigration Quotas

Although provision is made for issuance of two hundred and two thousand visas to displaced persons and Czech refugees within the two following fiscal years, the Act further provides that the quotas of the chargeable countries shall be mortgaged up to 50 per cent of the annual total for as many years as necessary to compensate for the numbers actually admitted.

(d) Provision

(d) Provision for Children

Displaced orphan children to be admitted under the Act specifically are exempted from the quota provisions applicable to other displaced persons and refugees. However, the Act provides that, before the children may be admitted, satisfactory assurances must be given that they will be cared for properly, in accordance with regulations of the Commission.

(e) Character Investigation

The Act provides that, before a displaced person or refugee may be accepted for admission, a thorough investigation and a written report shall be made regarding each individual's character, history and eligibility under the Act.

IV. Preferences and Priorities

In lieu of existing immigration preferences stated by law, the Act provides the following preferences:

1. First preference in immigration is given to persons previously engaged in agricultural pursuits and who will be engaged in agricultural pursuits upon admission to the United States. Not less than 30 per cent of all visas issued under the Act will be made available to this occupational group. Wives and unmarried dependent children of persons admitted under this preference will be counted as agriculturists.

2. Second preference is given to household, construction, clothing and garment workers or other workers needed in the locality in the United States in which they propose to reside. Also included in this preference group are persons possessing special educational, scientific, technological or professional qualifications.

3. Third preference is given to displaced persons who are blood relatives of citizens or lawfully admitted aliens in the United States.

Within the preferences stated in the Act, priorities are to be given to persons who, during World War II, bore arms against the enemies of the United States and to persons who were, on January 1, 1948, living in displaced persons camps and assembly centers. Provision is made that in exceptional cases visas may be issued to persons otherwise eligible who are located outside the camps.

V. Administration

The Act provides for the establishment of a Displaced Persons Commission consisting of three members to be appointed by the President with approval of the Senate, one member to be designated as Chairman. The Commission will be responsible for formulating and issuing regulations necessary for promulgation of the Act and for developing and implementing plans and regulations designed to achieve general settlement and distribution throughout the United States and its territories and possessions of persons admitted. The Commission is also responsible for reporting to Congress and the President on the manner in which the law is being carried out and on the status of displaced persons admitted under its terms.

Other Governmental functions necessary to the implementation of the Act will be performed by regularly established agencies of the Government. These functions will include selection, screening and processing of persons to be admitted, issuance of visas and implementation of regular immigration procedures.

/ more

VI. Reporting of Status

Each displaced person admitted, with the expeption of dependent children, will be required to report on his employment and residence to the Displaced Persons Commission every six months for the first two years of residence in the United States.

VII. Revocation of the "Truman Directive."

Beginning July 1, 1948, displaced persons are no longer granted preference or priority under the regular immigration laws because of their status as displaced persons. This provision nullifies an Executive Order issued in December, 1945 which granted immigration preference to bona fide displaced persons.

VIII. Admission of Volkedeutche

Included in the Displaced Persons Act is a provision which will make immigration visas available to the so-called "Volksdeutche" --persons of German ethnic origin who were born in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania or Yugoslavia and who are residing in Germany and Austria on the effective date of the Act. To accomodate these persons, the German and Austria quotas are reactivated with the proviso that 50% of the visas issued in the two year fiscal period beginning July 1, 1948 shall be reversed for the Vooksdeutche from the above-named countries.

IRO DEFINITIONS OF DISPLACED PERSONS

A displaced person eligible for admission in the United States is defined by the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 as "any displaced person or refugee as defined in Annex I of the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization and who is the concern of the International Refugee Organization." The pertinent section of Annex I of the IRO Constitution is quoted below to indicate the specific classes of displaced persons who will be eligible under this definition. Also quoted is Part II of Annex I in which are listed certain categories of individuals who are not eligible for IRO assistance. (It should be noted that the Czech refugees admissible under Section 12 of the Act are not included among persons eligible for IRO assistance).

PART I.
Refugees and Displaced Persons Within the Meaning of the Resolution Adopted by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations on 15 February 1946.
SECTION A - DEFINITION OF REFUGEES

1. Subject to the provisions of section C and D and of Part II of this Annex, the term "refugee" applies to a person who has left, or who is outside of, his country of nationality or of former habitual residence, and who, whether or not he had retained his nationality, belongs to one of the following categories:
(a) victims of the nazi or fascist regimes or of regimes which took part on their side in the second world war, or of the quisling or similar regimes which assisted them against the United Nations, whether enjoying international status as refugees or not;
(b) Spanish Repbulicans and other victims of the Falangist regime in Spain, whether enjoying international status as refugees or not;
(c) persons who were considered refugees before the outbreak of the second world war, for reasons of race, religion, nationality or political opinion.

2. Subject to the provision of Sections C and D and of Part II of this Annex regarding the exclusion of certain categories of persons, including war criminals, quislings and traitors, from the benefits of the Organization, the term "refugee" also applies to a person, other than a displaced person as defined in section B of this Annex, who is outside of his country of nationality or former habitual residence, and who, as a result of events subsequent to the outbreak of the second world war, is unable or unwilling to avail himself of the protedtion of the Government of his country of nationality or former nationality.

/more

3. Subject to the provisions of section D and of Part II of this Annex, the term "refugee" also applies to persons who, having resided in Germany or Austria and being of Jewish origin or foreigners or stateless persons, were victims of Nazi persecution and were detained in, or were obliged to flee from, and were subsequently returned to, one of those countries as a result of enemy action, or of war circumstances, and have not yet been firmly re-settled therein.

4. The term "refugee" also applies to unaccompanied children who are war orphans or whose parents have disappeared, and who are outside their countries of origin. Such children, 16 years of age or under, shall be given all possible priority assistance, including, normally, assistance in repatriation in the case of those whose nationality can be determined.

SECTION B - DEFINITION OF DISPLACED PERSONS

The term "displaced person" applies to a person who, as a result of the actions of the authorities of the regimes mentioned in Part I, section A, paragraph 1 (a) of this Annex has been deported from, or has been obliged to leave his country of nationality or of former habitual residence, such as persons who were compelled to undertake forced labour or who were deported for racial, religious or political reasons. Displaced persons will only fall within the mandate of the Organization subject to the provisions of sections C and D of Part I and to the provisions of Part II of this Annex. If the reasons for their displacement have ceased to exist, they should be repatriated as soon as possible in accordance with article 2, paragraph 1 (a) of this Constitution, and subject to the provision of paragraph (c), sub-paragraphs (ii) and (iii) of the General Assembly resolution of 12 February 1946 regarding the problem of refugees (Annex III).

SECTION C - CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH REFUGEES AND DISPLACED PERSONS WILL BECOME THE CONCERN OF THE ORGANIZATION. (SUMMARIZED).

All displaced persons and refugees included in the IRO definitions will be the concern of the Organization if they:

1. Can be repatriated and the help of the Organization is required to provide for their repatriation.
2. Have definitely expressed valid objections to repatriation after having received adequate information concerning conditions existing in their countries of origin.

Spanish Republican refugees will be the doncern of the Organization so long as the Falangist regime in Spain continues.

SECTION D, ANNEX I - CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH REFUGEES AND DISPLACED PERSONS WILL CEASE TO BE THE CONCERN OF THE ORGANIZATION

Refugees or displaced persons will cease to be the concern of the Organization:

(a) when they have returned to the countries of their nationality in United Nations territory, unless their former habitual residence to which they wish to return is outside their country of nationality; or
(b) when they have acquired a new nationality; or
(c) when they have, in the determination of the Organization become otherwise firmly established; or

/more

(d) when they have unreasonably refused to accept the proposals of the Organiz tion for their re-settlement or repatriation; or
(e) when they are making no substantial effort towards earning their living when it is possible for them to do so, or when they are exploiting the assistance of the Organization.

PART II

Persons Who Will Not Be the Concern of the Organization.

1. War criminals, quislings and traitors.
2. Any other persons who can be shown:
(a) to have assisted the enemy in persecuting civil populations of countries, Members of the United Nations; or
(b) to have voluntarily assisted the enemy forces since the outbreak of the second world war in their operations against the United Nations.*
3. Ordinary criminals who are extraditable by treaty.
4. Persons of German ethnic origin, whether German nationals or members of German minorities in other countries, who:
(a) have been or may be transferred to Germany from other countries;
(b) have been, during the second world war, evacuated from Germany to other countries;
(c) have fled from, or into, Germany, or from their places of residence into countries other than Germany in order to avoid falling into the hands of Allied armies.
5. Persons who are in receipt of financial support and protection from their country of nationality, unless their country of nationality requests international assistance for them.
6. Persons, who, since the end of hostilities in the second world war:
(a) have participated in any organization having as one of its purposes the overthrow by armed force of the Government of their Country of origin, being a Member of the United Nations; or the overthrow by armed force of the Government of any other Member of the United Nations, or have participated in any terrorist organization;
(b) have become leaders of movements hostile to the Government of their country of origin being a Member of the United Nations or sponsors of movements encouraging refugees not to return to their country of origin;
(c) at the time of application for assistance, are in the military or civil service of a foreign State.

*Mere continuance of normal and peaceful duties, not performed with the specific purpose of aiding the enemy against the Allies or against the civil population of territory in enemy occupation, shall not be considered to constitute "voluntary assistance." Nor shall acts of general humanity, such as care of wounded or dying, be so considered except in cases where help of this nature given to enemy nationals could equally well have been given to Allied nationals and was purposely withheld from them.

##########################

Foreign Affairs Outlines

BUILDING THE Peace

RECEIVED SEP 29 1948 Southern Regional Council

PREPARED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE • SUMMER 1948 • No. 18

A Charter for World Prosperity— The How and Why of the ITO

The drafting of a Charter for an International Trade Organization as a new specialized agency of the United Nations was completed by the representatives of 57 nations at Habana in March 1948. Acceptance of the Charter and membership in the proposed organization are now being studied by at least 54 governments, including that of the United States. Whether this country ratifies the Charter and enters the ITO will be for the decision of the American people acting through their Congress.

Approval of the Charter and acceptance of membership in ITO would be a logical continuation of United States economic policy. The Charter was developed on the basis of proposals made by the United States to other governments in November 1945. Moreover, the aims of the Charter are closely related to the traditional objectives of American economic policy—the reduction of trade barriers and the encouragement of the "open door" in world trade.

In the view of the United States a healthy world trade, like the trade of a city or a state, should be soundly based on the advantages of geography, labor, materials, and skills and conducted under a code of principles which offers equal competitive opportunity to all nations. The ITO Charter is proof that most nations share this view. But today many countries, by reason of war damage and vast economic dislocations, are unable to engage in an open system of trade. They have surrounded their economies by restrictive barriers and rigid controls that put trade virtually on the antiquated basis of barter. In many instances there has been no alternative. But if these measures are not progressively relaxed as emergency situations are overcome they are certain to retard world prosperity and may eventually endanger good international relations.

Existing conditions in the world economy raise some serious questions for the United States. The American people are spending billions of dollars annually to help other countries back on their feet. But what happens when this job is done? Does the world return to the disorganized, nationalistic measures of the years preceding the war? Will it, instead, freeze into the narrow, restrictive pattern of emergency controls? Or will it make a fresh start toward an open, cooperative system? The United States can exert a powerful and perhaps decisive influence on the choice that is made. There should be no question about the alternative this Nation prefers.

THE UNITED STATES LOOKS AHEAD

The choice of vigorously encouraging an open system of world trade is consistent with our traditional policy and present efforts to meet the dangers of the world situation. We are taking concrete steps to bring about international commercial relations that will help to make possible greater production, increased employment, a wider exchange and use of goods, and higher living standards in all countries. Through individual trade and tariff agreements with 42 countries, through support of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the Food and Agriculture Organization, and other United Nations agencies, through privately sponsored relief and private investments, through loans to individual countries, the European Recovery Program, and other measures of assistance we have moved to bring the world back to economic health. Ahead of us is the problem of insuring that the gains resulting from these efforts will be sustained over many years in order that we may fully share in the general benefits. Failure to meet this problem would place a heavy discount on prospective returns from our efforts to date.

In 1948 the United States is in a fortunate yet difficult position. It is the only great power whose productive capacity has emerged from the war undamaged and expanded. Production and employment have reached unprecedented levels. The creditor status of the United States has no parallel in history. In contrast, most of the other nations which held ranking positions in the world economy before the war are now in economic distress. They are short of food for their workers, raw materials for their industries, dollars for their foreign purchases. Some lack even the means of rebuilding their devastated areas, and large segments of their populations have scarcely the minimum essentials of shelter, food, and clothing.

799536°—48

In this situation there are potential dangers for the United States which will continue if the programs for neutralizing them are not carried through. First, there is the implied threat to world peace. Hunger and economic chaos are the favorite hunting grounds of violent political minorities. If continued unrest permitted them to seize power, their violence would become national violence directed abroad at the most obvious targets. In these circumstances it is doubtful that the United States could long continue to exist peacefully as a single island of prosperity in a poverty-stricken world. Second, the loss or permanent reduction of markets abroad would affect American prosperity. It would be economically unsound to suppose that the United States could long maintain its present economic pace without huge imports and without the stimulation and outlets of a healthy world trade. Third, there is the danger that the restrictive, governmental controls now in operation as emergency devices will become entrenched and thereby jeopardize the future of our economic system, based as it is on private, competitive enterprise.

The outlines of a successful response to this challenge are clear: The continued security and prosperity of the United States can be achieved only through a major program of economic assistance, geared into a still larger plan for the expansion of world trade on the basis of fair dealing and equal competitive opportunity. An emphasis on higher productivity and expanded trade rather than on relief alone is a keynote in American policy.

AID TO EUROPE

The United States acted promptly and generously to relieve the human distress left in the wake of World War II. Some 20 billion dollars were made available for foreign relief and reconstruction. The United States, for example, shouldered the major share of the costs of the UNRRA program. By 1947, however, it became clear to the nations of western Europe that something more than individual relief and reconstruction aid was needed. An unusually bitter winter followed by a severe drought and failing crops emphasized the thin margin of economic safety on which Europe was operating. Political unrest and increased activity by Communist groups accompanied this threat of continued hunger. With so little reserve strength, accident or continued agitation could readily push the nations over the danger line into political and economic chaos.

It was also clear that the needs of Europe would remain acute for some time. Secretary Marshall said of them in June 1947: "The truth of the matter is that Europe's requirements for the next three or four years of foreign food and other essential products—principally from America—are so much greater than her present ability to pay that she must have substantial . . . help or face economic, social, and political deterioration of a very grave character." But it was also clear that piecemeal aid to tide the European nations over their crisis would not bring sustained recovery or political stability.

What was needed was a broader, long-range plan of self-help. Somehow the initiative, leadership, and energies of Europe's own peoples had to be linked with American aid of a fundamental character to restore Europe to a self-sustaining economy on which the individual freedoms would be solidly based. The solution was the unique European Recovery Program which has now swung into action. The program was developed from a suggestion made by Secretary Marshall that the countries of Europe, with the friendly aid and support of the United States, act as an economic unit to get back on their feet. Sixteen nations are now cooperating to increase and coordinate production, to stabilize their currencies, to reduce the barriers to trading among themselves, and to share on the basis of productive use their output of raw materials and industrial goods.

One result of a successful program will be a genuine improvement of trading relations in western Europe. The U.S. Congress in passing the Economic Assistance Act and setting up the Economic Cooperation Administration required, at the request of the President, that individual agreements be reached with the countries receiving United States aid. A stipulation in each of these agreements is that the country concerned make provisions for "cooperating with other participating countries in facilitating and stimulating an increasing interchange of goods and services among the participating countries and with other countries and cooperating to reduce barriers to trade among themselves and with other countries."

The relations between the European Recovery Program and the broad aims of American economic policy mark out a definite course of action. The program itself is an indispensable step toward world recovery, but the economic gains and trading improvements which it promises can be made permanent only by gearing the program into a framework of world trade that will permit a broad and sustained expansion of commerce among nations.

The U.S. Government has acted vigorously along these lines and has achieved much. Through a coordinated program based on full support of and active cooperation in the European Recovery Program, the conclusion of individual trade agreements under the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and the adoption of the objectives and principles of the ITO Charter,

Purpose and Objectives of the ITO Charter

Article 1

RECOGNIZING the determination of the United Nations to create conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations, THE PARTIES to this Charter undertake in the fields of trade and employment to co-operate with one another and with the United Nations

For the Purpose of

Realizing the aims set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, particularly the attainment of the higher standards of living, full employment and conditions of economic and social progress and development, envisaged in Article 55 of that Charter.

TO THIS END they pledge themselves, individually and collectively, to promote national and international action designed to attain the following objectives:

1. To assure a large and steadily growing volume of real income and effective demand, to increase the production, consumption and exchange of goods, and thus to contribute to a balanced and expanding world economy.

2. To foster and assist industrial and general economic development, particularly of those countries which are still in the early stages of industrial development, and to encourage the international flow of capital for productive investment.

3. To further the enjoyment by all countries, on equal terms, of access to the markets, products and productive facilities which are needed for their economic prosperity and development.

4. To promote on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis the reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade and the elimination of discriminatory treatment in international commerce.

5. To enable countries, by increasing the opportunities for their trade and economic development, to abstain from measures which would disrupt world commerce, reduce productive employment or retard economic progress.

6. To facilitate through the promotion of mutual understanding, consultation and co-operation the solution of problems relating to international trade in the fields of employment, economic development, commercial policy, business practices and commodity policy.

ACCORDINGLY they hereby establish the INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION through which they shall co-operate as Members to achieve the purpose and the objectives set forth in this Article.

the United States can look ahead with confidence to the realization of its policy aims. The General Agreement represents an immediate attack on trade barriers; the Charter of ITO provides the broad framework for a continuing program to liberate and expand international trade.

PERMANENT POLICY—A CHARTER FOR WORLD TRADE

The ITO Charter is designed to provide a constitution for world trade and thereby strengthen the foundations of the United Nations. Within the framework of ITO the economic foreign policy of the United States can be exercised with certainty and effectiveness to promote the economic welfare of this Nation and others.

The Charter was not hastily drafted; it is the result of years of work by economic and legal experts and discussions among the representatives of many countries. Its main principles are firmly rooted in the traditions of American foreign policy; moreover the United States took a leading part in shaping its basic ideas and proposing them to other governments.

The lend-lease agreements with our Allies contained, in article VII, a mutual pledge to bring about a new and better world economic order after the war. It provided that, together with other like-minded countries, we would work for "the expansion, by appropriate international and domestic measures, of production, employment and the exchange and consumption of goods, which are the material foundations of the liberty and welfare of all peoples; . . . the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce, and . . . the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers".

In 1945 the United States spelled out this pledge in more detail in its Proposals for Expansion of World Trade and Employment. Our Proposals were supported in principle by Great Britain, France, Canada, and other countries. Soon afterward the United Nations Economic and Social Council sponsored the development of an International Trade Organization as part of the United Nations. After several preliminary meetings, a Conference on Trade and Employment was convened at Habana and drafted the Charter which is now before the governments of 54 countries for approval in accordance with their constitutional procedures. In the United States, the Charter will be presented to the Congress.

One purpose of this outline is to acquaint the American people with the ITO project in order that they may give full consideration to it. Since ITO cannot succeed without participation by the United States, our decision on this matter will be fully as important in the economic field as our decision on the Charter of the United Nations following the San Francisco conference in 1945. The Charter of ITO in respect to international economic relations is similar in scope and purpose to the Charter of the United Nations in the broader field of international political and social relations.

"OPEN" vs. "CLOSED"

The over-all purpose of the Charter is to establish and maintain by mutual agreement an "open" or multilateral system of trade relations between members of ITO and to expand on businesslike principles the trade of each member with all other members. The opposite objective calls for numerous "closed" economies, each of which conducts foreign trade under strict governmental control in accordance with short-term agreements based on planned "barter" with politically selected countries.

The United States has traditionally favored the open or multilateral system as opposed to the bilateral, and most other countries share our objective, as indicated, for example, by their pledges in article VII of the lend-lease agreements. This is fortunate, because the future of our economic system of free enterprise is intimately related to the choice that we and the rest of the world make between these two alternative systems of trade. In the absence of a framework for world trade that will prevent mounting trade barriers, nationalistic discriminations, and overhanging threats of economic warfare, it will be difficult to maintain the kind of domestic economic order which we in the United States prefer. A brief review of some of the features of the Charter will help to show how ITO can do this job.

BASIC PRINCIPLES

The basic principles of the Charter are expressed in three key provisions which call for: (1) equal treatment by each member of the commerce of other members; (2) reduction of tariffs and elimination of trade preferences through bargaining procedures similar to those under the Trade Agreements Act of the United States; (3) general elimination of quantitative restrictions, i.e. trade barriers that consist of governmental regulations specifying the amounts of any product that can enter or leave the country during a certain period of time.

These key provisions are applied in the Charter to many problems of international trade. For example, state-trading enterprises (i.e. those operated or controlled by governments) must behave in world markets in accordance with principles of the Charter. Members of ITO must also prevent restrictive business practices, such as those carried on by cartels, that interfere with the principles of the Charter. Members agree to simplify their customs procedures, thus eliminating much of the red tape that now makes it difficult to do international business. Members may also form customs unions for the purpose of enlarging the areas of the world within which trade barriers will be eliminated, thereby securing for smaller nations the benefits of a greater free market such as we enjoy on much of this continent.

A REALISTIC DOCUMENT

The Charter is a realistic document designed to cope with the practical facts of the world. It recognizes that many countries are not immediately able to carry out some of its strict principles in every particular. Allowance is therefore made for certain extenuating circumstances, particularly with regard to the use of "quantitative restrictions". A country has the right under the Charter to use import quotas to "ration" its expenditures on imports if it is seriously short of foreign currencies. However, the findings of the International Monetary Fund will be conclusive as to the monetary facts of each case, and import controls must be removed as soon as the situation permits.

Also, in the interest of underdeveloped countries, the Charter provides that restrictions may, for a limited time, be placed on imports of a product if this is necessary to develop a new industry. But such action is subject to detailed control by ITO and cannot be taken with respect to any product covered by a trade agreement unless the other party to the agreement consents.

World prices of certain raw materials may be liable to exaggerated price declines which work serious hardships to producers throughout the world. The Charter permits members to enter into commodity agreements designed to correct such economic maladjustments. Consuming countries must, however, be given an equal voice in these agreements, and they are subject to a number of additional standards to make sure that they conform to the principles of the Charter.

The Charter provides in various ways for stimulating the expansion of production. For example, one of its objectives is the development of the resources of areas now less highly developed than the industrialized nations of western Europe and North America. ITO, in cooperation with other international agencies, may advise members as to their plans for economic development and help them procure technical advice and assistance. The Charter also seeks to encourage the international flow of capital for productive purposes by providing essential elements of security for foreign investors. Members must not take unreasonable or unjustifiable action injurious to the rights or interests of nationals of other members in the enterprise, skills, capital, or technology which they have supplied.

A VOLUNTARY COMPACT

The ITO is in no sense a superstate. It is a voluntary compact between nations, based on the principle of sovereign equality and organized along democratic lines. Its main governing body, the Conference, consists of all members, each of whom has one vote and none the right of veto. Many functions of the Conference are or may be delegated to an Executive Board having 18 seats, 8 of which will be filled by the countries of chief economic importance. The United States is thus assured permanent representation. The remaining 10 seats will be filled periodically by vote of the Conference.

One of the major functions of the Organization is the settlement of differences between members, to avoid resort to the economic welfare which frequently results from retaliatory measures taken by one country against the actions of another. Under ITO, members may not have recourse to such unilateral measures but may settle their differences in accordance with the procedures provided in the Charter.

Another main function of the Organization is to administer the provisions of the Charter which set forth qualifications to the basic rules. There are numerous situations calling for the exercise of discretion by ITO, in accordance with prescribed standards, to determine whether a member is justified in taking certain proposed measures. The Charter also provides that after five years the members will meet to review the entire document and make such modifications as appear desirable in the light of experience. These features introduce a necessary and desirable element of flexibility into the Charter and enable it to be adapted to the numerous and changing conditions of the modern world.

FRONTAL ATTACK: THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

In 1947, while the drafting of the ITO Charter was in progress, the United States initiated a program for the immediate reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers. In accordance with the Trade Agreements Act we entered into negotiations at Geneva with each of 22 nations to reduce tariffs on a selective product-by-product basis. Most of these 22 nations also conducted similar negotiations with each other. The agreed tariff rates, applying to some 45,000 items, were then incorporated into one inclusive document known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

This agreement is a landmark in international commercial history. The countries that participated in the negotiations conduct over three fourths of the world's trade. Benefits have already been felt by consumers and producers. As shortages of production and of foreign exchange disappear, these benefits will be more fully realized and the agreement will have the effect of stimulating trade all around the world.

The following facts illustrate the importance of the agreement for American trade. The United States obtained tariff concessions from other countries on products that accounted for 1.4 billion dollars' worth of our exports as of 1939. On farm products, we obtained concessions on fruits, wheat and other grains, lard, rice, tobacco, soy beans, and cotton, all exported by the United States in substantial quantities. Concessions were also obtained on automobiles, industrial machinery, electrical machinery and appliances, agricultural machinery, office machinery, and other important products of American industry. Concessions took the form of tariff reductions and tariff bindings, i.e. an agreement not to increase rates of duty. They also took the form of reductions or eliminations of tariff preferences, i.e. the application of lower duties to certain "preferred" countries. Such preferences have often meant in the past that American goods were charged a higher duty than like products of "preferred" countries and were therefore largely shut out from some large, potential markets.

In exchange for these and other concessions, the United States reduced duties on imports valued at some 500 million dollars in 1939, continued unchanged duties on imports valued at 130 million dollars in that year, and agreed to continue free entry, as fixed by Congress, of products imported to a value of 1.1 billion dollars in 1939.

By stimulating imports as well as exports, the agreements concluded by the United States will help restore healthier and better balanced conditions in its foreign trade. Increased imports will also work to hold down price inflation at home. To the extent that areas receiving assistance from the United States are able to increase their exports to us and to other countries, their need for such assistance will diminish in the future.

A COORDINATED PROGRAM AND AN ACTIVE POLICY

International trade problems are many and complex, and the means to cope with them are far from simple. The United States is one of the few nations, and the only great power, fortunate enough to be in a position to take the initiative in pressing forward on a coherent long-range program. Free of general necessity for using quotas, blocked currencies, and other emergency controls, it can direct its efforts and those of other nations toward correcting the conditions which lead to the adoption of restrictive measures. By continued vigorous action it can lay the groundwork for a new pattern of world trade that will have as its objective an expanding world economy with open markets, equal competitive opportunity, and the expansion of production and consumption of goods in all nations.

The program now under way is geared for action on four levels: (1) action through the European Recovery Program designed to help Europe achieve for itself, in the language of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, "a healthy economy independent of extraordinary outside assistance"; (2) action through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade designed to achieve immediate reduction of some of the barriers that hinder the world circulation of goods; (3) action designed to support the Ito Charter and encourage its adoption as a permanent framework of rules for the conduct of world trade; (4) action through the United Nations and its specialized agencies designed to help bring about the growth of free institutions, the free interchange of information, persons, and services, and the economic, social, and political improvements which are necessary to peaceful commerce.

To maintain its effectiveness, this program must move ahead promptly. General world economic conditions are still flexible, but very soon the nations must choose between two alternatives: Either there will be cooperation to expand trade and production or there will be a growing conflict of national policies that will lead to dangerous international tensions and the retarding of living standards everywhere. The United States has chosen the way of cooperation. The continued force of its example can be the deciding factor in a turn toward peace and world prosperity.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE PUBLICATION 3243
COMMERCIAL POLICY SERIES 115

Released August 1948

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1948

11- Foreign Affairs Highlights

RECEIVED
MAY 9 1949
Southern Regional Council

FOREIGN AFFAIRS HIGHLIGHTS

Division of Public Liaison, Department of State

MAY 1, 1949 WASHINGTON, D. C.

On April 8, the Foreign Ministers of the U.S., United Kingdom and France announced that they had reached complete agreement with regard to the whole range of issues pending in connection with Germany. It was also announced that the text of an Occupation Statute had been transmitted to the German Parliamentary Council meeting at Bonn to plan the German Republic. Agreement was reached on the basic principles to govern the exercise of Allied powers and responsibilities and also the tripartite Allied control machinery. The Foreign Ministers confirmed and approved agreements on the subject of plant dismantling, prohibited and restricted industries and the establishment of an International Ruhr Authority.

GERMANY

The Occupation Statute defines the powers to be retained by the occupation authorities upon the establishment of the German Federal Republic and sets forth basic procedures for the operation of Allied supervision. Subject only to the limitations of the Statute, the German Federal State and the participating Laender will have full legislative, executive and judicial powers, in accordance with the Basic Law and with their respective constitutions. The Statute aims to permit the German people to exercise democratic self-government. Provision is made for a review of the terms of the Statute after a year in force.

The Trizonal Fusion Agreement, outlining the control responsibilities of each of the 3 occupying powers, will be initiated before the effective date of the Occupation Statute, and complete trizonal fusion will follow with the establishment of the German Federal Government. The Fusion Agreement covers the establishment of the Allied High Commission, composed of a Commissioner from each occupying power, and the integration of the functions of this Commission with the Occupation Statute and international agreements. It also details the voting procedure within the Commission and means whereby any one Commissioner can appeal to his government. It specifies that in order to permit the Federal German Republic to exercise increased responsibilities on domestic affairs and to reduce the burden of occupation costs, staff personnel of the Commission shall be kept to a minimum. Military Government as such will be terminated and the functions of the Allied authorities will become mainly supervisory.

PALESTINE

An armistice agreement was signed on April 3 between Israel and Transjordan after more than a month of negotiation. Thus, all the Arab states bordering Israel, excepting Syria, have signed armistice documents as a major step toward a permanent peace settlement in Palestine. Syria began armistice negotiations early in April.

While the truce enforcement has been charged to the UN Truce Commission and to the Acting Mediator, and the armistice negotiations have been conducted by the Mediator, the larger task of finding a final settlement to the Palestine problem falls to the Conciliation Commission for Palestine, established by the UN General Assembly resolution of December 11, 1948. Composed of France, Turkey and the U.S., the Conciliation Commission has been meeting with representatives of Israel and the Arab states during the past 2 months to find a solution to the serious refugee problem, reach a final territorial settlement and discuss the future status of Jerusalem.

WORLD TRADE

On April 11, representatives of 34 nations began negotiations at Annecy, France to lower or eliminate barriers to international trade. These negotiations are being carried out under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which was originally signed by 23 nations at Geneva in 1947. At that conference, the contracting nations also concluded 123 bilateral negotiations to reduce tariffs and tariff preferences, quantitative restrictions and other trade barriers. The tariff concessions which these countries negotiated among themselves were embodied in the General Agreement and have since been put into operation by all of them. Eleven of the countries represented at the conference are newcomers to the negotiations, all having stated their intention of acceding to the General Agreement. Each of the 23 contracting parties can negotiate with each of the 13 acceding countries, and the newcomers with each other. The Annecy meeting is expected to last 3 months.

INDONESIA

On April 14 representatives of the Netherlands and the Republic of Indonesia recommenced negotiations in Batavia under the auspices of the UN Commission for Indonesia. This is the first official conference between representatives of the 2 governments since the Netherlands "police action" of December 18, 1948. The U.S. representatives reported that the talks opened in a cordial atmosphere. The Netherlands Delegation is headed by Dr. J. H. van Royen and the Republican one by Mohammed Roem. The current talks are preparatory to the convocation of a round-table conference at The Hague proposed by Netherlands officials to arrange for transfer of Netherlands sovereignty to a representative federal government in Indonesia at an early date. President Soekarno announced the Republic would favor participation in the proposed conference provided its administration be restored to Jogjakarta and that the UN Commission for Indonesia participate in the conference. When the question of UN Commission participation was referred to the Security Council, the Council adopted a Canadian proposal requesting the Council's President to send a message to the Commission for Indonesia instructing it to assist both parties in reaching agreement on the arrangements for the restoration of republican administration to Jogjakarta and for holding the The Hague conference. The Batavia meetings are an outcome of this directive.

INTERNATIONAL COURT

On April 9, the UN International Court of Justice handed down its first decision. The United Kingdom had sued Albania for damages resulting from the mining of 2 British destroyers in the Corfu Channel on October 22, 1946. Britain held that Albania was liable under international law for the damage and loss of life and the issues were considered by a Committee of the UN Security Council, but were never resolved. Last year the disputing nations agreed to abide by whatever decision the International Court would give, although Albania is not a member of the UN. The Court held Albania responsible but did not assess damages, deciding to hold further hearings if the 2 parties accept its competence to assess the amount. It held also that British vessels on one occasion had violated Albanian sovereignty but that the declaration to this effect by the Court had constituted adequate satisfaction to Albania.

The 2nd Advisory Opinion of the Court was handed down on April 12. The opinion was rendered at the request of the General Assembly on the question whether the UN could sue governments for injury caused to the Organization or any of its agents in the discharge of UN functions. The Court held unanimously that the UN could claim compensation from any government, whether it is a member of the UN or not, for any damage incurred by the Organization when the government is legally responsible for injury to an agent of the UN.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The UN General Assembly reconvened at Lake Success on Apirl 5 to take up matters not completed at the session in Paris last fall, as well as some new items. The UN Guard Force proposal has been referred to a special committee for study, while Israel's membership application was referred to the Political Committee. The 3 draft conventions on freedom of information are being discussed in the Social, Humanitarian and Cultural Committee, and debate is still continuing on the problem of the Italian colonies, whose return Italy has requested. The General Assembly has been given authority in this respect in view of the agreement of the 4 powers in the Italian peace treaty to abide by a General Assembly decision in the event they were unable to reach agreement among themselves.

A resolution was adopted on April 14 providing for a policy of gradual liberalization of the voting procedures of the Security Council, with the Soviet block objecting. The resolution recommends restriction of the veto's use on 34 types of decisions which are considered procedural. It also recommends that the major powers agree voluntarily among themselves to restrict the veto on certain substantive matters, particularly those involving the admission of new UN members and the pacific settlement of disputes. Other major items on the General Assembly agenda are: the Mindszenty case; the question of Spain; the treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa; and Indonesia.

STATUS OF WOMEN

The UN Commission on Status of Women concluded a 2-week session at Beirut on Apirl 4. Major interest centered on a U.S. proposal for a convention on the nationality of married women, on which preliminary studies indicate a variety of hardships arising from conflicts in law. A U.S. resolution calling attention to the worldwide shortage of health-workers, especially nurses, won unanimous support, except from the USSR. Belgium and Chile were congratulated for extending suffrage to women and the situation was reviewed in the 20 some nations which still deny women a voice in governing. The Secretary General was requested to report on the extent to which women are being appointed to key posts on the UN Secretariat and on delegations of members to the UN agencies. The Commission reviewed the recent action in the UN Economic and Social Council and International Labor Organization on equal pay for women, recommended equal opportunities for training and promotion, and invited UNESCO to cooperate in examining discrimination against women in regard to educational and professional opportunities. The governments of Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Iran, Greece and Turkey met in a regional conference during the session to discuss questions relating to women's status in the Middle East.

ROUNDUP Newly organized UN International Law Commission opens 1st session at Lake Success to launch 3-year program for codification of international law....Dr. Martha M. Eliot, Associate Chief, U.S. Children's Bureau, appointed Assistant Director-General World Health Organization....President signs 15-month Marshall Plan extension....UN Commission on Human Rights opens 6-week session at Lake Success May 9 to continue drafting of International Covenant on Human Rights and measures for implementation....30th Soviet veto defeats admission to UN of Republic of Korea.

PUBLICATIONS

For more detailed information on subjects mentioned in this summary and on other matters of foreign policy, reference should be made to the DEPARTMENT OF STATE BULLETIN and other publications of the Department. The publications listed below cover topics of current interest. A limited number of sample copies of documents listed for sale are available on request without charge from the Division of Public Liaison, Department of State.

The United States Goal in Tomorrow's World. General Foreign Policy Series 6. Reprinted from the Department of State Bulletin of February 27, 1949, Publication 3450. 6pp. 5 cents.

Cultural Relations Between the United States and the Soviet Union. International Information and Cultural Series 4. Released April 1949. Publication 3480. 25pp. 10 cents.

The United Nations and the North Atlantic Pact. International Organization Series III, 30. Reprinted from the Department of State Bulletin of March 6, 1949. Publication 3463. 4pp. 5 cents.

The Meaning of the North Atlantic Pact. General Foreign Policy Series 9. Reprinted from the Department of State Bulletin of March 27, 1949. Publication 3489. 5pp. 5 cents.

****

FOREIGN AFFAIRS HIGHLIGHTS may be quoted with or without credit to source.

11- Foreign Affairs Highlights

FOREIGN AFFAIRS HIGHLIGHTS

RECEIVED
JUN 30 1949
Southern Regional Council

Division of Public Liaison, Department of State

JULY 1, 1949 WASHINGTON, D.C.

The Council of Foreign Ministers ended its session on June 30 after 4 weeks of negotiation with a limited agreement on Berlin and with formal instructions to the Ministers' deputies to complete a draft of an Austrian treaty by September 1. At the September session of the UN General Assembly, representatives of the 4 powers will consider plans for the next CFM meeting. At the last minute, and after the formal communique had been issued, Soviet Foreign Minister Vishinsky asked for another meeting, saying that Moscow insisted that the ministers write into their joint statement on an Austrian treaty the declaration that Austria "shall not put any obstacles in the way of the export of profits or other income in the form of production or any freely convertible currency received." This referred to the profits of the Russian-owned companies in Austria. Upon the West's refusal to change the communique unless the addition was subject to clarification by the deputies to whom the Austrian treaty was referred, Mr. Vishinsky said that the question might be settled through diplomatic channels.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

There had been 4 items on the agenda for this session: economic and political unification and allied controls for Germany, unification of Berlin, procedures for the preparation of a German peace treaty, and the drafting of an Austrian treaty. With regard to unification of Berlin, the Russians again proposed close 4-power control and the veto, while the West reiterated its previous position of general self-government for Berlin. No agreement was reached on this problem. Nor was any agreement reached in respect to economic and political unification of Germany. Mr. Vishinsky proposed a government under close 4-power control and the "rule of unanimity"(the veto). The 3 Western nations proposed unification under the Bonn Constitution already adopted for the Western zones, with a wide range of self-government and limited allied controls. The final communique issued by the Ministers was a general declaration designed to enable the Soviet Union and the West to renew contacts informally in Germany and Berlin and reaffirming the New York accord lifting the blockade on May 4. On the question of a German peace treaty, the Soviet proposal was that the 4 powers submit peace proposals in 3 months and withdraw occupation troops a year after the conclusion of a treaty. The West's stand was that talk about a treaty was futile until there was agreement on German economic and political unity. Major points of disagreement on an Austrian treaty were resolved and the Ministers' deputies were instructed to prepare a draft by September 1.

KOREA

The UN Korean Commission has named a sub-committee, headed by Mr. A. B. Jamieson of Australia, to observe and verify withdrawal of remaining U.S. occupation forces in Korea. According to UN reports, other members of the sub-committee include China, India and El Salvador. The group has been assured full cooperation by the U.S. Withdrawals of U.S. troops from Korea were begun last December in compliance with the UN General Assembly resolution calling for withdrawal of all occupation forces from Korea "as early as practicable." U.S. withdrawals are geared to the steady improvement in the capabilities of Korea's own security forces, and, at the request of the Korean Government, a U.S. Korean Military Advisory Group will remain to assure continuation of progress in developing and training such forces. Although the Soviet Union has said it has withdrawn its forces from north Korea, the UN Commission has never been permitted to visit the northern zone to verify this.

ATOMIC ENERGY

The UN Atomic Energy Commission's working committee has decided that further study of international control plans for atomic energy should be delayed until the Big Five and Canada report that a basis for agreement exists. A Cuban-Argentine resolution adopted by the Committee on June 15 called upon the U.S., United Kingdom, France, China and Canada to confer and determine whether agreement on atomic control is possible. This step had been first recommended by the UN General Assembly in November 1948. Eight of the 11 working committee members voted for the resolution; Egypt abstained and the Soviet Union and Ukraine cast opposing votes. The Committee also adopted a Chinese resolution saying no useful purpose could be served by further study of Soviet Union Proposals which the Commission has rejected as inadequate for control over atomic energy. Only the Soviet Union and Ukraine opposed this resolution, while Egypt and Argentina abstained. The resolutions adopted by the working group will be referred to the Atomic Energy Commission as such, which is comprised of the same membership.

LATIN AMERICA

At a meeting of the Inter-American Commission on Methods for the Peaceful Solution of Conflicts June 9, Haiti and the Dominican Republic signed a joint declaration reaffirming their intentions to maintain "Good Neighbor relations" and binding themselves to prevent the existence in their territories of any movement disturbing "the domestic peace" of the other or of any other friendly nation. The joint declaration put an end to months of tension in the relations between the 2 Caribbean republics first brought to the attention of the Organization of American States late in February when Haiti charged the Dominican Republic with "moral aggression" and asked the Council of the Organization to convoke a Meeting of Consultation, under the Rio Treaty. Haiti's charges were based on the use of privately-owned Dominican broadcasting facilities by former Haiti Army officer Astel Roland in a series of speeches attacking the Haitian Government. After the council declined to invoke the Rio Treaty, the matter was referred to the Inter-American Commission on Methods for the Peaceful Solution of Conflicts. The Commission is composed of representatives of Mexico, Argentina, Brazil, Cuba and the U.S.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Fifteen sets of bilateral tariff negotiations have been completed at Annecy, France, where tariff bargaining is underway between the 23 nations which originally framed the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and 11 new nations wishing to accede to the Agreement. The Chairman of the Working Party of the Tariff Negotiations Committee, Mr. Dana Wilgress of Canada, also announced on June 15 that 74 additional negotiations are underway and 87 are under consideration. Negotiations are expected to continue at Annecy through July.

WHO

An agreement by which the Pan American Sanitary Bureau, located in Washington, D.C., becomes the Regional Office of the Western Hemisphere of the UN World Health Organization was signed May 24 in Washington by Dr. Brock Chisholm, Director General of WHO and Dr. Fred L. Soper, Director of the Pan American Sanitary Office. Under the agreement the Pan American Sanitary Commission may adopt and promote health and sanitary conventions and programs in the Western Hemisphere provided they are "compatible with the policy and programs of the WHO and are separately financed."

NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

Belgium deposited its ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty with the U.S. State Department on June 16, the third signatory to do so; Canada and the United Kingdom had previously deposited their ratifications. As of June 16, 7 of the 12 nations in the Atlantic community which signed the pact in Washington on April 4 had ratified it.

WHEAT AGREEMENT

On June 13, the U.S. Senate ratified the 1949 International Wheat Agreement. The agreement, when it becomes operative, will bind the U.S. and 4 other wheat exporting nations, and 36 importing nations, in a marketing arrangement for the sale and purchase of over 456,000,000 bushels of wheat annually for 4 years. Prices are fixed at a maximum of $1.80 a bushel with a minimum of $1.50 the first year, scaling down 10 cents a year to $1.20 in the fourth year. To become operative, the agreement must be ratified by the parliaments of signatory nations representing 70% of the guaranteed purchases and 80% of the guaranteed sales and the instruments of acceptance deposited with the U.S. by July 1, 1949. Canada deposited its acceptance on May 12 and the U.S. on June 17.

ILO

A 12-point agenda was presented to the 32nd session of the General Conference of the UN International Labor Organization which opened in Geneva June 8. Among the subjects which the General Conference is considering are adoption of 2 conventions designed to aid migrant workers, vocational guidance standards, revision of working standards on shipboard, revision of the 1933 convention which sought to abolish fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit and to regulate the operation of those not conducted for profit, and application of the principles of the right to organize and to bargain collectively. Some of the subjects on the agenda of the Governing Body are: consideration of the form and extent of ILO's contribution to an international program of technical assistance for economic development, the question of forced labor, the question of enforcement of trade union rights, arrangement for ILO's Asian regional conference next year and preliminary consideration of the agenda for the General Conference in 1951.

ROUNDUP UN Commission on Human Rights continues debate on draft International Covenant of Human Rights and measures of implementation . . . . President Truman calls for U.S. ratification of Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide . . . . UN Committee for India and Pakistan agrees to extension of time for replies to Commission's truce terms . . . . UN Economic and Social Council scheduled to open 9th session on July 5 in Geneva . . . . UN International Law Commission concludes first session with drafting of Declaration on Rights and Duties of States . . . . 2nd World Health Assembly opens in Rome on June 13.

PUBLICATIONS

For more detailed information on subjects mentioned in this summary and on other matter of foreign policy, reference should be made to the DEPARTMENT OF STATE BULLETIN and other publications of the Department. The publications listed below cover topics of current interest. A limited number of sample copies of documents listed for sale are available on request without charge from the Division of Public Liaison, Department of State.

The Point Four Program - a Progress Report, No. 2. June, 1949. 13 pp. Free.

The "Point Four" Program - Foreign Affairs Outline No. 21. Publication 3498. Spirng 1949. 6 pp. Free.

Background Information on the Military Assistance Program - May 10, 1949 15 pp. Free.

The Proposed Military Assistance Program - Fact Sheet. May, 1949. 2 pp. Free.

United States Participation in the United Nations - Report by the President to the Congress for the year 1948. Publication 3437. April, 1949. 303 pp. 55 cents.

* * * * * * * * *

FOREIGN AFFAIRS HIGHLIGHTS may be quoted with or without credit to source.

11- Foreign Policy
RECEIVED JAN 21 1949 Southern Regional Council

Foreign Affairs Outlines

BUILDING THE Peace

PREPARED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE • SPRING 1949 • No. 19

Collective Security in the North Atlantic Area

The Vandenberg Resolution, adopted by the Senate on June 11, 1948, by a vote of 64 to 4, marks a new departure in American foreign policy. The resolution proposes that for the first time in the Nation's history the United States associate itself in peacetime with countries outside the Western Hemisphere in collective security arrangements designed to safeguard peace and to strengthen our own security.

This declaration is a logical extension of the decision—implicit in our membership in the United Nations—to take an active part in world affairs to insure world peace and our own security. The policy stated in the Vandenberg Resolution also is a forthright recognition of the fear and insecurity that weigh upon free people everywhere and hamper the efforts we and others are making to promote international economic recovery. It is another evidence of the realistic approach to basic world problems exemplified by the European Recovery Program.

A Premise for Peace

The conduct of American foreign policy since the defeat of the Axis Powers has been based on the premise that strong nations can live together in peace, if they are willing to do so, no matter how much they may differ in their economic and political outlook and in their national institutions. One proof of our sincere belief in this premise and of our hope for collective security was the drastic reduction of our armed forces immediately after the end of hostilities. A more positive proof has been our wholehearted cooperation with the majority of the Members of the United Nations in the common effort to achieve enduring peace and a world order based on law.

The United Nations was founded on this same premise of Great Power cooperation. The structure of the U. N. is therefore such that if any one Great Power is unwilling to cooperate, it can seriously impede efforts for peace within the organization.

A consideration of the international situation developed during the past three years clearly reveals the major factors that make necessary the kind of policy set forth in the Vandenberg Resolution—dissension in the United Nations, the growth of fear and insecurity, and obstruction of the cooperative efforts to eliminate the causes of that fear.

Instead of the Great Power teamwork so devoutly sought by the people of the world, the obstruction of one country and its willing or unwilling associates has seriously hampered the activities of the United Nations. The end result, if not the aim, of the Soviet program has been to weaken the effectiveness of the U. N. and to shake the confidence of many people in it as an instrument of peace. The resultant widespread fear and uncertainty have created a situation in which forward-looking governments have begun to seek additional means of preserving the peace in keeping with the principles of the United Nations Charter.

During three years of unavailing attempts to secure an adjustment in Soviet policies, it became increasingly evident that peace-loving nations would have to take direct action, consistent with the aims and spirit of the Charter, to prevent the further loss of freedom and to reduce the danger of aggression. Inevitably, countries that found their freedom and security jeopardized turned for help to the United States, the one great democracy relatively unscathed by the war.

The Truman Doctrine

In February 1947 Greece and Turkey appealed to the United States for aid—Greece because it was being threatened with subjugation by an armed minority directed from abroad, Turkey because it was being forced to maintain a costly military machine in order to resist heavy pressure from without.

On March 12, 1947, President Truman declared in a message delivered personally to a joint session of Congress that it was the policy of the United States "to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures." He warned that failure of the United States to exercise proper leadership might endanger world peace and would certainly endanger "the welfare of our own Nation."

817013°—49

This pronouncement, followed by the enactment of the Greek-Turkish aid program, provided a direct answer by the United States to the threatened undermining of the United Nations and world security. It served notice that the United States would uphold the principles of the Charter and would act to prevent the imposition of totalitarian regimes on free peoples by either direct or indirect aggression.

Meanwhile, the rapid deterioration of the economies of Western Europe and the consequent spread of want, misery, and unrest had begun to present a grave danger to security and peace also. It was clear that if a catastrophe, possibly resulting in the collapse of Western European civilization, was to be avoided, the afflicted countries must combine their energies and resources in a concentrated effort toward economic recovery. It was equally clear that no cooperative effort, however determined, could succeed without help from the United States.

The ERP—Cooperation in Action

The United States offer to help the countries of Europe restore their economies, announced by Secretary Marshall on June 5, 1947, marked the beginning of a cooperative enterprise without precedent in history. The program is now being carried out by the Economic Cooperation Administration for the United States and by the Organization of European Economic Cooperation for the 16 participating countries of Europe. Much progress has been made in the few months the plan has been in operation.

THE RISING STRUGGLE FOR PEACE

The nature of the American proposal made it clear that this country had no desire to dominate the European nations or to dictate their decisions. It was open to all European countries willing to work wholeheartedly toward the common goal of recovery. The initial reaction to the proposal, however, made it clear also that all nations did not feel that their interests would be served by the elimination of the social and economic troubles that plagued Europe.

The Soviet Union flatly rejected the proposal. Its satellites were forced to follow suit, reluctantly. The Cominform, an organization composed of representatives of the Communist parties of Europe—all directed from Moscow, was established with the avowed purpose of defeating the ERP.

As the morale of the Western European countries rallied in response to ERP prospects, Communist pressure increased throughout the Continent. In Western Europe Communist-led minorities, particularly in France and Italy, tried unsuccessfully to dominate or weaken constitutional governments and to disrupt the economic life of their countries. In Eastern Europe Soviet efforts have been concentrated on consolidation of Communist control and the stamping out of freedom.

In February 1948 the free, democratic government of Czechoslovakia was overthrown by a Communist coup d'état. In March and April 1948 the Soviet Union, in violation of agreements with Great Britain, France, and the United States, embarked on a series of provocative moves culminating in the total land blockade of Berlin and thereby created a situation gravely endangering the peace.

The fall of Czechoslovakia shocked the countries of Western Europe with the realization that they must be ready to meet a crisis at any time. Their sense of insecurity mounted as they considered the possibility of a sudden outbreak of violence over Berlin.

How Fear Retards Recovery

Fear and insecurity, if left unchecked, might paralyze the recovery effort and destroy the psychological basis upon which recovery depends. People are reluctant to make the strenuous effort and personal sacrifice required for successful economic recovery when they fear that their land will be overrun by alien armies and the fruits of their toil taken from them. The decisions governments must make in connection with their recovery programs are enormously complicated by the addition of defense calculations.

If world recovery is to progress, the sense of security must be restored. Since the threat of armed aggression is at the root of insecurity, collective action which will enable free nations to confront a potential aggressor with preponderant power, together with economic recovery and political stability, provides the only satisfactory antidote to fear.

COLLECTIVE SECURITY UNDER THE UNITED NATIONS

The Charter of the United Nations points the way to effective cooperative action for individual and collective self-defense by nations in the present circumstances. It does so by recognizing that certain groups of countries have common interests of a strategic, political, economic, and social nature and that certain security problems are of a distinctly regional character.

The right of nations having such common interests to take collective action for defense under certain conditions is stated specifically in two provisions of the Charter.

The Vandenberg Resolution

Whereas peace with justice and the defense of human rights and fundamental freedoms require international cooperation through more effective use of the United Nations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate reaffirm the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations so that armed force shall not be used except in the common interest, and that the President be advised of the sense of the Senate that this Government, by constitutional process, should particularly pursue the following objectives within the United Nations Charter:

(1) Voluntary agreement to remove the veto from all questions involving pacific settlements of international disputes and situations, and from the admission of new members.

(2) Progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements for individual and collective self-defense in accordance with the purposes, principles, and provisions of the Charter.

(3) Association of the United States, by constitutional process, with such regional and other collective arrangements as are based on continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, and as affect its national security.

(4) Contributing to the maintenance of peace by making clear its determination to exercise the right of individual or collective self-defense under article 51 should any armed attack occur affecting its national security.

(5) Maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as provided by the Charter, and to obtain agreement among member nations upon universal regulation and reduction of armaments under adequate and dependable guaranty against violation.

(6) If necessary, after adequate effort toward strengthening the United Nations, review of the Charter at an appropriate time by a General Conference called under article 109 or by the General Assembly.

—June 11, 1948

Article 51 says that "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security."

Article 52 provides that "Nothing . . . precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action . . . consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations."

The Treaty of Rio is a notable example of how these articles and other related provisions of the Charter may be put into practical effect. That treaty, which was adopted at the Inter-American Conference for the Maintenance of Continental Peace and Security held in Brazil in 1947, and which entered into effect on December 3, 1948, provides for collective action by the American republics in the event of an armed attack against a Western Hemisphere nation, whether from within or without the Americas. A similar agreement embodying essentially the same principles has been entered into by several nations in Western Europe. This agreement possibly means as much for security in the Western Hemisphere as does the Treaty of Rio.

The Brussels Pact

Shortly after the fall of Czechoslovakia, the Governments of the United Kingdom, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg met in Brussels to consider what kind of action they might take for their common security. The treaty that evolved from this meeting is known as the Brussels Treaty, signed March 17, 1948.

The contracting parties committed themselves for a period of at least 50 years to a number of important undertakings, including—sweeping plans for closer economic cooperation; provision for cooperation in social matters and closer cultural understanding; settlement of disputes among the signatories by peaceful means, including referral to the International Court of Justice of all matters within its jurisdiction; guarantees of full military and other mutual aid in the event of an armed attack upon a member nation, in accordance with the appropriate provisions of the United Nations Charter; and provision for permanent consultative machinery to achieve the purposes of the treaty.

The obligations assumed under the pact materially improve the prospects of greater strength and unity in Western Europe. The defense provisions, however, are only partially effective; they do not, by themselves, appreciably lessen fear and insecurity in Europe. The reason is that the combined resources of the Brussels Pact nations cannot at this time provide enough military strength to assure effective resistance to aggression. Outside assistance must be made available if the potential promise of the pact as an instrument of peace is to be fully realized.

U. S. Action Essential

Because of its preponderant strength, support by the United States is essential. Just as the requirements of world peace have enlisted our support in programs of reconstruction, the mounting struggle for security requires that we give active support, both moral and material, to free nations taking joint action to prevent aggression. Association of the United States with like-minded nations in collective arrangements, in conformity with the principles and purposes of the U. N., is one of the most effective ways we can contribute to the security of the world and our own protection.

In his message delivered to Congress on March 17, 1948, President Truman referred specifically to the Brussels Pact and said:

" . . . This development deserves our full support. I am confident that the United States will, by appropriate means, extend to the free nations the support which the situation requires. I am sure that the determination of the free countries of Europe to protect themselves will be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so."

The implications of that statement were given broader outline and sharper focus some three months later in the more detailed provisions of Senate Resolution 239. A brief study of the substance of the resolution should make clear its scope and meaning.

The Vandenberg Resolution

Three provisions of the resolution (those contained in paragraphs 1, 5, and 6) are relatively long-range. They suggest means for organic strengthening of the United Nations. Though these objectives are highly desirable, it is not likely that they can be immediately attained. They must be achieved through the procedures of the United Nations and consequently their fruition requires a degree of Great Power harmony which does not now exist.

The other three provisions are capable of being put into effect immediately. They recommend that the United States—encourage the progressive development of collective security arrangements in keeping with the principles of the U. N. Charter; associate itself with such arrangements when they are based on full self-help and mutual aid and when they affect the security of this country; and make clear, in advance, that any armed attack by an aggressor nation upon a peace-loving nation whereby the security of the United States is affected will be combatted by the United States in the exercise of our inherent right of self-defense.

Both the Vandenberg Resolution and the accompanying Report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (issued May 19, 1948) make clear that these provisions are not directed against any country or group of countries; they are directed only against aggression.

Furthermore, any action taken pursuant to these provisions must be subject to constitutional process; that is, the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, must approve any treaties, agreements, or appropriation acts designed to implement the resolution.

This important statement of the firm intention of the United States actively to oppose armed aggression and the positive steps being taken to put it into effect have two purposes: To contribute to the maintenance of peace by helping to deter aggression anywhere in the world, and to reassure the free nations in their efforts to achieve security based on the recovery of their economic and political stability.

The resolution therefore works not only against aggression, but also against the fear of aggression which can seriously impede the establishment of world conditions of peace and confidence.

Security and Recovery—Parallel Programs

In order to strengthen the United Nations, to promote world peace and security, and to insure the effectiveness of our efforts for economic recovery, the United States must now consider what practical means exist for associating itself with other nations which have joined forces in a common front against aggression. It must determine what can be done to help those nations build a military establishment strong enough to assure their effective self-defense. It must at the same time continue to assist them toward economic recovery. On the other hand, the United States must be careful, in doing so, not to weaken its own basic economic strength.

Economic recovery and security against aggression are closely related, and the requirements for each must be carefully balanced. The weight of an armament program large enough to sustain even a minimum level of security probably would overburden the shaky economies of most European countries, if they were forced to undertake it alone. Certainly, the necessary diversion of scarce materials and manpower from production for recovery would destroy the stability now being established through ERP.

It seems clear that the United States must supply much of the military equipment which the countries working for recovery cannot produce themselves. In so doing, we must neither endanger our own economic or military strength nor deprive friendly nations of the aid we are providing through the recovery program. Overemphasis on defense alone would be futile, for it would weaken us and mean most probably an economic collapse in much of Europe and the loss of the valuable gains already made toward recovery.

The nations of Western Europe have been individually spending large sums on armaments without coordination. The defense agencies of the Brussels Treaty are endeavoring to provide the greater strength which comes from integrating the efforts of the parties in a unified defense and supply program. That is what the words "continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid" in the Vandenberg Resolution mean. Each country must contribute what it can most effectively, whether in manpower, arms, raw material, or production capacity.

As in the case of ERP, coordinated efforts by the Europeans in an integrated program should both give them greater returns for their effort and reduce the amount of supplemental assistance they will need from the United States. In some cases their domestic expenditures for military purposes may be increased, but a successful program of integrated defense, with United States backing, will bring a degree of security which could not be obtained in any other way and which should facilitate further recovery through increasing confidence.

Economic recovery is fundamental and should continue to have priority over rearmament. What is needed is a carefully drawn balance in Europe between recovery and rearmament and a similar balance here between the needs of our own domestic economy, our own defense, our contribution to ERP, and our contribution to European rearmament.

The supply of military equipment alone to the friendly nations of Europe would only partially relieve their insecurity. It would not fulfil the intent of the Vandenberg Resolution. Formal association of the United States with those countries in an arrangement directed against aggression evidently will be needed to give practical meaning to the provisions of the resolution and to bring the security and sense of security which are essential. A logical point at which to begin such association is with the five nations that form the Brussels arrangement.

The North Atlantic Community

The geographic position of the Brussels Pact nations brings their strategic and security interests into mesh with those of the United States and Canada. Consequently, from the combined requirements for security in this geographic area there has sprung the concept of a regional security arrangement among the nations of what might be called the North Atlantic community.

In July 1948, following the passage of the Vandenberg Resolution, exploratory conversations were begun in Washington at the request of the Brussels Pact nations, between their representatives and representatives of Canada and the United States. These discussions concerned possible methods of increasing the security of the participating nations through a collective security arrangement,

REGIONAL AND OTHER DEFENSE ARRANGEMENTS

(Excerpt from the Report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, May 19, 1948, accompanying Senate Resolution 239)

In recommending the progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements, the resolution is based squarely on the [United Nations] Charter.

The Charter envisages, in article 52, the existence of—> Regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action.

Such arrangements must be consistent with the purposes and principles of the Charter. The first purpose of the Charter, as stated in article 1, is—

> To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression.

The Charter also states, in article 51, that—

> Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

within the framework of the United Nations Charter, in which they and other nations in the North Atlantic area might participate.

These considerations led to agreement that such an arrangement was both practicable and eminently desirable. Late in October the Canadian and Brussels Treaty Governments announced their readiness to negotiate a treaty establishing such an arrangement. The exploratory talks were resumed early in December and have brought steady progress toward specific proposals for a treaty.

Planning for Common Defense

In April the Permanent Military Committee established by the Brussels Treaty undertook the task of planning an integrated defense organization and a common defense policy and of coordinating the military forces and resources of the five countries. Since July, United States and Canadian military representatives have been participating in a nonmember status in the work of the committee.

The five Ministers of Defense in September approved an integrated military command organization headed by Viscount Montgomery as chairman of the Commanders in Chief Committee, French General Jean de Lattre de Tassigny as Commander in Chief of the Western European Ground Forces, British Air Marshal Sir James Robb as Commander in Chief of the Air Forces, and French Vice Admiral Robert Jaujard as Naval "Flag Officer" of the committee. In October, the Consultative Council approved the common defense policy, based on the Brussels Treaty and on the United Nations Charter. The committee is currently working on coordinating the military resources of the five countries in an integrated supply program which is expected to reveal what the five can do for themselves and each other in this respect and the extent to which they may find it necessary to seek supplies of military equipment from the United States.

Association of the United States and Canada with nations of Western Europe in a North Atlantic regional security pact, if carried out in the spirit of the Vandenberg Resolution, will have far-reaching implications for the future peace and security of the world. The practical steps leading up to such an arrangement are now receiving the most intensive consideration on both sides of the Atlantic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE PUBLICATION 3377
EUROPEAN AND BRITISH COMMONWEALTH SERIES 5
RELEASED JANUARY 1949

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1949

International | Aspects - US "Race Problem"

EUROPEAN REACTION TO DISCRIMINATION IN AMERICA

AS EXPRESSED IN PRESS COMMENTS

FOLLOWING THE EXECUTION OF WILLIE McGEE

* * *

The American Jewish Committee --- Paris Office --- May 18, 1951

A. France

1. Reactions in the French Parliament

Communist Deputy Rene Arthaud, on behalf of his group, intervened with the following remark: "On the anniversary of the victory of free peoples over Hitlerism and racism, we learn that the government of the United States found it opportune to commit an abominable racist crime in executing the innocent Willie McGee. The Communist Group raises its indignant protest against this crime and salutes warmly this latest victim of racial hatred and imperialism." M. Edouard Herriot, President of Parliament, replied: "No matter what your personal opinions are, it is my duty to protest bringing charges against a foreign government which is free to conduct its own internal administration and justice." The Communist deputies interrupted his remarks with cries of "Down with racism!". M. Rene Mayer, Minister of Justice, then took the floor, and said, "I think that my views on racism are sufficiently known..." Madame Madeleine Braun, Communist deputy, interrupted by remarking "But Xavier Vallat (Vichy Commissioner for Jewish Affairs) was liberated." The Minister of Justice continued, "I am astonished that a party which claims to defend free peoples challenges the sovereign decisions of the judicial branch of a foreign state."

Reaction in the Assembly of the French Union (French Colonial Parliament)

Communist members raised a strong protest against the McGee execution in the Assembly. The leftist groups proposed to close the session of May 8 as a sign of mourning. This proposal was supported by the Progressive Republicans through Jacques Mitterand who said, "In this Assembly we may be divided on questions of a political nature, but there is a problem on which the Assembly of the French Union has on every occasion demonstrated its unanimity: that is the relentless struggle against racism wherever it appears. Today, under the cover of justice, an abominable act was committed in the United States. It is appropriate that an Assembly such as ours, which more than any other in the world contains an important percentage of colored members, should raise its protest through a symbolic gesture against this act."

Speaking for the Socialist group, Leon Boutbien expressed the emotion of free men as a result of the execution of McGee.

The proposal to close the session was further supported by other groups and was adopted.

Communist Protest Meeting

Communist elements organized a protest meeting in the Salle Wagram, one of the largest halls in Paris. In addition to well-known Communists and leaders of Communist-dominated trade unions, there were also on the platform representative liberals and leading intellectuals who expressed their indignation against the sentence to execute McGee.

PRESS COMMENTS

II. The Conservative Press

LE FIGARO, the most important Parisian morning daily, ultra-conservative and mildly de Gaullist, in a front-page article on May 10, 1951, by one of its leading commentators and noted writer, Thierry Maulnier, said:

> McGee perhaps committed a crime. Perhaps. I don't know whether the death penalty is really necessary in order to preserve society. I do know that in any case this penalty, this vestige of ritual murder, perpetuated by an entire people, assumes additional weight when one adds the word "perhaps". McGee perhaps committed a crime. McGee surely was a Negro. McGee lived in a region of the United States where the policy of racial defense has remained particularly virulent.
>
> It is known -- all men of good will know it -- that lynchings have become more and more rare in the United States. There is, however, in the execution of McGee something more painful to us than a lynching: that is, its strictly legal character. It cannot be charged to the fury of a delirious mob. Sober men took a responsible decision after mature deliberation. It was proposed coldbloodedly. Nothing can make us believe that McGee would have been condemned, let alone executed, if he were not a Negro.
>
> Nothing can make us believe that McGee is dead because he attacked a woman, but because in the city or in the state in which he lived, people believe that to recall by example a principle, according to which Negroes must not approach white women, is more important than the life of a Negro, innocent or guilty -- the life of a Negro having not too much importance.
>
> I am not bringing charges here of racial discrimination in the south of the United States. It is possible that some of our compatriots speak too lightly of a situation of which they do not have sufficient understanding of the real facts. Should there exist ethnic separation, if one wants to avoid a mixture of races? Is it true that a mixture often creates a category of ethnic bastards? But the possible legitimate concern of avoiding such mixtures cannot in any case justify the vexations, humiliations and brutality of the strong against a race of victims. It cannot in any way justify the judicial murder of McGee.
>
> It ought to be said at a time when a great struggle is taking place in the world to safeguard human dignity, even the possibility of human dignity, at the moment that the United States of America is the champion of this struggle, -- because it alone still has the necessary force, because it alone perhaps has the necessary faith, -- that the execution of McGee is a mistake. Which doesn't prevent it also from being a crime. For McGee was perhaps guilty, and the execution of a man who was perhaps guilty is surely a crime.
>
> I know too that there are other crimes in the world. I know that we should not play the game of those who have been seeking to utilize the death of McGee (and what accomplices they found in the Mississippi judges!) in order to discredit the cause of the free nations and to turn the eyes of the world away from the thousands of McGees, the millions of McGees, the dozens of millions of those whose guilt is uncertain and of those who are innocent, who have died and are dying by verdict of judges as implacable as those of Mississippi.

But neither the self-accusatory trials in the popular democracies, nor the collective deportations, nor the extermination of opposing minorities in the Soviet third of the world, nor the infernal testimonials brought by those who have escaped the prisons in Siberia, nothing in all this justifies the murder of McGee, nor the silence on the murder of McGee.

It must be said nevertheless that if in the free world in which we live the execution of McGee is possible, the protest against the death of McGee is also possible; while the world in which our adversaries choose to live is a world where protest is not possible. We are not delivered from evil. But at least we have the right to fight against it.

The radical difference between our world and that of its Communist accusers is not only the overwhelming difference in the number of victims, it is also that our morals are undoubtedly powerless to prevent the death of McGee but the death of McGee is only part of our morals.

LE MONDE, the most prominent Parisian afternoon daily, conservative and semi-official, in its issue of May 3, 1951, under the headline "The McGee Case Illustrates the Persistence of Color Prejudice in the South of the U.S.", says as follows:

...The McGee case illustrates tragically the discrimination suffered by Negroes in the south of the United States. There was a time when capital punishment was used only in cases of Negroes convicted of rape. Today this distinction no longer exists but the practice continues. To our knowledge no white man has ever been executed in the south for the crime of rape, while in Virginia, for example, 53 Negroes went to the electric chair in the course of 30 years for the same reason. This inequality, a vestige of the era of slavery, is based on the idea which is deeply rooted in the south that the purity of the white woman must be preserved at all costs.

The legal prohibition of mixed marriages does not prevent illicit relations between the two groups. The existence of this legal barrier contradicts the contention of white people that there is an instinctive repulsion which separates the whites and blacks in this realm. In fact, as happens in all colonial territories, the whites often take colored women as mistresses...

By his act, the Negro has sullied the honor of "white womanhood". He has committed the crime of racial deterioration; he has shaken the foundations of southern society, established on the co-existence of two races, one superior and the other which must stay in its place. To reestablish this hierarchy, the whites sometimes go as far as lynching. Before the court the verdict of death is inevitable.

Willie McGee is the victim of this state of affairs. Even if there were no doubt as to his guilt, his execution would confirm the prejudices against the Negro people in the south and would be a bad service to the cause of America among the colored populations at a time when it needs them most.

L'AUBE, organ of the M.R.P., second largest political party in France, the French Catholic party, led by Georges Bidault and Foreign Minister Robert Schuman in its issue of May 9, 1951, says:

How much does a Negro weigh in a world where people of all colors are struggling with the brutal forces of nature and societies? Why is there so much noise about a trial which after all is an internal affair, not only of the United States of America, but of one of its States?

He weighs exactly that of all those whose lot it is to protest an injustice. And the injustice in this instance has as its name, racism.

For us who do not know the dossier of McGee, it is not a question of whether he was or was not guilty of rape, for which he was executed. This aspect of the question is not for us, but the other aspect concerns us, and that is: If rape in the United States is a crime, punished theoretically by death, the death penalty is never pronounced against a white person in the rape of a colored woman. It is only used for Negroes who have raped white women.

Thus the execution of McGee is ostensibly a racial affair. It demonstrates to us that despite the incontestable gains against prejudice and race hatred, these have not yet been conquered in a democracy which on the other hand shows such devotion to the cause of man. More than our sensitiveness, it is our sentiment of justice which is hurt...

We are not indignant because McGee was executed in the United States, and this circumstance does not prevent us from being indignant. Our reaction to injustice does not depend on the region of the world where the wrong was committed. It is the more bitter to note that it took place in a continent which gave for liberty enough of its sons not to deliver up to hatred a poor Negro, -- that is what weighs heavily.

TEMOIGNAGE CHRETIEN, leading Catholic liberal weekly, in a front-page editorial on May 11, 1951, says:

For the third time since the beginning of the year, a Negro affair has been prominently featured in the news. In Martinsville there were 7 who were accused of having raped a white woman. They were executed. Though protesting against it, we could still believe it exceptional. Several weeks later in Trenton, 6 Negroes were accused of the same crime and condemned to death...Now comes the McGee case...

The problem before us with regard to this affair is this: can we be indifferent to a crime, a denial of justice, or an abuse of rights, under the pretext that it is being committed abroad? Or, to put the question in another way, have the Americans the right, for example, to be disturbed by Soviet deportations? Our reply is "Yes". Before the second trial of the Negroes in Trenton, it is our duty to say that the stories of the "dirty Negroes" create a dangerous misunderstanding between the French and American peoples. But this is not the main thing. It is in the name of Christian demands that we protest. And in order to present this protest, we need not be prevented by frontiers.

LA CROIX, Catholic daily, on May 10, 1951, states:

Even without expressing judgement about American justice in general and about this trial in particular, world public opinion had the clear impression that this man McGee was executed because he was a Negro. The same accusation and the same sentence would never have been pronounced against a white man. Public opinion feels therefore that racial hatred triumphed in this unhappy affair.

Racism cannot be accepted. As Christians we know that every person, whatever his race, color or blood, is created by God and saved by Christ. As Christians it is our duty to have more respect and compassion for people who yesterday were not elevated from their state of inferiority but who were moreover enslaved by white men... We do not have the right to monopolize for our profit the material and spiritual conquests of civilization, nor to despair of people who have not yet reached our degree of evolution.

Let us simply repeat the recent declaration of Monseigneur Feltin (Archbishop of Paris): "If I am questioned on the position of the Church when it is appealed to for an expression of humanity, is it necessary to state that, faithful to the spirit of Christ and the New Testament, the church does not admit either barrier of race, nor privileges of cast, nor matters of personality when it is a question of justice and charity?"

III. Socialist Reaction

LE POPULAIRE, May 9, 1951, says:

...Everything in this affair has been revolting. We have recalled here under what conditions the verdict was pronounced. The proofs of guilt were never solidly established. A witness had stated that he met McGee, at the moment when the rape of which he was accused was supposed to have taken place, some 50 kilometres away. This statement was disregarded. Finally it is known that whites accused of rape are never condemned to death. The whole trial seems like a monstrous "legal lynching".

The incidents which took place at the time of the execution show the persistence of the hatred of Negroes in the southern states. The Negroes who demonstrated before the courthouse in Laurel were repulsed, some were arrested. However, hundreds of whites stationed themselves in front of the building all night. Hurrahs resounded when at ten minutes after midnight the news of the execution was spread... These repugnant manifestations demonstrate that for certain whites it was a sort of a ritual murder and not the punishment of a guilty person.

> The McGee trial and his execution are evidence that race hatred and color prejudice have preserved all their criminal violence which revolts the human conscience and is unworthy of a great civilized nation.

On May 10, LE POPULAIRE, in an article from its correspondent in New York, L. Seigel, asks:

> Will we see again in the United States similar trials to that of McGee, this time in Groveland, Florida, and Trenton, New Jersey?

The rest of the article is devoted to a review of the two trials mentioned. Underneath this article is a news dispatch from Karlsruhe, Germany, concerning "a violent fight which broke out in a cafe in Karlsruhe between two groups of American soldiers, white and colored, following a discussion of the execution of Willie McGee. Several soldiers were gravely wounded and the cafe was wrecked."

IV De Gaullist Press

L'AURORE, on May 9, 1951, declared:

> We have not heard either the accused or the victim and we are unaware of the exact reasons which six times deferred the execution of the condemned. The innocence or guilt of McGee is a question which we cannot argue in good faith. But it appears strange to us that a justice, so sure of itself to the point of denying the intervention of the entire world, should have required six trials before executing the guilty person, as if it had asked itself six times whether it had judged well.
>
> What moves us is that a man should have remained more than five years waiting daily for the pitiless grilling, and that a punishment perhaps unwarranted and in any case disproportionate to the crime, should have been meted out to him at the moment when all the efforts of his friends gave him a bit of confidence.
>
> What frightens us is that the prayers of hundreds of thousands of men literally crashed before a pitiless and deaf "justice". Is the gesture of pardon so heavy that no government in the world seems to be able today to bring it about, neither for a Petkov, nor for others who are nearer to us, nor for a poor Negro electrocuted by judges uncertain of their sentence?
>
> Was it truly impossible for powerful America to let an unfortunate man live, when millions of his colored brothers waited with anguish for the pardon which, in saving a life, would have given them something to hope for?

V Communist Press

L'HUMANITE, organ of the Communist Party, on May 9, 1951, headlined "Defying the Universal Conscience, Truman Assassinated Willie McGee, the Innocent Negro", and states: "Truman and his men have committed this abominable crime, signal for the unleashing of a campaign of terror against the Negroes, the friends of peace, the men of progress who, in the United States, courageously oppose the war policies of the American millionaires.

Willie...died with great courage, while there resounded around the prison the death cries of the maddened racists."

LIBERATION, pro-Communist daily, on May 9, 1951, carried the following appeal:

> The secretariat of the "Movement against Racism, Anti-Semitism and for Peace" (M.R.A.P.), in order to express the sorrow, indignation and wrath of all French men and women, voices a solemn protest against the legal assassination of McGee. The American authorities responsible for it did not believe it necessary to take into account world opinion. This murderous gesture, defying democracy and justice, strikes at the heart of every one of us. The peoples of the entire world have felt profoundly this defiance and rise against it. The Movement against Racism invites all Frenchmen to protest and to send delegations to the U.S. Embassy.

In its issue of May 10, it goes on further:

> Throughout the entire world, the execution of the colored American Willie McGee aroused anger and indignation. In the embassies of the U.S.A. a flood of letters and telegrams protested this racist crime.
>
> Radio-Moscow commented on the execution of McGee in these terms: "Humanity will not forget or pardon the fanatics of the 20th century for the murder of Willie McGee."

The Committee for the Defense of Democratic Liberties in Black Africa pronounced in a communique, that "the news of this cowardly attempt has climaxed the emotion aroused by the announcement in the papers of the opening of an American consulate in Abidjan on the Ivory Coast."

Evoking the death in a prison in Grand-Bassam of a colored woman, Mamba Bakayoro, the Defense Committee called on all honest men to join it in fighting against racial oppression which also reigns in Black Africa.

VI. Independent Press

FRANC TIREUR, progressive, anti-Communist daily, on May 9, 1951, published an article by Georges Altman, famous journalist and editor of the paper, as follows:

> Disgust, consternation, helpless amazement: these are the emotions aroused by the frightful "legal lynching" which the people of Mississippi have committed by killing the unfortunate Negro Willie McGee in the electric chair. He was held six years in prison, tried six times. It had everything: crowds shouting racist slogans, justice as an accomplice, all the proofs of innocence discarded, the pseudo-victim McGee's mistress for some time, and no white has ever been executed for rape...

Unhappy amazement! What does it matter that the Constitution of the United States prevents the President or any other person from intervening in the affairs of a state! Nothing can make us understand this silence, this silence, this indifference on the part of those responsible for a nation whose customs, institutions, laws and people we refuse to confuse with the white gangsters of Mississippi.

"It is not my affair," said President Truman. "We can do nothing," Judge Vinson excused. But yes, Mr. President, yes, Judges, it does concern you, it concerns most of all the honor of your country, the aid which whatever is worthwhile in American democracy can give Europe. It concerns us all, for injustice is worse in a world where justice exists!

One single Negro, it is said...But this murder is the symbol of a bestial fury which was thought strangled, and the bloody proof that a pest has not yet been cured and repressed, even in that part of the world where must be safeguarded and defended the values of our civilization.

One single Negro...But his death is heartrending, his last words brand his assassins: "It is because I am a Negro that I am being executed," McGee wrote before being tied to the electric chair...

Ah! how fine are they, those people of Mississippi, the bourgeois, the magistrates, the dignitaries who are frightened, vexed, full of "sacred horror" because a white woman had an affair with a Negro. Impossible! It must be that the Negro raped her. The honor of the race, just think of it!

With the ashes of McGee, they have sullied not only their own faces but that of their country. They don't care. They "got even" with their Negro.

FRANC TIREUR, May 10:

Most Parisian newspapers, whatever their tendency, were moved by the execution of McGee. Each one in its own fashion reflected the opinion of the majority of the French people which rejects with horror racism and everything that goes with it. This healthy reaction does honor to the press of our country. It is only regrettable that one does not always find among our newspapers such powerful unanimity when it is a question of other crimes against man.

In this concert of reprobation, there is, however, one false note: the one contributed by the Stalinist press. Certainly it did not make the smallest noise. But it was obvious that for the Communist spokesmen it was only a question of propaganda...

FRANC TIREUR, May 10:

The "Committee for the Support of the McGee Family," created under the auspices of the International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism" (LICA), opened a large subscription in behalf of the widow and four orphans of the young Negro, Willie McGee. The appeal of the committee has already received the adherence of Richard Wright, Justin Godart, Jacques Madaule, Jean-Paul Sartre, Lamine-Gueye, Claude Bourdet, Rene Maran, Pierre Paraf, Leon Boutbien, Jean-Pierre Melville, Remy Roure, the Reverend Vergara, Edmond Fleg, and Georges Altman.

COMBAT, non-Communist, liberal daily, on May 9, 1951, headlines its article as "The Fine Whites":

> There came forward in the world, McGee, to save your life, in their finest clothes -- president, director, officer of the Legion of Honor, worker, priest, professor, mother, to beg the judges: "Save McGee!" We still shout, McGee, even if on May 8 you are dead for something for which white people do not die.
>
> Those who have white skins. The whites. The fine whites... The governor of Virginia, who refused to pardon the seven Negroes, the seven young Negroes of Martinsville, condemned to death, executed on Sunday the 4th and Monday the 5th of February 1951, in their last prison in Richmond...The jury had white skins. The prosecutor had a white skin. The lawyers had white skins. The court of the State of Virginia had white skins and the accused black skins...Paradise is for the white skins. There is no paradise for Negroes except in the movies. A horrible death is reserved for Negroes. Since 1908 the fine whites of America have killed with impunity 50 Negroes in the prison of Richmond. Not to mention those who have died in other prisons, those who die in the streets, and those who are sent to die in every war.
>
> McGee, you are not the first.....
> McGee, you are not the last.....
>
> Central Europe could answer our protests with truth: "Busy yourself with your own justice!" America does not answer, and we should be happy, because it could say to us: "what are you doing for your Negroes? Why do certain restaurants refuse to serve them? Didn't it happen two years ago that only two private schools would accept them as students? Why do you send them to war, in trucks, among the first? Long live the Senegalese! Why have you massacred 89,000 Malgaches in Madagascar? Why do you shout 'Save McGee and long live the Negroes!' fine whites of Europe, when you despise them, when you let them die, not even in the name of justice but in the name of money, labor, the country and the prestige of the white race...."
>
> But no one has told us these things, we pretend ignorance and we do nothing about it. The fine whites of Europe with blue eyes have nothing to say as long as they have, like the fine whites of America, dirty hands. Ah! it is easy and sweet to cry, "Save, McGee," instead of saving McGee by saving the first Negro, loving the Negro, the next Jesus whom we encounter.

CE MATIN, independent daily, of May 10, 1951, has this to say:

> We in France hate racism in all its forms. We cannot understand the hateful contempt of Americans toward Negroes.
>
> Everything dealing with segregation revolts us and provokes us to criticise.
>
> We have never known the problems which Americans had to solve in regard to their Negro population. But we have noted with a great and fraternal relief -- thinking of colored Frenchmen -- the certain amelioration which has been evident in the United States these past few years. The Negroes of New York, for example, do not suffer any more from that old "colonial" attitude of the Yankees. On the contrary! They are the first to recognize this progress and to rejoice in it.

The McGee case seems a throw-back to "southern" rigors. The essence of the trial eludes us. We do not know whether McGee, executed at the age of 38, married and father of four children, really raped a white woman, who never appeared before the court as a plaintiff but who was represented by her husband.

One thing is certain: never before any court was a white man sent to the electric chair for the rape of a colored woman.

Finally, we cannot understand why the condemned was executed after six years of detention. Even were he guilty, he had a hundred times expiated his crime by four trials and his interminable wait for death...We do not understand how American sensitivity, so alive and scrupulous toward everything concerning human suffering, has not encompassed the case of McGee... The sad truth is that the McGee case was falsified by interventions which placed it on the plane of racism or politics.

It concerns a man like any other who paid too much for the crime of which he was accused...The first fault of the judges of Mississippi is that they did not listen to the appeal for pity. Let us hope that they will be the last representatives of a generation and a class, obtuse and cruel, which a rejuvenated America will relegate among the causes for remorse that all peoples carry in their history.

L'OBSERVATEUR, French neutralist and mildly pro-Communist weekly.

AMERICA INTRODUCES RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN EUROPE, charges Richard Wright, well known American novelist, in an article published in the issue of May 3, 1951. The text is cited here in full:

Because France has no "Negro sections" which would permit a census of individuals on a racial basis, there is no official figure on the number of American Negroes living in the French community. Approximate estimates indicate that there are more than 500 American Negroes in France, of which half reside either permanently or temporarily in Paris, the rest being dispersed in the provinces. They can be classed socially in several groups: students, former veterans, newspapermen, doctors, government employees, musicians, music-hall artists, independent artists and writers who live by their own means and bring their contribution to the daily life of France.

The situation of the American Negro in France differs considerably from his situation in America, principally in this manner: in America he is forced by law and custom to live in certain areas called "Negro sections," while in France he is lost among the 40 million French who are indifferent to the color of his skin.

The American Negro in France goes about his daily occupations without worrying about facing arbitrary racial attacks directed against him concerning his residence, his work or even his social or cultural activities.

However, and the fact is understandable, the painful memory of racial prejudice suffered, before coming to France, remains in the mind of the American Negro. France is a refuge, the only place on earth that offers him a chance of living in a normal human atmosphere. For him, France represents a normal human civilization, in the midst of which he is neither coddled, nor particularly remarked, but simply "left alone." The American Negro understands naturally that France is agitated by social, political and economic problems. He knows that France is no Utopia; but the difference between his life in France and that which he led in America is so vast and so profound that he has a feeling of gratitude for being allowed to live like a man among men.

But a new factor is beginning to appear in the life of American Negroes in France; a new kind of uneasiness is being borne in their conscience; and it has nothing to do with the French or their attitude toward him. With the appearance of the Marshall Plan and the Atlantic Pact, the American Negro has been able to ascertain the extension and penetration of American influence in France. The troublesome racial atmosphere which he fled seems to be crossing the Atlantic. For the first time since he landed in France as a "refugee visitor," the American Negro is asking himself: to what limit will some French, anxious to please the Americans, accept the racial doctrines contrary to the traditions and customs of their country?

If the Negro had only to occupy himself with the attitude of the French community, he would have no worries. But each day world events show that France is no more simply France. It is a nation whose actions vary according to the pressures exercised on the one hand by the industrial and growing military might of America, and on the other by the provocations of Russia. Each day American Negroes have seen the conditions of life in France waver and recoil under the shock of one or the other of these nationalist blocs. Around them, Negroes have heard the French express fear and concern for the fate of French liberty, on the national humiliation to which France is now subjected, and because of these facts, American Negroes have expressed their sympathy to the French. They have a double right to do so: both as guests of France and as partisans of liberty. To a degree to which white Americans feel neither the necessity nor the need, American Negroes have searched, as if they were impelled by an instinct of preservation, to espouse the cause of French sentiments.

Each time a new white American soldier arrives on French soil, the American Negro feels that his security, because of American racism, is less and less assured. Besides, the American Negro notes that the American spokesmen in France are almost exclusively officials of the American government, profoundly nationalist, representing government political plans. There is no liberalism in them, no human quality capable of echoing the profoundly humanitarian aspirations of the average American.

Feeling very close to the French ideal of liberty, American Negroes have reacted violently. Certainly, they know that present conditions in France make American aid necessary, but who, better than American Negroes, victims of three hundred years of American "kindness," can tell when the danger line of "kindness" is crossed, when "to give" becomes little by little "to take," when "aid" leads to domination?

Our quarrel, to tell the truth, as American Negroes, is only with our co-citizens, these white Americans who are proud to criticize French life and culture unfavorably 24 hours a day; these white Americans who, while they toss to the four winds the words of liberty and of democracy, continue to practice racial exclusivity.

Let us cite a few examples:

1. Not one American commercial firm in all of France employs a single American Negro; however, among these firms are branches of such American industrial giants as the Guaranty Trust Company of New York; J.P. Morgan and Company; Commercial Cable; The American Express Co.; The Chase National Bank; Kodak; Standard Oil; Shell Oil; U.S. Steel; Western Union; International Harvester, etc.

2. Up to a year ago, government agencies in Europe rarely employed Negroes.

3. The American Hospital in Paris, during its 25 years of existence, has never employed a single American Negro.

4. White American tourists, loaded with dollars and racist psychology, have obliged some French hotels to apply racial practices for the first time in the history of France.

5. A growing number of incidents between white American soldiers and Negro American civilians in Paris have been noted during recent months.

The few examples I have just cited reflect only partially the attitude and conduct of certain Americans in France, an attitude which has caused many French to turn to American Negroes to ask for an explanation of such virulent nationalist manifestations on the part of their white compatriots.

American Negroes, to assure the defense of their liberty and to achieve a gesture of friendship and solidarity toward the French who surround them, have organized a group. To help the French as well as themselves, they have launched the French-American Fellowship, whose aim is to revalue the idea of liberty, generosity, dignity and sacred respect for the individual.

While keeping themselves scrupulously outside of French internal political problems, the French-American Fellowship testifies for liberty, offers a hand to those who also hope to keep alive the creative idea of man. The French-American Fellowship helped enthusiastically the recent campaign of French intellectuals, destined to save William McGee from legal lynching, prepared by the crowds in Mississippi.

To the French of good will, to the French who are for liberty, the French-American Fellowship confirms its solidarity with those who place liberty before all else, who feel the need to restate the proud traditions of French culture and history.

L'OBSERVATEUR, May 10, 1951:

Perhaps in different times, Mr. Truman (or a more courageous president) would have saved the victim of race hatred. But this front of the entire social reaction against a single colored man will profoundly disturb even the warmest friends of the United States in Europe, in Africa and in Asia.

VII. The Foreign Language Press

LA PENSEE RUSSE, Russian-language emigre weekly, strongly anti-Communist, published in Paris, on May 11, 1951, criticized Communist exploitation of the McGee case, but added:

> There is no doubt that as often happens in the southern states the determining factor was that the accused was a Negro. If he were white, the trial would not have been climaxed by the death sentence. Here we have a palpable and undeniable injustice, the expression of a social evil existing in the southern states of North America. And this evil made it possible for an incarnation of evil, the belligerent world Communism, to appear again in the role of the defender of freedom and social justice. In all countries of the free world, Communist agents through press, posters and meetings mobilized public opinion and attracted to their campaign prominent representatives of science, literature and art, and made them unwilling participants in a diversive action.

B. Austrian Reaction to Racial Persecution in the U.S.

After the execution of seven Negroes in Virginia, a number of Austrian newspapers commented on the racial situation in the U.S.

The Communist VOLKSSTIMME launched a violent attack against the U.S. which it compared with the nazi regime. The NEUES OESTERREICH, a coalition paper, was milder in tone but expressed indignation at the racial policies in the U.S.

Communist comments ran in the following vein:

> American democracy again covered itself with the insult of race prejudice and race hysteria. The victors are again the reactionaries who are determined to preserve their white 'predominance' by every possible means...for them their power, their right to exploit is at stake...intimidation, injustice and force are not too excessive to suppress the Negroes and keep their cheap labor supply.
>
> They cannot expect the workers in Austria to defend the 'freedom' of the blood-soiled American regime and to join in a war for their benefit. For what freedom? For the freedom of Krupp, the 'Kanonenkoenig.' For a freedom which is only understood by the American mass murderers.
>
> The brutal legal murder of Negro boys, the current justice of lynch law, the cultivation of race hatred are current in America today, as were pogroms in Hitler's Third Reich.
>
> The accomplishment of the sevenfold legal murder, despite world protest, shows that the government wanted under all circumstances to preserve race hatred and officially to keep racial murder as an essential of the American body politic. Despite enormous waves of protest from the whole world the last three of the seven innocent Negroes from Martinsville were brought to the electric chair...Truman could have prevented the legal murder through his intervention. He did not do it and, therefore, agrees with this action.

The NEUES OESTERREICH commented as follows:

...The Allies want to advise us how to establish a democratic community. Advice is given in detail. Therefore, we have learned, as pupils, that the principle of race-unity belongs to democratic principles and must be protected by law.

Recently seven Negroes were executed in America and the whole world is aware that they were executed because they belong to the black race. They were accused on charges of rape - but it never happened in the State of Virginia that a white individual was sentenced to death on the same charge ....Even in cases of proven guilt, such a mass execution is not justified in Virginia or anywhere in the world and can only be explained on the grounds of race hatred and race delusion, an absolute anti-democratic motive, which we Austrians know without being instructed.

The sentence and its execution caused great dissatisfaction in all democratic countries - even in America herself. For that reason, it would be unjustifiable to blame the American people as a whole for this act.

No democracy is without mistakes, not even the American one...What is applicable to larger countries applies also to the smaller. Our own democracy is not faultless. But what we must deny is instruction by others who are themselves in need of instruction. We established our democratic institution entirely by our own efforts and in the spirit of our immortalized architect of the State and his followers. It is a good democracy, one of the best all over the world. We do not need any instruction from outside, not from the country of the black race delusions nor from other countries.

# # #

(Sources: Negro Yearbook, 1947, and Jessie Daniel Ames, The Changing Character of Lynching.)

DEFINITION OF LYNCHING

Legal Definition

The writers of Federal anti-lynching legislation have accepted the following definition of lynching:

> "Any assemblage of three or more persons which shall exercise or attempt to exercise by physical violence and without authority of law any power of correction or punishment over any citizen or citizens or other person or persons in the custody of any peace officer, or suspected of, charged with, or convicted of the commission of any offense, with the purpose or consequence of preventing the apprehension or trial or punishment by law of such citizen or citizens, person or persons, shall shall constitute a 'mob' within the meaning of this Act. Any such violence by a mob which results in the death or maiming of the victim or victims thereof shall constitute 'lynching' within the meaning of this Act: Provided, however, That 'lynching' shall not be deemed to include violence occurring between members of groups of law-breakers such as are commonly designated as gangsters or racketeers, nor violence occurring during the course of picketing or boycotting or any incident in connection with any 'labor dispute' as that term is defined and used in the Act of March 23, 1932 (Sec. 2, 47 Stat. 70, H. R. 1507 - Van Nuys).

Definition Agreed upon at Tuskegee Conference, 1940 (Attended by representatives of the NAACP, Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching, the Department of Records and Research at Tuskegee, the white press, and the Negro press.)

The following supplementary definition of lynching was unanimously agreed upon:

> "There must be legal evidence that a person has been killed, and that he met his death illegally at the hands of a group acting under the pretext of service to justice, race, or tradition."

This definition broadens the legal definition to include acts of a mob based solely on the race of the victim.

Comments

Mrs. Jessie Daniel Ames (in The Changing Character of Lynching) comments that the Tuskegee definition is weak in that "it in effect could be made to convert into a lynching the death of every Negro at the hands of white persons". (p. 30)

However, she also states that "indubitably lynchings [are] killings committed by a limited number of persons for personal reasons, but understood by the community as disciplinary measures, regrettable but accepted as necessary under the South's social code. No precise legal terms can be applied to these lynchings to distinguish them from murder, yet the South knows the spirit which inspired them. No protests by officials from the governor down can make such murders less than lynchings so long as the community, by its failure to punish the murderers, supports the act as accessories after the fact." (p. 31)

TH

WEATHER
AND STOCK MARKET
STILL UNSETTLED

GEORGIA

"A Government Of P

VOL. 15 NO. 46 THURSDAY, MARCH 25, 1948 (4)

"SOUTHERN SEN
TREASON," NEG

PENN. CONGRESSMAN DEMANDS GA. PROBE

WASHINGTON, March 18—Rep. Herman P. Eberharter, D., Pa., wants the House Un-American Activies committee to investigate the "brutal treatment"' accorded three newspapermen by the Ku Klux Klan in Georgia recently.

Eberharter read to the house a newspaper account of the KKK treatment of two reporters and a photographer. He said the incident occured near Columbus, last week.

"This was done in an effort to suppress freedom of the press," Eberharter said, "I say this is un-American and I call upon the un-American activities committee to investigate."

TRIBUNE JOINS DEMAND

March 22, 1948

Mr. Herman P. Eberharter,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

My dear Mr. Eberharter:

I note with interest the AP and the UP dispatches that has received such wide publicity was conceived and executed to keep a pro-labor daily from coming into existence, to crush competition, to gain sympathy in a losing battle with its public in its anti-labor fight, and to pose as the defender of the public interest.

In taking the side of this paper on the floor of the House, and under the standard of this anti-labor paper, many of your constituents are interested in your reaction to the anti-union fight being waged under the guise of this alleged news incident.

Believing in that interest, we are taking the privilege of furnishing each newspaper in your district with a copy of this letter, and placing a copy on file with each of the labor unions there.

But, we are with you in the demand for a full investigation and report to the people of America on the lengths to which newspaper owners can charge called a "true-bill" or indictment, and the accused natives are made to face trial before 12 of their own kind, called a traverse or trial jury. A native judge travels from place to place, like the old pied-a-terre, or "dusty-foot" courts, hearing the complaints against the natives and meting out punishments varying from burning at the stake to mere loss of a hand or foot for trival offenses. Of coarse, foreigners are not subject to t boos, or laws, bu extra-territorial

"Federal Courts."

So interesting w
Georgia now, tha offers to pay the
of a mission by y ritory. We will t
for you to witne native orgies so report to the peo
sylvania on the these amusing will, of course, b safe-conduct by th
ia.

The people are band themselves
cording to their

(continued on

Week's Developm
In Klan Story

1. Georgia Power Company general counsel e as attorneys for Ledger reporters.

2. GBI's McLemore leaves case for more int der case in Florida. May return later.

3. Local Negroes reported to have contribut
"prosecution fund" against Tribune editor.

THE
A TRIBUNE
nt Of Principles, Not Men"

(4) COLUMBUS, GEORGIA PRICE FIVE CENTS

THIS SPACE FOR RENT TO ANYBODY EXCEPT HENRY WALLACE

ENATORS NEAR TO NEGROES CHARGE

not subject to the native taboos, or laws, but are tri in extra-territorial courts ed "Federal Courts."

So interesting would you find Georgia now, that the Tribune offers to pay the entire expense of a mission by you to the territory. We will try an arrange for you to witness one of the native orgies so that you can report to the people of Pennsylvania on the progress of these amusing people. You will, of course, be guaranteed safe-conduct by the local militia.

The people are beginning to band themselves in groups according to their skills. The

(continued on page 4)

velopments
Story

y general counsel enters the case ers.

case for more interesting mur-
later.

to have contributed $10,000 to bune editor.

Negro Blames U.S. Disarmament On Southern Revolt its own grave."

White intimated that Suthern Senators and Congressmen had sought to trade their support for the European Recovery Plan against the Civil Rights Plan, and directly charged that they had attempted to block American armament in favor f Southern Segregation. "The Southerners", he said, "Are ruining our international relations, particularly with Russia, and Russia is proving that the U. S. is a hypocritical nation when it claims it is democratic."

SOUTHERNERS STALIN AIDES, SPEAKER SAYS

"If I were Joe Starlin I would just turn over money to the Southern 'revolters' and let them establish a communis-

"This was done in an effort to suppress freedom of the press," Eberharter said, "I say this is un-American and I call upon the un-American activities committee to investigate."

TRIBUNE JOINS DEMAND

March 22, 1948

Mr. Herman P. Eberharter,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

My dear Mr. Eberharter:

I note with interest the AP and the UP dispatches that you have demanded on the floor of the House that the House Un-American Activities take cognizance of the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer reporter matter, and investigate it completely.

The Georgia Trbune joins with you in this demand and we are writing to each of our respective representatives in both houses asking that the Committee take jurisdiction and render a full report on the matter, with appropriate recommendations for whatever action is indicated.

The editor of this paper would be happy to accept the first subponea for the investigation, because the editor of this paper is foroed into the position of being an unwitting and unwilling witness for the "hooded knights" who are charged with this outrage, and because the widespread publicity has centered attention on Georgia, he believes it his public duty to do all possible to see that the complete and true story reaches the public.

Therefore, we join with you in your demand.

Let us give you a little more background than has heretofore appeared. Inclosed herewith is a copy of the current issue of our little paper which gives its poor presentation of the facts, together with some of the background material which plainly shows the motive for these charges.

By a strange coincidence, the two papers which make the charges have locked out its printers who were members of the International Typographical Union and were at the time of these charges and are still operating with non-union, strike-breaking printers. The two papers had dropped more than 5000 subscribers and this paper, The Georgia Tribune, was opened for the purpose of competing with the two established non-union papers. It was taking away the subscribers almost as fast as the other two papers were dropping them.

This paper, The Georgia Tribune, will operate with union contracts and each employee will be an owner when it transfers to a daily basis.

Therefore, the stunt which your reaction to the anti-union fight being waged under the guise of this alleged news incident.

Believing in that interest, we are taking the privilege of furnishing each newspaper in your district with a copy of this letter, and placing a copy on file with each of the labor unions there.

But, we are with you in the demand for a full investigation and report to the people of America on the lengths to which newspaper owners can go in utilizing the Taft-Hartley Act and manufactured news to beat down the men whose capital is their skill and brains.

Georgia has been nortorious for keeping its nose out of Pennsylvania affairs outside of a trifling incident at Gettysburg in 1863. Since that time Georgia has developed so much that we believe a mission here would do much in the way of educating Pennsylvania in its new ways.

You would hardly recognize the country now. Many of the natives have embraced the Christian faith and have stopped eating each other. They are being taught to eat a kind of bread made of maize, or corn, instead of using it to make the native okolehau or moonshine as they formerly did. Many of them wear a rude sort of clothing made of a heavy blue denim an they labor with their crude tools in the fields or at their homemade looms. Some of them are being taught to read and write by the missionaries, and there is talk of the iron-horse coming into the territory. Some radicals are insisting that soon the native will be ready for the franchise, or vote, which makes their overseers fidgety.

There is a sort of rough art coming into being, and some of the hoganns are amusingly decorated with it. The natives produced on their homemade instruments a kind of single-theme music which they call "hill-billy" in which the motif is not unlike the mournful single-themes of the more morbid Russian composers.

The missionaries have almost succeeded in doing away with the abandonment of baby girls, and are working on the abolition of polygamy and suttee The establishment of a school is expected at any time now. The natives have a kind of vigilante group which they call police which enforce their tribal laws.

Along with these vigilantes which enforce the tribal taboon, or laws, they have a sort of inqusitorial body known as Grand Juries, somewhat akin to the Hundred Courts of William the Conquerer. After its infuest, they return a sort of

Week's Developme
In Klan Story

1. Georgia Power Company general counsel e as attorneys for Ledger reporters.

2. GBI's McLemore leaves case for more int der case in Florida. May return later.

3. Local Negroes reported to have contribut "prosecution fund" against Tribune editor.

4. Huxford & Garges, private detectives from style themselves "Investigative Consultants" enter of Ledger and begin exhaustive and exhausting dence, reporting to Power Company counsel.

5. Power Company's general counsel reque 2-week delay in Manchester City case for commo against Ledger reporters and photographer.

6. Local pathologist at City Hospital release no narcotics found in tests from reporters and but that trace of "chloral hydrate" was found.

7. Pennsylvanian demands Congressional inv reporter incident.

8. TRIBUNE joins him.

9. Ledger in Sunday editorial lays the whol fellow named Talmadge.

10. Private Detective Huxford offers TRIB grapher "interesting job" during interview.

11. Ledger reporters spread rumor of Klan pa Harris County on eve of primary election last We no Negroes vote. Only reporters parade, Klan does

12. Georgia Power Company cancels GEO BUNE'S advertising contract.

13. Drew Pearson blames it on Mrs. Jenkins.

14. WGBA and WGBA-FM after calling all w BUNE editor to reply to charges, does not run charges, does not run the reply on "comparable would have been Saturday March 20th at 6:00 P March 21st and 12:00 noon, and Sunday at 5:05 BUNE'S petition to Federal Communication amended to show the refusal to run statement on time.

15. Ledger-Enquirer owners and editors ser traction demand notice.

16. Manchester, Georgia, site of alleged outrag mysterious strangers hunting some person to pay dues" to.

17. Tribune editor at Southern Conference of Association for the Advancement of Colored People denying that he was connected with the Columbus quirer and being told apologetically by Director didn't know, I just knew they were our friends. I any other paper would be interested enough to co ference.

18. Fellow at local club saying slyly, "If tho at the Ledger just knew it, they could ask for $1000- and get it. They've got that outfit over a barrel!"

19. Local officers at Manchester reading TIM story linking them with Klan, looking a little disgus

20. Life Magazine's John Bryson, who begged ture of the Klan-reporter incident to make the Pi Week, and who stayed to listen for an hour to TRIBU intelligence testing voters, keeping his promise t South a fair break in the story." No mention of was made in Life, in spite of Time's heavily editoria

21. Bystander at bus station shouting to loc holding up heavily soused prisoner, "Let him go, reporter that's been forced to do it!"

22. New expression of disbelief made by one to another, "Excuse me, but has that story been slo velopments Story

general counsel enters the case rs.

case for more interesting mur-
ater.

to have contributed $10,000 to une editor.

e detectives from Atlanta, who Consultants" enter case on side and exhausting hunt for eviany counsel.

ral counsel requests and gets y case for common drunkeness otographer.

y Hospital releases report that n reporters and photographer, te" was found.

Congressional investigation of rial lays the whole thing on a ford offers TRIBUNE photo-interview.

rumor of Klan parade all over y election last Wednesday and parade, Klan does not.

any cancels GEORGIA TRI-

on Mrs. Jenkins.

after calling all week for TRIes, does not run the reply to on "comparable time" which h 20th at 6:00 P.M., Sunday,
d Sunday at 5:05 P. M. TRI-Communication Commission run statement on comparable rs and editors served with re-te of alleged outrage filled with me person to pay their "Klan hern Conference of the National t of Colored People indignantly with the Columbus Ledger-En-ically by Director Current, "I were our friends. I didn't know ested enough to cover our conaying slyly, "If those reporters could ask for $1000-a-week raise fit over a barrel!"

hester reading TIME magazine
oking a little disgusted.

Bryson, who begged for one pic-nt to make the Picture of the r an hour to TRIBUNE plan for ping his promise to "give the y." No mention of the incident me's heavily editorialized story.

ion shouting to local policeman oner, "Let him go, he's just a do it!"

belief made by one cab driver that story been slobber-tested?"

EXECUTIVE SECRETARY OF NEGRO ORDER "WE WILL WIN!" CRIES WALTER WHITE

Three thousand Negroes and two white men listened in the timbered chapel at Tuskegee Institute last Sunday as Walter White, Executive Secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, lashed out at Southern Congressmen who, he charged, "came to treasonable action," when they sought to barter their support on the National Armament bill as the price for abandoning the administration's Civil Rights program.

White, whose speech came as a climax to a 2 day Regional Conference of Negro leaders from 375 branches in 7 Southern States, denounced the Southern "revolt" before the 300 delegates to the Conference and approximately 2700 other Negro leaders from the South. Two White men, a GEORGIA TRIBUNE reporter and a photographer were present.

Before a charmed audience, the Negro author and leader of 500,000 NAACP members, blasted the "Regional Plan," of higher education suggested by the Southern Governors' Conference as "prostituting the memory of Booker T. Washington," and avowed the intention of his organization to beat it to the ground. Nothing less, he said, than complete surrender of segregation barriers will satisfy the "thinking people of both races."

White, who is one sixty-fourth Negro, is a small, blond, blue eyed man of quiet demeanor, dressed in excellent taste. The author of "With Rope And Faggot" and other books dealing with lynching and rioting, he is the world's most articulate authority on Negro rights.

"NOT PROUD OF SOUTHERN BIRTH."

White was introduced by Dr. Joseph A. Berry,physician in the local Veterans Administration Hospital and president of the local branch of NAACP, as the man who "personally introduced President Roosevelt to the NAACP." White began his speech with a humorous story which was told to him, he said, "by my good friend, Claude Pepper," and immediately launched into a tirade against "the progressional Southerner who is imperilling America today." "I was born in the South," he saidsaid, "But I'm not proud of it." The day of the professional Southerner is drawing to a close, and the better people of the South are co-operating with the NAACP in its fight to implement the U. S. Constitution and the Ten Commandments."

SENATORS "WOULD BE KLUXERS," NEGRO SECRETARY CHARGES

White spoke scornfully of "the so-called Southern revolt in Congress by would-be Ku Kluxers who are making the welkin ring with their shouts to retain the infamous system of segregation," and "who will be found right on in the Democratic column when November rolls arould because the one party South is digging ed to block American armament in favor f Southern Segregation. "The Southerners", he said, "Are ruining our international relations, particularly with Russia, and Russia is proving that the U. S. is a hypocritical nation when it claims it is democratic."

SOUTHERNERS STALIN AIDES, SPEAKER SAYS

"If I were Joe Starlin I would just turn over money to the Southern 'revolters' and let them establish a communistic nation with it," White said. America can never have satisfactory international relations, the Negro leader said, until the Civil Rights bill is passed and enforced in its entirety.

"NEGROES ELECT PRESIDENT ANYWAY," WHITE ASSERTS

The speaker said that the South played no part in the last two presidential elections and the result would have been the same if every Southern state had voted in the Republican column. "Negroes," he said, "hold the balance of power with its potential vote in 17 states of the U. S. with 297 electoral college votes, and only 266 are necessary to elect a president. John Temple Graves of Birmingham said that if the white people of the South used their 30 per cent of the population as intelligently as Walter White uses his 9.8 per cent of the population, it would be better off."

WILL DEFEAT REGIONAL COLLEGE PROPOSAL

Turning his attention to the Southern Governers' Plan for Negroes to be supported by mutual tax contributions, White said, "The Governors south of the 'Smith and Wesson Line' have proposed to get around the case in Oklahoma by setting up segregation institutes of higher learning. NAACP will defeat this plan in the United States Supreme Court. Already the case of Heman Sweat, who was denied admission to the University of Texas, is in the Federal Courts and we will win!"

WHITE BRANCH OF NAACP ON TEXAS U. CAMPUS

There is no prejudice among the students at the U. of Texas against Heman Sweat or any of us. There is no prejudice anywhere at the graduate or professional level. Already, the white friends of Heman Sweat have established an all white branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People on the campus of the U. of Texas. I can promise you that as soon as his case is heard in

(continued on page 3)

RECEIVED
30 1949
Southern Regional Council

The American Legion's Exposure of Hate Groups

Extension of Remarks of

Hon. Sidney R. Yates

of Illinois

in the House of Representatives

Thursday, October 6, 1949

Not printed at Government expense

United States Government Printing Office, Washington : 1949

860767—31973

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SIDNEY R. YATES

OF ILLINOIS

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report entitled "Subversive Activities of Hate Groups" of the Americanism commission, Department of Illinois of the American Legion:

The American public is becoming increasingly aware that there exist organizations which, under the guise of spreading the principles of Americanism, create discord and misunderstandings among all races, creeds, and colors, contrary to our basic democratic concepts. The American Legion membership has fought for a long time the dangerous and totalitarian precepts of the Communists and Communist front groups. During recent years, it has become aware of other types of anti-Democratic organizations. The Legion's exposure of these organizations has been a great factor in curbing the growth and, indeed, in some cases, putting out of business these potentially un-American organizations in the United States. It is our view that communism, fascism, socialism or any other form of totalitarianism cannot be countenanced by our membership which must fight these un-American activities.

At the Miami 1948 National Convention of the American Legion, two resolutions, in particular, were passed that form the basis and motivation of this report. These resolutions are quoted below:

"Resolution 264

"Whereas, for God and country, we have again assembled to renew our pledge of allegiance to the principles upon which the American Legion was founded, to consolidate the victories already won and to organize our resources for the battles still ahead; and

"Whereas, the events of the passing year have emphasized more than ever before those dangers to our liberty which spring to life during the slightest relaxation of that eternal and self-sacrificing vigilance which keeps men free: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in national convention, assembled in Miami, Fla., October 18–21, 1948, That we again declare our undying allegiance to the faith of our fathers, the faith that founded a nation of free individuals creating and employing the powers of government only to make their freedom the more secure and their liberty the more desirable, a nation in legend and in fact the last great hope of a theretofore bewildered and enslaved humanity; be it further

"Resolved, That we propose to see to it that this last great hope of man be not lost either to enemies invading from without, or traitors corrupting from within; that this government of free men, by free men, and for the freedom of men shall not be lost either to those who would become tyrants for their own selfish interests or to those whose vulnerability to the songs of Utopia make them the easy prey of fascistic and communistic totalitarianisms; be it further

"Resolved, That we go forth from this convention to warn all those who believe in Americanism that in this hour of national peril, the time is later than we think; that their defense of the life they love must be prompt, thorough, united, and militant; that they and we, defending our Nation in its maturity, are not worthy of the trust given us if we do not pledge to the cause, as did those defending it in its infancy, our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor; be it further here and now highly

"Resolved, That we recognize the time of the battle as now, the place of the battle as here, and that we enter the fray in the firm determination that our zeal for Americanism shall be unmatched in degree by the fanaticism of its worst enemies, and that the ultimate victory shall certainly be ours, for God and country."

"Resolution 621

"Whereas it has been the policy of the American Legion, as part of its Americanism program, to condemn and oppose all forms of subversive activities, whether they be manifested by an appeal to racial hatreds and prejudices or by attempts to divide this Nation into industrial strife by agitating and fomenting trouble between capital and labor, and economic group against economic group; and

"Whereas communism is an ideology, a state of mind, a bundle of emotion, which has skillfully organized and developed, with many secret and conspiratorial aspects, to serve where required as a fifth column for the Government of Soviet Russia; and

"Whereas many Communists, Communist sympathizers, and their fellow travelers are reliably reported to have secured employment in confidential and key positions in public office, political and labor organizations, and particularly in the teaching profession in our schools and colleges; and

"Whereas subversive organizations and individuals are continuing their vicious campaigns of propaganda to disunite and divide the American people, setting class against class, race against race, and creed against creed; and

"Whereas these un-American forces are disrupting national unity in these critical postwar years, when victory on the home front and peace in the world are as important as was victory on the battle front; and

"Whereas some form of legitimate democratic action is necessary as a defense against Communist betrayal of our form of government and to insure the safety and security of our Nation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That we call upon the people of our Nation to oppose this threat to American unity and urge our fellow citizens of all races, colors, and creeds to demonstrate that same spirit of cooperation that was evidenced by our armed forces on the battlefronts in our fight against aggression, bigotry, and intolerance, and fight every attempt of these un-American forces to destroy the fundamental principles of life, liberty, justice, and freedom guaranteed by our Constitution."

The American Legion has always stood for an Americanism based on the dignity and equality of all human beings and has been sternly vocal against false Americanism doctrines that attempt to foster religious, racial, or class hatred among the American people. The American Legion firmly believes that it has helped and can help further in the eradication of religious and racial strife in the United States by exposing to its membership and their families those organizations, groups, individuals, sometimes through publications, radio, and on public platforms, who seek to destroy a harmonious and democratic America.

Therefore, in this new 1949 report of the Americanism Commission Department of Illinois of the American Legion, we shall list and discuss many of the existing organizations whose purposes and techniques are contrary to the basic moral and legal values of American citizenship. We do this, strongly believing, that when the entire membership of the American Legion knows fully about these organizations, and individuals, it will not only not fall victim to them, but it will continue to expose the true character of these organizations and individuals to the entire American populations and individuals that foster racial and religious hatreds. The Department of Illinois, American Legion, has in other exposures emphasized and reiterated its opposition to the equally dangerous Communist groups in the United States. The same is true of the national organization.

After a careful study of the activities of many organizations, we have reached the conclusion that those listed below are inimical to the best interests of American democracy. These organizations are anti-American since they pit class against class, race against race, and creed against creed, and make appeals with varying degrees of emphasis—all with the purpose of creating chaos and disunity among our people.

860767—31973

Anglo-Saxon Federation, Haverhill, Mass., Howard Rand, leader.

The Anglo-Saxon Federation is a group which preaches the theory that they are the true descendants of Israel. They resort to anti-Catholicism and anti-Semitism. Operating under various names, the group has its counterpart in all of the English speaking countries. In the United States, it has chapters in Chicago, Dayton, Portland, Los Angeles, and Boston. The official publication of the Anglo-Saxon Federation is a monthly magazine called Destiny.

Christian Nationalist Crusade, Christian Nationalist Party, Patriotic Tract Society, St. Louis, Mo., Gerald L. K. Smith, leader.

Gerald L. K. Smith is probably the most vicious of the rabble-rousing and sensational hatemongers operating today. He has followers throughout the country, and his literature distribution has reached large proportions.

The Patriotic Tract Society is a paper organization that is used as a front for the distribution of this literature. The official publication of Smith's outfits is the Cross and the Flag. Typical of the false and dangerous doctrines that have appeared in this publication are the following excerpts from the May 1949, issue.

"We believe in the complete social and political segregation of the black and white races in America. * * *

"The danger to the white race comes from the aspirations of the Jewish race to dominate the world."

Citizens Protective League, New York, N. Y., Kurt Mertig, leader.

The Citizens Protective League has been a rallying point for Bund elements and native Fascists. On January 10, 1946, Mertig was arrested for unlawful assembly, and drew a sentence of 6 months in the workhouse and served his time. The Citizens Protective League was branded "subversive" by Attorney General Tom Clark in May 1948.

Constitutional Educational League, New York, N. Y., Joseph P. Kamp, leader.

The Constitutional Educational League's main activity is pamphleteering. Pamphlets issued by the group try to create religious hostility. In its accusations of "Communist infiltration," it makes malicious and irresponsible charges against responsible and respected groups and individuals who are working to strengthen and improve our democracy. The league is a personal vehicle of Kamp's which sells its pamphlets at profiteering prices in order to insure a good living for him.

Great Pyramid Club, Los Angeles, Calif., Ray and Sam Capt, leaders.

Among the leadership of this group are a number of former klansmen. Rev. Wesley Swift has been a regular speaker before this organization. Swift is a former klansman and a known rabble rouser. He has a reputation of being the west coast's most vicious hatemonger.

House of Prayer for All People, Denver, Colo., Rev. William L. Blessing, leader.

Blessing preaches the Anglo-Saxon Federation's type of religion, although he is not directly connected with the group. He is not only anti-Semitic, but frequently makes vitriolic attacks upon the Catholic Church. Blessing's official publication is called Showers of Blessing. A typical quote from his publication is the following taken from the May 13, 1949, issue:

"How much better off would we in this country be if Roman Catholicism were completely defeated—not a Roman Catholic left in the country?"

Judge Armstrong Foundation, Fort Worth, Tex., George W. Armstrong, leader.

The Judge Armstrong Foundation was set up to support financially those divisionist "nationalist" groups in which Armstrong was interested. Armstrong is an independently wealthy man, and has written several anti-Democratic pamphlets. In one of his pamphlets Armstrong urged the repeal of sections of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution "thereby limiting the franchise to the Nation's white Americans," another aspect of the "white supremacy" doctrine.

Ku Klux Klan (Association of Georgia Klans), Atlanta, Ga., Dr. Samuel Green, leader.

We have before us again the hooded secret order and its fiery cross. Its methods of intimidation and terrorism have long been the disgust and disdain of law-abiding citizens. Antimask laws have been passed in a number of southern States, in an attempt to curb the order. The Klan is, of course, not only anti-Negro, anti-Jewish, and anti-Catholic, but extends its cruel and inhuman activities against veterans. Recent indictments and resultant convictions of those guilty of these illegal acts are eagerly expected by all law-abiding and law-observing citizens.

Loyal American Group, Union, N. J., Conde McGinley, leader.

This organization was set up by McGinley for the purpose of promoting his hatemongering paper Common Sense. Numerous meetings have been held in New Jersey, at which some of the most poisonous literature published has been offered for sale. The Loyal American Group and Common Sense have been denounced by patriotic organizations and by official Catholic bodies. The official publication of this group is called Common Sense.

Lutheran Research Society, Detroit, Mich., Lawrence Reilly, leader.

The Lutheran Research Society is an independent venture and has no connection with the official Lutheran Synod, a respected organization. This society does not hold regular meetings but it has sponsored the appearance in Detroit of Don Lohbeck and Kenneth Goff, representatives of Gerald L. K. Smith. The official publication of this group is called Eleventh Hour.

National Blue Star Mothers, Philadelphia, Pa., Catherine V. Brown, leader.

A violently hatemongering group. It labels its critics as either "Jews" or "Reds." This group distributed masses of hate literature at the Democratic and Republican conventions held in Philadelphia in 1948. They tried to cause disturbances to focus attention on their activities. This group has recently been cited by the Attorney General's office as being subversive.

National Economic Council, New York, N. Y., Merwin K. Hart, leader.

Merwin K. Hart operates his National Economic Council with an aura of respectability. Recently, Hart abandoned his subtle innuendoes and showed his true character by resorting to anti-Semitic items in his publications and speeches. The official publication of this group is the Economic Council Letter.

National Renaissance Party, Beacon, N. Y., James H. Madole, leader.

The National Renaissance Party is a one-man paper antidemocratic organization. Madole is given to one-man crusades which have fancy titles, such as "The Animist Party," "National Renaissance Party," etc. He has made several attempts to unify the nationalist movement in the United States. The following are two of the published aims of this group:

1. "Nationalization of our people through an educational campaign among college, church, and labor groups."

2. "Termination of political bureaucracy and establishment of rule by the intellectual elite."

Nationalist Action League, Philadelphia, Pa., W. Henry MacFarland, Jr., leader.

The Nationalist Action League was recently set up by MacFarland, a Philadelphia extremist. It is a political action group, aimed at influencing voters and legislation. MacFarland works closely with such known rabble-rousers as Catherine V. Brown, of the National Blue Star Mothers, Gerald L. K. Smith, etc. The official publication of this group, National Progress, has, as of June 1, 1949, been consolidated with Common Sense, the official publication of the Loyal American group.

Organized Americans of German Ancestry, Chicago, Ill., Leonard Enders, leader.

A number of leaders of this group were former Bund members and key figures in the old pro-Nazi Einheitsfront. The ostensible purpose of the group is to weld all German-Americans together in order to form a powerful political bloc.

Original Southern Klans, Inc., Columbus, Ga., Alton E. Pate, leader.

A splinter Klan group which is openly anti-Negro, anti-Semitic, and anti-Catholic, and whose aim is the defense of white Protestant America. The official publication of this group is called the Klansman.

Pro-American Information Bureau, Hinckley, Ill., Andrew B. McAllister, leader.

The Pro-American Information Bureau is a clearing house for hate literature. McAllister has made several unsuccessful attempts to coordinate the hate groups and has held several conferences in Hinckley, attended by representatives of a number of these groups.

Protestant War Veterans of the United States, New York, N. Y., Edward James Smythe, leader.

A one-man paper organization, which publishes anti-Semitic and anti-Catholic leaflets and pamphlets. Apparently the funds solicited by Smythe through his organization are his sole source of income. He is a habitual drunkard with no ostensible means of support. In a recent brochure, published by this group, the following slogan was printed in bold type: "We stand opposed to racial and social equality."

Public Affairs Forum, Los Angeles, Calif., Earl Craig, leader.

A hate organization, which holds regular meetings. The gatherings of the forum are the rendezvous of a number of other notorious rabble-rousers and a distributing point for a great deal of hate literature.

Not only are there organizations which by their policies and techniques attempt to further disunity among the American people, but there are a number of publications that have no organizational affiliations which try to contribute to the same pernicious goal. Below are listed some of the more important of these publications (name, address, and editor):

American Digest, Americus, Ga., Dewey Taft.

Beacon Light Herald, Atascadero, Calif., William Kullgren.

Bible News Flashes, Faribault, Minn., William D. Herrstrom.

Boise Valley Herald, Middleton, Idaho, A. Boyd and I. W. Cornell.

Broom, San Diego, Calif., C. Leon DeAryan.

Christian Veterans Political Counsel, Chicago, Ill., Frederick Kister.

Dayton Independent, Dayton, Ohio, A. G. Silvey.

Defender, Wichita, Kans., Gerald B. Winrod.

Free Press, Redmond, Oreg., Syd D. Pierce.

Georgia Tribune, Columbus, Ga., "Parson" Jack Johnston.

Guildsman, Germantown, Ill., Edward A. Koch.

Kingdom Digest, Fort Worth, Tex., J. A. Lovell.

Malist, Meriden, Conn., Henry S. Sattler.

Methodist Challenge, Los Angeles, Calif., Robert P. Shuler.

Ohio Pioneer, Dayton, Ohio, Ohio Pioneer, Inc.

Prayer Circle Letter, Wichita, Kans., publisher, Gerald B. Winrod.

Truth and Liberty, Minneapolis, Minn., C. O. Stadaklev.

Williams' Intelligence Summary, Hollywood, Calif., Robert H. Williams.

The American Legion has on many occasions warned its membership of activities of some of the groups and publications listed above. Ever since the end of World War II the American Legion, Department of Illinois, has energetically gone on record every year in condemning all those organizations and publications which try to foster disunity in our country. Other sections of the Legion have opposed those groups similarly. For example, in January of 1949 the Legionnaire, official publication of the American Legion, Department of New York, warned its membership not to have anything to do with the publication Common Sense, the Union, N. J., paper published by Conde McGinley. The Legion publication referred to Common Sense as "a hate sheet," and said that Common Sense is "violently anti-Semitic and in direct conflict with the principles of the American Legion." In a recent issue, April-May 1949, of the Summary of Trends and Developments Exposing the Communist Conspiracy, published by the national Americanism commission, subcommittee on subversive activities, of the American Legion, a number of the organizations listed above were classified by this publication as subversive; for example, the National Blue Star Mothers of America and Original Southern Klans, Inc.

The chairman of Americanism commission of the American Legion, Department of Illinois, believes that it is the duty of every Americanism chairman of every post and that o. each liberty-loving American not only to familiarize himself with the contents of this report but to be responsible for the creation of positive Americanism programs on this subject throughout the year. This department invites post Americanism chairmen and other citizens to make use of its services in the creation of affirmative and effective Americanism programs in local communities. It is hoped that these programs will carry into effect American Legion mandates against those fostering religious hatreds, hate mongering, and rabble rousing as well as other mandates against those isms which place in peril our established institutions.

ELLIODOR M. LIBONATI,
Chairman, Americanism Commission, Department of Illinois, American Legion.

860767—31973

O

F.D.Westbrooks,Jr.
11 Pryor St.S.W.
Atlanta, Ga.

FAITH IN CHRIST
BRIDGES THE CHASM
TO OUR ETERNAL HOME

The Georgia Tribune

THE TRUTH
IS THE LIGHT
UNTO THE WORLD

VOLUME 19 | COLUMBUS, GEORGIA | THURSDAY, MAY 24, 1951 | NUMBER 4

'NO NEGRO POLICE YET,' COMMISSION RULES AT MEETING

Grenade-Throwing Knocks Out Well Laid Plans To Force Negro Policemen Into Ranks Of White Officers; Reflection On Daily Newspapers And Others; Negroes Hark Back To Jungle Days Of Forefathers In Africa, With Modern Implements Added.

During the past few months the local newspapers (dailies) and others have been extraordinary in their efforts to "Soften up" the citizens of Columbus, working in league with the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored Race in America, and thus playing into the hands of Communists, by insisting that the time was ripe for the mingling of the races. Their first and most potent step was to add Negro Policemen in the Southern cities to the police forces, and they used, as one of their most "reasonable appeals," the "fact" that, "it is working nicely in other Southern cities." However, inasmuch as "time and tide waits for no man," and also in lieu of the fact that the "pretty little stripped cat" will never do to play with, for fear of what his future plans might be!, the whole thing went on the rocks, for the time being, it is thought that some Negro Soldiers, dressed in civilian clothes made the second attempt to murder some of the white policemen, down in one of the ultra Negro sections of Columbus.

The daily press admitted this week (editorially) that "If there

'Roy Martin Day' June Twelfth

An effort is to be made in Phenix City June 12th to honor the memory of Roy Martin, deceased, when the Lion's Club of Phenix City will sponsor a "Roy Martin Day" at an appropriate occasion, when a bronze plaque will be unvailed, and speeches will be made in honor of Mr. Martin's memory.

Mr. Martin, who did more for the recreational interest of Phenix City than any other man and who built the Idle Hour Park, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on the project, and at the time of his untimely death was planning to spend many more thousands, will be honored in Phenix City June 12th., the Lion's Club of Phenix City sponsoring the program which will be at the Martin Theatre at 7:30 P. M., June 12th., will also be appropriate. The plaque will be of bronze, and the likeness of Mr. Martin

(Conintued on Page 3)

Barefooted Robber Gets No Money

Last Sunday night one of the business houses of Phenix City was burglarized, and although the safe was opened, the thief got no money. A man by the name of Mayo has been taken into custody, and is under a $2,500 bond. Someone reported to have seen a certain kind of automobile leave the place in the car, driven by a Negro. It seems that the white man abandoned the car, and was captured, but the Negro and the car escaped. The officers, it is reported, saw the car, but was unable to apprehend it.

During the past few months the local newspapers (dailies) and others have been extraordinary in their efforts to "Soften up" the citizens of Columbus, working in league with the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored Race in America, and thus playing into the hands of Communists, by insisting that the time was ripe for the mingling of the races. Their first and most potent step was to add Negro Policemen in the Southern cities to the police forces, and they used, as one of their most "reasonable appeals," the "fact" that, "it is working nicely in other Southern cities." However, inasmuch as "time and tide waits for no man," and also in lieu of the fact that the "pretty little stripped cat" will never do to play with, for fear of what his future plans might be!, the whole thing went on the rocks, for the time being, it is thought that some Negro Soldiers, dressed in civilian clothes made the second attempt to murder some of the white policemen, down in one of the ultra Negro sections of Columbus.

The daily press admitted this week (editorially) that "If there is a conjunction between these incidents (referring to the Grenade-tossing incidents) and the effort on behalf of Negro policemen, someone is being ill-advised." Now, it seems that it is not impossible for our daily newspapers to finally see a point, and this is hopeful, indeed.

Certainly, this is an effort on the part of someone to urge the attention of the people to the need of having "Negroes look after negroes," by placing negro policemen on beats where negroes are prevalent, but their agreement will not work, and their plans shall not stand. It would be a serious thing for, the people of Columbus to sit idly by and permit the NAACP and their well-wishers to crucify the blood bought rights of Southern white people on the cross of negroism. However "good the plan may be working in other cities," Columbus must work out her own salvation, and there is no room for argument, we 'just don't need negro policemen; not yet!", says the Columbus city commission.

Columbus Commissioners Rise Up As One Man

In their meeting this week (Tuesday), the Columbus City Commissioners arose with blood in their eyes, and the lead was taken by Jesse Binns, one of America's World War II veterans, when he spoke his piece relative to the effort of certain elements, in league with a well planned trick of Walter White, and his gang, and the Communistic element of the nation to force negroes into the ranks of white people, and one of their initial steps seem to be the placing of negro policemen on the force of police departments throughout the South. This effort has been going on for many months, not only in Columbus,

(Conintued on Page 3)

June Twelfth

An effort is to be made in Phenix City June 12th to honor the memory of Roy Martin, deceased, when the Lion's Club of Phenix City will sponsor a "Roy Martin Day" at an appropriate occasion, when a bronze plaque will be unvailed, and speeches will be made in honor of Mr. Martin's memory.

Mr. Martin, who did more for the recreational interest of Phenix City than any other man and who built the Idle Hour Park, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars on the project, and at the time of his untimely death was planning to spend many more thousands, will be honored in Phenix City June 12th., the Lion's Club of Phenix City sponsoring the program which will be at the Martin Theatre at 7:30 P. M., June 12th., will also be appropriate. The plaque will be of bronze, and the likeness of Mr. Martin business houses of Phenix City was burglarized, and although the safe was opened, the thief got no money. A man by the name of Mayo has been taken into custody, and is under a $2,500 bond. Someone reported to have seen a certain kind of automobile leave the place in the car, driven by a Negro. It seems that the white man abandoned the car, and was captured, but the Negro and the car escaped. The officers, it is reported, saw the car, but was unable to apprehend it.

(Conintued on Page 3)

White America Should Wake Up! This Map Shows Moscow's Dixie

COMMUNISTS'
"BLUEPRINT FOR A BLACK STATE"

VOLUME 19, NUMBER 4

E. G. Johnston, Editor
A. E. Pate, Associate Editor

THE GEORGIA TRIBUNE EDITORIAL PAGE

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY
By The Georgia Tribune Publishing Company
Entered as Second Class matter March 11, 1948 at the Post-Office at Columbus, Georgia.
--under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879--

THURSDAY, MAY 24, 1951

52 ISSUES FOR $2.00
ADVERTISING RATES FURNISHED ON REQUEST

Fort Benning Is A Target For Communism

There is no doubt that Fort Benning, and this area about Columbus is a target for the Communists, and every precaution is being taken by our officials, without any doubt. The water supply, as well as other public places, Institutions and the individuals as a whole. This business of Communism is not a joke, and too much precaution could not be taken. Therefore each one of us should lend every cooperation to the local and state government in their efforts to stay awake, during these trying hours. There is a possibility that the average individual is far too careless and indifferent abiout this matter, but it could be too late to wake up, my friend.

THE 'ME TOO' AND DESALLE EPISODE

The leaving suddenly of his $53-a-day job by M. E. hompson, who served as "Supply Governor" of Georgia for a little while, and God be thanked that things changed about so that he was removed as early as possible, has caused a joke. At first it was played up by the daily newspapers of Columbus, and a very few others, it looked serious, but the only thing serious about it now is the fact that M. T. is missing that fifty three dollars per day that he had no business with to begin with. Just another one of those New Deal-Fair Deal tricks that was supposed to be played, and was being played, but M. E. Thompson in colaborating with the newspapers of Georgia that hate Governor Talmadge, he (M. E.) jumped when they said "Scat," but he hit a rock that time. Of course, they intend to use this in the next campaign for Governor in Georgia, but we will be able to see it fall to pieces long before the time comes for M. E. to take the stump, and attempt to memic Eugene Talmadge in his vocal tirade against Herman Talmadge.

We do not believe Mr. Thompson is sincere, because he knew all about the situation in Washington, before he went up there, and he collaborated with Harry Truman, and others in the effort to place the FEPC, and other diabolical tricks on the South, and did so, too, because he was trying to beat Talmadge. M. E. Thompson knew that Talmadge was right, but he wanted to be Governor. Well, you could not blame a fellow much for desiring to be Governor, but you will do well to blame any man who works politics at the expense of principles, and contributes to efforts to socialize. and finally Communize this nation.

The best thing M. E. Thompson could do now is to forget DeSalle, and his $53-a-day that used to be; find him a job that will be in his class, and go to work. Perhaps teaching school in his field, most anybody could do that now!

What Bogged Down The Community Chest?

A few years ago an effort was launched by the Daily Papers, and they made it very urgent. that all agencies combine and that we have one "Unified drive," which would "take care of all the agencies that made a practice of begging, or soliciting funds for their up keep," and finally this was done.

We were opposed to it then, and the records will bear this out, and we are opposed to it now. Like the "Urgent plea" for Columbus to "try the Negro police plan," the newspapers kept urging, until they made the grade, and now they are trying to find out "what the trouble is." About 27 per cent of the funds asked for have been given by the public, and they find that the most of the people have stopped in their tracks, which or tell about that? If you have one church associated in this drive, would it not be right and proper to include all the churches? Why should there be any difference, or pertiality shown? There was a day when certain organizations did much good, as they were set up, but when they left the paths laid out for them; organized themselves into a church; observe the ordinances of the Church, and try to make people believe they are a church, and then, at the same time try to take their place, or hold their place in the line of serving the general public, it is time to look around and see what has happened. Twenty years ago, we would see, of ten, members of a certain religious organization (not a church they just think they are) in various churches

THE AMERICAN WAY

Control The Controllers

The Secret Of Prosperity

By George S. Benson

Preprations for national defense have again thrown the spotlight on the mutually beneficial interrelationship of big the continuing stream of new products developed by the big company's research program. Du Pont spent 10 years and $27,000,000 developing and manufacturing its first ounce they intend to use this in the next campaign for Governor in Georgia, but we will be able to see it fall to pieces long before the time comes for M. E. to take the stump, and attempt to memic to be; find him a job that will be in his class, and go to work. Perhaps teaching school in his field, most anybody could do that now!

What Bogged Down The Community Chest?

A few years ago an effort was launched by the Daily Papers, and they made it very urgent. that all agencies combine and that we have one "Unified drive," which would "take care of all the agencies that made a practice of begging, or soliciting funds for their up keep," and finally this was done.

We were opposed to it then, and the records will bear this out, and we are opposed to it now. Like the "Urgent plea" for Columbus to "try the Negro police plan," the newspapers kept urging, until they made the grade, and now they are trying to find out "what the trouble is." About 27 per cent of the funds asked for have been given by the public, and they find that the most of the people have stopped in their tracks, which we knew they would do. There was nothing left to do, and it is right to quit. Nobody should give a thin dime, until the thing is corrected. The movement, in the first place, is leaning towards some sort of Socialistic plan, but the people of America are so bent on "Unification" in all things; they want Religion unified, and when that is done, and it will be done, it wll be a good thing, for the simple reason that none of God's children will be in favor of it, and probably it will be one of the factors in bringing about persecution. It is not Socialism in England that is threatening us; it is not Communism in Russia that we should fear, but it is the loose, slack, and otherwise distorted thinking of the people in America. To be perfectly plain, it's ignorance on the part of leaders here. Socialism, nor Communism comes over night, but little by little, it slips up on nations.

There are agencies among the 17, or 18 that are jumbled up together in the Community Chest drive that should not be there. We do not need to mention any of them, because it would only mean that we are sticking our necks out, and we will not mention them. However, as an illustration may we look at this: If there is an agency associated, or connected, that should not be allowed to participate, just how would you judge, or tell about that? If you have one church associated in this drive, would it not be right and proper to include all the churches? Why should there be any difference, or pertiality shown? There was a day when certain organizations did much good, as they were set up, but when they left the paths laid out for them; organized themselves into a church; observe the ordinances of the Church, and try to make people believe they are a church, and then, at the same time try to take their place, or hold their place in the line of serving the general public, it is time to look around and see what has happened. Twenty years ago, we would see, of ten, members of a certain religious organization (not a church they just think they are) in various churches, and would find them offering their services to any group, or faith, and that was according to the plan of their founder, but now you never see them like that, because they are all for themselves, and are building their "Church," as they actually call it, and the newspapers are so dumb until they never see anything, except those things that please them.

The Community Chest is doomed, as it is set up now, and should be. Of course, there will be those who will not see eye to eye with us, but it will be because the daily press will continue to assist in keeping the people blind to those things that make for our good, as a whole.

There is nothing seriously wrong in allowing all, or any organization to go afield and solicit funds, if they so desire. This is America, and untill we shall have completed our plans, which the Fair Deal is so urgently pushing to socialize Unionize, and otherwise combine everything, dragging them inot, and under one head, let us remain Americans. People should be allowed to give to whatever they may please to give, or to give not at all, and slowly but surely the majority of the people will refrain from supporting the Community Chest, as it is now set up, and this element is doubtless the most paralysing factor associated with it.

Advantages In Weekly Newspaper Advertising

Usually people see advertising mediums once each week, whether in a weekly, daily or radio, and this keeps their business before the people, which is sufficient, and is good advertising. People usually do their buying once each week, for the simple reason the great majority of people get their money once each week. The majority of buyers are to be found among the common, working people, who are the better class of people, after all, if there are any "better" class. They work for their money, and they do not mind spending their money, and this is what makes the clock tick!

When you advertise in a weekly newspaper, you get it cheaper, and if it reaches the people, what more could you want, or how much better should you expect! Then too, the weekly newspaper is read more closely than other kinds of literature that goes to people, because of its personal features, and its local complex. Many cities think they need a daily newspaper, when, really what they need is a good healthy weekly. One of the most leading journalist once said that no man should spend over five minutes reading a daily newspaper, and sometimes you might read what was in it, of interest, much quicker than that! But as most fo the time, people read all the news, and everything else, in a weekly, even the testimonies relative to Hadacol!

The advantages to be had in advertising in a weekly newspaper are legion, and once you try it, you will find out what we mean.

Editorial Sermons:

The Devil never misses an opportunity to stir up strife among friends and neighbors, and his favorite method is to prevent each of us from seeing our own faults, but he is careful to have us magnify the faults of others.

We will never be able to legislate Christianity into people, nor make the world a safe place in which to live.

The longest road in the world is the one we often think we must travel, but never do.

Control The Controllers

The Secret Of Prosperity

By George S. Benson

Preprations for national defense have again thrown the spotlight on the mutually beneficial interrelationship of big and small business. These two segements in our American business system form the productive team which safeguards our nation in wartime and gives our people their unparalleled living standard in peacetime. The manner in which they work together in peacetime goes almost unnoticed. In wartime it is dramatized by urgency and gets written up in newspapers anl magazines.

Almost everyone has read the story of the T41 tank—the "Walker Bulldog." The Army needed lots of them, and in a hurry. No "small" industry, of course, could undertake such a huge job. And yet the big industry that got the job was utterly dependent upon hundreds of "small" industries for parts and raw materials. The manufacture of several hundred parts in the Walker tank was "farmed out" to that many shops and fabricating plants, or "suppliers."

Works Both Ways

The dependency works both ways. In peacetime, especially, the small suppliers look to the big ones for their "meal ticket" business. Many people would no doubt be astonished at the number of families of working people in America who are affected each day by the successful operation of, say the Du Pont chemical company. In peacetime it buys materials anl products from—believe it or not—30,000 other companies! If each had only 100 employees, that would be 3,000,000 people, plus their families, whose economic welfare is dependent to some degree on Du Pont's success.

Again using Du Pont as an illustration, the pay envelopes of a great many other people are affected to some degree by the continuing stream of new products developed by the big company's research program. Du Pont spent 10 years and $27,000,000 developing and manufacturing its first ounce of nylon staple. The new synthetic fiber then created hundreds of new businesses, and literally thousands of business expansions—new hosiery mills anl dress manufacturers, sales force expansions and a hundred-and-one other kinds.

By The Pound

Nylon fibre sells at about $1.50 a pound. My wife and daughters wear some garments made of it. Among them is a nylon dress—cost $32.95. It weighs a pound and three ounces. The Textile mlil which spun the 1.3 pounls of fibre into yarn paid Du Pont $1.95 for it. The difference between this $1.95 and the $32.95 my wife paid for the dress went as wages and profits to the employees and owners of a number of small businesses. These include the spinner who spun the fibre into yarn, the throwster who twisted it, the weaver who made the cloth, the finisher who dyed it, the designer, the cutter, the seamstress—and finally all the people and companies in the channels of wholesaling and retailing.

Of course big industry is dependent upon the small industries for its production progress and its market. But the biggest beneficiary in all this is the consumer. Mrs. Benson says her nylon dress will outwear two silk ones. And the man who pays the bills at our house says it cost less than the silk ones used to, and its upkeep is small. Instead of meeting the cleaning man at the door with his long paper bag and a bill, I find the nylon garments at our house frequently hanging from the shower curtain rod, drying after a quick wash in the basin, and being automatically pressed!

The Danger Of False Rumors On God's Children

Last week, a certain man suddenly died in this vicinity, and the story associated with this man's illness, and sudden death might be of interest, and should be, to all men.

On Saturday morning, May 12th., the gentleman referred to above went into the home of a member of a certain Baptist Church of Columbus, Ga., and deliberately, maliciously, and otherwise unwisely, attacked the character of the pastor of this member. An argument persued, whereupon the "Gentleman," and probably a child of God, continued his attacks, with bitter lies, and accusations against the pastor, until the lady of the house was in the act of ordering him away from her home. He jestingly remarked, "We have had a good time arguing, haven't we?" The lady replied, "No, not me, I am very sorry you came here this morning and disturbed me and by starting this argument caused me to think less of you, because you have deliberately lied on my pastor, and I shall do something about it."

In less than forty-eight hours, God saved the woman from further embarressment by taking the matter into His own hands, and without any doubt, removed the man from this earth. He died, suddenly, and unexpectedly to all, including his family, and thus God vindicated the pastor, as well as protected the woman.

It is strange how people do not think about these things. It is true that God does not kill all of those who lie on people, but it is also true that He does kill some of them, as Ananias, and his wife Sapphira (Acts 5) is evident, as well as Moses,

John W. Johnston To Graduate

Jonh Wade Johnston, son of Mrs. Chloe Johnston, born July 20, 1932 will graduate from Columbus High School this year, and will be the third son of Mrs. Johnston's to finish Columbus High. The former two, Jimmie and William B. William Johnston will finish his first year in Medicine at the University of Georgia this year, havng finished Emory University two years ago.

Mrs. Johnston was left a widow in 1940, when R. H. Johnston, who had been a resident of Columbus for about twelve years, died here. Mrs. Johnston was left with five sons: Robert, Jimmie, William, John Wade, and Roy. Roy is finishing his first year at Columbus High this time. Mrs. Johnston has done a wonderful job of helping these young men through school, and they, in turn have done a wonderful job in helping their mother. All five of the boys are members of the Baptist Tabernacle in Columbus, Ga., and are faithful workers in the church and but also in other Southern cities and because of the stupid minded leaders in many of the cities they have worked their "rabbit foot," and have been successful in sending out reports that, "it is working beautifully" — of course, for the advancement of the Colored race. But to use some very plain, but necessary language, it's playing h..... in its wake to deteriorate and vitiate the white race. There is an organization which is trying to get started, but it seems to be meeting with poor response, for the purpose of attempting to "Advance the White race in America," and this is badly needed.

NO NEGRO POLICE—

(Continued from Page 1)

Commissioner Binns said, "I am not personally going to consider he negro police question (period)." As we said above, Mr. Binns spoke with "blood in his eyes," and he carries a good size "stick of influence" down in the Commission meeting, as a rule too. Well good for Mr. Binns, and ten thousand white people should write a letter of thanks, and appreciation to Mr. Binns for living up to his oath of office. We elected those Commissioners with the understanding that they would protect our city, and all we ask of them now, is that they live up to the contract.

Haynie Suggests Communistic Interference

Good news comes also from another Commissioner, and we were surprised, for some mighty good reasons, to find this Commissioner was being awakened somewhat. He suggested that this "might be the Communists activity." Well, now! is it not strange that this particular Commissioner and all the rest of the Commissioners should not have recognized long ago that the whole thing is Communistic, and many of our fine white you have not seen it already? We do not know the face of man, when it comes to principle and we call for our Commissioners to stand up and be counted right now.

Don't Try To Lay It At The Door Of Liquor

Now gentlemen, don't start the "Liquor trick." That trick is as old as the race, and we have no brief for whiskey; we never took a drink, and don't expect to, and we would be happy to see all of it destroyed, and we are not like the dear Colored preacher, who after delivering a very dramatic sermon against the drinking of whiskey or any strong spirits; his message was said to be very effective, and it was very interesting. His eloquence was exquisit, and appealing. As he came to his most marvelous climatic points, and as he swung in on the homestretch, he said, "Brethren and sisters, it would be a great blessing to our race, and to all

(Continued on Page 4)

Rose Hill Launderette
2317 HAMILTON AVE
SPIN DRY FLUFF DRY
FLAT WORK IRONED

Use EZLO For
Atheletic Foot And Ringworm
GUARANTEED
SHACKELFORD DRUG STORE

Get Your Checks Cashed At The Manhattan Cafe
No Charge
OPEN ALL NIGHT
203 14th Street
PHENIX CITY, ALABAMA

Moving
Call Us For Estimates
IF IT CAN BE DONE
We'll Do It!
Homer Jones Transfer
MOVING - STORING AND HEAVY HAULING

God saved the woman from further embarressment by taking the matter into His own hands, and without any doubt, removed the man from this earth. He died, suddenly, and unexpectedly to all, including his family, and thus God vindicated the pastor, as well as protected the woman.

It is strange how people do not think about these things. It is true that God does not kill all of those who lie on people, but it is also true that He does kill some of them, as Ananias, and his wife Sapphira (Acts 5) is evident, as well as Moses, when God "took him on Mt. Ne-Land, and others. People should not engage in telling ugly things on people, even though they be true, but when it comes to deliberate, malicious, and uncalled for lies, and under serious circumstances too, God has often made an example out of people, however much it might have been un-noticed by those of us who were left. One of the most evident reasons for this matter being written about at this time, is the fact that the woman as well as her daughter (17 years of age) were shocked, and peculiarily struck, when they picked up the paper, not much more than forty-eight hours after this episode, and read of the death of this man, whom they had always respected, and to whom they had paid their money, as a collector, and both of them were definitely made to feel that it was God's hand in the matter.

It is very likely that the man was a child of God, which would furnish even a better reason for God's dealing with him, and the lesson that others should get from it, is that it never pays to deliberately lie on one of God's children, preacher or layman, and especially one of God's men.

Let all of those laugh, jeer, or do whatever they may be pleased to do about this matter, but it would be very wise if all of us would heed the warning. Certainly, we could be wrong, but think it over seriously. The preacher did not know the man, personally; had never bothered him, and in fact had only seen him a few times in his life, and did not recognize him as being any certain one then. Then too, the lying was not calcuated to benefit the man, but was a direct aggravating, nagging and otherwise hurtful thing to the sity two years ago.

(Continued on Page 4)

Mrs. Johnston was left a widow in 1940, when R. H. Johnston, who had been a resident of Columbus for about twelve years, died here. Mrs. Johnston was left with five sons: Robert, Jimmie, William, John Wade, and Roy. Roy is finishing his first year at Columbus High this time. Mrs. Johnston has done a wonderful job of helping these young men through school, and they, in turn have done a wonderful job in helping their mother. All five of the boys are members of the Baptist Tabernacle in Columbus, Ga., and are faithful workers in the church, and without any doubt are most splendid young fellows, and their opportunities in life look very bright, indeed.

It is understood that Jonh W. will take up accoounting, if his Government does not see fit to draft him into the service, He is employed, during the evenings at the Goo Goo Restourant. John Wade has a wondreful voice, and sings in the choir in his church every Sunday, and his graduation is a source of happiness, not only to his mother, but to a host of kins folk here in Columbus, as well as in Montgomery, Alabama, and elsewhere.

ROY MARTIN DAY —
(Continued from Page 1)

will serve as a perpetual reminder to the people of Phenix City for many years to come, of his philinthropic deeds of kindness on behalf of the general public. Mr. Martin was indeed a lover of Phenix City, and was always disposed towards any effort being made for the advancement of public institutions in the city.

The Plaque will be erected at the Roy Martin Stadium, and will honor the life, and memory of this man who loved his neighbors, and was always anxious to help, especially the unfortunates of his community.

WAGNER AUTHORIZED
BRAKE SERVICE
W. H. CROWDER
& SON AUTO SPRINGS &
AXLE SERVICE
1639 - 10th Ave. Dial 5515

them now, is that they live up to the contract.

Haynie Suggests Communistic Interference

Good news comes also from another Commissioner, and we were surprised, for some mighty good reasons, to find this Commissioner was being awakened somewhat. He suggested that this "might be the Communists activity." Well, now! is it not strange that this particular Commissioner and all the rest of the Commissioners should not have recognized long ago that the whole thing is Communistic, and many of our fine white gentlemen, and especially some of the younger tribe who are doing some good things for our city otherwise, but they are swallowing this Communistic junk without a frown, and yet, some of them are very active in "fighting Communism" in other fields. Some of these young fellows should read (again) the story of how the Ku Klux Klan (actually the citizens who loved the South) rose up and did the job in Atlanta and other places during the days of reconstruction, or immediately after the Civil War. Maybe they do not remember reading how the white gentlemen went after that negro crowd, who were tricked into many desires to gain for themselves social equality then, by the Yankees, but the Southern white gentlemen like Henry W. Grady and others went into the Court House, and the Capital of Atlanta and these "dark-skin brethren," along with their carpet bagging white-skin (not otherwise so) brothers led the way; they jumped out the windows, ran past the robed men, and wounded themselves in their effort to get away, but that broke it up. Now, gentlemen, let's not have this as a repetition in 1951, but the possibilities are bright for it, unless the white people follow men like Commissioner Binns; unless we shall use our heads, and pay less attention to distorted minds who parade through the columns of daily newspapers, for the purpose of being popular, and who are following the lines of Communism, however much they mean well, and might, in their own minds think that they are opposed to Communistic tactics.

Of course, it is Communism, pure and simple, and the whole thing is a Communistic effort, and where have you been that

DEPENDABLE
Moving
Call Us For Estimates
IF IT CAN BE DONE
We'll Do It!
Homer Jones Transfer
MOVING - STORING AND HEAVY HAULING
Local And Long Distance
DIAL 5208
719 · 24th STREET COLUMBUS, GA.

New Floor Sanding Machines
For Rent By the Day
V. C. WATERS
HARDWARE
4231 Hamilton Rd. Dial 8-4971

The average American, the figures show is eating 11 per cent more food (and better food too!) today than before World War II.

JOHNSON'S AUTO SERVICE
M.A. (JOHNNIE) JOHNSON
24-HOUR WRECKER SERVICE
Precision Crankshaft Grinding in-the-Block Saves You Money
GENERAL AUTOMOBILE REPAIRING
Dial 3-4407 — If No Answer Dial 2-0259
1141 - 27th. STREET

$100 LEFT U. S. BY IMMIGRANT

We Americans who grow up in freedom sometimes fail to realize how important it is.

With Stanislaw Zakerzewiski, a Polish immigrant who became a barber on Long Island, New York, it was different. He had lived in a country where freedom was restricted, and he could appreciate liberty when he had a chance.

So when Mr. Zakrzewski died recently, he left a will giving $100 to the United States of America. The will said the money was "a token of gratitude for the privilege of enjoying freedom and the opportunities offered by the United States.

FOR SALE
One Charge Ticket, Fire Proof Filing Cabinet
$75.00
Remington Noisless Typewriter In Perfect Shape
$60.00
One Attic Electric Fan with Motor 18" Frame
$35.00
B. H. Samples, Dublin, Ga.
Phone Day 144, Night 509W

NEW AUTO ENGINES USE LESS FUEL

The average American motorist used 215 fewer gallons of gasoline in 1950 than he would have used if he had driven the same distance in a 1930 car with 1930 gasoline, aciording to C. L. MiCuen, general manager of the Research Laboratories Division of General Motors Corp.

Mr. McCuen credited this saving to industrial research by both the automotive and petroleum industries. The two industries, he said, have progressed together, with the automobile supplying a demand which the petroleum industry has filled through research to improve motor fuels.

Gain Given Customers

The average mileage of American motor vehicles in 1950 was 9,550, he said. The 1930 car, he explained, would have used 935 gallons of 1930 gasoline in covering that distance, whereas the 1950 car burned only 720 gallons.

"These are the economic gains which the petroleum and automobile industries," he added, "have made together over the period from 1930 to 1950, and have passed on to their customers."

THE DANGERS OF

(Continued from Page 3)

ones to whom he was telling the lies about the preacher. It was all deliberate, malicious and wrong, and the results of it, whether God's hand was directly in it or not, the man died, suddenly, for some cause, we do not know!

NO NEGRO POLICE—

(Continued from Page 3)

races, if we could gather every jug, bottle, container of strong drink, and carry them down to the river, and there break, and empty the contents into the water!" He paused for a moment, and many of the brethren groaned and spoke their most heart-felt, and sympathetic Amens. The good pastor waited for a minute, while great silence prevaded the audience, and he calmly said, "Now let us stand and sing, Shall We Gather At The River!"

Of course, whiskey will aggravate the situation, and we are not critical of what the police, or the Commission has done, or may do, relative to closing liquor stores at an early hour at nights, or altogether, and we are confident that they know what they are doing, but we do insist that whiskey is not the trouble, in connection with this problem.

It's A Trick Of Communists

If everybody could read the Daily Worker; issue of May 15, 1951, in their report of what happened at the first instance of Grenade-tossing, down in the negro section of Columbus, Ga., they would begin to realize more fully how very closely the Communists are keeping up with the situation here. The Daily Worker, New York, is the "Apple of the Communist eye," and when we tell you that you will not be, or should not be surprised to know that the majority of the outstanding negroes of the South, and of America are either directly, or indirectly connected, or associated with the Communist Party, and if this is not true, the burden of proof is on them, because two things equal to each other, are equal to the same thing, and all we ask you to do is to check on what we have Telephone Wage Costs UP...

freshment — more pick-up — and
RC IS BEST BY TASTE-TEST!

ROYAL CROWN COLA
Best by taste-test

$75.00
Remington Noisless Typewriter In Perfect Shape
$60.00
One Attic Electric Fan with Motor 18" Frame
$35.00
B. H. Samples, Dublin, Ga.
Phone Day 144, Night 509W

THE DANGERS OF

(Continued from Page 3)

ones to whom he was telling the lies about the preacher. It was all deliberate, malicious and wrong, and the results of it, whether God's hand was directly in it or not, the man died, suddenly, for some cause, we do not know!

negro section of Columbus, Ga., they would begin to realize more fully how very closely the Communists are keeping up with the situation here. The Daily Worker, New York, is the "Apple of the Communist eye," and when we tell you that you will not be, or should not be surprised to know that the majority of the outstanding negroes of the South, and of America are either directly, or indirectly connected, or associated with the Communist Party, and if this is not true, the burden of proof is on them, because two things equal to each other, are equal to the same thing, and all we ask you to do is to check on what we have said.

Some gentleman, who withheld his name, called us and asked if it were possible that some members of our City Government were leaning towards the Communist Party, and we assured him that we did not think so, and we are now calling on them to stand up and be counted, something that Edgar Hoover asked all Americans to do many months ago. Granting that negro policemen would be advisable, in normal times, and at a time before the Communist Party started to working with the Negro race in America, we would oppose it at this time as being very much wrong for any Southern city to make the experiment, and we insist that it just should not be done at this time.

Remember, those who are in favor of hiring Negro policemen; The Daily Worker (representing the Communist Party); The Columbus Daily Newspapers, most of the Negroes and a few white citizens, but this newspaper is opposed to the plan, now, 60 days from now on, and that's how we feel about it.

In an editorial May 23, the local daily said: "Commissioner R. J. Haynie made the interesting suggestion that perhaps the police had been "derelict" in their duty in the trouble area—Seventh avenue sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth streets." No. Mr. Haynie, you are all wet and the records will not substantiate your suggestions, and furthermore, you are simply attempting to blame the grenade throwing on the police, probably some of our Commissioners would prefer exchanging the present police force for an "all color" force. At least, that was a jab at the police department that might have been left off, in the midst of this argument.

Telephone Wage Costs

UP...

Telephone Equipment Costs

UP...

Telephone Tax Costs

UP...

3 BIG REASONS WHY INCREASED TELEPHONE RATES ARE NECESSARY

SINCE Southern Bell's rates in Georgia were set two years ago, telephone costs have gone up drastically.

WAGE COSTS have increased and are going up still further as a result of the wage offer made to our employees through their Union on May 8. This offer was made in accordance with our policy of paying wages that are in keeping with those paid in the communities we serve. And it's more than policy—it is essential in order to obtain and keep the type of employees required to render good service.

FEDERAL corporate tax rates have risen sharply, too, adding greatly to our costs of rendering service.

TELEPHONE facilities are way up in cost—including replacement equipment to keep the service good, as well as equipment to expand the service. Two years ago we had $254 invested per average telephone in Georgia. Since then, the cost of facilities per telephone added has averaged $359.

EVEN BEFORE the most recent cost increases, telephone rates were lagging behind telephone costs. For example—annual revenue from rate increases authorized in Georgia since 1939 is failing by more than $4,170,000 to cover the annual costs of wage increases made effective during this period. And this does not include the May 8 wage offer which will widen the gap between our wage cost increases and our rate increases in Georgia.

TELEPHONE SERVICE demands are increasing rapidly in both rural and urban areas of Georgia. Meeting these demands will require large sums of new capital to pay for additional facilities. This money can be obtained only if earnings are adequate to attract funds from people who will invest their savings in the telephone business. Earnings in Georgia at present are not adequate.

THAT IS WHY an increase in Georgia telephone rates is so necessary if we are to continue serving the State's great and growing needs, including those of national defense.

LANE HUBBARD
Georgia Manager

U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics Consumer Price Index.

SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

F.D.Westbrooks,Jr
11 Pryor St.S.W.
Atlanta, Ga.

FAITH IN CHRIST
BRIDGES THE CHASM
TO OUR ETERNAL HOME

The Georgia Tribune

THE TRUTH
IS THE LIGHT
UNTO THE WORLD

VOLUME 19 | COLUMBUS, GEORGIA | THURSDAY, MAY 24, 1951 | NUMBER 5

ANARCHY REIGNS AMONG NEGROES; NO NEGRO POLICE NEEDED HERE NOW

Three Dollar Automobile Tags For Ala. Probable

There is a possibility of Alabama cars being "tagged" with the much discussed, but greatly appreciated "$3 Tags" in Ga., if the plans of Governor Persons ripen into frutition. The Alabama folk, and while there is opposition, yet it is thought possible, and many of the citizens of Alabama are delighted.

Certainly there are disadvantages to such a plan, but it is very probable that it is the part of wisdom, because there are other taxes that might be made to take care of the situation, and thus bring the possibility of running a car to the door of all the people.

The "low auto tag" proposal in Alabama came in connection with a proposed bond issue, associated with Highway funds for Alabama in the amount of $25,000,000 road bonds. This subject will get wide publicity, and much discussion in Alabama. The Birmingham News had the following to say on this issue recently:

"Nineteen of the Senate's 35 members signed a bill calling for an election on the bond issue. A large number of representatives also seems to be in favor of the election. The full weight of the administration, of course is thrown behind the effort.

"In one sense, arguments for and against the bond issue

Working People Receiving Benefits

Palmer Lauded For Polio Fund Drive

Atlanta, (GPS) In accepting the directorship of the 1952 Georgia March of Dimes, Atlanta Constitution Editor Ralph McGill has a job cut out for him. In fact, he will have an extremely difficult task. The reason: He succeeds Charles F. Palmer, president of Palmer Inc., Atlanta, under whose guidance the fund raising activities brought in more per capita during 1951 campaign than ever before.

Mr. Palmer, who also is Chair man of the Franklin D. Roosevelt Warm Springs Memorial Commission, has been awarded a citation for his successful direction of the 1951 March of Dimes. Atlanta's Jesse Draper, Georgia polio chairman, said that during last year $330,000 funds were spent on Georgia's polio victims through the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis.

Negro Soldiers Throw Rocks And Bottles At Moving, Crowded Bus; Attempt Made By Negroes To Sit In White Folk's Place On Bus Started Row; Driver Repulsed Negroes, Drove Them Off Bus.

Last Tuesday night on one of the streets of Columbus. Georgia. as one of the City Buses passed under a viaduct, two negroes stepped from behind one of the viaduct's supporting pillars and started throwing rocks and bottles at the Bus. One of the rocks crashed through the window. breaking the glass, and passing near the driver. This same driver had been forced to repremend two negro soldiers early in the night who attempted to sit in the front of the Bus, which is provided for white people. Quite a row followed between the soliers (Negroes) and the Bus driver, but he was able to chase them off of the bus without any serious trouble. It is thought that these were the same two negroes who pulled the vandalism, and revealed the fact that negroes are not yet sufficiently civilized to take their place along with white people, as they so much desire.

People Seem To Be Waking Up

There is some evidence that the whit people, who have been primerially to blame for the mary purpose in the minds of the NAACP leaders has been branded as being Communistic, and they have proven that this is their desire by every move they have made.

The negroes were apprehended last Tuesday night by policeman, after a long chase, because the negro soldiers ran when they saw that the police were looking for the ones who molested the bus a few minutes prior to this time.

FEPC Is Planned For America

It is well understood that the sponsors of the FEPC are now attempting to push forward probable that it is the part of wisdom, because there are other taxes that might be made to take care of the situation, and thus bring the possibility of running a car to the door of all the people.

The "low auto tag" proposal in Alabama came in connection with a proposed bond issue, associated with Highway funds for Alabama in the amount of $25,000,000 road bonds. This subject will get wide publicity, and much discussion in Alabama. The Birmingham News had the following to say on this issue recently:

"Nineteen of the Senate's 35 members signed a bill calling for an election on the bond issue. A large number of representatives also seems to be in favor of the election. The full weight of the administration, of course is thrown behind the effort.

"In one sense, arguments for and against the bond issue could wait until the proposed amendment is before the people. But the circumstances are such that those arguments will largely stand or fall by what the Legislature does in the matter of automobile tags, upon which the lawmakers can decide themselves.

"If automobile license tags remain as they are now, the state, so it is argued, will be able to carry on all highway operations and still match federal funds. But if the license tags on passenger cars are cut to $3, which Gov. Persons has persistently urged, then the resultant loss

(Continued on Page 3)

Working People Receiving Benefits

Atlanta, (GPS) Gov. Herman Talmadge long has been considered a good friend of the working man—whether on the farm on in the factory. And the other day the youthful chief executive had an opportunity to talk straight to representatives of organized labor in Georgia; telling them in much detail what his administration has been and is doing for the working people in this state. He spoke before the annual convention of the Georgia Federation of Labor, held in Atlanta for the first time since 1943.

Declaring that "in my entire public life I have always advocated the principles of collective bargaining and have supported those security benefits of which the working people have so long been entitled," Gov. Talmadge said his administration has brought working people many benefits, direct and indirect, including increased benefits in workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation; better schools hospitals and roads; more welfare benefits, and more job opportunities through a promotional program to bring new industries to Georgia.

Calling for the preservation of "friendly relations between labor and management so that we can raise our state to the top rank in the nation," he said never before in history has the importance of labor as a contributive force to the krowth of the nation been so evident.

"It is more essential than ever before," he emprasized, "that we make our democracy a living and breathing thing, make it a faith for which men

(Continued On Page 4)

Phenix Child Struck By Auto, Leg Is Fractured

Guy Childs Jr., small son of Mr. and Mrs. Guy Childs, Sr., 1302 Twenty-sixth street, Phenix City, sustainel a broken leg and possible back and head injuries this week when he was struck by an automobile on Smmerville road.

The child's mother said he stepped in front of an approaching vehicle, and was struck down.

The child is in fair condition after being taken to Phenix Memorial hospital.

Police identified the driver of the car as Robert Tranler. 27, Fort Benning soldier.

No charges were made as a result of the accident.

Investigating the accident were officers Jesse Green and John Waltermon.

J. Palmer, president of Palmer Inc., Atlanta, under whose guidance the fund raising activities brought in more per capita during 1951 campaign than ever before.

Mr. Palmer, who also is Chairman of the Franklin D. Roosevelt Warm Springs Memorial Commission, has been awarded a citation for his successful direction of the 1951 March of Dimes. Atlanta's Jesse Draper, Georgia polio chairman, said that during last year $330,000 funds were spent on Georgia's polio victims through the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis.

Georgia Seeking Tourist Dollars

ATLANTA—(GSP)—Did you know that vacation travel, estimated at $10-billion annually, is the fifth largest industry in the United States? Well it is and according to Clark Gaines, Secretary of the Georgia Department of Commerce, Georgia wants more than $120-million this state received from tourists last year. (The American Automobile Association estimates Georgia's take at $125,-million.)

"Georgia, one of the finest states for tourists in the nation, is receiving at the most only one-eightieth of the country tourist expenditure," Mr. Gaines declared. "That's not enough. It should be at least a fiftieth or $200-million. Incidentally, the Florida figure for 1950 is placed at $825-million."

What is being done to increase Georgia's take? For one thing, the State Commerce Department is launching a new campaign through pamphlet distribution and national advertising to interest our state. But, as Mr. Ganes explained, to really reap the full benefit of this campaign local communities must do their part. For example, they must make their place ever more attractive and interesting if they expect visitors to stop and linger a little longer there.

The American Way.

Remember motorists—Observance of laws for the good of all has been one of the truly American things that has made our country great.

vided for white people. Quite a row followed between the soliers (Negroes) and the Bus driver, but he was able to chase them off of the bus without any serious trouble. It is thought that these were the same two negroes who pulled the vandalism, and revealed the fact that negroes are not yet sufficiently civilized to take their place along with white people, as they so much desire.

People Seem To Be Waking Up

There is some evidence that the whit people, who have been primerially to blame for the much discussion, and the brazen effort of negroes to attempt to take their place along with white people. The white people have meant everything to the negro race, and especially in the South, and there is a great desire on the part of some to continue to help the negro, on the part of some, while others are joining in with the Communistic effort beng conducted by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in America. Many fine white people seem to be very dumb relative to the whole effort, and are not aware, that the main issue with the NAAPC is to have Social equality. This is the main desire on the part of the Negroes, in their effort to fan the "Need of negro policemen into a flame, and many otherwise splendid white people are falling into line, and cleaning all the bait off the hook. The pri-

Port Expansion

ATLANTA — (GPS) — The Georgia Ports Authority has acquired an additional $500,000 to be used in the construction of ports facilities on its Savannah property, according to Chairman James D. Robinson, Jr., of Atlanta. Similar to the $5-million loan obtained by the authority earlier this year, the additional $500,000 consists of revenue certificate.s Construction of the Savannah facilities began in January, with completion scheduled by late summer of 1952. Included in these facilities wi bel a 2,065-foot pier with 40-foot apron and three large transit sheds with a capacity of 74,000 square feet.

the NAACP leaders has been branded as being Communistic, and they have proven that this is their desire by every move they have made.

The negroes were apprehended last Tuesday night by policeman, after a long chase, because the negro soldiers ran when they saw that the police were looking for the ones who molested the bus a few minutes prior to this time.

FEPC Ic Planned For America

It is well understood that the sponsors of the FEPC are now attempting to push forward their program in every manner possible, and the order given in the Army for the mingling of the races has not, and is not helping to aljust matters, but is making matters worse. The South will continue to refuse the overtures of political-minded people to force segregation in the South to break, and every effort that is being made to foster the FEPC is directly in line with Communism's plans of long standing. All of these things like the negroes rock tossing last Tuesday night are signs pointing in the direction of the establishing of the FEPC plan in the South. This plan if put into effect, would cause white people to be forced to accept, or endure, the abuse that would be subjected upon the white people by the negro race. It is Communism's plan, not only to see that negroes get "equal opportunities," but that their plan actually goes beyond that, and would establish a plan whereby the negro race would become the superior race in America. This, the Communists know, would break down the morale of the American people to the level of the negro, and would thus furnish the Communists their long and much sought for opportunity to take over. The negro race is not yet capable of taking the lead in America, and whether they will ever be, even in a hundred years from now, depends entirely upon what we do about such things as the employment of Negro Policemen, and many other plans, well laid out by the Communists, and are being followed to the letter by the NAACP, and their sympathizers in America.

VOLUME 19, NO. 5

E. G. Johnston, Editor
A. E. Pate, Associate Editor

THE GEORGIA TRIBUNE EDITORIAL PAGE

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY
By The Georgia Tribune Publishing Company
Entered as Second Class matter March 11, 1948 at the Post-Office at Columbus, Georgia.
--under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879--

THURSDAY, MAY 31, 1951
52 ISSUES FOR $2.00
ADVERTISING RATES FURNISHED ON REQUEST

Negroes Want Social Equality; Not Equal School Facilities

Nothing is more evident, in the effort of the NAACP to antagonize the South, relative to "Segregation in the schools" than the fact that they do no want, or care very much about "equal opportunities" in the schools, but that they are looking towards the gap that leads into social equality of the races, and the testamony of the one Ke&nneth Clark, a negro specialist in chill psychology at the Colege of New York City. This negro witness, brought from New York to testify, by the NAACP, proved concusively that we are right in the above statement relative to Social equality. He said: "Segregation affects the personality development of both whites and negroes, causing the negroes to be confused, hostile and resentful, and the whiets to have a feeling of guilt." We would suggest that this nigger remain down South for a while and note the difference between that motley gang of foreign elements; a mixture doubtless of practically eevry nation on earth; we suggest that he stay down in S. C. for a while where some real, honest-to goodness white people live, anl see if he doesn't change his mind about that "guilt" business!

Somebody will get mad before this thing is over, and we had better begin to tell the truth, while it is time, for it will be too late before you know it. The situation that waswitnessed just following the Civil War should not be allowed ot be repeated, but if the newspapers, and those who have influence do not stand up and speak the truth, it will be too bad, and we are just warning all honest people of both races who would like to continue to live peacefully together.

We have plenty of respect for the Southern, honest and humble negro, and we have no desire to see him mistreated, but neither do we desire to see the white people mistreated, and we are telling you in plenty of time that it would be better to stop this agitation. It would be a splendid idea to look after a few like Walter White, by teling him where to head in now, than to wait until he, and his gang get too "hostile," or "resentful!" The white people in the South would like to see the negroes prosper, and they have helped them to advance throughout the years, but if they don't mind now, they will permit some of these Northern negro psychologists to kick the bucket over and spill the milk.

The case in Oklahoma is sufficient evidence to prove that the negroes do not want "Equal opportunities, if it means that they are still deprived from courting and marrying white people; they were offered equal school facilities in Oklahoma, and they will be given as much in Georgia and South Carolina, if they will be patient. No, that is not what they want; they want segregation broken completely down, and that's what they are trying to tell you now.

There has always been segregation; it's true in the animal kingdom; horses mate with horses; cows with cows; various kinds of birds with their kind, and God intended that negroes should mate with their kind, and white people with theirs. The negroes pay less than 5 per cent of the taxes in Georgia, and South Carolina, and they get a mighty lot for what they pay, and if they will wait a time with patience, doubtless their taxes will be raised, and they wil be able to demand a lot of things they are not now priviledged to have.

There is not a poor devil (like myself(in the country who would not like to have the same accomodations, and priviedges that the rich have but we just cant have it, and God did not intend it: All of this negro effort iis inspired by Socialism and Communism, and there is no need for any one to accept our word for t; open your eyes and take a look for yourself.

What A Difference!

In hte Soviet Union, that wonderful workers' paradise, only thosewho are tired of living criticise the government and its major policies. However, the rulers in the Kremlin allow and to an extent encourage criticism of individual factories and stores and the goods they sell. This, probably, serves a dual purpose—it gives the ci- [illegible] off a little harmless to no tobacco and came apart when he tried to smoke them

So it goes, down a long list of complaints In Russia, the factories and the stores are either owned by the state or run by the state, and in either case the result to the consumer is the same. It's strictly a take it or leave it propo-

LEAVES FROM SOVIET BOOK OF THE YEAR

Denmark Gets Socialized

By George S. Benson

The economic warfare of a people is determined by the production of goods and services in the nation in which they live. American production, stimulated by freedom and incentives, leads the world; and so does the American living standard. Industrial and agricultural production in China and India are extremely [illegible] working mothers, maternity leaves, and many other benefits of a full-fledged social security program. I can find very few of life's hazards and inconveniences that are not protected. And these services are not of stop-gap nature, but are, in themselves, a basic way of living.

Why Work?

"Industry has felt the effects of this program in its would like to con[illegible] gether.

We have plenty of respect for the Southern, honest and humble negro, and we have no desire to see him mistreated, but neither do we desire to see the white people mistreated, and we are telling you in plenty of time that it would be [illegible] but we just cant have it, and God did not intend it: All of this negro effort iis inspired by Socialism and Communism, and there is no need for any one to accept our word for t; open your eyes and take a look for yourself.

What A Difference!

In hte Soviet Union, that wonderful workers' paradise, only thosewho are tired of living criticise the government and its major policies. However, the rulers in the Kremlin allow and to an extent encourage criticism of individual factories and stores and the goods they sell. This, probably, serves a dual purpose—it gives the citizens a chance to blow off a little harmless steam, and it also keeps the managers and employees of the various government monopolies iin a state of suspense.

In any event, these criticisms are often printed in the Russian papers. They always follow the same line. Comrad A bought a sewing machine and found it woudn't run because a part was missing and he couldn't obtain it. Comrad B went into a store to by an overcoat, but the clerk wouldn't sell it him uness he aso bought a pair of pants he didn't want—it seems the pants were of such bad quaity that this was the only way they could be moved off the shelves. Comrad C's latest ration of cigarettes contained next to no tobacco and came apart when he tried to smoke them

So it goes, down a long list of complaints In Russia, the factories and the stores are either owned by the state or run by the state, and in either case the result to the consumer is the same. It's strictly a take it or leave it proposition, which is only possible in an economy which has rid itself of such bothersome factors as competition.

Contrast that with America. where the chain stores and the independent stores, the big stores and the little stores. are looking for more business and are scratching their heads to find new ways to attract the consumer. If a man doesn't like one store's stocks or service or prices or anything else, he just moves on down the street, taking his money with him. He's a free agent—free to pick and choose as much as he likes. It looks as if there is something to be said for competitive free enterprise after all.

Dividing The Dollar

Wha thappens to the money industry takes in thrrough sale of its products?

The last annual financial report of a leading oil company offers an interesting case in point--particularly so, in the light of the fact that many people seem to believe that oil has made incredibly large profits in late years.

This company took in more than $1,300,000,000 last year. And here is how each of those dollars was divided up.

First of all, 62 1-2 cents was spent for raw materials and for producing, transporting, manufacturing and selling products and services.

Next payrolls and employee benefits took 12 1-2 cents out of the dollar.

Third, obsolescence and depreciation of properties and equipment accounted for 7 3-10 cents.

Fourth, 5-6|10 cents was put back into the business in the form of new properties and facilities, to keep the company a progressive concern.

Fifth. government stepped in to the tune of 5-9|10 censt, which paid the company's income and other direct taxes.

Next, 5-8|10 cents out of that fast-shrinking dollar was distributed in the form of dividends to more than 100,000 investors whose savings made this company's existence possible.

Last 4|10 of a cent was used to pay interest on borrowed m oney.

In short, the tax collector got as much as the owners--and the workers got much more than either. That is typical of American industry today.

Judge And Jury

Daniel W. Tracy, president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, is one of the growing number of labor leaders who have come to reaize the great danger that socialization of industry represents to the labor movement.

In a recent speech he said, "The experience of IBEW with the destructive effects of the public power program on its interests has convinced us that we must extend every effort to retard and ultimately stop the present expansion of the public power program." He added that under public ownership, the protection of collective bargaining is removed and job security and wages are lowered. He cited an example in Virginia, where the private utility pays $1.90 an hour to certain classifications of workers, while socialized utilities pay as low as $1.36 and $1.37.

It is an ironical fact that in the early days of the public power movement, labor was fairly solidly behind it. Some abor people, who remain blind to the facts of life, still are. But the awakening is under way, as Mr. Tracy's forthright stand indicates. Socialism, by its very nature, must destroy free labor just as it destroys free enterprise.

What we have here is simply the fact that when government is the boss, no one can effectively oppose it or arbitrate with it. Government sets all the policies, makes all the decisions, and acts as judge and jury. It works on the "like it or lump it" basis. And that goes for all concerned, including abor and the consumer.

Denmark Gets Socialized

By George S. Benson

The economic warfare of a people is determined by the production of goods and services in the nation in which they live. American production, stimulated by freedom and incentives, leads the world; and so does the American living standard. Industrial and agricultural production in China and India are extremely low, and so is the living standard of their people. History documents this economic law over and over again. And yet the people of many nations have been enticed into believing that government, through economic planning, can improve the economic well-being of the citizens.

England's Labor-Socialist government set out to do it, and for three or four years the majority of the English people blissfully believed a magic solution had been found for removing worry care and tiresome work. Now the dream is shattered. England is prostrate. The people are hungry. And the Labor-Socialist government is split between the totalitarian group which apparently wants a Socialist dictatorship and the "moderate Socialists" who want Socialism but without all its brutal realities. The basic trouble in England is a falling off—under Sociaism—of the production of goods and services.

Everything "Free"

Harding College now is sponsoring a study tour of Europe by Dr. W. T. Bean, principal of the Butler (Pa.) High School. "The social security program in Denmark," he wrote last week from Copenhagen, "guarantees the comfort and safety of the people in nearly every aspect of life. There are generous payments for the unemployed; free medical, hospital, and dental services; and comfortable pensions for those over 65—including free housing.

"The children get free education throught the University, including free meals and, when necessary, free clothing and transportation. There are free nurseries for children of working mothers, maternity leaves, and many other benefits of a full-fledged social security program. I can find very few of life's hazards and inconveniences that are not protected. And these services are not of stop-gap nature, but are, in themselves, a basic way of living.

Why Work?

"Industry has felt the effects of this program in its production. Even before the war, production had begun to fall rather sharply, and in recent years this trend has continued, despite the fact that there has been retooling and modernization of the plants. The workers are rapidly losing their incentive to do a full day's work. After all, nothing unpleasant can happen to them if they don't. The government takes care of everything."

Amidst such conditions Dr. Bean found it requires a full year to build a modest-sized dwelling. "The installation of a telephone," he reports, "is a major operation. The most recent strike in Denmark," he further reports, "occurred in the welding department of one of the shipyards when one worker, working on piece work, stepped up his production until he was doing three times as much work as the average worker. For his efforts he was thrown into the harbor and the employees went out on strike demanding he be fired. In the end the company was forced to discharge him. And so it would seem that advancement due to industrial initiative is not a part of the basic structure of labor policy here—as this type of action is not uncommon."

Progress in Reverse

Dr. Bean says almost no new businesses are being established and virtually no new money is going into business expansion. In fact, retrogression has already set in—though the citizenry as a whole is not yet aware of it. "Since business opportunities are almost nil," writes this American educator, "many young Danes are emigrating to other lands. The loss to the nation of this group has not in revenue will make it impossible for the state to match all the available federal highway funds without additional funds. This is all the more true under the Persons proposal to raise the percentage of the local government's share of the licence receipts.

(Continued on Page 3)

Three Dollar—

(Continued From Page 1)

"Both the Alabama State Chamber of Commerce and the Alabama Motorists Association have issed statements in recent months urging the state to adopt pay as you go highway construction program. Both organizations take the position that the state can, if it eliminates politics from road-contract letting, match all federal aid moneys available.

But both attitudes are predicted on the assumption that license tag rates will remain as they are.

"Thus the immediate point in the highway situation in the Legistature is not so much whether a bond issue is needed to match federal funds as whether license tag costs are to be changed. If licenses are reduced, the chances are that a bond issue will be necessary to provide funds for matching. If licenses are untouched, then the question will be whether the people of Alabama prefer to go on a highway improvement program through borrowed money, which will have to be paid back some time, somehow, with interest, or move more slowly, paying as we go.

"The claimed ability of the state to match all federal funds if Highway Department income is untouched is not left to the desire of motorists and motorist associations to alter the plan under which special taxes they pay on gasoline, for tags

News At A Glance

Atlanta, (GPS) Gov. Herman Talmadge has indicated that he will in effect remove the state property tax of five mills "during the calendar year 1952." He said the tax is from Jan. 1 to Jan. 1 and "in my opinion I can take the action any time from January up until about Jly." He plans to redce the rate to about one-fourth or one-eighth of a mill, just enough to keep the state in the property tax field for equalization purposes, he said. The tax now produces some $6-million annually .....The stage is being set for a crackdown on financially responsible children who refuse to support their aged parents. To put the law (passed by the recent Georgia legislature) into effect, State Welfare Director Alan Kemper has released a regulation setting a procedure under which the new law will be applied. Sixty per cent of the state's residents who are 65 years of age or older reportedly are on relief rolls——The state Department of Education estimats that some $2.5-million in "contigent" funds will have to be paid 139 county and independent school systems to place them on an equal footing when the Minimum Foundation Program goes into operation July - .....Atty. Gen. Eugene Cook has notified Gov. Talmadge that in his opinion the Agricultural Commodities Authority Act of 1951 is unconstitutional.

AROUND GEORGIA: The newly created State Board of Registrations for Foresters is ready to begin the registration of practicing foresters, according to R. C. Coleman, joint sect. of the state examining boards. Persons desiring to practice forestry and use the title "Registered Foresters" must file an application with the board.... Georgia Regional VA Mana-

Your Home

NEW UNDER THE SUN

CHICAGO—For those who scoff that there's really nothing new under the sun, here is the "lingerie look" in beachwear. From Marshall Field & Company, this sun favorite features a negligee-type organdy beachcoat and a figure-molding lastex bathing suit.

Memorial Day Is Observed POW's Are Honored

Prisoners of war, living and dead, were honored in wreath-laying memorial services this week at the POW memorial monument at the intersection of Cussetta and Old Benning roads.

The Rev. Colin Campbell, rector of the Trinity Episcopal church made the principal address.

Tracing hte evolution of society from hte family through clans to the modern state, he showed how wars and threats of extinction have made mankind come together in ever larger groups for protection.

"It is not inconceivable that the nations of the modern world will be compelled to become one united nation," he said.

Saying that such changes had always been accompanied by suffering, he especially called attentionto the suffering that had been endured by men in the war who fell prisoners of the enemy. Praising hte men who had served their country so valiantly, he concluded with the statement that he who serves his nation well also serves God.

Present to represent Maj. Gen. John H. Church, Fort Benning commander, and himself a prisoner of the Japanese in World War II, was Lt. Col. Winston Jones. Col. Jones was a prisoner for seven days, escaping shortly after the fall of Bataan. Following his escape, he fought as a guerrilla until the Philippines were reataken in 1945.

FOR SALE

One Charge Ticket, Fire Proof Filing Cabinet

$75.00

Remington Noisless Typewriter In Perfect Shape

$60.00

One Attic Electric Fan

Can you find her?

Perhaps she's a Florist or Beauty Parlor Operator . . . the Manager of a Dress Shop or of a Music Store. Whatever her business . . . whatever the product or service you are looking for, you'll find it in the

'YELLOW PAGES'
of your Telephone Directory

. . . your handiest guide to
WHO BUYS — SELLS
RENTS — REPAIRS

are untouched, then the question will be whether the people of Alabama prefer to go on a highway improvement program through borrowed money, which will have to be paid back some time, somehow, with interest, or move more slowly, paying as we go.

"The claimed ability of the state to match all federal funds if Highway Department income is untouched is not left to the desire of motorists and motorist associations to alter the plan under which special taxes they pay on gasoline, for tags or other purposes are in some instances diverted to non-highway uses and in more instances dispersed to local governments to spend in ways that are of little or no benefit to motorists as a group. If diversion and dispersion are stopped, the Highway Department would have still more money.

"As badly as more and better roads are needed in Alabama, it would seem the part of wisdom for Alabama legislators first to see that all highway taxes be used for highway purposes. Nineteen states aready have written into their constitutions a ban against diversion of motorist taxes."

Denmark Has—

(Continued From Page 3)

had much impact on official thinking, but there is marked concern among some. The courage that it takes to emigrate is the same courage that makes a successful business man. It is a national asset that no nation can afford to lose."

Just as it is doing in England, the gradual decrease of industrial production under the political management of the Socialist planners, and the breakdown of individual initiative and incentive, will one day lead Denmark into economic chaos. Then the extreme totalitarian Socialists will have their chance to seize power and make of every Dane a cog in the soulless machinery of State, as in Russia. Americans must think twice before accepting further glib promises of something for nothing from the government.

.....Atty. Gen. Eugene Cook has notified Gov. Talmadge that in his opinion the Agricultural Commodities Authority Act of 1951 is unconstitutional.

AROUND GEORGIA: The newly created State Board of Registrations for Foresters is ready to begin the registration of practicing foresters, according to R. C. Coleman, joint sect. of the state examining boards. Persons desiring to practice forestry and use the title "Registered Foresters" must file an application with the board.....Georgia Regional VA Manager urges veterans to make plans now if they expect to participate in the GI educational and training program. The deadline: July 25.....Plans for Stone Mountain Memorial Park have been completed and an answer as to whether a New York banking firm will grant a loan ($2.5-million) for the project is expected in July, DeKalb Commissioner Scott Candler disclosed ..... Herty Laboratories, of Savannah, reportedly has agreed to do "anything possible" in a proposed project to develop a process of manufacturing paper from scrub oak. This was in response to a request from the University of Florida where the experimental work has been carried on to date..... Georgia's population, listed as 3,444,578 in the 1950 census, is 14,000 more than that, according to a later provisional estimate by the Bureau of Census.

Your Home

By Frances Ainsworth

I think the beginning of Spring is just about the busiest time of all at our house. We always clean the house, of course, but in addition we re-paint walls and woodwork and re-decorate the rooms with new colors for our walls, slipcovers and draperies. It's really amazing what a fresh new color scheme will do for the home, isn't it?

Another favorite trick of ours is painting furniture to accent our new color schemes. Our den, for instance, has a wall filled with sectional bookcases which we bought unfinished and have painted. Our kitchen table and chairs get a bright new color every Spring. Then, too, we're busily re-painting all of our porch and lawn furniture, getting set for the warmer months ahead. If you haven't yet tried painting furniture, do try it this season — it's very simple if you use a good grade of paint.

I got some painting tips from Hayes Quinn, the color consultant of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company, which I thought you might be interested in — particularly for painting your tables and chairs. Place the piece upside down on a protected surface. Then paint from the leg ends downward, brushing the enamel lightly as you work. Next turn the piece upright and finish the sides. Do your chair backs and other broad surfaces. Table tops or chair seats should be painted last. It's really very simple if you paint this way. I always use a waterspar enamel for my painting because it doesn't water-spot and is practically chalk free — especially important for outdoor furniture. You can wash a good enamel, too — keeping it fresh and bright. We think that painting is the easiest, most inexpensive way there is to re-decorate our home. Try it in yours, I'm sure that you'll agree with us!

Rose Hill Launderette
2317 HAMILTON AVE
SPIN DRY FLUFF DRY
FLAT WORK IRONED

WAGNER AUTHORIZED
BRAKE SERVICE
W. H. CROWDER & SON
AUTO SPRINGS & AXLE SERVICE
1639 - 10th Ave. Dial 5515

valiantly, he concluded with the statement that he who serves his nation well also serves God.

Present to represent Maj. Gen. John H. Church, Fort Benning commander, and himself a prisoner of the Japanese in World War II, was Lt. Col. Winston

FOR SALE
One Charge Ticket, Fire Proof Filing Cabinet
$75.00
Remington Noisless Typewriter In Perfect Shape
$60.00
One Attic Electric Fan with Motor 18" Frame
$35.00
B. H. Samples, Dublin, Ga.
Phone Day 144, Night 509W

Store. Whatever her business . . . whatever the product or service you are looking for, you'll find it in the

'YELLOW PAGES'
of your Telephone Directory

. . . your handiest guide to
WHO BUYS — SELLS
RENTS — REPAIRS

SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

Reddy's Roundup
...of Electrifying Facts!

A broiler raiser in Lawrenceville, Ga., says his electric poultry feeder does the work of two hired hands...and operates for a few cents a day!

A penny's worth of electricity, at Georgia Power's low rates, provides four hours of radio entertainment!

Since 1941 the cost of insulators has risen 85%, but Georgia Power's average residential price per kilowatt hour has dropped 23%.

Georgia Power

Farmers' Markets Help Boom State Truck Crop Sales

Atlanta, (GPS) Truck crop sales in Georgia are increasing by leaps and bounds. How come? The main reason is because of the expansion of Ga.'s State Farmers' Markets. At least, that's how Gov. Herman Talmadge, a successful farmer in his own right, sees it.

Speaking at the annual Tomato Festival at Glennville the other day, Georgia's farmer-governor had this to say: "The remarkable increases in truck crops have resulted, almost directly, from the expansion of the farmers' markets in Georgia. For the first time the total sales of all state markets rose above the $50-million mark in 1950. The exact total was $50,-556,699."

The Governor failed to tell his South Georgia friends of the soil that he personally was responsible for this market expansion. For example, last July 1 he made available an additional $500,000 for further expansion of the State's Farmers' Markets, bringing the total annual allotment to $1,125,000—the largest amount ever supplied by a state administration.

Since Jan. 1, 1949, the present administration has completed or has under construction farmers' markets at Augusta, Buchanan, Camilla, Columbus, Dillard, Donalsonville, Jesup, Leesburg, Sylvania, Thomson, Winder and Waynesboro. This constitutes the largest building program of farmers' market facilities ever accomplished in Georgia within a similar period of time.

Declaring that South Georgia counties can vie successfully with Florida in producing early truck crops for shipment to all parts of the country the chief executive said that section of

Get Your Checks Cashed
At The Manhattan Cafe
No Charge
OPEN ALL NIGHT
203 14th Street
PHENIX CITY, ALABAMA

Working People—

(Continued From Page 1)

are willing to live and for which they have shown their willingness to die . . . In face of manifold opportunities for service which lie ahead, let us all work together to build a better future for ourselves and our children. When we labor as one, then we will be sure to get things done. . . Working in unity we can make Georgia hum and prosper."

Turning to the new Georgia labor groups, Gov. Talmadge said he also is generally against such taxation. But, he said it was found that no other single tax or series of taxes could finance the state' multi-million-dollar school expansion program. He predicted the sales tax will produce $75-million to $125-milion annually; said working people of the state have this assurance the tax money wil be well spent.

King For A Day!

LOUISVILLE, KY.—Shorthorns and Polled Shorthorns take over the spotlight on June 11th here when the Blue Grass International Futurity will crown a Grand Champion of the breed. Over 100 entries will compete for $8000 in premiums. The nation's leading Shorthorn and Polled Shorthorn herds will be represented with their strongest entries.

In addition to this sparkling show held at the Kentucky State Fair Grounds, sponsored by the Kentucky Department of Agriculture and the American Shorthorn Breeders' Association, there will be the Annual Members' Meeting of the national Shorthorn Club—and on the following day, June 12th, all animals entered in the Futurity will be sold at auction.

A unique feature of the show is that it will be held in the afternoon and out of doors on Kentucky's famous carpet of blue grass.

Reservations have already been received from all over the United States and Canada.

Shorthorns are the oldest breed of purebred registered livestock in America and were introduced to Kentucky by the early Scotch settlers. They were the first of the purebreds brought to the Blue Grass and limestone region. This was even before Kentucky became the fifteenth state to join the Union and while Kentucky was part of Virginia, which then was a crown colony.

Shorthorn steers have been crowned Grand Champions over all breeds at three recent major Kentucky beef cattle shows, and continue to bring fame to Kentucky.

'Ga. Has Them All,' Describes State's

Beauty Treatment

freshment — more pick-up — and
RC IS BEST BY TASTE-TEST!

ROYAL CROWN COLA
Best by taste-test

Moving

Call Us For Estimates
IF IT CAN BE DONE

We'll Do It!

Homer Jones Transfer

MOVING - STORING AND HEAVY HAULING
Local And Long Distance
DIAL 5208
719 - 24th STREET COLUMBUS, GA.

CO-OP CABS
QUICK SERVICE!

FOR THE FASTEST IN TAXICAB SERVICE
No Time Lost When You Phone 5511
For Taxi Service. We Reach Our Men
By Two-Way Radio And Give The Driver Nearest Your Address Your Call
FIRST TWO-WAY RADIO EQUIPPED
TAXICABS IN COLUMBUS
CO-OP CAB CO. Call 5511

markets at Augusta, Buchanan, Camilla, Columbus, Dillard, Donalsonville, Jesup, Leesburg, Sylvania, Thomson, Winder and Waynesboro. This constitutes the largest building program of farmers' market facilities ever accomplished in Georgia within a similar period of time.

Declaring that South Georgia counties can vie successfully with Florida in producing early truck crops for shipment to all parts of the country the chief executive said that section of the state is forging to the front economically as a result of the intelligent diversification plan of farming. In driving home his point he said:

"While we cannot grow citrus fruits on a large scale there are numerous other early crops produced in Florida that can be equally produced at a profit in South Georgia. Tomatoes form one example. We must not forget our watermelons and cantelopes which we ship in large quantities to markets in the East and North. South Georgia is favorably located also for the development of the livestock industry which is having such a remarkable growth all over the state."

Use EZLO For Atheletic Foot And Ringworm
GUARANTEED
SHACKELFORD
DRUG STORE

New Floor
Sanding Machines
For Rent By the Day
V. C. WATERS
HARDWARE
4231 Hamilton Rd. Dial 3-4971

be sold at auction.

A unique feature of the show is that it will be held in the afternoon and out of doors on Kentucky's famous carpet of blue grass.

Reservations have already been received from all over the United States and Canada.

Shorthorns are the oldest breed of purebred registered livestock in America and were introduced to Kentucky by the early Scotch settlers. They were the first of the purebreds brought to the Blue Grass and limestone region. This was even before Kentucky became the fifteenth state to join the Union and while Kentucky was part of Virginia, which then was a crown colony.

Shorthorn steers have been crowned Grand Champions over all breeds at three recent major Kentucky beef cattle shows, and continue to bring fame to Kentucky.

'Ga. Has Them All,' Describes State's Industry Assets

Atlanta, (GPS) "Georgia Has Them ALL" is a slogan the Ga. Department of Commerce used in national advertisements last year in its campaign to attract new industries to our state Commenting on that catchy phrase, Gov. Herman Talmadge in a speech before the Commerce (Ga) Chamber of Commerce's recent meeting, said he thought the line described the state's advantages to prospective industries exactly.

"We most assuredly 'Have Them ALL' as far as the natural advantages are concerned," the Governor said. "We have the climate, we have the water supply, we have the electric power, we have the vast untapped reservoirs of dependable workers, we have the transportation advantages by rail, by highways and by ocean steamers, and we have a spirit of public cooperation that can't be beat. Like this advertisement states, some of our sister states have only a few of the many advantages Ga. possesses, but they do not fail to exploit them.

"Soon after the present administration took office we created the Georgia Department of Commerce to stimulate and coordinate the development of business and manufacturing throghout the whole state. This Department is on the alert at all times to bring to our state the kind of industries which will prosper here. On top of this the steady progress that has been made in Georgia has developed large, new markets which can be best served by industries located on the spot. Big national manufacturers are locating branch plants here to take advantage of the increased buying power of our people."

Calling attention to the progress Georgia is now making in the manufacture of many products, Gov. Talmadge said: "When we get the balance between agriculture and industry which we are seeking, we will see Georgia hum and thrive as never before, not only in the urban centers but in the agricultural areas as well."

Beauty Treatment

Now mowing a lawn can qualify as a beauty treatment for milady instead of a backache for dad with a new kind of electric mower that operates by push button, is as light weight as a baby carriage and costs less than a fortnight's wage to the vanishing handyman. A new flip over handle makes direction changing effortless with the new Huffy electric mower and retractable blades end all hazards from hidden obstacles.

No more need for tiresome hand clipping of grass around bushes, etc., either. This new Huffy mower achieves close, safe trimming within ⅝th's of an inch; and operating it gives milady just the right light weight incentive for figure-improving constitutionals.

JOHNSON'S AUTO SERVICE
M.A. (JOHNNIE) JOHNSON
24-HOUR WRECKER SERVICE
Precision Crankshaft Grinding in-the-Block Saves You Money
GENERAL AUTOMOBILE REPAIRING
Dial 3-4407 — If No Answer Dial 2-0259
1141 - 27th. STREET

HAWAII EDUCATIONAL REVIEW

RECEIVED
MAR 23 1948
Southern Regional Council

Exhibit on the Study Unit, "The Sea."

MARCH, 1948

21- Labor
RECEIVED
Southern Regional Council

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK
CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION AND RESEARCH
Vol. X No. 2 February, 1949

Labor's Stake in Economic Foreign Policy

The United States' foreign policy faces a difficult problem in 1949. The political phase of the problem is that of maintaining peace under tense conditions that prevail in many parts of the world. The economic phase is that of improving world living standards as a basis for political stability. American labor has a vital stake in both aspects of the problem.

The CIO believes that the only kind of foreign policy able to cope with this situation is one that strengthens the political and economic condition of free men everywhere. The resolution on foreign policy enacted by the Tenth CIO Convention in Portland, Oregon, November 23, 1948, stated this clearly. Peace and prosperity, it said, are indivisible. A sound, progressive America can give encouragement to the peoples of the world to improve their living standards and to widen the horizon of their political liberties. American participation in world affairs should be directed to the spread of democracy and to the establishment of economic conditions that will enable democracy to survive.

In line with these aims the CIO advocates an integrated foreign policy directed toward international cooperation: in the political sphere, through support of the United Nations and a strengthening of the democracies; in the economic sphere, through the European Recovery Program, the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, the adoption of the Charter for an International Trade Organization, and other measures to expand international trade.

Economic Outlook, CIO.

Labor's Stake In International Trade

Labor has a direct stake in international trade, not only because the United States is such a large exporter of the products of American labor, but also because most of the goods we import from other countries are essential to us to keep our industrial machines operating and maintain a high standard of living.

Exports mean the difference between prosperity and depression for many American industries. This is particularly true in industries such as electrical machinery and apparatus, transportation equipment, agricultural machinery, automobiles and trucks, rolled steel products, office machinery, and many others, for which exports absorb a large proportion of our total output. Some of this production is concentrated in a few localities which are largely dependent upon a single industry. For the United States as a whole, approximately 10 percent of our total industrial output is sold abroad, but the proportion is much higher for certain industries.

The U. S. Department of Labor estimates that, in the first half of 1947 (the latest period for which statistics are available), exports provided jobs for 2.4 million non-agricultural workers, representing 5.6 percent of the total non-agricultural employment in the United States. The percentage of workers dependent upon exports was particularly high in steel works and rolling mills; coal mining and manufactured solid fuel; machinery, including electrical apparatus; and rubber. There were nearly three times as many workers dependent upon exports in 1947 as in 1939. This reflects the growing importance since the war of exports in our domestic economy. Average annual wages in the export industries have always been much higher than in industries protected by high tariffs.

Guernsey-Montgomery for the Economic Outlook, CIO.

American labor also benefits from agricultural exports because they increase the purchasing power of American farmers for the products of American industry. Approximately 10 percent of the total agricultural output of the United States is exported. Thus, nearly one-tenth of the total farm employment (there were 10 million agricultural workers in the U. S. in 1947) depends upon export for its income. Farmers and city workers are interdependent. They prosper together or not at all.

But American labor also benefits from imports. Our huge American industrial machine could not operate at present levels without raw materials supplied by other countries. This became increasingly evident as wartime demands depleted our natural resources, particularly minerals. The U. S. Bureau of Mines reported to Congress, in May, 1947, that our known commercial reserves of twenty-four major minerals were less than sufficient to supply thirty-five years of domestic requirements at current rates of consumption. Among these are such vital minerals as copper, lead, zinc, manganese, chrome, tungsten, mica, tin, bauxite, cadmium, vanadium, tantalum, asbestos, graphite, nickel, and petroleum. Reduced imports of such products would reduce our present industrial production, would create unemployment, and would raise prices to consumers on hundreds of products used in our daily lives.

In addition, a great number of products which are essential to the American standard of living must be provided by other countries. Tea and coffee for our tables, as well as pepper, pineapple, chocolate, sugar, and bananas, come from foreign lands. Wool for our clothing, hemp for rope, and rubber for a thousand uses, come largely from imports.

A sharp reduction in American foreign trade, both export and import, would reverberate throughout the entire domestic economy and would make it impossible to maintain full employment and high living standards in this country.

The European Recovery Program

The best way to maintain American export trade is to encourage economic recovery abroad.

That is one reason why the CIO supports the European Recovery Program. Without European recovery there can be no permanent world recovery, because Europe is the keystone in the world's economic arch. Europe is the principal market for United States exports, absorbing in the prewar years over 40 percent of our total exports. Europe is also the principal market for the exports of Latin America, Asia, and Africa. The capacity of those countries to buy American products depends, in part, upon their ability to sell their own products to Europe.

The over-all goal of the European Recovery Program is to restore the European economy to the prewar level and to make Europe self-sufficient by mid-1952. Congress appropriated $5 billion for this gigantic endeavor in 1948. The nineteen countries who have chosen to participate in ERP have requested $4.3 billion for the second year, a request soon to be considered in Congress. Despite Communist opposition, these European countries have already made enormous strides toward recovery. The industrial production of Western Europe has almost reached the prewar level; and bread-grain production is nearly 90 percent of the prewar rate. European consumption is still below the prewar level, because the European economy suffers from the loss of its foreign investments during the war, from the stoppage of raw materials from east of the Iron Curtain, and from the loss of raw materials from the Far East.

The CIO has participated actively in ERP from the very beginning. We participated in the Harriman Committee that helped formulate the ERP, supported it at Congressional hearings, and are now represented in the administrative organization of ERP. It is the CIO's view that improved living standards and a wider horizon of political liberty go hand in hand; and that European recovery strengthens the democratic peoples and the labor movements of those countries. As President Philip Murray said in his 1948 report to the Tenth CIO Convention, "Only evil, anti-democratic forces in the world want Europe to drift helplessly into a breakdown that will cause even more human misery, disease, poverty, and social confusion which is the breeding ground of dictatorships."

If ERP puts Europe on its feet again by mid-1952, it is equally essential to the final success of the plan that Europe be able to stay on its feet after emergency American financial aid comes to an end. Otherwise, our effort and sacrifice will have been in vain.

To achieve an eventual self-supporting status, the densely populated countries of Western Europe must be able to buy raw materials from many parts of the world, because their own resources are inadequate to meet their needs. To pay for these imported raw materials, Western Europe must export manufactured products to many countries. The establishment of trading conditions that make for good world markets is thus a life-and-death matter to a self-supporting Europe. Unless the nations that are benefiting under the European Recovery Program are able to sell the products which their rehabilitated industries produce, they will be denied the monetary exchange which they must have to buy from others commodities which must be imported by them to survive. Thus, ERP must be supplemented by the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program and the Charter for an International Trade Organization which are intended to establish trading conditions that make for good world markets for all nations.

The ERP, the Trade Agreements program, and the ITO Charter represent the tripod of United States economic foreign policy. If one leg of the tripod weakens, the entire structure is shaken.

What Is the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Program?

The aim of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program is to reduce artificial trade barriers so as to encourage an expansion of competitive world trade.

Under the Trade Agreements Act, the President may conclude trade agreements with other countries whereby the United States reduces its tariff rates on individual products we buy from them in return for tariff reductions by the other countries on products they buy from us. Such an agreement is a "swap" of trade benefits.

The Trade Agreements Act was passed in 1934 for a three-year period, and has been renewed five times since then. The last renewal by the 80th Congress, in June, 1948, was for one year, instead of the customary three years, and had crippling amendments. President Truman, in his State of the Union message on January 5, 1949, recommended that the Act be restored "to full effectiveness," in its original form without crippling amendments, for another three years (until June, 1951). The CIO, in its 1948 Convention resolution and in testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee on January 25, 1949, endorsed extension of the Trade Agreements authority on a long-range basis to promote national economic stability and to encourage international trade.

An effective Trade Agreements Act is particularly important at this time because of American efforts to encourage other countries to reduce trade barriers at the forthcoming World Trade Conference scheduled to meet at Annecy, France, April 11, 1949. Thirteen new countries have agreed to participate in that conference, with the twenty-three countries which had already signed the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade at Geneva in 1947, in order to negotiate with each other and with the twenty-three for a further reduction of trade barriers. The General Agreement of 1947, already in effect for all twenty-three countries but one, contained tariff commitments on individual products accounting for over one-half of the world's foreign trade.

Comparison of Production per man-hour in U.S. and five other countries

Guernsey-Montgomery for the Economic Outlook, CIO.

The Annecy Conference, if successful, will help to expand trade among European countries themselves, thereby lessening European dependence upon the United States. When Congress passed the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, it emphasized that European countries should take all appropriate measures of self-help. That Act expressly required each participating country to make agreements with the United States committing itself to cooperate with other participating countries "to reduce barriers to trade among themselves and with other countries" and to stimulate "an increasing interchange of goods" among themselves. Such action would enable European countries to develop their production along more efficient lines, thereby increasing their total output of goods.

Do High Tariffs Guarantee High Wage Levels?

It has been charged that the Trade Agreements program, by reducing American tariffs, will reduce American wages to the levels of foreign countries. This argument assumes that American production cannot compete against foreign products if our tariffs are reduced, and that there will be a flood of imports into the United States which will create unemployment and low wages in this country. Nothing could be further from the truth. The best proof of American competitive power is the simple fact that we have been and are competing successfully. United States exports have exceeded imports almost every year since 1875. If we can compete successfully against foreign competition in foreign markets, surely we can meet foreign competition in our own markets.

Our competitive strength is due to the efficiency of American labor and industry in relation to abundant natural resources and a larger domestic market. Our relative efficiency is indicated by a study of labor productivity in the United States and Great Britain, made by the International Labour Office. With British output per worker in 1935-39 counted as 100, it shows United States output per worker in that same period as follows:

Manufacturing	215
Mining	415
Public utilities and communications	233
Building and construction	115
Agriculture and fisheries	103

Postwar comparisons would be even more striking because United States productivity per worker increased greatly during the war, whereas the wartime destruction of factories and the lag in replacement of obsolescent machinery, tended to retard British productivity. And labor productivity in Great Britain is greater than that of most other countries.

High productivity, rather than the American tariff, accounts for the American wage level. If our labor productivity were low, we would not have high wages even if our tariffs were raised a thousand times. Many foreign countries have much higher tariffs than the United States, yet their wage levels are lower than ours simply because their productivity is lower than ours. The plain truth is that foreign countries worry about their ability to compete with us.

In certain cases, unusual circumstances might cause an abnormal increase in imports of a particular commodity after the tariff was reduced. The Trade Agreement procedure provides a safeguard in such cases. If, as a result of a tariff reduction, imports of a particular commodity enter the United States in abnormal quantities, so as to create or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry, the tariff reduction may be withdrawn without obtaining the consent of the other country. The other country would then be free to withdraw an equivalent concession from the United States. The provision has been incorporated in all of our trade agreements since 1943.

American labor knows that when huge American corporations shed crocodile tears over the tale that imports depress American wages, their real purpose generally is to restrict imports so they can raise prices to consumers in this country and increase their own large profits. Already full production and full employment in the United States is threatened by the unjustified increase in corporation prices and profits relative to consumer income. (Read CIO Economic Outlook, January, 1949, and October, 1948.)

Import competition helps to control monopolies, helps to keep domestic prices at competitive levels, and helps to keep our economy healthy. Reciprocal Trade Agreements, by lowering our tariffs, encourage import competition.

If we expect to export to other countries we must expand our imports from them. In 1948, United States total exports were nearly double total imports from all countries (see chart above); and exports to Europe were four times as large as our imports from Europe. Europe cannot buy our products unless the United States and other countries buy from them.

The tariff is a special tax upon imports. Not only does it restrain imports, thereby fostering domestic monopolies and higher prices to consumers, but it burdens consumers with a direct tax which falls indiscriminately upon all those who use imported products. For example, the tariff on woolen cloth taxes the poor man almost as much as the rich man. An equitable tax system, such as income taxes, is one based upon ability to pay. Mr. Cordell Hull, who sponsored the Trade Agreements Act of 1934, was a leader in the fight for the Income Tax Law in 1913.

The Charter for an International Trade Organization

The Charter for an International Trade Organization (ITO) represents an additional step toward the United States' objective of expanding world trade and stimulating world economic recovery.

The CIO is actively supporting the Charter. Not only have we testified in its behalf; we also were represented at the Havana Conference a year ago which formulated its detailed provisions.

The Charter does two things: It establishes rules that countries voluntarily agree to follow in their conduct of trade with each other. It creates an organization, composed of the governments of all countries that adhere to the Charter, to administer these rules and to settle trade disputes.

The countries that worked together in the preparation of this Charter felt that the existence of an agreed-upon code of fair dealing in international trade, and the existence of a permanent forum for the settlement of trade disputes, would make it possible for them to cooperate in an expansion of world trade. They felt that such an organization and procedure would help to avoid the kind of economic warfare between nations which prevailed in the decades between World Wars I and II. This economic warfare dried up international trade in the 1930's, created economic disorder and unemployment in many countries, and contributed much to the economic and political instability that led to World War II.

The Charter was formulated by the fifty-seven-nation United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, at Havana, Cuba, November 21, 1947, to March 24, 1948. Fifty-four countries have already agreed to the text of the Charter and are now submitting it to their governments for ratification. It will go to the United States Congress for decision as to action by this country early in the forthcoming session. What other countries do about the Charter, which was sponsored by our own government during the war, will be determined largely by action of the United States Congress now.

The Charter rules cover the whole range of international economic relationships: tariffs, quotas, subsidies, foreign exchange, customs formalities, cartels, commodity agreements, non-discrimination, state trading, and the international aspects of foreign investments, employment and economic development. It pledges countries to consult with each other on any international trade action affecting another country. It obligates countries to negotiate for the reduction of trade barriers, thus extending to other countries the aims of our own Reciprocal Trade Agreements program. It obligates member countries not to discriminate against the trade of each other, except in carefully limited cases which have been previously agreed upon. It obligates member countries to settle their international trade differences in accordance with the principles of the Charter and the decisions of the International Trade Organization. Instead of the rules of the jungle, orderly and democratic procedures would now be applied to international trade.

The ITO respects the sovereign equality of all countries. It does not interfere in their domestic affairs. Each country has one vote. Decisions are by majority vote, unless otherwise specified. If a country is dissatisfied with a decision of the ITO, after following the specified procedures, it may leave the Organization on sixty days' notice. Thereafter, however, it will not be entitled to the lower tariff rates and other benefits that member countries grant each other.

The charter, as an instrument to expand world trade, production, and consumption, is of general significance to American labor. Certain provisions are of particular interest to American labor; namely, those relating to employment, economic development, and cartels.

Under the Charter, each member assumes a positive obligation to maintain "full and productive employment" within its territory by "measures appropriate to its political, economic and social institutions." This principle is similar to that of the United States Employment Act of 1946. Countries agree that in solving their own production and employment problems, they will try to avoid measures that injure other countries. They agree that unfair labor conditions, particularly in export industries, create difficulties for other countries. They agree to cooperate with the International Labour Office in regard to fair labor standards. The ITO may not interfere in the internal affairs of member countries to put these principles into operation, because sovereign countries do not permit such interference, but it can lend experience and counsel to encourage members to observe these principles in their dealings with one another. It remains, of course, for actual practice to demonstrate how successfully these principles will be carried out. But it is surely a step in the right direction to obtain international recognition and agreement upon such principles.

The Charter Seeks to Aid Under-developed Countries

The Charter recognizes another basic problem of profound implication for the future of mankind. This is the problem of economically under-developed countries.

There was a time, not so long ago, when economically powerful countries assumed a perpetual right to exploit the under-developed countries as they saw fit. Poverty, disease and misery were assumed to be the unquestioned fate of a large part of mankind. The Food and Agriculture Organization noted that before the war two-thirds of the world's population were under-nourished. The time has come when the people of the under-developed countries are no longer content to suffer their lot in silence. They feel that they should have a hand in their own destiny.

Two roads are open. With the cooperation of the industrialized countries, they may develop their production, raise their living standards, and broaden the horizon of their political liberties along the lines of democracy. The other road is an attempt by the industrialized countries to preserve the status quo, sullen resentment on the part of the "have nots" against the "haves," continued poverty, rejection of democratic ideas, and a turning toward totalitarianism. How long our kind of democracy, with its emphasis upon individual liberty and freedom could survive in such a world, no one can say.

From the United States' point of view, there is every reason to improve the lot of the under-developed countries.

Developed countries mean better markets for our exports. For example, Canada, with a population of 12 million people, bought nearly twice as many American goods before the war as did South America, with a population of 84 million people. In the prewar period, the United States exported more to Belgium and the Netherlands (with a population of 18 million people) than to China and India (with a population of 850 million people). As the under-developed countries improve their economic condition, wage levels in those countries rise. An improvement in the lot of labor in such countries, accompanied by a strengthening of trade union movements, makes for fairer conditions of international trade competition among all countries.

Another aspect of the problem was stressed in a recent foreign report of the Executive Committee of the National Planning Association, which is composed of representatives of American labor, agriculture, and industry: "It is the good fortune of the free nations," says the report, "that a large proportion of the world's resources, especially of its undeveloped resources, falls within their sphere of control. A major strategic aim of the United States must be to seek a full development and use of these resources. Both technical and financial assistance must be available to this end. Assistance given by the United States for the development of these resources will make an important contribution to economic stability and to orderly and balanced trade relations."

The Charter contains many provisions for stimulating progress of the under-developed countries. The ITO, when requested by a member, may make studies and advise members on projects for their economic development. Members must not place unreasonable obstacles upon the flow of capital, equipment, or technology to under-developed countries (except for purposes of national security). The Charter recognizes that international investment will stimulate economic development.

When an under-developed country wants to increase its tariff rates, to stimulate the development of a particular industry, the Charter permits such action under an orderly procedure: the country must obtain the consent of other interested members if the product is covered in a trade agreement, or the approval of ITO if the product is not in a trade agreement. In certain circumstances, the Charter permits countries to extend tariff preferences to each other, to broaden the market and to stimulate the development of a particular industry. Countries also may form customs unions to broaden the "free trade area" of their market.

Under the Charter, participants also agree to prevent business practices affecting international trade which restrain competition and foster monopolistic control. When a member is injured by such practices of another country, it may ask the ITO to investigate and recommend to the other country the steps necessary to curb such practices.

People are now aware how the prewar international cartels restricted international trade. Domestic monopolies often restrict trade, too.

The President's Council of Economic Advisers noted in their report of December, 1948, that control of the domestic market is passing more and more into the hands of the large corporations, through internal growth and through the swallowing of smaller firms, and that the concentration of economic power is becoming more and more intense. It recalls the findings of the Temporary National Economic Committee that before the war four or fewer firms controlled 75 percent or more of the production of each of the industries which together produced one-third by value of all industrial products in the United States.

It is hardly a coincidence that some of the most vigorous opponents of the ITO Charter, who loudly complain that the Charter is "a vast invasion of free competitive enterprise," come from huge corporations, which operate behind the shelter of exorbitant tariff protection, which were associated with German cartels before the war, and which are now under indictment for violations of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

Bound Copies "Economic Outlook" for 1948

The 1948 issues of the ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, bound with cardboard covers and side-stapled, will be available at $2 per volume. Its complete subject-matter index will be valuable for organizers, labor editors, and education directors. No orders will be accepted after March 15, 1949; volumes will be shipped shortly thereafter. Price, $2.00.

Send in your order today.

Guernsey-Montgomery for the Economic Outlook, CIO.

The curbing of cartel practices, and the maintenance of import competition, are necessary to keep consumer prices at levels which will support maximum markets for our own industrial products. Cartels and monopolies make it almost impossible, in the long run, to maintain full employment, full production, and full consumption.

* * *

The European Recovery Program the Trade Agreements program, and the ITO Charter are three interlocking parts of the campaign to expand world production, to raise living standards, and to promote world economic recovery. The weakening of any one of these three tools of United States economic foreign policy would imperil the success of the others.

The struggle to maintain and extend the frontiers of democracy is more than a political battle. Economic well-being is a prerequisite of political stability and the extension of individual liberty. Only as we build towards world-wide economic recovery and permanent prosperity, to which orderly and expanding international trade makes a major contribution, can the battle against political repression be won.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

Published Monthly by

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

PHILIP MURRAY, President JAMES B. CAREY, Sec'y-Treas.
ALLAN S. HAYWOOD, Vice President

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION AND RESEARCH

718 JACKSON PLACE, N. W. WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

STANLEY H. RUTTENBERG, Director
George T. Guernsey, Associate Director of Education
Katherine Pollak Ellickson, Assistant Director of Research

EXTRA COPIES

15c a copy—$1.50 a year 100 or more copies—4½c each
Up to 100—5c each 1,000 or more copies—3c each

Mats of "Outlook" illustrations are available on request.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS, DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION AND RESEARCH

Vol. XIV No. 8 August 1953

How the Minority Rules in the States

Some years ago the Supreme Court of Kentucky declared:

"Equality is the basis of patriotism. No citizen will or ought to, love the state which oppresses him; and that citizen is arbitrarily oppressed who is denied equality of representation with every other of the Commonwealth."

These words could apply with considerable force to our federal government as well, since millions of American citizens, as we have seen, are being deprived of equal representation in the Congress of the United States.[1] In the legislatures of the states, however, minority rule is becoming so oppressive and has become so widespread, that it has taken on the nature of a national scandal!

Who are the second class citizens in this underrepresented majority? They are the millions living in our towns and cities, says the United States Conference of Mayors, pointing to the fact that the 59 percent of all Americans who were living in urban centers in 1947 elected only 25 percent of the state legislators.

"59%=25% is bad arithmetic—and bad government. It hurts not just city dwellers, but everybody." [2]

Today, 64 percent of all Americans live in urban centers and each year the proportion continues to rise. Yet the representation of city dwellers in most of the states has hardly increased at all.

[1] See "Our Unrepresentative Congress: A National Problem" CIO Economic Outlook, July 1953.

[2] See "Government of the People, By the People, For the People," a pamphlet issued by the United States Conference of Mayors, 730 Jackson Place, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Guernsey-Montgomery for the Economic Outlook, CIO.

Pretty Bad Arithmetic

Economic Outlook, CIO

Let a legislator from Oregon speak for himself:

"I represent 81,000 people. A few desks away sits a senator from a realm of sagebrush and mountains and he represents 7,200 people. This is the total population of his district. Any time there is a roll call, regardless of the proposal at issue, his vote can cancel mine. The result, of course, is that each resident of this senator's district in the backwoods has 11 times the voice in the state senate of one of my constituents in Portland." [3]

Take a roll call of the 48 state legislatures and you will find minority rule almost everywhere. Study the facts about your own state legislature. Check each representative in the Senate and in the House against the number of people he represents. Prepare to be shocked by what you find.

Take New Jersey, for example, the most heavily urbanized state in the nation. In the upper House of its state legislature sit eight senators who represent eight counties which contain four-fifths of the population. Outvoting them time after time are thirteen Senators from thirteen rural counties who represent only one-fifth of the population of New Jersey.

In Connecticut, the city of Hartford with 177,397 people has two representatives in the lower House; the town of Colebrook with a population of 592 also has two.

In agricultural Iowa, Polk County with 226,010 inhabitants—half of them living in Des Moines—is allowed one Senator in the Upper House. Mahaska County with 24,672 people has one. (The population of Polk County increased 30,000 between 1940 and 1950; Mahaska lost 2,000. Representation? Still one each.)

In California, Los Angeles County with 40 percent of the population, is entitled to only 2½ percent of the state senators.

In Georgia, the 393,000 people who live in Fulton County (Atlanta) had three representatives in the lower House in 1947; Echols County (population 3,000) had one.

America is predominantly an urban nation—over 95 million people now live in cities and towns—but the minority control over the city-dwelling majority goes far beyond the writing of state laws alone. It touches every level of government—federal, state and local.

We have already seen how the minority-controlled state legislatures influence the composition of the national government through unrestrained power to set up rotten borough federal Congressional districts within the state. But that is not all. The city majorities are even deprived by the legislatures of local self-rule in their own home towns. Not only are municipal governments controlled in their own actions, but the very existence of municipal governments must be authorized by the states from which they derive their power.

According to the U. S. Conference of Mayors, "So detailed is state control of municipal affairs that in a 20-year period, the New York State legislature made 550 amendments in the charter and passed 1,002 special acts relating to New York City alone."

[3] "Our Rotten Borough Legislatures" by Richard L. Neuberger, The Survey, February 1950.

In the Beginning, Just a Little Under-Representation

How, in a great Democratic nation, could such a distortion of government "by the people" come about? And why does this injustice continue to this day?

The answer can be found in the resistance of people and institutions to the changes which the growth of America into an urbanized industrial giant has long made overdue.

When the original 13 states adopted their state constitutions, the 95 percent of the population who lived on isolated farms and in scattered tiny villages were closely tied to their own townships and counties. In that day, it was not surprising that they wanted each township or county to have one representative in the State Legislature. In the majority of states today, this form of "area" representation, generally by counties, has become established, at least in the make-up of one of the two Houses of the State Legislature.

Back in 1790 when only 5 percent of the population lived in cities of over 2500, urban areas were so few and their populations were so small, this area form of representation involved only a slight inequity to the city dwellers.

Cities did have representation, however, and in the second House they usually had the full number to which their population entitled them. This second House, like the House of Representatives of the federal government, was often set up to reflect "people" rather than territories, like townships or counties. Under most state Constitutions seats in this second House were to be "reapportioned" at regular intervals—usually every 10 years—so that shifts in population within the state would be taken into account.

As the Constitutions of the 48 states were written, a pattern of legislative representation, somewhat like our federal system, emerged with one House based on area, the other on population. While in some states the system varies substantially from this pattern—and in detail no two state systems are alike—both area and population representation became characteristic of most state legislatures.

One of Many Examples

Economic Outlook, CIO. EACH • = 100 PEOPLE

Today: A Mockery of Democracy

But America would not stand still. The age of the frontier and the flintlock, and a nation predominantly made up of farmers, passed away. America's millions began to move to the cities and today a majority of us live there.

But the system by which state legislatures are elected has virtually remained the same.

Look at what this means:

In state after state "area" representation based on townships or counties has made a mockery of representative government.

Although some states have modified their Constitutions and now allow large counties two, three, or a few more additional senators (or combine two or three of the smallest counties into one senatorial district), the frustration of equality of representation continues.

Baltimore, with 47 percent of the population of Maryland, has 6 out of 29 Representatives in its Upper House. In New York and Pennsylvania, city representation in the Senate is limited to a fixed percentage of the total membership, regardless of population growth.

In Montana, Silver Bow County (Butte) with a population of 48,422 has one Senator; Petroleum County with 1,026 has one.

In California the 4,125,146 people who live in Los Angeles County elect one State Senator. The 13,568 people who live in the three counties constituting the smallest senatorial district also elect one.

Some state Constitutions even freeze unequal representation into the structures of both Houses of the legislature. Neither is set up to reflect the "respective numbers" in the population as our Federal constitution sets forth for the U. S. House of Representatives.

For example, Rhode Island allows a maximum of 6 Senators from any city and a minimum of one representative from any city or town but none to have more than one-fourth of the total.

No Texas county can have more than one Senator and not more than seven representatives, except that one additional is allowed for each 100,000 over 700,000.

Wyoming allows at least one seat to each county in both Houses, regardless of size.

Delaware froze its division of representatives and Senators among the various sections of the state in its Constitution of 1897 and hasn't changed it since.

Vermont and Connecticut base their representatives in the lower House on townships. Representation in the Senate is based on the counties.

We could go on recording state after state; in the overwhelming majority one House or both are set up so that political units rather than people are accorded major recognition in the legislatures.

By contrast, the lack of balance in the United States Senate—where New York has 92 times the population of Nevada but each state gets two Senate seats—is almost trivial. In California and Connecticut, for example, the vote of a resident of the smallest legislative district is worth 300 times the vote of a citizen who lives in the largest.

There is no logical justification for this outrageous distortion of the concept of representative government. Why should a sparsely populated county made up mostly of sagebrush or pastureland share equal voting rights with another, containing hundreds of thousands of people?

If representation based on townships and counties had some justification 100 years ago—when most of the population was rural and widely dispersed—there can be none today.

Any significance the county may have had in the day of the birchbark canoe or the covered wagon has dwindled in the age of the jet plane and the atom bomb. Besides, our American political system never conferred "sovereign" powers on the counties, such as were enjoyed by the 13 original sovereign states. There is no parallel in history or in function that can justify a status for the county in the structure of State government comparable to the role of the state in the government of the United States!

They Stop Counting People

But the worst shame of the states is the refusal of the legislatures to reapportion seats according to population changes even when the Constitution requires that they do so.

In most of the states representation in at least one House is supposed to reflect population in some degree as we have seen.

In 42 states the constitutions hold the legislators themselves responsible to reapportion legislative seats generally every 10 years, after the Federal Census is conducted. Yet in state after state, as the movement toward the cities has gained momentum, the dominantly rural legislators have refused to act. (See page 63.)

Perhaps it was too much to entrust this responsibility to them, since the action inevitably would remove many from their jobs. But even the courts have refused to compel compliance with the clear language of the state constitutions. Both state and federal judges have regularly ruled that they are without power since reapportionment is a "political" and not a "judicial" question.

As a consequence, only 19 state legislatures have gotten around to reapportioning one or both Houses since the Census of 1940. Connecticut last established its number of state representatives in 1818 and state senators in 1903. Mississippi's last reapportionment was in 1890, Illinois' and Alabama's in 1901. Most have not reapportioned for over ten, twenty, or thirty years.

Refusal of legislatures to reapportion ensures rotten borough control over the entire legislature. While the ideal of equal representation may already be stultified in one House, because it is based on area representation, the same effect is achieved in the other House as well by a refusal to reassign representation based on new population shifts.

In the Michigan upper House, the Senators from the five largest districts represent areas with a population of 2,432,743; the five smallest, 400,823. But even in the lower House, the disparity is now almost as great—577,617 against 141,480.

Here's how Iowa (last reapportionment: Senate 1928, House 1904) practices "equal" representation: Five urban counties with a combined population of 635,000 elect 5 Senators; 20 rural counties with 627,000 people elect 20. In the lower House the 10 representatives from the 5 urban counties are outvoted almost five to one by the 46 representatives from the rural counties.

Even Nebraska, which so hopefully adopted a one-house "model" state legislature a few years ago allows one representative for 17,936 rural citizens as against an average of one for 40,145 city people in Omaha's populous Douglas County. (Nebraska last reapportioned in 1934.)

Economic Outlook, CIO.

In state after state enlightened Governors have been elected by overwhelming majorities after promising to initiate critically needed programs in the field of housing, education, social insurance or tax reform. And time after time the peoples' will has been frustrated by the minority stranglehold over one or both Houses of the State Legislature.

Why Progress Stops at the State Line

Is there any wonder why, for the solution of so many vital issues, millions of Americans must look to their federal government instead of the capitols of their states?

While the United States Congress by no means reflects equal representation, its composition is still far more responsive to the needs of America's urban millions than the minority-dominated legislative bodies of most of the 48 states.

Even though modern-day problems increasingly require national leadership in this age of industrial inter-dependence, there is ample scope for constructive action within the states on many issues, if state governments do not default their responsibilities.[4]

Problems like slum clearance, urban traffic congestion, race relations, juvenile delinquency, day nurseries to aid working mothers, health and education, factory safety, workmen's compensation and a score of others plague city people but are often unknown in rural areas. Without adequate funds and state cooperation, cities are powerless to solve these problems unaided. Yet, the rural dominated legislatures—unfamiliar or unsympathetic to them—too often do little or nothing to help.

Is further intervention by the Federal Government the only answer? Or can representation in the legislatures of the states be so reconstituted that the needs and views of the urban majority receive attention and get action?

Too often special interest groups—not always originating in the countryside—try to pit farmer against city dweller in an effort to maintain a profitable status quo.

The State Senator from Portland, from whom we have already heard, speaks pointedly about the experience of Oregon on this issue:

"The chasm between farm and city interests is of course exaggerated. True, there are contrasts in emphasis. Yet, in nine instances out of ten, the law which is good for the truck driver is good for the orchardist as well. May I be pardoned a personal example in proof?

"As I write these words, the Oregon State Grange, largest agricultural organization in our rural state, publishes its 'box score' on the recent legislative session. Although I represent the state's only large city, I led the Grange's list with eleven 'favorable' votes and one regarded as 'unfavorable.'

"Ironically, at the bottom of the Grange compilation, with only three 'favorable' votes each, was a trio of senators from agricultural areas. Such episodes as this at least ought to help convince the dwellers in the hinterland that legislative reapportionment will not adversely affect their welfare."

The urban-rural fight over representation is not in reality a conflict between farmers and city citizens. In the states where the issue has been drawn the sharpest, few real "dirt farmers" actually sit in the halls of the legislatures.

[4] See "States' Rights: How Far Do They Go" CIO Economic Outlook July-August 1952.

Guernsey-Montgomery for the Economic Outlook, CIO.

The so-called urban-rural rivalry for legislative representation is largely a smokescreen. As Dean McHenry has pointed out with regard to California in the National Municipal Review:

"Certain business interests in the State have found it easier to make their influence felt in the legislature through Senators from rural areas. Privately owned utilities, banks, insurance companies and other concerns with crucial legislative programs have discovered some 'cow country' legislators more responsive to their demands and less committed to contrary points of view on key social and economic issues than are urban representatives." [5]

The vigorous opposition of the California Chamber of Commerce (not a dirt farmer organization) to a change in legislative representation more favorable to the cities seems to bear out this view.

Speaking on this issue in 1948, the Los Angeles Daily News said:

"The State Chamber of Commerce's charge that reapportionment would 'disenfranchise' the rural counties isn't borne out by analysis. Far from 'unbalancing' California's legislature, the proposed measure, if approved next November, would actually restore some semblance of democratic balance to what has been plainly an unbalanced, undemocratic legislative body. . . . Obviously what opponents of reapportionment are trying to do is to manufacture a bit of smog."

[5] Dean E. McHenry, "Urban-vs-Rural in California," National Municipal Review, July 1946.

What Can Be Done?

Respect for American democracy, both at home and abroad, as well as its ability to fulfill its basic purpose, demand the end of unrepresentative government.

The states are a good place to begin, since it is there that the rotten borough system grows the roots which eventually envelop even our federal Congress.

It is true that the United States Congress itself can end the evil of rotten borough in its own House of Representatives by enacting the Celler proposal to establish federal Congressional districts of reasonably equal size.[6]

Similarly, the state legislature can alleviate some of the gross injustice of unequal representation by reapportioning state districts as their own Constitutions prescribe. It is also within their power, and sometimes solely theirs, to initiate basic revisions of State Constitutions in order to bring their representation system up to date.

But there is a tragic dilemma in this situation. To end the minority stranglehold over our legislative bodies we are largely dependent on the initiative of these elected representatives themselves. Yet, the reluctance of legislators to vote themselves out of their own jobs, the pressure of party and special group interests, and the sheer force of inertia perpetuates the evil of misrepresentative government year after year. Since the courts won't act to destroy this veto power what then can be done?

Public opinion when sufficiently aroused can ultimately become an overwhelming force.

[6] For an explanation of the Celler Bill, see CIO Economic Outlook, July, 1953.

In three states—Michigan, Illinois and Wisconsin, the combined pressure of patriotic citizen groups has set reform movements in motion during the last twelve months.

These efforts include proposals to secure basic constitutional changes which will revise or scrap altogether the outmoded "area" system of representation; to take from the legislatures their power to control reapportionment or, if the legislature fails to act, to give reapportionment powers to an "ex officio" committee which would be subject to the discipline of the courts; to establish maximum limits that the population of legislative districts can deviate from the statewide average, like the 15 percent limitation for federal Congressional districts suggested by the Celler proposal.

The people still retain power to secure reform by effective use of the ballot box.

In some states, a Constitution which has become unworkable due to changing times, can be amended by a petition of the people. Initiative measures, in those states, provide one form of action that can be used to escape the vise of minority rule.

In all states the governors at least, are elected by the ballots of all of the people; in this case the votes of the city dweller and the urban resident count alike. Before elections all candidates for statewide office, and the political parties as well, can be forced to commit themselves to constitutional reform and reapportionment if an outraged public would demand it.

Certainly it appears to many, if not yet to the United States Supreme Court itself, that the Constitution of this land is being trampled upon when the vote of any citizen counts for but one-three-hundredth of the vote of another when electing the government that passes laws affecting both.

The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States specifically proclaims that:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

When, as in California, the people of the urban counties, who pay almost 70 percent of the state's taxes, are allowed only five senators in the legislature and fourteen senators, who represent only 6 percent of the entire state population, enjoy a veto power over the state's billion dollar budget—it appears to many—including the United States

DATES OF LAST REAPPORTIONMENTS OF STATE LEGISLATURES, BY HOUSE

States	Senate	House
1900 Census or before—8 States
Alabama	1901	1901
Connecticut	1903	1818
Delaware	1897	1897
Illinois	1901	1901
Iowa	1928	1904
Mississippi	1890	1890
Oklahoma	1908	1941
Tennessee	1905	1905
1910 Census—last for one or both Houses—1 State
Minnesota	1913	1913
1920 Census—last for one or both Houses—8 States
Indiana	1921	1921
Kansas	1923	1943
Louisiana	1921	1921
Maryland	1922	1922
Michigan	1925	1943
Montana	1921	1941 (1)
Pennsylvania	1921	1921
Texas	1920	1920
1930 Census—last for one or both Houses—11 States
Arizona	1932	1932
Arkansas	1936	1936
Colorado	1933	1933
Nebraska	1934	1934
North Dakota	1931	1931
Oregon	1933	1931
Rhode Island	1930	1930
South Carolina	1932	1932
Washington	1931	1931
West Virginia	1937	1933
Wisconsin	1931	1931
Wyoming	1933	1933
1940 Census—last for one or both Houses—17 States
California	1941	1941
Florida	1945	1945
Georgia	1946	1951
Idaho	.....	1941
Kentucky	1942	1942
Maine	1941	1941
Massachusetts	1947	1948
Missouri	1945	1945
Nevada	1947	1947
New Hampshire	.....	1943
New Jersey	1947	1947
New Mexico	1949	1949
New York	1943	1943
North Carolina	1941	1941
South Dakota	1947	1947
Vermont	1941	(2)
Virginia	1948	1948
1950 Census—last for one or both Houses—2 States
Ohio	1951	1951
Utah	1951	1951

Source: Wisconsin Legislative Reference Library and Citizens Bureau Questionnaire, March 1952.

(1) Council of State Governments gives last date for Montana—House–1951.

(2) Each town and city has one representative according to State Constitution.

Note: The fact that a reapportionment was carried out recently by no means indicates that it necessarily was carried out equitably.

Guernsey-Montgomery for the Economic Outlook, CIO.

Conference of Mayors—that the Constitution of the United States is being violated.

The duty to restore truly representative government to the people is the responsibility of all of us. Both as individuals and to the groups to which we all belong—church, patriotic, professional, civic, labor, farm, business, Republican and Democratic—we must unite to win this battle. Even the most conservative citizen—the one who really wants to solve community problems "at home" rather than to content himself merely by making states' rights speeches—has a place in this crusade.

In the effort to make the 48-state legislatures and the U. S. Congress truly representative of the people as they live today, the men and women of the CIO will give their complete support.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

Published Monthly by

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

WALTER P. REUTHER, Pres.

JAMES B. CAREY, Sec.-Treas. JOHN V. RIFFE, Ex. Vice-Pres.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION AND RESEARCH

718 JACKSON PLACE, N. W. WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

STANLEY H. RUTTENBERG, Director

Katherine Pollak Ellickson, Associate Director of Research

Nat Goldfinger, Associate Director of Research

Frank Fernbach, Associate Director of Research

George T. Guernsey, Associate Dir. in Charge of Education

Ben Segal, Associate Director of Education

Stuart P. Brock, Associate Director of Education

EXTRA COPIES

15c a copy—$1.50 a year 100 or more copies—4½c each

Up to 100—5c each 1,000 or more copies—3c each

Mats of "Outlook" illustrations are available on request.

Recent CIO Publications

No. 222. THE CIO CASE AGAINST TAFT-HARTLEY. A 91-page detailed, chapter-and-verse presentation, including CIO comments on pending bills to revise T-H and the testimony of CIO Pres. Walter P. Reuther and General Counsel Arthur J. Goldberg before the Senate Labor Committee. $1.00 a copy; quantity price on request.

MAINTAINING PROSPERITY. A careful statement by the CIO's Committee on Economic Policy which stresses the economic program our nation must follow to maintain prosperity. 52 pages, 17 charts with texts. $1.00 a copy; 3 for $2.00; 10 or more 60¢ each.

No. 223. UNION ACTION FOR HEALTH. CIO charges America is paying price for the AMA's victory to date over National Health Insurance, and tabulates gains made for CIO members and families through union efforts. 15¢ each; 20 for $1.00; 100 for $4.50.

No. 224. RULES FOR UNION MEETINGS. Based on Roberts Rules of Order as used by one CIO union. Generally applicable to other union meetings. 15¢ each; 100 or more, 12¢ each.

No. 225. 116 QUESTIONS ABOUT TAFT-HARTLEY. Some of the most frequently asked questions about T-H, plus the answers, in easy to read form. 5¢ each; 50 for $1.50; 100 for $2.50; 500 for $10.00; 1,000 for $18.00.

No. 226. HIGHER INTEREST RATES HELP BANKS—HIT YOU. Nation's economic difficulties no longer arise from probable future inflation, but from too steep deflation. Sees danger in "High Interest, Tight Money" policies of Treasury Department. 15¢ each; 20 for $1.00; 100 for $4.50.

No. 227. FARMERS AND WORKERS WIN TOGETHER. 4-page popular presentation of reasons for developing cooperation between farmers and workers. 15¢ each; 20 for $1.00; 100 for $2.00; 1,000 for $15.00; 10,000 for $100.00.

No. 228. WHAT'S AHEAD—EXPANSION OR UNEMPLOYMENT? Calls for recognition of increased productivity of American workers, creation of new employment opportunities, and states expanding economy can be maintained by rising civilian spending. 15¢ each; 20 for $1.00; 100 for $4.50.

Order from

CIO PUBLICITY DEPARTMENT

718 JACKSON PL., N. W., WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

REGISTRATION CERTIFICATE NO._____

COUNTY OF WALTON, STATE OF FLORIDA

Precinct No._____ Date_____ 19_____

NAME _____

Address _____

Age	Occupation	Col.	Sex	Party	Nativity	F. H.

Date of Birth

This registration is made in accordance with the laws of the State of Florida.

_____
Signature of Elector

By_____

Supervisor of Registration. Deputy

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO ALL VOTERS

YOU MUST NOTIFY REGISTRATION OFFICE of any change in address. Fill in following spaces and return by mail to the Office of the Supervisor of Registration.

New Address City-St. & No. or Rural Route

My residence is located: Inside City Limits ☐ Outside City Limits ☐

All registration questionnaires must be filled in, signed and returned by you if you wish to remain qualified to VOTE.

Date .....19.....

Sign .....

BOWEN SUPPLY CO., PLANT CITY, FLA. FORM 11

COUNTY, FLORIDA

THIS REGISTRATION IS MADE IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE LAWS OF FLORIDA

R. A. GRAY SECRETARY OF STATE

PERMANENT REGISTRATION OF VOTERS

PRECINCT RECORD

LAST NAME	FIRST	MIDDLE	OCCUPATION	AGE	DATE OF BIRTH	REG. NUMBER

STREET ADDRESS	PLACE OF BIRTH	SEX	COLOR

CITY	STATE	MAILING ADDRESS

NATURALIZATION DATA - IF FOREIGN BORN

COURT	STATE	DATE	CERTIFICATE NO.	RESIDE IN MUNICIPALITY? IF SO GIVE NAME

YES	NO	HEIGHT	WEIGHT	COMPLEXION	EYES	HAIR	BLIND	LOSS OF LIMB	OTHER	ILLITERACY

CAN VOTER BOTH WRITE NAME AND MARK BALLOT? IF ANSWER IS NO, STATE FULLY DISABILITY AND DESCRIPTION

OATH: I DO SOLEMNLY SWEAR OR AFFIRM THAT I WILL PROTECT AND DEFEND THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES AND OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA: THAT I AM TWENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE AND HAVE BEEN A RESIDENT OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA FOR TWELVE MONTHS AND OF THIS COUNTY FOR SIX MONTHS AND I AM QUALIFIED TO VOTE UNDER THE CONSTITUTION AND LAWS OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA.

SWORN AND SUBSCRIBED BEFORE ME

THIS_____DAY OF_____19____

SUPERVISOR OF REGISTRATION

BY_____

SUPERVISOR ☐ DEPUTY ☐

I STATE UNDER OATH THAT ALL OF THESE STATEMENTS ARE TRUE

MARK | SIGNATURE OF VOTER | PARTY

AS AN ELECTOR VOTES RECORD FACT OF VOTING WITH AN X IN PROPER PLACE.

VOTING RECORD

1ST PRIM.
2ND PRIM.
GENERAL
YEAR	50	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	60	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	70	1	2	3	4
SPECIAL
SPECIAL
SPECIAL

SCHOOL						PERSONAL PROP.	FREE HOLDER		PARTY	LAST NAME	FIRST	MIDDLE
1
DIST.		PRECINCT NO.				TAXPAYER	CITY	COUNTY	PARTY

OUT

REGISTRATION NO.	LAST NAME	FIRST	MIDDLE

ADDRESS CHANGED TO	PRECINCT	DATE	DEPUTY	REMARKS	DATE	CLERK
ORIGINAL REGISTRATION ON LINE BELOW

The humblest citizen of all the land, when clad in the armor of a righteous cause is stronger than all the hosts of Error.
William Jennings Bryan - 1896

ANOTHER JOB FOR THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE CONCERNED

In 1948, when all was not well in many of our Southern courts, women--church women--sat in the courts, oftentimes saying nothing, but by their very presence, the character of the courts was changed for better. Now, in an effort to circumvent the Civil Rights legislation passed by Congress last fall and at the same time curtail a large registration of Negroes, our several Southern states are in the process of passing very restrictive voters' registration legislation which will make it very difficult for any new voter - Negro or white to register. This is a denial of basic democratic principles and will bring in its trail injustices and discrimination that will inevitably bring law suits costly both to the taxpayer and the defendant.

There is something we can do as we did in our campaign "Know Your Courts as You Know Your Schools." We must know our Registrars and their methods:

BY VISITS TO THE OFFICE
AND OBSERVING METHODS USED. Hale County too-

****

For your guide here are a list of questions for you to fill in from your observations:

1. When and where are registration books open in your community? In Hale County Court House
2. When and where do Negroes register? In Court House along with white
3. Is there an application form to be filled out in order to register? yes If so, attach a sample.) In closing a blank
4. Is every one permitted to register after filling out registration forms? Whites In the Negroes fill out their form & republicized
5. What questions were asked by the Registrar? (Use another sheet of paper to list them, if many questions were asked.)
6. Are the same questions asked Negroes and whites? yes
7. How did you obtain this information?
   a. By going in registration office and observing? yes
   b. Was permitted to observe during registration? _____
   c. Talked to people who had registered? yes
   d. Talked to the Registrar? yes

FILL IN AND MAIL TO: and to Mrs. Carter Prattville Ala

Mrs. M. E. Tilly, Fellowship of the Concerned
Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Avenue, N. E., Room 432
Atlanta, Georgia

Mrs. W. C. Carter
Prattville Ala.

The humblest citizen of all the land, when clad in the armor of a righteous cause is stronger than all the hosts of Error.
William Jennings Bryan - 1896

ANOTHER JOB FOR THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE CONCERNED

In 1948, when all was not well in many of our Southern courts, women--church women--sat in the courts, oftentimes saying nothing, but by their very presence, the character of the courts was changed for better. Now, in an effort to circumvent the Civil Rights legislation passed by Congress last fall and at the same time curtail a large registration of Negroes, our several Southern states are in the process of passing very restrictive voters' registration legislation which will make it very difficult for any new voter - Negro or white to register. This is a denial of basic democratic principles and will bring in its trail injustices and discrimination that will inevitably bring law suits costly both to the taxpayer and the defendant.

There is something we can do as we did in our campaign "Know Your Courts as You Know Your Schools." We must know our Registrars and their methods:

BY VISITS TO THE OFFICE AND OBSERVING METHODS USED.

Walton county Ga

****

For your guide here are a list of questions for you to fill in from your observations:

1. When and where are registration books open in your community? County Court House - open Continuously until 30 days before election.
2. When and where do Negroes register? Same as whites.
3. Is there an application form to be filled out in order to register? If so, attach a sample.) No
4. Is every one permitted to register after filling out registration forms? Whites Yes, Negroes Yes.
5. What questions were asked by the Registrar? (Use another sheet of paper to list them, if many questions were asked.)
6. Are the same questions asked Negroes and whites? Yes
7. How did you obtain this information?
   a. By going in registration office and observing? ✓
   b. Was permitted to observe during registration? ____
   c. Talked to people who had registered? ✓
   d. Talked to the Registrar? ✓

FILL IN AND MAIL TO:

Sample registration blank & card attached.

Mrs. M. E. Tilly, Fellowship of the Concerned
Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Avenue, N. E., Room 432
Atlanta, Georgia

Reprinted from The Journal of the American Medical Association
December 26, 1942, Vol. 120, pp. 1369-1372

Copyright, 1942, by American Medical Association

SYPHILIS AMONG MEN OF DRAFT AGE IN THE UNITED STATES

AN ANALYSIS OF 1,895,778 SEROLOGIC REPORTS OF MEN AGED 21-35 WHO WERE EXAMINED UNDER THE SELECTIVE TRAINING AND SERVICE ACT OF 1940

R. A. VONDERLEHR, M.D.
Assistant Surgeon General, U. S. Public Health Service
AND
LIDA J. USILTON, M.A.
Principal Statistician, Division of Venereal Diseases,
U. S. Public Health Service
WASHINGTON, D. C.

For years those struggling with the syphilis problem in the United States have been fighting an unknown antagonist. What is the problem? Where is it? Lack of satisfactory answers to these questions has handicapped every effort at syphilis control. The objective of this study is to discover, for the purpose of applying the machinery of control more efficiently, what and where the syphilis problem is.

SOURCE AND NATURE OF MATERIAL

The data used were taken from the reports of clinical examinations and blood tests given to 2,093,138 selectees and volunteers through Aug. 31, 1941. The Selective Training and Service Act of 1940 requires a routine serologic blood test for syphilis as a part of the general examination of every draftee and volunteer. The results of these tests were recorded in quadruplicate on standard report forms, together with a statement by the examining physician as to the presence of primary or secondary lesions. One copy of each form was forwarded to the United States Public Health Service by the health officers of forty-four states and the District of Columbia. Through April 15, 1941 1,051,985 reports of blood tests had been received. Another 1,041,153 were received through Aug. 31, 1941. A summary of the first reports has been published.[1]

The study does not include data from Idaho, Kentucky, Oregon and Vermont. These states did not use the standard report forms, and the data they supplied were incomplete. A further reduction in the number of cases included in the study was made when all men under 21 and over 35 were excluded. In most states their number was too small to yield rates which could be used with confidence. In addition, men of unknown age or residence were excluded because it was impossible to classify them properly. Finally, since races other than Negro and white were grouped with unknowns in the tabulations, they were excluded also. The study therefore deals with white and Negro men of known residence, aged 21 to 35 inclusive.

The proportion of the total sample lost because of the exclusions just described was small. Of the total 2,093,138 men for whom reports were received, 114,865 were excluded for age and another 82,495 for lack of data regarding race or residence. Thus, reports on 1,895,778 individuals, 90.6 per cent of the total number reported, form the basis for all calculations.

DEFINITION OF RATES

All rates represent the proportion of men between the ages of 21 and 35 with suggestive early lesions or with positive or doubtful serologic test results. "Observed" rates refer to the group actually examined. "Corrected" rates are an estimate of the prevalence in the entire male population between the ages of 21 and 35.

It might be objected that the inclusion of doubtful tests among the positives, by increasing the total number of infections, would make the rate too high. However, in the 1941 evaluation of serodiagnostic tests for syphilis[2] less than 0.3 per cent of positive reactions were found in known nonsyphilitic bloods, whereas at least 10 to 15 per cent of known syphilitic bloods gave negative reactions. It is therefore highly probable that the total number of positive reports would be increased rather than decreased if an infallible criterion for the presence or absence of syphilis could be found and applied. This interpretation is, of course, valid for statistical purposes only. It might lead to tragic errors if applied to the diagnosis of individual cases.

1. Vonderlehr, R. A., and Usilton, Lida J.: Syphilis Among Selectees and Volunteers, J. A M. A. 117: 1350 (Oct. 18) 1941.

2. Parran, Thomas, and others: Serodiagnostic Tests for Syphilis in State Laboratories: The 1941 Evaluation of Their Performance, J. A. M. A. 117: 1167 (Oct. 4) 1941.

CORRECTION FACTORS

The chief factor which required correction in the rates was that of age. The younger men, for the most part without dependents or occupations to defer them from the draft, were numerically more strongly represented than the older men. This bias was constant throughout the sample and, since positive blood tests were found more and more frequently with increasing age, had the effect of lowering the rates. Consequently the correction for age raised the national rates in every case. Among the rates corrected for age only, i. e. the rates specific for race and residence, there is only one instance in which correction produced a reduction in rate. This was among rural Negroes in Kansas, where, probably because of the small number tested, a higher rate was found among the younger men. Similarly there was only one state in which the total rate for either whites or Negroes was lower after correction. In New Mexico the Negro rate was reduced from 318.8 to 304.8. In this case too few rural Negroes were examined to provide corrected rates for the group.

The direction of the biases introduced by race and residence was less constant than were those resulting from age. In some states, particularly those with large Negro populations, proportionately more colored than white persons were tested; elsewhere the reverse was true. Similar variations with regard to urban and rural residence existed. The total effect of these variations was to increase the rates, mainly by inclusion of an undue proportion of Negroes, thus counterbalancing to some extent the lowering of the rates by the age distribution.

This is demonstrated in some states where certain corrected rates were appreciably lower than the observed rates. These include Florida (total rate), Georgia (total rate), Louisiana (urban rate), Maryland (rural rate) and Mississippi (urban rate). In each case in which correction resulted in reduction there was a smaller proportion of Negroes among the state population than among the individuals examined.

For the three factors age, race and residence the rates can be corrected to represent the prevalence of syphilis with reasonable accuracy as far as it is reflected in the occurrence of positive and doubtful serologic reactions and suggestive early lesions. That other less tangible factors of selection exist in the sample cannot be denied. A few that come most readily to mind are marital status, permanence of residence in a community and economic status. These cannot be identified with assurance, much less evaluated or corrected; and it must suffice that their existence is suspected but their effect unknown.

CALCULATION OF THE RATES

The methods of calculating the rates and of making the corrections were sufficiently simple and straightforward. The number of men examined and the number in whom evidence of syphilis was found were tabulated according to residence (rural or urban), race (white or Negro) and age. From these two sets of figures, specific rates of prevalence were calculated. These rates were then weighted by the state populations in corresponding age, race and residence groups. The populations used for weighting were obtained from the 1940 census reports. The census tabulations, however, set up the age limits as 20-24, 25-29, 30-34, whereas the selectee tabulations had the age limits 21-25, 26-30, 31-35. Consequently it was necessary to interpolate. This was done by means of the La Grange formula applied to the cumulative population curves. Nine fixed points were used for this purpose (a polynomial of the eighth degree).

In some states the number of Negroes tested (urban, rural or both) was so small that no rates could be calculated. In all such cases the entire group was omitted from both numerator and denominator of subsequent calculations. In other instances race-residence groups contained so few individuals that only one or two of the age specific rates could be calculated. When this occurred the missing rate (or rates) was estimated on the basis of known rates for the other age groups.

The age specific rates were multiplied by the corresponding state populations to get the estimated total number of persons in each age-race-residence group showing some evidence of syphilis. When this estimated number of infected persons is divided by the state population of the group, the result is the rate corrected for age. The total estimated number of infected persons for the state in each race and residence group divided by the total populations of these groups gave the corrected rates for the state by race and residence. The same process applied to the total number of syphilitic men and the total populations in the forty-four reporting states and the District of Columbia gave the corrected national rates by race and residence.

HOW MUCH SYPHILIS?

Now, how much syphilis is there among white and Negro men in the United States between the ages of 21 and 35? The corrected rate of prevalence is 47.7 per thousand (table 1). Among the men actually examined and without any correction the rate is 45.3 per thousand (table 2). The highest rate of prevalence is among Negroes, the corrected rates for the entire country being 272.0 per thousand for Negroes and 23.5 per thousand for white men (table 1).

Among both white men and Negroes the rates rise sharply with increasing age. Table 2 shows observed white and Negro rates for the three age groups in both urban and rural areas. Among the white urban dwellers the rate of prevalence is almost four times as high in the age group 31-35 as in the age group 21-25. Among Negro urban dwellers the rate among the oldest men is about twice the rate among the youngest men. This, of course, does not mean that the older men are exposed to syphilis twice or four times as fast as the younger men but rather that there is a constantly accumulating backlog of uncured syphilis. This is due in part to the fact that too much syphilis never is brought to treatment and in part to the fact that too many syphilitic patients are not held through an adequate treatment course.

WHERE IS IT?

Of greatest practical value to those operating the control machinery is the distribution of syphilis. Where is it? The rates by state and region given in table 1 are most effectively illustrated on the map showing total rates of syphilis in each state. It will be seen that the highest rates are in Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, Georgia and Louisiana. When white and Negro populations are considered separately the same

TABLE 1.—Syphilis Rates per Thousand White and Negro Men Aged 21-35 in the United States, Based on 1,895,778 Selectee Serologic Reports and Arranged in Descending Order by States, U. S. Census Division and Region

White		Negro		Total
Area	Syphilis Rate	Area	Syphilis Rate	Area	Syphilis Rate
State:		State:		State:
1. New Mexico	54.2	1. Florida	405.9	1. Mississippi	171.5
2. Texas	53.4	2. Texas	343.2	2. Florida	158.6
3. Florida	53.3	3. Georgia	327.6	3. South Carolina	145.5
4. Arizona	48.9	4. Maryland	324.6	4. Georgia	133.2
5. South Carolina	48.8	5. Mississippi	321.6	5. Louisiana	116.5
6. West Virginia	46.9	6. Arkansas	314.3	6. Arkansas	98.6
7. Oklahoma	39.5	7. New Mexico	304.8	7. Texas	93.4
8. Tennessee	39.4	8. South Carolina	296.3	8. District of Columbia	92.7
9. Georgia	39.0	9. Arizona	295.8	9. Alabama	92.3
10. Louisiana	37.9	10. Tennessee	277.8	10. North Carolina	84.6
11. Mississippi	35.2	11. District of Columbia	272.9	11. Tennessee	81.1
12. Nevada	32.1	12. Louisiana	272.0	12. Virginia	80.8
13. Virginia	31.0	13. Indiana	267.2	13. Maryland	77.3
14. Arkansas	30.0	14. Oklahoma	254.5	14. Arizona	60.4
15. Indiana	29.9	15. Virginia	245.9	15. West Virginia	57.2
16. Missouri	28.5	16. Delaware	239.6	16. New Mexico	56.5
17. North Carolina	28.5	17. North Carolina	237.4	17. Oklahoma	54.7
18. Maryland	28.4	18. Missouri	231.6	18. Delaware	51.5
19. Alabama	28.2	19. Alabama	227.1	19. Missouri	41.6
20. California	27.0	20. California	212.3	20. Indiana	38.3
21. Maine	26.9	21. West Virginia	211.7	21. Nevada	32.1
22. Wyoming	25.8	22. Illinois	211.4	22. California	30.7
23. District of Columbia	23.8	23. Kansas	210.5	23. Ohio	30.1
24. Ohio	21.9	24. Connecticut	207.1	24. Illinois	30.0
25. Delaware	21.8	25. Nebraska	204.4	25. Kansas	26.9
26. Illinois	21.1	26. Colorado	201.3	26. Maine	26.9
27. Kansas	20.5	27. New York	197.3	27. Wyoming	25.8
28. Colorado	20.2	28. New Jersey	193.0	28. Pennsylvania	24.7
29. Pennsylvania	17.0	29. Ohio	191.2	29. Michigan	23.5
30. Michigan	16.4	30. Pennsylvania	190.5	30. New York	22.8
31. Iowa	15.9	31. Michigan	182.6	31. New Jersey	22.0
32. Washington	15.6	32. Iowa	182.1	32. Colorado	21.9
33. New York	14.7	33. Washington	174.6	33. Iowa	16.8
34. Montana	14.1	34. Wisconsin	157.0	34. Washington	16.2
35. New Jersey	12.6	35. Minnesota	141.9	35. Montana	14.1
36. Nebraska	11.2	36. Massachusetts	115.8	36. Nebraska	13.1
37. Rhode Island	9.6	37. Rhode Island	91.8	37. Connecticut	12.5
38. South Dakota	9.6	Maine	*	38. Rhode Island	10.6
39. Connecticut	9.0	Montana	*	39. Massachusetts	10.3
40. Massachusetts	9.0	Nevada	*	40. South Dakota	9.6
41. Minnesota	8.6	New Hampshire	*	41. Minnesota	9.1
42. Utah	7.3	North Dakota	*	42. Utah	7.3
43. North Dakota	6.9	South Dakota	*	43. Wisconsin	7.0
44. New Hampshire	6.6	Utah	*	44. North Dakota	6.9
45. Wisconsin	6.4	Wyoming	*	45. New Hampshire	6.6
U. S. Census Division:		U. S. Census Division:		U. S. Census Division:
1. West South Central	45.4	1. West South Central	307.1	1. East South Central	109.5
2. South Atlantic	36.8	2. South Atlantic	296.1	2. South Atlantic	102.9
3. East South Central	34.6	3. East South Central	277.2	3. West South Central	91.9
4. Mountain	26.4	4. Mountain	270.8	4. Mountain	28.9
5. Pacific	24.7	5. West North Central	222.3	5. Pacific	27.8
6. East North Central	19.7	6. Pacific	210.6	6. East North Central	27.1
7. West North Central	17.1	7. East North Central	204.6	7. Middle Atlantic	23.4
8. Middle Atlantic	15.2	8. Middle Atlantic	194.2	8. West North Central	22.2
9. New England	10.7	9. New England	146.2	9. New England	12.2
Region:		Region:		Region:
1. 15 Southern states and District of Columbia	39.5	1. 15 Southern states and District of Columbia	294.0	1. 15 Southern states and District of Columbia	100.5
2. 29 Northern states	17.9	2. 29 Northern states	201.4	2. 29 Northern states	24.0
Total:		Total:		Total:
44 states and the District of Columbia	23.5	44 states and the District of Columbia	272.0	44 states and the District of Columbia	47.7

* Number tested insufficient for computation of rate.

states generally show the highest prevalence rates for both groups. The rate of prevalence among white men, for instance, is highest in New Mexico, Texas, Florida, Arizona, South Carolina and West Virginia. Among Negroes the rate is highest in Florida, Texas, Georgia, Maryland, Mississippi, Arkansas and New Mexico.

In the states having Negro populations of any significant size the Negro rates are many times higher than

TABLE 2.—Syphilis Among 1,895,778 Selectees and Volunteers by Age Group, Race and Residence: Number Tested, Number in Whom Evidence of Syphilis was Detected and Prevalence Rate per Thousand Tested

	Urban			Rural			Total
Age Group	Number Tested	Syphilis Detected	Rate per 1,000	Number Tested	Syphilis Detected	Rate per 1,000	Number Tested	Syphilis Detected	Rate per 1,000
				White
21-25	594,054	5,887	9.9	350,306	3,678	10.5	944,360	9,565	10.1
26-30	309,934	6,530	21.1	162,625	3,328	20.5	472,559	9,858	20.9
31-35	172,128	6,758	39.3	81,472	2,814	34.5	253,600	9,572	37.7
Total	1,076,116	19,175	17.8	594,403	9,820	16.5	1,670,519	28,995	17.4
				Negro
21-25	63,990	13,062	204.1	53,011	9,313	175.7	117,001	22,375	191.2
26-30	42,699	12,944	303.1	23,459	6,488	276.6	66,158	19,432	293.7
31-35	29,862	10,766	360.5	12,238	4,271	349.0	42,100	15,037	357.2
Total	136,551	36,772	269.3	88,708	20,072	226.3	225,259	56,844	252.3
				Total
21-25	658,044	18,949	28.8	403,317	12,991	32.2	1,061,361	31,940	30.1
26-30	352,633	19,474	55.2	186,084	9,816	52.8	538,717	29,290	54.4
31-35	201,990	17,524	86.8	93,710	7,085	75.6	295,700	24,609	83.2
Total	1,212,667	55,947	46.1	683,111	29,892	43.8	1,895,778	85,839	45.3

the rates for white men. And high Negro rates in general tend to be associated with high white rates. This relationship, however, is not a constant proportion. Indeed, in those localities where the Negro rates are highest the white rates are relatively much higher than in areas where the Negro rates are low. Thus the high Florida Negro rate is only 7.6 times Florida's white rate; but the relatively low Negro rate in Massachusetts in 12.8 times the white rate. The tendency applies as well to large areas as to individual states. Table 1 shows that in the three census divisions having the highest prevalence of syphilis the Negro rates are less than ten times the white rates, whereas in the four

TABLE 3.—Syphilis Rates per Thousand Males Aged 21-35 in the United States Based on 1,895,778 Selectee Serologic Reports by State, Race and Urban or Rural Residence

State	Urban			Rural			Total
	White	Negro	Total	White	Negro	Total
Alabama	41.5	298.2	130.6	21.9	186.7	72.9	92.3
Arizona	55.0	304.6	67.3	45.1	289.8	56.1	60.4
Arkansas	44.7	358.2	116.8	25.3	301.2	92.8	98.6
California	27.2	212.8	31.6	26.5	209.1	28.4	30.7
Colorado	23.2	201.3	26.3	17.0	†	17.0	21.9
Connecticut	9.0	200.5	12.9	9.1	232.8	11.7	12.5
Delaware	17.2	264.2	48.5	27.2	215.0	54.9	51.5
District of Columbia	23.8	272.9	92.7	....	.....	....	92.7
Florida	52.8	413.3	163.1	53.8	395.8	152.8	158.6
Georgia	55.3	407.3	172.3	29.4	278.6	109.8	133.2
Idaho	*	*	*	*	*	*	*
Illinois	22.2	212.6	33.1	17.8	200.1	21.0	30.0
Indiana	35.4	266.2	48.4	22.6	281.3	24.1	38.3
Iowa	22.5	182.1	24.7	10.9	†	10.9	16.8
Kansas	30.0	253.8	43.0	13.5	82.3	14.5	26.9
Kentucky	*	*	*	*	*	*	*
Louisiana	45.3	317.9	127.0	31.6	242.9	108.4	116.5
Maine	23.8	*	23.8	29.0	†	29.0	26.9
Maryland	30.0	339.0	82.6	25.9	300.2	68.9	77.3
Massachusetts	9.1	122.2	10.5	8.2	62.9	8.9	10.3
Michigan	17.6	185.4	27.3	13.8	150.4	15.3	23.5
Minnesota	12.0	141.9	12.9	5.3	†	5.3	9.1
Mississippi	48.8	431.1	199.7	30.3	296.4	163.2	171.5
Missouri	34.9	240.2	54.0	21.2	199.5	26.6	41.6
Montana	19.6	†	19.6	10.7	†	10.7	14.1
Nebraska	17.2	204.4	21.7	7.3	†	7.3	13.1
Nevada	38.4	†	38.4	28.3	†	28.3	32.1
New Hampshire	8.5	†	8.5	3.8	†	3.8	6.6
New Jersey	12.6	194.9	22.2	12.9	183.2	21.2	22.0
New Mexico	71.3	304.8	76.7	43.5	†	43.5	56.5
New York	14.4	196.2	23.5	16.1	214.3	19.6	22.8
North Carolina	34.2	323.6	119.0	26.1	194.0	69.4	84.6
North Dakota	13.8	†	13.8	5.1	†	5.1	6.9
Ohio	22.6	199.8	33.6	20.5	121.7	22.2	30.1
Oklahoma	47.6	309.5	70.2	34.0	198.9	43.8	54.7
Oregon	*	*	*	*	*	*	*
Pennsylvania	16.7	192.1	27.0	17.6	178.3	20.1	24.7
Rhode Island	9.9	91.8	10.9	6.1	†	6.1	10.6
South Carolina	51.8	417.2	181.6	44.8	256.5	131.3	145.5
South Dakota	13.4	†	13.4	8.2	†	8.2	9.6
Tennessee	58.4	313.2	125.8	29.6	228.9	53.3	81.1
Texas	67.2	384.2	112.0	40.5	303.3	76.1	93.4
Utah	9.4	†	9.4	4.5	†	4.5	7.3
Vermont	*	*	*	*	*	*	*
Virginia	36.7	307.4	98.2	27.3	207.9	69.7	80.8
Washington	19.4	174.6	20.5	11.4	†	11.4	16.2
West Virginia	59.3	257.6	71.4	41.5	192.4	51.0	57.2
Wisconsin	7.3	157.0	8.3	5.4	†	5.4	7.0
Wyoming	29.7	†	29.7	23.7	†	23.7	25.8
44 states and District of Columbia	24.1	290.2	46.5	22.6	252.8	49.4	47.7

* Data not available. See text.
† Number tested insufficient for computation of rate.

divisions with the lowest prevalence the Negro rates are more than ten times the white rates.

On the whole the highest rates are found in the Southern and agricultural states, the lowest in the Northern and industrial states. As groups, the New England states show the lowest rates, the East-South Central the highest.

It has long been suspected that prevalence rates of syphilis were much higher in urban than in rural areas. The selectee data indicate that this supposition is only partially true (table 3). Both white and Negro rates for the country as a whole are higher in urban than in rural areas; but the total corrected rates in rural areas are 49.4 per thousand as compared with 46.5 for urban areas. This may be explained by the fact that in the combined white and Negro total for all states there is a preponderance of Negroes in the rural areas. Thus, combined white and Negro rates are higher in rural areas, whereas white and Negro rates separately are higher in urban areas.

Rates per thousand for two million selectees blood tested for syphilis, corrected for age, race and residence within each state; reports received November 1940 through August 1941.

SUMMARY

1. The study is based on the serologic blood test reports received through Aug. 31, 1941 of 1,895,778 white and Negro men between the ages of 21 and 35 tested under the provisions of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940.

2. The rate of prevalence based on positive and doubtful blood tests among the selectees examined is 45.3 per thousand. The rate of prevalence for the entire male population of the United States between the ages of 21 and 35 is estimated to be 47.7 per thousand.

3. The rate of prevalence among Negro selectees is 252.3 per thousand, among white selectees 17.4 per thousand. The estimated rate of prevalence for the entire male Negro population aged 21 to 35 is 272 per thousand, for the entire male white population 23.5 per thousand.

4. The rate of prevalence among selectees from rural areas is 43.8 per thousand, from urban areas 46.1 per thousand. The estimated rate of prevalence among the entire male population aged 21-35 in rural areas is 49.4 per thousand, in urban areas 46.5 per thousand.

5. Highest prevalence rates (white and Negro) are found in the Southeastern states, the lowest in the New England, West North Central and Middle Atlantic states.

Printed and Published in the United States of America

Cheeloo
Fukien
Ginling
Hangchow
Hua Chung
Hwa Nan
Lingnan

Chinese student nurses like this one at the West China Union University Hospital, Chengtu, are being trained in the latest Western medical methods by the Christian Colleges.

Nanking
St. John's
Shanghai
Soochow
West China
Yenching

THE CHINA COLLEGES

VOLUME XIV JUNE 1947 NUMBER 4

DINNER SPEAKERS LAUD WORK OF COLLEGES AND STUDENTS

Nowhere in the world today do students hunger for an education as do the young people of China, according to Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, president emeritus of Union Theological Seminary.

Speaking at the recent Annual Dinner of the Associated Boards held in New York on May 12, Dr. Coffin declared that although "many of China's students today are poorly clad and badly nourished, nothing discourages them in their zeal for an education, and no hardship is too great to be endured." Compared with this quest for more learning, he said, everything else is of but secondary importance.

Congressman Walter H. Judd of Minnesota, a former medical missionary in China, who also spoke, asserted that "much of China's unrest is the natural outgrowth of the impact of modern and progressive Christian social and moral forces upon an ancient civilization."

Dean T. C. Chao of the Yenching School of Religion described the Christian Colleges as a "world church in miniature, international in character and interdenominational in formation." They have, he added, become a "vital force" in influencing the intellectual elements of the country. And graduates of these colleges which are vital centers of democracy, he said, create a sympathetic atmosphere for the Christian religion.

Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen presided at the dinner which was attended by more than 300 friends, supporters, and staff members of the Colleges. Henry R. Luce, publisher, served as toastmaster.

(See picture on page 3)

TRAINING CHINESE NURSES IN WESTERN WAYS AMONG COLLEGES' GREAT CONTRIBUTIONS

One of the greatest contributions the Christian Colleges in China have made to that country has been training young Chinese nurses in the latest western medical methods, says Dr. Leo Eloesser, formerly with UNRRA medical personnel in China.

Dr. Eloesser returned recently from China where he visited medical colleges and hospitals, and reported the findings of his trip to the Associated Boards. He will return to China shortly for the World Health Organization and will work under the direction of the Chinese Government's National Health Organization.

Asserting that 4,000,000 of the 12,000,000 persons who die each year in China could be saved if the Chinese had more knowledge of preventive medicine, Dr. Eloesser urges mission schools to spend more of their time and energy training students in preventive medicine and sanitation. These, he declares, are more important now than curative medicine.

China's two greatest needs in the field of medical education, according to Dr. Eloesser, are for personnel and supplies. As possible sources for personnel, he suggests veterans and older men of established reputation.

"The latter," he asserts, "although they may have fulfilled their usefulness in the United States, would find their training and experience of particular value in a country like China where there is a dearth of trained medical personnel."

Dr. Eloesser especially praises West China Union University which he says stands quite high among the mission schools. "When you go out to the campus you think you are in a small town in Canada rather than in China," he asserts.

ST. JOHN'S NEEDS SUPPLIES DORMS, PRE-CLINICAL STAFF

The three most pressing needs of the College of Medicine at St. John's University in Shanghai, are pre-clinical teaching staff, equipment, and dormitory space for students, according to Dean P. C. Nyi.

At a recent meeting at the Associated Boards Dr. Nyi revealed that St. John's now has 2,200 students, although it was planned for only 600. Because of the serious lack of dormitories, 1,600 of these students cannot be housed on the campus, Dr. Nyi reported, and have to travel a long way each day to reach the campus which is far from the center of the city. The Medical School at present has 154 students, about forty of whom are women.

"All Chinese of professorial standing are graduates of either American or European medical schools," he said, "or have received advanced training in America, mostly in the University of Pennsylvania."

Referring to the college's equipment, Dr. Nyi reported that most of it was used up or broken down in the war, and only a few replacements have been procurable in Shanghai. Supplies have been ordered from America, he said, but these take several months to be delivered.

Plans for the future, he revealed, include expanding the department of public health.

PERSONALITIES IN THE NEWS

Dr. W. H. Adolph, recently elected acting president of Yenching University, Peiping, with Mrs. Adolph.

President Wu Yi-fang of Ginling College travels to business appointments in Nanking in a pedicab.

Jean LeQuire

Presidents Lucy Wang, Hwa Nan College, and Henry Lin, University of Shanghai, exchange greetings at the Associated Boards' Annual Dinner.

DR. W. H. ADOLPH ELECTED ACTING PRESIDENT, YENCHING

Dr. William H. Adolph, head of the chemistry department at Yenching University in Peiping, was recently elected Acting President of Yenching. He takes over the duties relinquished by Dr. J. Leighton Stuart, the university's President, who is now American Ambassador to China.

Dr. Adolph, who has trained many of China's leading biochemists, was born in Philadelphia, Pa. in 1890. He received his A.B. and Ph.D. degrees from the University of Pennsylvania and has divided his time between China and the United States, occupying teaching and research posts at Cheeloo and Yenching, and at the Universities of Illinois, Nebraska, Yale, and Cornell. He became professor of biochemistry at Yenching in 1929.

CHEELOO STUDENTS LIVING IN NEARLY BARE ROOMS

The continued economic difficulties which have been specially severe in northeast China and the financial situation of Cheeloo University have made it impossible to provide students with what would normally be considered the minimum necessities, declares President K'e-ming Wu in his annual report. "For instance," he says, "in the students' rooms in the women's dormitories there is only one chair for every two girls. There is no accommodation for bathing though it is hoped shortly to remedy this. Neither is there any provision for hot water, because the University cannot meet the cost of fuel. The students are responsible for running their own kitchen. Owing again to economic difficulties they are living on a diet which seems hardly adequate for maintenance of health. However, in spite of these adverse conditions the health record has been good on the whole and there is a very cheerful spirit among the students."

Many of the new students, writes Catherine Mackinnon, Dean of Women, had been waiting several years for the opportunity of entering the university so "they came with thankful hearts, ready to put up with many lacks in material equipment and a good deal of inconvenience. The lack of furniture in the students' rooms is quite obvious. There is a room where guests are received, but the furnishing consists of two rickety tables and there are no chairs. The social room is completely empty. In each dormitory there is a prayer room, but these also contain nothing and so remain unused. We hope it will not be too long before these outward conditions can be changed for the girls of Cheeloo University. They deserve something better."

Alumni Profiles

Jean LeQuire

Drs. Bert Yang and Edith Shiong.

A married couple, both alumni of West China Union University, '35, are being featured as our choice for this issue's outstanding Christian College graduates. They are Drs. Bert G. L. Yang and Edith B. S. Shiong (Mrs. Yang).

Both were born in Szechuen, West China, and both are Christians — Dr. Shiong a Methodist, and Dr. Yang, United Church of Canada.

Dr. Yang, who has been on the medical staff of WCUU since his graduation, came to Canada three years ago to do postgraduate work at McGill University. He also spent two and a half years working in surgery and urology at the Royal Victoria Hospital.

Dr. Shiong arrived in Canada last year and took postgraduate work in obstetrics and gynecology at Women's College Hospital in Toronto.

Drs. Yang and Shiong sailed for China May 30, after having stopped over in Rochester, Minn., to visit the Mayo Clinic.

KENTUCKY COLLEGE TO HELP RESTORE HANGCHOW LIBRARY

The Religious Activities committee of Centre College in Danville, Ky. has initiated a drive to help war-ravaged Hangchow Christian University recover from the effects of the Japanese occupation. The first aim of the committee is to raise $1,000 to start the restoration of Hangchow's library.

Hangchow will be joined with the American college not only by contributions, but also through an exchange of students, professors, and books for short periods from time to time.

Dr. Robert J. McMullen, executive secretary of the Associated Boards, is a former president of Centre College. At the time of the Japanese invasion he was head of Hangchow University.

CHURCH ATTENDANCE TRIPLES AT UNIVERSITY OF SHANGHAI

Church attendance at the University of Shanghai has tripled since the war, says President Henry H. Lin who is now in the United States on a four-months' lecture tour.

"The eight years of war made the Chinese students hungry for religion," he asserts. "About 98% of the students would now like to elect religious courses in school, while before the war very few would even take the courses."

Of the 1,571 students enrolled at the university last fall, about 19 per cent were Christians.

FUKIEN RECEIVES CATTLE FROM AMERICAN CHURCH

About 800 head of cattle were assembled recently by the Church of the Brethren in the United States, shipped from New Orleans to China and allocated by the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry to the Christian institutions of North Fukien. Of these Fukien Christian University received seventeen head, including fourteen Holstein cows, a Holstein bull and two calves.

"Early one morning," says a letter just received by the Associated Boards from Fukien, "the ship's crane began swinging the cows one by one in a crate to the lighters pulled alongside the ship. The cattle were landed about two miles upriver in the yard of a temple occupied by Chinese Marines, and their barbed wire barricade formed an ideal place for sorting the cattle."

In an aluminum capsule suspended in the ear of one of the cows received was the following message from the donors: "Claribel—produced on the Claribel Stock Ranch, Oakdale, Cal., a gift of the Methodist Church, Oakdale. Hope, courage, strength, health and happiness is our wish for you. Write us."

Cows sent Fukien University by an American church arriving at their destination at Pagoda Anchorage.

HEADLINERS AT ASSOCIATED BOARDS' ANNUAL DINNER

Religious News Service

Congressman Walter Judd of Minnesota addressing the Annual Dinner of the Associated Boards in New York, May 12. Seated l. to r. are Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, president emeritus of Union Theological Seminary, Henry R. Luce, publisher and chairman, China Christian Colleges Committee, and Henry P. Van Dusen, president of the Associated Boards. Over 300 friends, supporters, and staff members of the Colleges attended.

The China Reader

CHRISTIANITY AND CHINESE CULTURE, by Dr. Francis C. M. Wei. Charles Scribner Sons, New York, $2.75.

This book by the distinguished president of Hua Chung University is a collection of the Hewett Lectures which Dr. Wei delivered in this country last year.

"We have here," writes Prof. Kenneth Scott Latourette in the Foreword, "a subject of central importance treated by a master. . . . Toward the comprehension of the spirit of the Chinese and their culture Dr. Wei is a superb guide. A Chinese by birth and nurture, he knows his people and the unseen forces which have molded them. He is a specialist on the religion and the philosophies of his people. . . . At the same time he knows the Occident and so is able to bridge the gulf between that part of the world and China. Sympathetic with the deepest insights of the Chinese spirit, he is also a Christian. Few can equal him and none can surpass him as an interpreter of the soul of China to the English-speaking world."

Lingnan University in Canton will receive twelve exchange students from the United States during 1947-48.

ASSOCIATED BOARDS BECOME UNITED BOARD ON JUNE 30

On June 30 the Associated Boards for Christian Colleges in China will officially become known as the United Board for Christian Colleges in China, according to an announcement by Dr. Eric North, newly-elected chairman of the Board of Trustees of the United Board.

"The Associated Boards," Dr. North explained, "has consisted of the members of thirteen separate corporations each related to one of the colleges in China. Under the new arrangement the United Board will be a single corporation for serving the interests of all the colleges, thus simplifying the corporate structure and affording a more effective way of dealing with the common interests. It is anticipated that nearly all the original college boards of trustees will merge with the United Board as some have already done."

Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, president of the Associated Boards, now becomes president of the new United Board.

During the past year more than $250,000 worth of equipment has been ordered or sent to China for the thirteen Christian Colleges by the Associated Boards.

Treasurer, United Service to China, Inc.
1790 Broadway, New York 19, N. Y.

To aid the work of United Service to China in helping the Chinese to help themselves, I am glad to contribute the sum of ..... dollars.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

I wish to designate my contribution to the program activities of:

☐ Associated Boards for Christian Colleges in China
☐ United Service to China

Gifts Deductible for Income Tax purposes.

ON A CHINA CHRISTIAN COLLEGE CAMPUS

Students at Ginling College in Nanking on their way to Monday morning assembly. Note the watch tower built by Japanese soldiers on top of building in the background. This has now been removed.

NANKING TEACHER DEVELOPS METHOD TO PREVENT EROSION

A unique program to prevent soil erosion in China has been developed by Dr. Shui Tsai Hwang, professor of soils and fertilizers at the University of Nanking. Dr. Hwang, experimenting with broadcasting a cover crop of soybeans on hillside corn fields rather than planting them inter rowed as was done heretofore, found that this method of planting almost completely stops loss of soil from slopes as steep as twenty per cent.

Dr. Hwang points out that Chinese farmers must be taught the right use of strip farming and other means of protecting and using slope land, and asserts that the idea must be spread among them that the use of upland is as important as the use of rice paddies.

Dr. Hwang has journeyed to the Gobi Desert area and Chinese Turkestan, and has made trips south to the border of China and French-Indo China. Today he has forty-eight "soil profiles," representing all the important soils of China ranging from those in the humid, warm areas to the desert types of soil.

Among the urgent present-day needs in the University of Nanking's College of Agriculture, according to Dr. Hwang, are at least two new soil laboratories, and special equipment, including a specter-photometer, petrographic microscope, glass electrode pH meter, and at least one fine balance.

Dr. Hwang, who is a graduate of the University of Nanking and has an MS degree from the University of California, arrived in the United States last January and visited agricultural projects and colleges and soil erosion conservation projects in all parts of the country. He left recently for England where he will study recent methods of reclaiming saline soils.

ENGLISH, ECONOMICS POPULAR WITH HUA CHUNG STUDENTS

English and economics are the two most popular subjects at Hua Chung University in Wuchang, says Prof. John L. Coe, treasurer. Prof. Coe, who also teaches mathematics at Hua Chung, arrived recently in this country for several months' furlough.

Registration at Hua Chung, he has reported to the Associated Boards, has reached an all-time high this year despite the dislocations in living induced by inflation. Last fall 450 students, two-thirds of them men, were admitted, he revealed, but because of lack of space, many men students are sleeping in double-decker beds.

Although inflation in Wuchang is not as serious as in Shanghai, it still costs plenty for an education at Hua Chung, Prof. Coe says. "In terms of Chinese dollars," he points out, "it costs a student about 3,000 times more for room, board, laboratory fees, and tuition than it did in pre-war days. Before the war it cost CN $7 a month—now it is CN $30,000 a month."

None of the college buildings were destroyed during the Japanese occupation, he reports, but the invader carried off all the books and laboratory apparatus left behind when students and faculty fled into exile before the advancing Japanese army in July, 1938. College personnel were able, however, to take 10,000 books with them when they left on the long 1,600-mile trek to Hsichow in Southwest China. About one-third of the scientific apparatus they brought back from exile is now worn out and useless, Prof. Coe reveals.

CHINA COLLEGES NEWS BOX

Dean Ruth Chester will return to Ginling College in August.... Prof. and Mrs. Sam Dean are enroute to Yenching after a year's furlough in the U. S.... Elsie M. Priest will return in August to resume her work as Treasurer of the University of Nanking.... Prof. T. H. Wang of Fukien Christian University has been admitted to Syracuse University and will enter this fall.... Miss Ho-I Pai, after a year's graduate study in home economics at Kansas State College, leaves in July for Yenching.... Dr. Eric Cheo is returning to the Dental School of WCUU after studying at the University of Michigan.... Dr. Liu En-lan, head of Ginling's geography department, has recovered from the automobile accident she had in New York several months ago. She will study this summer at McGill University's geography school in Montreal.

DR. C. T. YANG TO HEAD FUKIEN—SUCCEEDS C. J. LIN

A cable just received from China reports that Dr. Chan-tung Yang has been elected president of Fukien Christian University in Foochow. He succeeds the late Dr. C. J. Lin, president of Fukien since 1927, who died last January in New York while on furlough. To Dr. Yang, an alumnus of Fukien, falls the task of guiding the university through the difficult days of rehabilitation.

Dr. Yang holds master of arts and bachelor of divinity degrees from Yenching, and a Ph.D. degree from Drew University, Madison, N. J. A Methodist, he had been since 1945 president of Fukien Union Theological College.

CHINA COLLEGES

Published Quarterly by the Associated Boards for Christian Colleges in China

150 Fifth Avenue, New York 11, N.Y.

Cooperating with United Service to China, Inc.

DR. HENRY P. VAN DUSEN, President
DR. ROBERT J. McMULLEN, Executive-Secretary
EDWIN M. McBRIER, Treasurer
MARGUERITE MALLORY DIXON, Editor

Congressional Record

United States of America

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 82d CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

Fourth World Health Organization Assembly at Geneva, Switzerland, May 7 to 26, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 5, 1951

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to make some observations on the Fourth World Health Organization Assembly held in Geneva, Switzerland May 7 to 26, 1951, to which I had the honor to be one of the four congressional advisers, two named by the President of the Senate and two by the Speaker of the House. I appreciate deeply the opportunity afforded me to attend this outstanding assembly with my congressional colleagues, Senators HERBERT H. LEHMAN and RICHARD M. NIXON, and Representative THOMAS E. MORGAN.

The delegation in behalf of the United States consisted of the following members in addition to the congressional advisers: Chairman and chief delegate, Dr. Leonard A. Scheele, Surgeon General, Public Health Service; two delegates, Dr. Roy Cleere, executive director of the Colorado State Department of Health, Denver, Colo., and Mrs. Herbert T. Edwards, executive director, women's division, Democratic National Committee; four alternates, Dr. Frederick J. Brady, Assistant Chief, International Organizations, Division of International Health, Public Health Service; Dr. Howard B. Calderwood, Office of United Nations Economic and Social Affairs, Department of State; Dr. H. van Zile Hyde, United States Representative, Executive Board, World Health Organization; George M. Ingram, Chief of Division of International Administration, Department of State; secretary of delegation, Millard L. Kenestrick, Conference Attaché, Office of Resident United States Delegations to International Organizations, Geneva; technical assistant, Jeanne Ende, Office of UN Economic and Social Affairs, Department of State; documents officer, Florence S. Thomason, administrative assistant to the United States representative, World Health Organization; and administrative assistant, William G. Murphy, conference assistant, Office of Resident United States Delegation to International Organizations, Geneva.

The World Health Organization is a part of a concerted effort made by the United Nations to create a firm foundation of improved economic and social conditions for all peoples of all nations. It is the United Nations Health Department of the world, with almost 70 nations belonging to it. It battles disease on a global basis. The Director General of the organization is General Brock Chisholm whose office and headquarters are maintained in Geneva. Dr. Chisholm has said no country can depend solely on its own protective arrangements. Each must be assured of satisfactory controls in all other countries as well. The protection of one country depends on the effectiveness of health administrations in other countries and upon the success of their collective actions. There is an annual meeting in which representatives of most of the United Nation's organizations take part. This international health agency was the subject of a declaration adopted in 1945 at San Francisco, and the International Health Conference which met in 1946 adopted a constitution which is the vehicle of the present World Health Organization. Briefly the objectives of this organization are as follows:

First. Peace and security can be obtained on a durable basis only in a world community composed of countries whose peoples are physically and mentally healthy.

Second. In the shrunken world of today the concept of health is indivisible; that is to say that no individual, no nation, no group of nations, can be considered safe from infection while disease still prevails in any part of the earth.

Third. The means, skills, and techniques for the eradication of most ills, and for the betterment of health, exist.

Fourth. It is therefore the joint responsibility of nations to put an end to the unequal development in different countries toward the control of disease and the improvement of health, and thus to help all people to attain "the highest possible level of health."

This specialized agency of the United Nations is set up to be the medium for a world-wide cooperative effort through which knowledge and skills are put to the disposal of all countries needing them for the improvement of their health services and to mobilize all available health resources for the solution of those health problems which lend themselves to international action in this very important field. Its purpose is to solve health problems on a world-wide basis by reason of the fact that under modern conditions united action on the part of all nations only can provide adequate answers to the problems.

While the organization is known as World Health Organization, the concept behind it and the purposes sought to be achieved are broader than mere physical health. As set forth in its constitution, health is a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity. The solution of the problem, therefore, broadens the field beyond purely defensive measures to protect nations against disease. It has been said it must wage a defensive battle against mankind's physical and mental ills by attacking their very roots, which can be found in the economic and social conditions under which the majority of people live today. In the furtherance of these broad objectives which should buttress a world-wide program, the constitution states that the World Health Organization should "promote, in cooperation with other specialized agencies where necessary, the improvement of nutrition, housing, sanitation, recreation, economic, or working conditions, and other aspects of environmental hygiene; study and report on administrative and social techniques affecting public health and medical care from preventive and curative points of view, including hospital services and social security; promote improved standards of teaching and training in the health, medical, and related professions; foster activities in the field of mental health, especially those affecting the harmony of human relations; promote maternal and child health and welfare, and foster the ability to live harmoniously in a changing total environment."

The organization issues from time to time a large number of medical publications and scientific works and the technical services of the organization are contributing to the offensive against illness through various research projects on diseases such as influenza, trachoma, and poliomyelitis, as well as a number of parasitic diseases which incapacitate millions of the inhabitants of the agricultural areas in America, Africa, and Asia. Also included for research are malaria, tuberculosis, and syphilis, which alone take 10,000,000 lives yearly.

A colleague of mine recently called to my attention an experience which was brought to his notice when traveling in the Far East, of the spread of a cholera epidemic in Egypt in which hundreds of people were dying daily from the dread scourge. The World Health Organization immediately took over through the activities of the medical director, who, by the way, came from the United States, and as a result literally tons of serum and thousands of hypodermic needles were dispatched by air, most of them coming from New York, to the infected areas, and the cholera epidemic was arrested in its early stages, resulting in the saving of thousands of lives. While the expense involved in this case I have recited was initially borne by the World Health Organization, the Government of Egypt reimbursed the Organization.

Mr. Chairman, all of the four congressional advisers were in attendance at the assembly and we not only found the sessions most interesting but of much importance to us as Members of the Congress in getting first-hand information on important problems of world health from the standpoint of the many nations affiliated in the Organization, comprising some sixty-one in attendance. The sessions were given over largely to reports on progress made during the last year in various areas of the world where contagions have threatened world health and also in the formulation of plans for the ensuing year for international cooperation in alleviating and stamping out the spread of contagious diseases and the adoption of plans for improving the national health of the various nations affiliated in the program. Outstanding leaders from the nations represented at the assembly took part in the discussions, and it is one organization which seems to function with a minimum of friction, notwithstanding it has in the affiliation many nations which have not been able to cooperate successfully on political and economic questions.

Dr. Leonard A. Scheele, the Surgeon General of the United States, was elected as president of the Organization for the ensuing year. He is a man of broad vision and great understanding in all health problems and will bring to the organization leadership that unquestionably will result in great achievements during his stewardship.

In considering the activities, accomplishments, and objectives of the World Health Organization, it is of interest to note that in 1909 the Fifty-sixth Congress enacted legislation defining the future relations of the United States and Cuba, which stated that the Government of Cuba should execute plans to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, assuring protection to the commerce of the southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein. This legislation reflected the difficulties that our Nation had experienced year after year as a result of the importation and consequent spread of yellow fever in the United States. The wording of this act indicated a new philosophy that diseases should be controlled at their sources rather than controlled by erecting international barriers to their spread.

In the past 50 years, we have made tremendous advances in all branches of medical science. But it is a black mark on our generation that the world still is ravaged by pestilential diseases that can be readily controlled. Smallpox, which can be controlled by vaccination, still sweeps through large areas of the world in epidemic waves leaving behind misery and death. Bubonic plague remains a scourge which could and should be controlled by the new tools available to medical science. Malaria still infects millions of people and yet its cure is inexpensive, and DDT, as well as other insecticides, can be used to stop its transmission. The story with a host of other diseases is similar; new developments have made their eradication possible, but lack of personnel and funds have hampered nations in eradicating these diseases.

Undoubtedly it was facts such as these which prompted the United Nations Conference in San Francisco in 1945 to recognize health as a matter with which it should concern itself. The World Health Organization later came into existence on April 7, 1948 when the required 26 member nations of the United Nations ratified its Constitution. The United States membership was not effective until June 21, 1948 some 2 months later.

The WHO is governed by the Assembly which is composed of delegations from member nations. The Fourth Assembly was the one just concluded in Geneva, to which 61 member states sent delegations. The membership today comprises 78 member nations and 1 associate member. These nations include all the more advanced nations of the world. Of the 78 members, 10 have indicated their wish to withdraw from the organization; these 10 include Russia and its satellites and the Chinese National Government. However, Communist Yugoslavia is an ardent supporter of the World Health Organization.

The United States delegation to the Fourth Assembly, as I have pointed out, was comprised of health experts in a number of fields, whose services could be foreseen as needed at the Assembly. They included Public Health Service officers, a State health officer, sanitary engineer, nurse, a dean of a school of public health, a practicing physician, a hospital administration expert, a public leader, as well as experts on financial and foreign policy matters from the Department of State. The four Congressional advisers I have named were on the delegation. One of the first activities of the Assembly was to elect Dr. Leonard A. Scheele, Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and chairman of the United States delegation, as President of the Fourth World Health Assembly.

The Fourth Assembly voted to reduce the assessment of the United States from 35 percent in 1951 to 33⅓ percent in 1952. A total budget of $8,600,000 was voted for 1952 activities.

There was considerable discussion of the WHO program for 1952. The activities of the organization will to a great extent be directed at giving training and assisting educational institutions in various parts of the world. In the United States there is 1 physician for each 500 persons; in some countries the ratio reaches 1 to 80,000. In one country with a population of 1,500,000 only one native has ever received a medical degree. The shortages of other types of personnel needed for health such as nurses and sanitary engineers are even more acute. Today the developed countries are looked to to provide personnel for these areas, and the World Health Organization, by its training programs, is being of great assistance in helping the less fortunate countries to provide their own trained experts.

The World Health Organization is giving asistance to countries in their campaigns against malaria, smallpox, venereal diseases, plague, cholera, tuberculosis, and so forth. One can readily see, however, that direct assistance of WHO must be limited when it spent but three-one-thousandths of a cent per capita on health programs compared with our expenditure of over $2 on public health. WHO must operate by showing others, using as little of its funds as possible. This it is doing and doing well by giving advice to the appropriate branches of governments, by the use of demonstration teams, by training nationals, by showing lethargic peoples a more healthy way of life previously beyond their comprehension.

The WHO, by virtue of its international membership of governments, sets standards of purity and potency of drugs for nations to adopt. These standards are similar to those adopted by the United States years ago but are new to much of the world. This activity protects United States citizens when they become ill abroad in that they will not be treated with inferior preparations.

The WHO keeps a constant vigil on the occurrence of epidemic diseases throughout the world. Compiled data are relayed by short-wave radio from Geneva daily so that we are alerted on the occurrence of epidemics thousands of miles away. The WHO has organized the best laboratories of the world into a network for typing and reporting the strains of influenza virus that are prevalent. The results of this reporting of the types of virus are made known to us so that we may be able to alter the course of a threatened pandemic such as occurred in 1918–19.

The WHO has the authority to adopt regulations binding on members. The Fourth World Health Assembly approved and adopted new quarantine regulations that in 18 months will be binding on the United States without the necessity of ratification by the Senate. Member states, however, are permitted to make reservations within 9 months after passage by the Assembly. World travel has long been harassed by a maze of conflicting regulations and agreements that have often unnecessarily delayed the traveler and hampered movement of commerce. The present regulations were drafted by assembled governmental experts of 40 nations and were designed to give the maximum protection against importation of disease while at the same time expediting travel and commerce. The adoption of these regulations is a major accomplishment of WHO that will benefit us enormously because of the numbers of Americans who travel abroad and because of our large shipping interests.

The Fourth World Health Assembly was an outstanding example of how nations can cooperate effectively for the common good, forgetting selfish interests—indeed it was an example of a democracy of nations through voluntary cooperation for mutual benefit.

Mr. Chairman, after leaving the World Health Organization assembly meeting at Geneva, I took the occasion to return to the United States through the Near and Far East and the Pacific area, making visitations first in Germany and Italy, in order to secure as much first-hand information as possible in a short trip through these world areas where vast populations are wrestling with social, economic, and political, as well as world health problems which threaten the very foundation of world peace and security.

While in Japan I had a conference with General Ridgway and also attended a briefing on the Korean War at a session of the military leaders in charge of our operations in Korea and was able to obtain some first-hand information on the ground with respect to this conflict which threatens world peace.

Max Lerner, the noted author and columnist, has well said:

> A warless world will have its beginnings in what each of us does in his own community. If humanity moves away from the corrupt and bestial it will * * * be by the restablishment of the sense of society—the sense of what ties men to other men. A local community, for example, in which men have come together to work out the housing problem * * * is worth all the sermons in the book. This functioning sense of society, at the level of daily living, is the source to which alone we can look.

The program for moral rearmament is taking hold of many leaders throughout the world. As the Michigan congressional delegation put it:

> Moral rearmament has been described as "a world force having as its principal objective adequate preparedness of free nations for the ideological conflicts in which the world is now engaged." That is an objective which challenges the interest and imagination of all of us who believe in the strength and guidance of God. We believe that material forces alone cannot assure permanent peace, security, and tranquillity among nations and among people. We who believe in God see that our spiritual strength, as well as our material strength, must be mobilized to meet the universal threat of godless Communist materialism.

The remarks of Dr. L. L. Williams, Jr., made before the American Society of Tropical Medicine in November of last year are worthy of note in this connection. As he said, today public health has become a major concern also of the United States foreign policy with general recognition of international public health activities as an indispensable link in our strivings for solidarity between democratic nations. The underlying philosophy of this policy does not stem from unrealistic sentimentality. We are in an era of world unrest which has long been in the making but has been brought to a head by the economic and moral dislocations resulting from World War II. In the far-flung chain of nations essentially friendly to us, which encircles the globe, there are links which are weak because of downright poverty of the people. Such nations will be an easy prey to the extravagant promises and amoral teachings of militant communism. Only by creating a better reality right now before their eyes can we dispel the specter of our own isolation in a hostile world. In Asia this chain of friendly nations dips down through semitropical to tropical climates. Everyone in this room has seen such areas where poor health causes lethargy and apathy, and knows that tropical poverty can be broken only by breaking tropical diseases. The betterment of health in this area is a necessary first step toward increasing productivity. The effects of malaria, yaws, schistosomiasis, intestinal parasites, malnutrition, and other ailments reduce toward the vanishing point the power for physical and mental exertion. A hemoglobin percentage of 65 is not unusual. The daily calory intake is around 2,000 as compared with over 3,000 in the United States, and the daily protein intake is about one-sixth of ours. The death rates from tuberculosis are 4 to 10 times those recorded among us.

The extent of my trip and the places visited by me is evidenced by the following tabulation of the air travel made by me between the several stops enumerated:

From	To	Miles
Washington	Gander	1,350
Gander	Paris	2,800
Paris	Switzerland	410
Switzerland	Munich	190
Munich	Frankfort	182
Frankfort	Rome	635
Rome	Athens	715
Athens	Tripoli	705
Tripoli	Cyprus	1,195
Cyprus	Dhahran	340
Dhahran	Karachi	1,052
Karachi	Delhi	700
Delhi	Calcutta	795
Calcutta	Bangkok	1,015
Bangkok	Saigon	415
Saigon	Manila	1,000
Manila	Tokyo	1,910
Tokyo	Wake	2,030
Wake	Hawaii	2,375
Hawaii	San Francisco	2,410
San Francisco	Portland and return	1,380
Do	Salt Lake City	595
Salt Lake	Westover Air Force Base, Mass.	2,200
Westover Air Force Base.	Washington, D. C	395
Total		26,794

I was particularly impressed by what I was able to observe in this hurried trip which took me around the globe, with the futility of attempting to solve by force of arms the grave international problems now confronting the nations of the world, having to do with their political, social and economic welfare. More and more I was led to the belief that international organizations such as the World Health Organization offer a greater opportunity for cooperation by the nations which ultimately may lead to the adoption of cooperative plans rather than war for the solution of international relations.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1951 O - 963855

PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING IN BOLIVIA

THE FRONTIER OF PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING MOVES ON

CHARLOTTE C. THOMPSON, R. N.
NURSE CONSULTANT
THE INSTITUTE OF INTER-AMERICAN AFFAIRS
(A POINT 4 U. S. GOVERNMENT AGENCY)

ALTHOUGH THE Institute of Inter-American Affairs sent its first field party to Bolivia in 1942 to develop health centers, dispensaries, sanitary installations, and a program of public health nursing, I did not come to Cochabamba, Bolivia's second city, until late in December 1945. Through green and fertile valleys, across winding rivers that are dry beds in summer and raging torrents in winter, I traveled. My first sight of Cochabamba, the garden city, was an unforgettable one. Built around a plaza, like all cities of Spanish origin, the city's streets are narrow and cobblestoned—picturesque enough for tourists but very hard on traffic. Native women in wide colorful skirts and blouses and wearing the typical, stiff white hats, which resemble somewhat the fabled Mother Goose hat, bargained for eggs and vegetables in Spanish or Quechua, the local dialect.

Colorful and gay as he may seem, the average Cochabamban lives in the most primitive of homes without light, air, or heat. His home is an adobe hut with a dirt floor. Cooking is done out of doors and the usual fare consists of a thin vegetable gruel. Rarely does he see a piece of meat, and I have seen the children using their occasional pennies to buy bread and eat it as if it were the greatest of delicacies! There are no toilet facilities of any kind, and water is carried from a central supply in the streets, perhaps blocks from the house.

Certainly this was a wonderful field for public health—but where to begin? I was given the go-ahead signal by our Chief of Party and I started the search for a building that might be suitable for a health center. Two streets from the main plaza I found an old colonial type building built around a cobblestoned patio. This was city-owned and could be had rent free if we were willing to make the necessary repairs. The doors and windows sagged, the roof leaked, and it all seemed pretty hopeless. After beginning construction we found that the sewer pipes were broken in several places and sewage seeped into the ground under the entire building.

With the problem of the health center on its way to being solved, I was faced with the more difficult problem of securing nursing personnel both for clinics and field. Public health programs as we know them were unheard of, or if someone did have some information it was from an article concerning work in other countries. At that time there were not more than thirty graduate nurses in the whole country. Bedside care is not given in the native hospitals. The hospitals are under the direction of sisters and rarely is one found who has had any training or experience in nursing.

In La Paz there is a small well-equipped, thirty-five-bed mission hospital which graduated its first class in 1940. It was a small class consisting of one student. the Linda Richards of Bolivia. The school uses the standard curriculum as far as possible, since the director of the school at that time was a North American nurse. From that small beginning they have increased the student enrollment, but the classes must necessarily remain small, averaging about eight graduates a year.

For our center it seemed best to employ only graduates who had finished the three-year course since we were not equipped to teach a course in basic nursing. We were lucky at the beginning in getting two nurses from the La Paz 1945 class and another who had trained in Lima, Peru.

OUR NEXT DIFFICULTY was one of language. Fortunately, the nurses had learned Quechua in their childhood from servants employed in their homes. There was no teaching material in Spanish so I immediately compiled basic public health nursing texts and articles in English for translation. We studied one subject at a time, using the translations as they were ready. The work was entirely new to the nurses as well as to the community for on every side I heard, "But you can't do that here. You do not know our people. They will not change." But there is a challenge in teaching people, in bringing twentieth century scientific methods to a little town that seems to be still living in the middle ages.

96[illegible]180—51

With the aid of maps we zoned the city to include the very poorest sections. The nurses were timid and understandably so, for this was a transition from seclusion and protection in the home and from the time not yet forgotten, when a señorita did not walk in the streets alone. We sent them first to take the census in the districts in which they would work. This was a wedge; it gave them something definite to go on. It also gave me some idea of the number of people each nurse would have to serve.

During this time we were gradually preparing supplies for the new health center. We made sheets, towels, and nurses' butcher-type aprons. We sewed everything by hand except the doctors' gowns. These were too complicated for us and were given out to a local dressmaker. Those were hectic days and we flew from classes to census, from dressmaking to checking progress on a new building. After five months we set the date for our move to the new center. The painters and the carpenters were all over the place, but we thought if we were there it might spur them on to speedier action. We moved into the building on May 15, 1946. What a hodgepodge of equipment, furniture, workmen, and personnel! Paint dripped on us at every turn and on the floors and furniture as well.

I shall always remember the nurses' shocked reaction when with pail and brush I began to scrub the floors. After they had recovered from their speechless surprise, they, too, began scrubbing right alongside me! Señoritas don't usually scrub floors in Bolivia! Finally we were ready to open our doors. The nurses were in uniform; they knew their bag technic—but here we hit another shoal. Most of them didn't want to carry the bag! People would surely think they were peddlers! All that is now forgotten, for they have learned that the bag is indispensable to the job. And they may even be a little proud to carry it.

THERE ARE NO SOCIAL AGENCIES in Cochabamba and the nurses have learned to handle social problems. We have a supply shelf filled with small bundles, each containing one flannel shirt, a band, a diaper, and one large square that can double for a blanket. One diaper is a supply, for native babies do not wear diapers. When a nurse finds a newborn baby wrapped in a dirty piece of blanket she has something to offer in the way of a layette. The flannel came from a Good Samaritan. The women from the North American colony got together for an afternoon of tea and sewing, and our shelf was soon filled.

Our nurses are kept busy learning new methods daily and learning the specific technics which this jungle country requires. The Rockefeller Foundation staff of local doctors give lectures and classes on typhus, typhoid, yellow fever, malaria, and intestinal parasites. Field trips are arranged during the year to the slaughter house, market, dairy, water supply, and the river, where stagnant sewage chokes the stream.

We now have seven visiting nurses and four clinic nurses. There usually are trainees waiting to take over if we lose a staff nurse to matrimony. We have had to continue on-the-job training. At first the nurses receive concentrated supervision, which becomes more limited as they are ready to assume full responsibility for their districts.

With the discouraging predictions that it couldn't be done here, our statistics reveal that from May 1946 to the end of the year clinic attendance totaled 6,562 and the nurses made 1,616 home visits. During 1949, clinic attendance totaled 47,361 and the nurses made 21,170 home visits. The people have not only accepted the service offered, they come seeking it. The success of our initial program overshadows the discouragements, the hard work and frustration that were part of the mold that shaped its foundation. We can only hope that it may prove deep and firm enough to endure.

The future of the program in Bolivia is unpredictable. I believe it will be the young professional women of the country who will one day be responsible for better hospitals, better nursing care for the sick, health education in schools, and for raising the standards of living in general to insure better health for all.

By 1952 there were ten health centers in Bolivia, with home nursing service a part of the program at La Paz and Trinidad as well as Cochabamba.

Reprinted from PUBLIC HEALTH NURSING MAGAZINE
Issue of July 1951

GPO 83-25702

International Health

5. Bilateral International Health Programs of the United States *

HENRY VAN ZILE HYDE, M.D., F.A.P.H.A.

Medical Director, U. S. Public Health Service, and Director, Health and Sanitation Division, Institute of Inter-American Affairs, Washington, D. C.

THE story of the World Health Organization (WHO) presented by Dr. Chisholm and his colleagues is a truly great story, one still in its first chapter.

A significant part of the complete picture of international health falls outside the World Health Organization story. It is, however, so much the same thing, so intimately related and so vital to the ultimate triumph of the world health movement, that it is necessarily a part of these discussions. This is the story of the health programs that are being carried out jointly by two friendly countries working together for their common good and for the general good. Such programs differ from those of the World Health Organization in that they involve a direct bilateral relationship between the two governments concerned, rather than a multilateral international pooling of resources under common international direction Their story is an important one in the world today and one worth recounting.

We must view it with full understanding. We all believe, first and foremost, in the World Health Organization. We want to live, and want our children to live, in a world in which internationalism is a firm and established reality. That is our national policy; it constitutes Point I of President Truman's inaugural address, more renowned for its enunciation of the newer concept, Point IV.

We do not have such a world yet. We must keep building toward it. The WHO is part of it and, to us as health workers, the most vital part. But it is young and in a most troubled world for one so young. We, with our unique resources, our deep and abiding respect for man, and our fearsome world responsibility, must grasp every opportunity to build the kind of world in which the WHO can grow into splendid maturity.

The United States shares the belief expressed by the WHO that participation by any one nation to the extent of contributing beyond one-third of its basic budget would endanger the true and unfettered international character of the organization. Acceptance of this principle places, for the moment, certain limits on the organization which are determined by the ability of the least fortunate members, in a world of eccentric balance, to share in the common endeavor.

The United States is prepared to push beyond the present reach of the WHO and is doing so through its bilateral programs. Some of these programs were under way on a large scale when the WHO was born; others have been launched since then to meet specific urgent problems.

In carrying out its bilateral programs, the United States looks constantly to the WHO for leadership and guidance. It recognizes fully the coördinating authority given to WHO in its Constitution, to which the United States is a party. In Washington, each month, the responsible international health officials of the U. S. Public Health Service and of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs meet under the chairmanship of the Regional Director of the WHO, for the purpose of program development and coördination within this hemisphere. In Burma, Thailand, and other countries in Southeast Asia, coördinating committees, which include representatives of WHO and U. S. Public Health Service officers, have been established by the Ministries of Health at the national level.

* Presented before the Second General Session of the American Public Health Association at the Seventy-ninth Annual Meeting in San Francisco, Calif., October 31, 1951.

The international health movement is in the most real sense a single unified movement pressing toward a common goal. It draws freely on the rich international experience of private foundations, voluntary organizations, universities, commercial firms, and church medical missions. Each program makes some contribution through its own experience to the developing art of international collaboration in health.

The story of United States bilateral coöperation in health begins in our own hemisphere, taking us back almost a decade. The Foreign Ministers of the American Republics, taking a broad look at the problems of all-out war, within a month of Pearl Harbor called for cooperation among the republics on health and sanitation programs. They requested this as a measure that would aid in mobilizing the resources of the hemisphere for war and for the peace that would follow. Promptly, the United States Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs launched a coöperative health program in 18 of the Latin American republics.

This program, born of emergency needs, has become a major component of the long-range economic and social development plans and hopes of the hemisphere. It has established administrative patterns and modes of action which demonstrate that two governments can work hand in hand on joint development programs. It has pioneered the Point IV trail.

This program has from the beginning had four chief areas of emphasis: the development of local health services through health centers; sanitation of the environment, with particular emphasis on water supply, sewage disposal, and insect control; the training and full-time employment of professional public health workers; and education of the public in health matters. It has stressed complete community health development under full-time trained direction, with active community participation.

During the nine years since 1942, some 2,820 distinct projects have been undertaken in this program; 474 projects are currently active. These projects have included operation of 121 health centers; construction of 201 water supply systems, 74 sewerage systems, and 342 other health facilities, such as hospitals, nursing schools, laboratories, markets, and public laundries. Underlying this has been a training program: 1,302 Latin American professional persons have been given advanced training in public health through fellowships; technical assistance and financial aid have been given to the Schools of Public Health in Mexico, Santiago, and São Paulo; and 240 local training courses have been given at subprofessional levels.

This program has been carried out through joint services established within the Ministry of Health of each coöperating government. This, the Servicio Cooperativo, which is an integral part of the host government, is headed by the Chief of Field Party of the Institute, who thus becomes an official of both governments, directing a program that is jointly determined and jointly financed. The effective application of this administrative device on a wide basis in intergovernmental technical coöperation is a singularly significant achievement.

Early in the program, the financial contributions of the United States to the joint Servicio funds were substantially larger than those contributed by the host governments. Now, in every case, the host governments have substantially increased their contributions both in the total and in the amount relative to the contributions made by the United States. Since the inception of the work in 1942, through the fiscal year 1951, the joint programs have amounted to a total of $102,178,000, with the United States contributing, in personal services and program funds, approximately 48 per cent of the total. In the fiscal year 1951 itself, the Institute paid a total of under $3,000,000, while the coöperating Latin American governments contributed a total of $13,287,000 to the Servicio funds. This is not in the remotest sense a give-away program. It is a truly coöperative effort to overcome problems that are of immediate concern to the entire hemisphere and to the world in which this hemisphere plays such a vital part.

Jumping the Atlantic, we find in 1944 the second United States bilateral health program, in Liberia, a country tied to us closely by history and important to our cause in the dangerous days of World War II. It is a country that today has only one physician of national origin and has all the health problems of a primitive tropical environment. There, at the request of the President of Liberia, the U. S. Public Health Service embarked in 1944 on a program of bilateral assistance which marks the entry of the Public Health Service into the bilateral phase of international health work, in which today it plays a most important role. This program is being expanded and serves as the nucleus for the first Point IV program to be established outside of the Americas.

This program has developed health services and medical care facilities for Monrovia, the capital city. It has controlled malaria in the area of the capital and has established the first, and as yet only, nursing school in the country. Very dramatically, it stamped out a nation-wide epidemic of smallpox. For months, United States physicians and nurses led teams of Liberian dressers and vaccinators into the jungle and bush of a country which in its 43,000 square miles has a mere 200 miles of road. Since 1946 smallpox has no longer been a public health problem in Liberia.

Of deeper significance, the annual health budget of Liberia has increased tenfold since the U. S. Public Health Service Mission set foot in Africa seven years ago.

A new and important element entered into the bilateral health story in 1947. That was the open recognition, as a basis for national action, of the fact that communism breeds on filth, disease, and human misery. Immediately after the enunciation of the Truman Doctrine of containment of communism, a Mission was sent to Greece. It contained an important health component composed of U. S. Public Health Service officers which subsequently became the public health division of the present Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA) Mission to Greece.

The program has been one of technical assistance and the provision of essential supplies. The work has been done by Greece, under Greek direction, with Greek funds meeting all internal expenses. This has been an extensive program. It has included the construction of 5 tuberculosis sanatoria, 3 nursing schools, 6 hospitals and 2 health centers, as well as aid to the Greek War Relief Association in the construction of 5 general hospitals and 11 health centers. Water supplies have been improved in 375 communities.

A far-reaching result of the Mission's work is its influence and assistance in the strengthening of the organization of the national health service and, in particular, the establishment therein of sanitary engineering and nursing divisions.

The work of the public health group is recognized as one of the major factors in bringing a greater measure of economic and social stability to postwar Greece.

Today neighboring Turkey, which has seen this work in Greece, is host to a small, recently arrived ECA health mission.

With the conquest of China by the Communists and the outbreak of communistic guerilla activities in Southeast Asia, the ECA undertook to give assistance to these areas, with a view to quieting unrest. Applying its experience in Greece, it immediately undertook, with the technical assistance of the U. S. Public Health Service, to initiate health programs which would bring relief as rapidly as possible to the rural populations of the countries in this area.

In countries of Southeast Asia—Burma, Thailand, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, and Indonesia—and in the Philippines and Formosa, ECA is today spending some $22,000,000 to extend medical care and sanitation as rapidly as possible to the villages. Since these are highly malarious countries, much emphasis is being placed on initiating control programs, through both residual spraying and the distribution of chloroquine. In Vietnam, for example, some 114,000 houses have been sprayed within the last few months. In Thailand some 40,000 homes have been sprayed. Between 30,000 and 35,000 persons in Vietnam showing symptoms of malaria have been treated with chloroquine.

An aggressive attack is being made on trachoma and other eye infections in Burma, Vietnam, and Thailand, using the most modern techniques.

These and other extensive and intensive activities reaching directly into the villages are being directed by 80 U. S. Public Health Service officers.

The Point IV Program has already been mentioned. Its underlying concept is understood here, I am sure. It is an idea that is consonant with our greatest aspirations as American public health workers. It is administered by the Department of State through its Technical Cooperation Administration (TCA). The Institute of Inter-American Affairs has recently become a functional part of the TCA, and its program has been expanded as part of Point IV. The U. S. Public Health Service program in Liberia has been expanded in a similar manner.

The TCA has launched new Point IV programs in Iran and Lebanon. It is now planning health programs in cooperation with 15 of the governments of the Near East and South Asia, from Ethiopia to Nepal. In the field of health, the TCA and ECA meet in the U. S. Public Health Service, which supplies technical support and much of the personnel for both programs.

Today the World Health Organization, and in this hemisphere the Pan American Sanitary Organization, are growing rapidly in strength. As part of the same great international health movement, the United States is working jointly with many nations in the development of effective health services. There is ample evidence that in the field of public health we have a unique meeting ground for the people and nations of the earth, potentially the most fruitful avenue toward the coveted prize of a world of enduring peace. Working thus together toward these great ends, we can see ahead to a world that does not rock with each edition of the day's press, a world in which we, and in which our children also, can live as free citizens at peace, one with the other.

Foreign Commerce WEEKLY

Vol. XLVI, No. 5

February 4, 1952

LIMATAMBO AIRPORT, LIMA, PERU

March 1952

The materials in this kit are designed to provide you with background material for use in this year's celebration of World Health Day, April 7.

It is hoped that the widest possible use will be made of these materials in the observance of the day.

The material, we believe, is readily adaptable for use in newspaper articles, on radio and television programs, and for meetings of groups interested in the problems of world health and the part that we as a nation are playing in the world-wide fight against disease.

The materials in this kit may be adapted or modified as you see fit.

There are included lists of foreign trainees in the United States and United States leaders who have served on assignments abroad. You may wish to get in touch with these persons for assistance in observance of World Health Day.

I trust that the kit will prove useful to you.

Louis L. Williams, Jr.

Louis L. Williams, Jr., Med. Dir.
Chief, Division of International Health
Public Health Service
Federal Security Agency

In Observance of WORLD HEALTH DAY

April 7, 1952

prepared by

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY
Public Health Service
Division of International Health

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

WHO Newsletter

SEPTEMBER-OCTOBER 1952—Vol. V, Nos 8-9

SPECIAL EXHIBIT NUMBER

This Man belongs to the Earth's submerged majority

Two-thirds of all the People in the World are like him

Sickness is their Burden. Death claims them by the age of 30

Sickness enfeebles them,

People in the World are like him

Sickness is their Burden.
Death claims them by the age of 30

Sickness enfeebles them, condemning them to Poverty. They live on less than a Dollar a Week

Poverty, in turn, perpetuates their weakness

This is the Cost of Sickness:
Can the Price of Health
be higher?

Present-day knowledge must be made available to all countries in order to enable them to assure adequate care for mothers, the best possible chance of survival for infants, and for children normal physical growth and development as well as mental and emotional health... This is a big programme. In order to carry it out, one essential condition must be fulfilled: all nations of the world, regardless of the political, economic or social systems to which they belong, must play their part in building a healthier human society. In our shrunken world isolationism in the field of health is unthinkable. Disease and misery in any corner of the world are a potential threat to the rest of its population. As far as health is concerned, it is obviously and immediately clear that the world will be one or none.

BROCK CHISHOLM
DIRECTOR-GENERAL WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

THIS DOUBLE ISSUE

of the "Newsletter" for the months of September and October, is designed for display as a wall newspaper. The two inside picture pages together form one panel nearly six feet in length.

This issue is based on the exhibit shown to delegates of 64 nations attending the Fifth World Health Assembly in Geneva in May last and viewed later by thousands of the general public on visits to the Palais des Nations.

Facts, figures and notes for teachers and lecturers are printed on the back of the picture-sheets.

NO

WANTED 50,000 MEN AND WOMEN

MR. BELLBOY—
HERE'S A GOOD TIP
YOU CAN GIVE...

YOU CAN HELP US
BY HELPING THEM!
MR. TAXI DRIVER

THIS IS STRAIGHT STUFF

THERE'S A PLACE FOR YOU!
ROOMS

HELP!
I CAN'T MAKE IT..
PAYCHECK
HIGH COST OF LIVING

YOU DON'T GET A BREAK LIKE
THIS VERY OFTEN.

THIS IS A GOOD DEAL...

MR. BELLBOY — HERE'S A GOOD TIP YOU CAN GIVE...

BLOOD WILL TELL
get the "inside information"..

DON'T LET THIS SLIP BY YOU!

UD

Mr. Felix A. Grisselle, Dir
Health Publications Institute
216 N. Dawson St.
Raleigh, N.C.

See QSIM ltr, 8 Feb 48

the lamp is lit

the story of WHO

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

THE LAMP IS LIT. The story of the World Health Organization. By Ritchie Calder. 40 pp. (illustrated). Published by WHO Division of Public Information. 25 cents.

The Lamp of Mr. Calder's title is the lamp of health, which the World Health Organization seeks to light amid the darkness of disease and misery. Small as the light may be today, the shadows are already falling back...

In a remote corner of Bengal, for instance, a WHO team working with the Pakistan authorities demonstrated malaria control methods in a heavily infected area. At the end of a year "no cases of malaria were found among children under one year of age," said the report. But it also added: "The District Agricultural Officer reported an increase of 543 pounds of rice per acre for the year." When sickness vanished the people became stronger. Because they were stronger, they were able to work harder in their fields; and because they worked harder, they got their fields to produce more food.

This example is but one of many which Mr. Calder cites to show the humanitarian value of WHO's work and also the concrete dividends in terms of rising standards of living which go hand in hand with better health. Other examples are taken from the Organization's activities in assisting countries all over the world to combat the ravages of tuberculosis and venereal infections, to reduce sickness and death rates among mothers and children, to improve nutrition, to prevent mental ill-health, to train urgently needed doctors, nurses and other health workers, etc.

The details that Mr. Calder gives of the work already being carried out by WHO are impressive in themselves; but there is more to this booklet than a catalogue of dramatic material achievements. There is a clear realization of the wider functions of the Organization. "It is in less dramatic but enduring ways that WHO will have permanent effect," he declares. "It cannot itself create the social changes which will produce well-being for those who now lack it. It cannot do the job of governments, but it can help governments do their job better and faster..."

THE LAMP IS LIT is available at:

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
International Documents Service
2960 Broadway
New York, N. Y.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN PUBLIC HEALTH
THE MIDDLE EAST

Bordering the southeastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea and extending south to the Sahara Desert and east to the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulf is an area of the world often referred to as the Middle East. Although a part of two continents, Africa and Asia, the topography and the climate of the area and the cultures of its various peoples have much in common. The entire area, except along the shores of the seas or the banks of the rivers, is virtually a desert where water is man's greatest asset. It determines where he goes, what he eats, and how long he lives.

Although this area was the cradle of civilization, it is today still underdeveloped, both in its human and natural resources, and the disease problems which now exist have plagued these people for many centuries.

A major problem of this area is the movements of populations - refugees, immigrants and pilgrims. There are hundreds of thousands of homeless Palestine refugees temporarily settled in Lebanon, Syria and Jordan. Immigrants continue to flow into Israel. Every year, 200,000 Moslems make their pilgrimages to Mecca. These movements have far-reaching political, social and economic importance, including an effect on disease transmission.

These are among the reasons why the United States and the United Nations Agencies are channelling much of their technical assistance to the countries in this area. The United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund and the World Health Organization are providing medical personnel and supplies to stave off epidemics among the refugees. One hundred and forty-eight thousand refugee children have been vaccinated against tuberculosis. Control programs against malaria, typhus and other insect-borne diseases are carried on by these international organizations in the refugee camps.

Infectious eye diseases, such as trachoma, which blind large percentages of people in the Middle East, especially children, are being attacked in Jordan. With United States equipment and technical direction the Government of Jordan has set up a central laboratory to provide essential laboratory services required in attacking the problems of communicable diseases in that country. The Saudi Arabian Government, with World Health Organization assistance, has built quarantine facilities at Jidda to control diseases among the pilgrims.

The United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund and the World Health Organization are sponsoring vaccination programs throughout the area for protection against tuberculosis. In Israel, 208,000 children have been vaccinated, while in Egypt some two million children and young adults have been tested in the mass campaign. A vaccine production center is being established in Cairo with the assistance of the World Health Organization and the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund.

The Maternal and Child Health Center in Beirut is training local maternal and child health teams for work in the rural villages. The Technical Cooperation Administration has set up training facilities at the American University of Beirut for subprofessional and professional public health workers drawn from the nations in this area.

The World Health Organization and the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund have provided mobile units in Iraq which bring medical care to thousands suffering from bejel, syphilis and other spirochetal diseases. The Technical Cooperation Administration is establishing rural public health demonstrations in areas of Iraq undergoing economic development.

For the first time, the rural population of Iran is receiving the benefits of public health, scientific agriculture and fundamental education. In each of the provinces or ostans, a team of technical experts is setting up regional health centers under the Technical Cooperation Administration program. These centers are serving as focal points for training subprofessional health workers who will return to their native towns and villages and attack such problems as malaria, faulty sanitation, and high infant mortality. Also, the Technical Cooperation Administration, the World Health Organization and the Ministry of Health of Iran are very rapidly bringing malaria under control.

Throughout this area governmental and private agencies are initiating programs destined to stop human suffering and raise the level of health of the people.

GPO 83-28281

Mediterranean Sea
LEBANON
Beirut
ISRAEL
Jerusalem
Cairo
EGYPT
SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS
Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases

SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS

- Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases
- Tuberculosis
- Venereal Disease, Yaws, Bejel, and/or Pinta
- Maternal and/or Child Health, and/or Nutrition
- Rural Sanitation
- Public Health Training and Facilities
- Immunization
- Trachoma, and/or other Infectious Eye Diseases
- Laboratory and/or Research
- Public Health Demonstration Teams and/or Administrative Services
- Quarantine

Technical Assistance in Public Heal

THE MIDDLE EAST

SYRIA
LEBANON
Beirut
Damascus
RAEL Amman
usalem
JORDAN
IRAQ
Baghdad
Tehran
Isfahan
IRAN
Persian Gulf
Dharhan
SAUDI

ersian Gulf
SAUDI ARABIA
Dharhan
Riyadh
Red Sea
Jidda
Mecca
San'a
YEMEN Ta'izz

lic Health

T

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN PUBLIC HEALTH
EUROPE

Although Europe is not considered an underdeveloped area, there are many health problems which affect the economic development of particular countries. For this reason the World Health Organization, during its last assembly, decided to establish a Regional Office for Europe. Because of the advanced development of health affairs in Europe, the United States is giving technical assistance to only two countries in its bilateral program. These two countries are Greece and Turkey.

The present Greek program was initiated in 1947 as a part of the American Mission for Aid to Greece. It was designed to help in the economic recovery of Greece by controlling those diseases which affected the health of workers or made areas of the country unsuitable for agricultural production. Consequently, one of the biggest tasks when the program began was malaria control. This program was carried out on a large scale by the Public Health Division and the Agricultural Division of the ECA Mission to Greece. Once a major health and economic problem, malaria is now reduced to a minor problem in Greece. The Greek Mission also provides advisory services to the Ministry of Hygiene in helping it to reorganize its structure and to plan public health programs which will extend out into the provinces. In addition to developing health centers in the provinces, the Mission builds hospitals, promotes nursing education programs, develops hundreds of community water supplies and supervises the procurement and distribution of medical stores, drugs and chemicals. It guided the development of an artificial limb program and initiated public health fellowships for professional and subprofessional workers. Together with the World Health Organization, the Greek Government and the Danish Red Cross, it operates a tuberculosis control and BCG vaccination program.

In Turkey a small United States Mission of four people is giving assistance in malaria control. The activities of the Mission are centered in those regions of Turkey where rice production was stopped by the government because of an increase in malaria. This team also serves the government in a general advisory capacity on problems other than malaria control.

Because of the high degree of development of health in Europe the WHO has very few technical assistance missions there similar to those in the underdeveloped countries. Such assistance as is being given is confined to short term seminars and demonstrations. The World Health Organization has, however, been instrumental, along with UNICEF, in initiating extensive BCG vaccination programs in the war-ravaged areas of Central and Eastern Europe.

An international anti-venereal disease Commission of the Rhine was created in 1951 to coordinate services of the five countries bordering on the river for the benefit of Rhine boatmen and to establish diagnostic and treatment centers at principal river ports.

A training center for anesthesiology, opened in Copenhagen in May 1950, is being operated by the Danish State Medical Board, the University of Copenhagen, and the World Health Organization. Training in new techniques is being given to specialists from Sweden, Norway, Finland, Iceland, Yugoslavia, and Austria, as well as Denmark. The first class was graduated in April 1951.

A WHO team of six Swedish heart specialists demonstrated new surgical procedures such as "blue baby" operations in Vienna and Zagreb. Following the team's visits, cardiac clinics were scheduled to be established for children in those cities.

Technical aid is being given by WHO to UNICEF in a new program, launched in 1950, for rehabilitation of handicapped children in Europe. Assistance for hard-of-hearing children, war cripples blind, deaf mutes, polio victims, and other handicapped children has been requested by war-devastated countries. Supplies for the program are being provided by UNICEF.

WHO staff members and short-term consultants have been provided in such fields as venereal diseases, tuberculosis, and maternal and child health in many countries of Europe.

Medical books and periodicals have been sent to a number of governments to help them bring their scientists, isolated from research during World War II, up to date on new techniques.

WHO has helped a number of governments, including Austria, Finland and France, with specific problems of infant health.

GPO 83-26976

Technical Assistance in Public Health

EUROPE

SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS

- Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases
- Tuberculosis
- Venereal Disease, Yaws, Bejel, and/or Pinta
- Maternal and/or Child Health, and/or Nutrition
- Rural Sanitation
- Public Health Training and Facilities
- Public Health Demonstration Teams and/or Administrative Services
- Hospital Facilities and Services
- Laboratory and/or Research

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN HEALTH IN CENTRAL AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN AREA

In Central America and the Caribbean area the United States bilateral health programs are being administered by cooperative government agencies known generally as "Servicios." These agencies are staffed jointly by Americans and nationals of the host country. They are financed by contributions from the host government and the United States. In all cases the host government supplies by far the major portion of both personnel and funds. Eight countries in this area participate in this cooperative program.

In Costa Rica there is a project for the construction of sanitary privies, technical support to the Department of Sanitary Engineering in the Ministry of Public Health and, jointly with the World Health Organization, financial assistance to the National School of Nursing.

Current activities in El Salvador include the completion and partial equipping of two hospital health centers, a tuberculosis pavilion and a nursing school, and the supervision of an extensive rural sanitation project emphasizing safe water supplies and sewerage systems.

The objective of the Guatemalan program is the completion of a 1000-bed hospital and medical center on the outskirts of Guatemala City, for which Guatemala is furnishing the funds.

Major emphasis in Haiti is given to extensive campaigns aimed at the control of yaws and malaria, the two outstanding health problems of the country. In addition to assisting the control operations through clinics and mobile units, an extensive health education activity is also carried out. Other current activities include the operation of a health center, technical guidance to the National School of Nursing, construction of additions to the water supply system of the capital city, and general cooperation with the Hydraulic Service of the Haitian Government in a program aimed at improving community water supplies throughout the nation.

The principal activities in Honduras now include malaria control operations, the construction of water and sewerage systems, and technical assistance in the operation of a national tuberculosis sanatorium in Tegucigalpa, the capital city (this is the only institution of its kind in Honduras).

Since its beginning in 1942 the program in Mexico has placed special emphasis on the construction of water supply and sewerage systems. Other current activities include technical assistance to Servicio-constructed health centers, countrywide campaigns to control malaria, rickettsial diseases, tuberculosis, pinta, brucellosis, and Rocky Mountain spotted fever, as well as an extensive project to control venereal diseases along the U. S.-Mexican border and smallpox in the Tepalcatepec River basin.

The program in Nicaragua was reactivated in January 1951. Current operations comprise evaluation of previous work and conducting extensive surveys for water supply and waste disposal projects, construction of two health centers and two water supply systems.

The Panama program, which was reactivated in 1951 after a lapse of six years, is carrying on a countrywide health education project and making surveys for sewerage systems. It has also begun the operation of a countrywide BCG vaccination campaign against tuberculosis and is giving technical assistance to the national hospital in Panama City.

In this area the Pan American Sanitary Bureau, which acts as WHO's regional office for the Americas, continues its campaign for the eradication of the Aedes aegypti mosquito, carrier of yellow fever. Joint WHO/UNICEF projects for tuberculosis control have been started in Costa Rica, where a two-year program calls for tuberculin testing of 260,000 children and BCG vaccination of those not yet infected; El Salvador, where it is hoped that 877,000 children can be tested and vaccination provided in two years; and Jamaica, where the program calls for testing of 600,000 persons, vaccination, training of local personnel, and extending the services of an existing laboratory. A BCG vaccine laboratory in Mexico City aided by WHO and UNICEF, produces vaccine both for that country and for other Latin American countries.

Campaigns against insect-borne diseases, including malaria, are being conducted in Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, British Honduras and Nicaragua with WHO/UNICEF aid.

A two-year campaign against yaws was launched in Haiti in 1950 with the cooperation of WHO and UNICEF.

Venereal disease projects are being conducted in Nicaragua, Guatemala and Mexico.

The Institute of Nutrition for Central America and Panama was established in Guatemala with the cooperation of the regional office.

GPO 83-26976

Technical Assistance in Public Health
LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN AREA
SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS
Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases
Tuberculosis
Venereal Disease, Yaws, Bejel, and/or Pinta
Maternal and/or Child Health, and/or Nutrition
Rural Sanitation
Public Health Training and Facilities
Immunization
Laboratory and/or Research
Public Health Demonstration Teams and/or Administrative Services
Hospital Facilities and Services
LOWER CALIFORNIA MEXICO
MONTEREY
MEXICO CITY
Gulf of Mexico
HAVANA
CUBA
PORT AU PRINCE
CIUDAD TRUJILLO
SAN JUAN
PUERTO RICO
JAMAICA
KINGSTON
Caribbean Sea
HONDURAS
GUATEMALA
GUATEMALA CITY
EL SALVADOR
HONDURAS
TEGUCIGALPA
NICARAGUA
MANAGUA
CENTRAL AMERICA
COSTA RICA
SAN JOSE
PANAMA
PANAMA
PORT OF SPAIN
TRINIDAD

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN PUBLIC HEALTH FOR AFRICA

A vast region of the continent of Africa remains underdeveloped with its wealth of natural resources denied to mankind. Many times greater in area than either the pampas regions of South America or the prairies of the United States, this region could supply much of the needed food for the world if made safe for human habitation.

Many diseases, particularly malaria and African sleeping sickness, are rampant in this area and affect the destinies of man. Although man has discovered methods for the control of most of these diseases, the economic cost of applying such measures on a large scale in this region remains a formidable barrier to development.

Smallpox, typhus, epidemic meningitis, yellow fever, hookworm disease and malnutrition are prevalent. In the drier areas, trachoma, a disease often causing blindness, may affect two-thirds of the population. Along the coast, syphilis and gonorrhea have invaded the towns and villages. In the interior, yaws incapacitates both children and adults.

Under the bilateral program, the United States is giving technical assistance to Liberia and Ethiopia.

In Liberia, the bilateral program has been in operation since 1944. Originally initiated as a war-time operation to protect American military personnel stationed in that country, the program is now an integrated part of the public health services of Liberia. The American staff of the mission is assigned to responsible positions in the national health service. American experts provide assistance in nursing education, malaria control and laboratory services as well as in rural sanitation and other types of health services. At the request of the Liberian Government, the World Health Organization has provided a consultant to draft and codify health regulations. The Organization is also providing personnel to undertake a yaws control program in that country.

The World Health Organization has been providing assistance to Ethiopia for several years. Due to the extreme shortage of trained personnel in the health fields, the program has been primarily restricted to a training program for subprofessional personnel. Recently, however, the country has received assistance from the World Health Organization in leprosy control and a project for the control of venereal disease has been approved. The Technical Cooperation Administration has approved the assignment of a public health administrator to Ethiopia to plan a national health service for that country. It is anticipated that additional personnel will be assigned to Ethiopia when a plan has been agreed upon. So far as the rest of the region is concerned, the Mutual Security Agency has sponsored a malaria survey in Sierra Leone and epidemiological studies in the Gold Coast and Nigeria.

The World Health Organization has recently established a Regional Office for Africa at Brazzaville, French Equatorial Africa. Other than the activities cited above, assistance has been given in providing short-term consultants, survey missions and fellowships.

GPO 83-28281

TRIPOLI
ALGERIA
LIBYA
EGYPT
FRENCH WEST AFRICA
DAKAR
SUDAN ASMARA
ERITREA
DJIBOUTI
NIGERIA
FRENCH EQUATORIAL AFRICA
MONROVIA LIBERIA
GOLD COAST
ACCRA
LAGOS
ADDIS ABABA
ETHIOPIA
SOMALIA
UGANDA
KENYA
NAIROBI
BELGIAN CONGO
BRAZZAVILLE
LEOPOLDVILLE
TANGANYIKA

Technical Assistance in Public Health
AFRICA

SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS

- Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases
- Venereal Disease, Yaws, Bejel, and/or Pinta
- Public Health Training and Facilities
- Immunization
- Laboratory and/or Research
- Public Health Demonstration Teams and/or Administrative Services
- Leprosy

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN PUBLIC HEALTH
SOUTHEAST ASIA

Probably the most complex of the regions in which technical assistance activities in health are occurring is the Southeast Asia region. With a relatively small land area this region consists of peninsulas extending from the underside of China and thousands of small islands known as the "East Indies and the Philippines." Nine independent nations - Burma, Thailand, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Malaya, Indonesia, the Philippines and Taiwan - and a number of non-selfgoverning territories occupy this area. These nations vary in racial characteristics, religion, social and cultural background, language, political ideologies, and the maturity of their governments.

The United States is devoting intensive efforts in this area to relieve the suffering of the people and to assist the governments to develop sound economies which can support adequate health services.

In Indochina, where the French and Vietnam Governments are still fighting Communistic rebels, relief and care for war civilian casualties and war refugees necessarily constitute a considerable part of the health program. Fifteen American experts supervise malaria control teams, operate trachoma clinics, direct the drilling of wells and the building of privies in the villages, train and supervise first aid workers, laboratory technicians, dressers and other subprofessional personnel and provide the technical guidance for the construction and equipping of hospitals. They cooperate with the WHO in developing maternal and child health programs.

In Thailand, where there is greater stability, American experts are assisting the Ministry of Health in venereal disease, malaria, trachoma and plague control programs, rural sanitation and professional education. UNICEF and WHO have initiated a three year yaws control program. Assistance is also being given in malaria control and tuberculosis.

American personnel assigned to the U. S. Health Mission in Burma have been successful in carrying preventive medicine to the areas outside the major cities of Burma. Venereal disease and malaria control teams have been trained and assigned to rural areas. Quarantine personnel have been trained. A nation wide program in environmental sanitation is getting under way. American personnel serve as instructors at the Rangoon Medical School and Hospital. WHO and UNICEF are planning an extensive maternal and child health program in cooperation with the Government of Burma.

In Indonesia the small American public health group is providing advisory services to the Ministry of Health and assisting with the malaria control program carried on by the three malaria institutes. WHO and UNICEF are assisting in equipping 250 maternal and child health centers and are training personnel to staff these centers. A nation wide yaws eradication campaign is also carried on by WHO and UNICEF in which more than 100,000 persons have already been treated.

United States technical assistance in public health for the Philippine Islands is only in the planning stage. However, WHO and UNICEF have established a rural training center and are carrying out extensive yaws and syphilis control programs in Leyte and Samar. A BCG production laboratory and a tuberculosis demonstration center have been established at Santa Cruz near Manila.

In Formosa the United States, in addition to providing advisory services to the Ministry, is assisting in its malaria control program.

WHO has assigned public health nurses to Brunei, North Borneo and Sarawak to strengthen the nursing institutions in these countries.

In Malaya the WHO is sponsoring malaria control programs and extensive BCG vaccination campaigns.

GPO 83-26976

Technical Assistance in Public Health
SOUTHEAST ASIA
SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS
Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases
Tuberculosis
Venereal Disease, Yaws, Bejel, and/or Pinta
Maternal and/or Child Health, and/or Nutrition
Rural Sanitation
Public Health Training and Facilities
Trachoma, and/or other Infectious Eye Diseases
Laboratory and/or Research
Public Health Demonstration Teams and/or Administrative Services
Hospital Facilities and Services
Quarantine
BURMA
Bay of Bengal
RANGOON
THAILAND
BANGKOK
INDO CHINA
LUANGPRABANG
HANOI
HUE
PNOMPENH
SAIGON
TAIPEI
TAIWAN (FORMOSA)
LUZON
MANILA
MINDANAO
South China Sea
MALAYA
KUALA LUMPUR
SINGAPORE
SUMATRA
Indian Ocean
SANDAKAN
NORTH BORNEO
SARAWAK
KUCHING
BORNEO
CELEBES
INDONESIA
DJAKARTA
JAVA
NEW GUINEA

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE IN HEALTH IN SOUTH AMERICA

The United States carries on a bilateral technical assistance program in health in nine South American countries. These programs are carried out through cooperative services similar to those used in the Central American countries. These "Servicios" are an integral part of the Ministry of Health in each country.

The major activity in public health in Bolivia is the operation of a series of health centers in six of the country's nine departmental capitals. Other activities include the operation of dispensaries and a central laboratory, the training of personnel for laboratory work in health centers and hospitals, supervision of countrywide health education projects and the construction of a maternity hospital and a water supply system.

The cooperative health program in Brazil is centered principally in the Amazon, San Francisco and Rio Doce Valleys and in the states of Bahi, Paraiba and Pernambuco. Major activities include the operation of health centers (subposts in remote areas), hospitals, laboratories, mobile dispensaries on river launches; construction of demonstration water supply systems, laundries and public baths; statewide privy construction projects in the states of Amazonas and Para; studies relating to the incidence and control of yaws, schistosomiasis and other diseases common in the areas; improvement of public health and hospital nursing services in five states; conducting extensive health education projects; development of industrial hygiene; and technical assistance in hospital administration.

In Chile an important phase of the cooperative health program is the operation of three health centers serving areas with populations ranging from 30,000 to 80,000. Other activities include countrywide campaigns for the control of tuberculosis, typhus, typhoid fever, meningitis, diphtheria, whooping cough and other diseases with especially high morbidity rates in Chile. In progress also are a countrywide nutrition project, a technical assistance project in vital statistics, a project in sanitation for the Aconcagua Valley, construction of health centers and several sewerage and water supply systems for small towns and a countrywide health education project.

Emphasis is being placed in Colombia on the control of malaria in an area with a population of 3,000,000. Through operation and research, studies are being made on the nutritional deficiencies of the people. Health centers and yaws control projects, the operation of a countrywide health education project, and operation of the National School of Nursing are other activities of the Servicio. Industrial hygiene activities are being initiated and environmental sanitation projects expanded.

The present public health program in Ecuador is a broad one involving the control of malaria and yaws the construction of several small city water supplies, the construction of improved sewerage systems, and on-the-job training of sanitary inspectors and laboratory technicians. Thirty-two hospitals have been constructed and are in use.

Current activities in Paraguay include the operation of health centers a central laboratory and a 100-bed tuberculosis sanatorium, which is being expanded to 200 beds; and assistance to the leper colony.

At the present time activities in Peru include the operation of health centers, hospitals, dispensaries, medical and sanitary posts, and river launch dispensaries in the jungle area; the study of industrial hygiene problems particularly related to high altitude mining; a yellow fever and leprosy control project in the Department of Loreto; nutritional deficiency studies; and a nationwide health education project.

The cooperative health program for Uruguay has been directed primarily toward the planning, construction and operation of demonstration health centers in the important towns. The Servicio currently is operating four such demonstration health centers. Other activities include a countrywide health education project, a yellow fever project, a tuberculosis project, and technical assistance to the University School of Medicine.

The United States-Venezuela cooperative public health program is now limited to two major fields of activity: the provision of small water systems for the many small towns throughout the country, and technical assistance to the National School of Nursing.

The threat of yellow fever has been reduced in the Western Hemisphere in the past four years by the Pan American Sanitary Bureau, which acts as WHO's regional office for the Americas. In Ecuador joint WHO/UNICEF projects for tuberculosis control include testing of 1,100,000 children and adolescents, vaccination, and establishment of a vaccine laboratory in Guayaquil. A campaign against typhus in Peru, which began in Cuzco after an earthquake in May 1950, with WHO/UNICEF help, has been extended to the entire country. Venereal disease projects are conducted in a number of countries including Ecuador; Peru, where control in a port area will be demonstrated; Venezuela, where a serological laboratory and VD training center has been opened in Caracas; and Paraguay.

Immunization of children against diphtheria and whooping cough is under way in Chile and Colombia. In La Paz, Bolivia, the country's first children's hospital is being erected with technical aid by WHO and UNICEF.

GPO 83-26976

Caribbean Sea
Atlantic
CARACAS
VENEZUELA
BR. GUIANA
SURINAM
FR. GUIANA
BOGOTA
COLOMBIA
QUITO
ECUADOR
Galapagos Is.
Amazon River
BRAZIL RECIFE
San Francisco River
LIMA
LA PAZ
BOLIVIA
SUCRE
PARAGUAY
Rio Doce
Pacific

Pacific

Ocean

Technical Assistance in Public Health

SOUTH AMERICA

SYMBOLS FOR PROGRAMS

- Malaria and/or other Insect Borne Diseases
- Tuberculosis
- Venereal Disease, Yaws, Bejel, and/or Pinta
- Maternal and/or Child Health, and/or Nutrition
- Rural Sanitation
- Public Health Training and Facilities
- Immunization
- Laboratory and/or Research
- Public Health Demonstration Teams and/or Administrative Services
- Hospital Facilities and Services

17-Illiteracy

Notes on Illiterary in the South- 1940

The usual statistics on illiterary, that is on the ability of persons to read and write English, are not yet available.* However, the 16th Census of the United States gives basic data on the education of the population that permit some significant conclusions.

In 1940 there were 74,775,836 persons 25 years old and over in the United States. Of this number 21,191,471 were in the South. In the total population there were 2,799,923 persons of this classification who had no schooling; 1,136,221 of that number were in the South. The median years of education completed for the United States was 8.4; for the South 7.8.

*1940 Census took no illiteracy figures, commenting that illiteracy was almost completely wiped out except for certain isolated spots. They do give "schooling completed" figures, however.
Selective Service has made some study of "functional illiteracy", based on draft figures.

The regional differentials for this problem are interesting. Let us set up two hypothetical populations of 1,000 people, one for the Nation, one for the South. This is the way their education would compare:

Total Population	The Nation Persons 1,000	The South Persons 1,000
No schooling	37	54
Completed 1- 4 grades	98	176
Completed 4- 6 grades	114	167
Completed 7- 8 grades	346	250
Completed 4 years high school	141	108
Completed at least 4 years college	46	40
Others and unknown	219	205
TOTAL	1,000	1,000
Completed less than 5 years of schooling.	135	205

The following table gives a break down of the educational status of the South's population twenty years of age and over by color.

MEDIAN SCHOOL YEARS COMPLETED BY PERSONS

20 years of age and over, by color, in the South, 1940

	Total Persons 20 years old and over.	These Had NO Schooling.	This Is As Far as the Average Person went in School.
			Age 20-24	20 years and over
			Grade	Grade
All Southerners	25,023,784	1,207,659	9.2	8.1
All Southern Men	12,415,666	668,826	8.8	7.9
All Southern Women	12,608,118	538,883	9.7	8.3
White Southerners	19,303,622	605,559	10.3	8.6
White Southern Men	9,649,972	338,019	9.8	8.4
White Southern Women	9,653,650	267,540	10.8	8.8
Negro Southerners	5,720,162	602,100	6.6	5.3
Negro Southern Men	2,765,694	330,807	6.0	4.9
Negro Southern Women	2,954,468	271,293	7.2	5.8

To these statistics may be added a few other facts about education in the Southern States.

Of every 1,000 persons 25 years old and over in the following thirteen states these are the numbers who have had less than 5 years of schooling and those who have had no schooling.

The State	Less Than 5 Years Schooling	No Schooling
Virginia	232	54
North Carolina	262	58
South Carolina	347	79
Georgia	301	65
Florida	185	40
Kentucky	202	41
Tennessee	217	42
Alabama	289	67
Mississippi	302	66
Arkansas	231	39
Louisiana	357	128
Oklahoma	135	25
Texas	188	53

Finally, Negroes number approximately 330 in every 1,000 people in the South, they number approximately 490 in every 1,000 Southern people between 5 and 24 years of age who have had no schooling, and, approximately 240 of every 1,000 in the same ages who are attending school.

February 3, 1944

Data Compiled by Ira De A. Reid
Southern Regional Council
710 Standard Building
Atlanta 3, Georgia

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF INTERGROUP RELATIONS OFFICIALS
4901 Ellis Avenue
Chicago 15, Illinois

RECEIVED
APR 30 1948
Southern Regional Council

April 23, 1948

RELEASE NO. 2

SUBJECT: Memorandum on Current Litigation Before the United States Supreme Court Involving Race Restrictive Housing Covenants.

Purpose

This memorandum has two purposes: (1) It is designed to indicate the nature of the litigation on racial covenants and possible decisions of the Supreme Court and sets forth possible results following a decision, and (2) it proposes action that may be taken by community agencies.

PART I

Background

In the October Term, 1947, the United States Supreme Court had before it four cases involving race restrictive housing covenants. Two of these cases, Shelley v. Kraemer (from Missouri), and McGhee v. Sipes (from Michigan), reached the Supreme Court on writs of certiorari granted in June 1947; the other cases, Hurd v. Hodge and Urciolo v. Hodge (both from the District of Columbia) came to the Court on writs of certiorari granted in July 1947. All four cases were argued at the same time, January 15 and 16, 1948. Three of the nine Justices of the United States Supreme Court disqualified themselves at the time that hearings were begun. As late as April 16, 1948, the Court had announced no decision in the litigation.

Although there was much cooperation in the planning and preparation of briefs, each of the four cases was argued separately. As a consequence, there were four briefs for petitioners (who were challenging racial covenants). In addition, over 20 briefs were filed by agencies and organizations as friends of the court (amicus curiae). The Attorney General submitted a comprehensive consolidated brief amicus curiae in all four cases for the United States, and the Solicitor General presented oral arguments at the time of the hearings.[1]

Litigation in the United States Supreme Court involving residential segregation first arose in connection with ordinances designed to establish racial zones of living in American cities. In Buchanan v. Warley (1917), Harmon v. Tyler (1925), and The City of Richmond v. Deans (1930), the Supreme Court declared residential segregation ordinances of Louisville, New Orleans, and Richmond, Va., unconstitutional. In order to effect such residential segregation and not run afoul of the law, race restrictive housing covenants, alleged to be private agreements between property owners, were revived and widely applied.

Although a race restrictive housing covenant of San Francisco aimed at Chinese was declared unconstitutional in 1890 by a Federal Court in California, in only three recent instances have courts in California and in New Jersey failed to enforce race restrictive covenant cases. Lower courts in some 19 states and the District of Columbia have, during the last two decades, upheld and enforced such agreements. Usually one or more parties to these restrictive agreements violate the terms of the covenant, and some one or several other parties to the agreement petition the court to force the recalcitrant to keep the original pledge. Without the backing of court enforcement, therefore, the race restrictive housing covenant becomes an ineffective instrument.

---

[1] The remaining amicus curiae briefs (known to the writer) were from the following organizations: (for the petitioners) American Association for the United Nations, American Civil Liberties Union, American Federation of Labor, American Indian Citizens League, American Jewish Committee and B'nai B'rith, American Jewish Congress, American Unitarian Association, American Veterans Committee, California amicus, Civil Liberties Department of the Grand Lodge of Elks, Congregational Christian Churches of the United States, Congress of Industrial Organizations, National Bar Association, National Lawyers Guild, Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League, and Protestant Council (of churches) of the City of New York; (for the respondents) Arlington Heights Property Owners Association, Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia, Inc., Mount Royal Protective Association, Inc., and National Association of Real Estate Boards.

The Issues

1. The basic issue involved in the current litigation is the constitutionality of judicial enforcement of racial covenants. The question is whether the judicial enforcement of private contracts, which provide for the kind of action which the Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional when attempted by state or local legislation, is constitutional, or whether racial covenants are private agreements and as such should be enforced by the courts.

2. In addition, the cases raise the following questions: Does judicial enforcement of racial covenants involving a willing seller and a willing buyer

a. violate Section 1978; Revised Statutes (8 U.S.C. Sec 42) which provides "All citizens of the United States shall have the same rights, in every State and Territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property";

b. violate a treaty of the United States, namely, the Charter of the United Nations which states that the parties to the treaty will "promote.....universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race";

c. conflict with the public policy of the United States;

d. result in such discriminatory and inequitable results that a court in equity should not lend its aid by enforcing the covenant;

e. involve unreasonable restraints on conveyance and transfer of property?

3. The broad issue involved was stated by the petitioners in Urciolo v. Hodge, as follows:

> "Shall we in the United States have ghettos for racial, religious and other minorities, or even exclude such minorities entirely from whole areas of our country, by a system of judicial enforcements based on private prejudice and made effective through the use of government authority and power?"

Constitutional Issues Involved

The constitutional question involved is this: are the restrictions contained in racial covenants upon the alienation, acquisition and occupancy of land, based solely on race, unconstitutional under the amendments to the constitution that prohibit a deprivation of property without due process of law? The states are prevented from interfering with property rights except by due process of law by the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment; for the District of Columbia, the Fifth Amendment guarantees due process of law. Consequently in Shelley v. Kraemer and in McGhee v. Sipes the Fourteenth Amendment is cited; in Hurd v. Hodge and in Urciolo v. Hodge the Fifth Amendment is cited.

Principal Legal Precedents Cited

The three United States Supreme Court decisions involving legislative action to effect residential segregation, referred to above, are the most important legal precedents. In addition, the following litigation is frequently cited in the briefs for the petitioners:

Gandolfo v. Hartman (1890)
This is the first reported case involving a racial restrictive covenant. It arose on the West Coast (California) where a covenant against a Chinese family was contested and declared unconstitutional in the federal court.

Corrigan v. Buckley (1926)
In this case the Supreme Court refused to dismiss on appeal an injunction enforcing a racial restrictive covenant. The sole issue involved was whether the covenant was void because the agreement (as contrasted to its enforcement) conflicted with the Constitution and the laws of the United States and with public policy.

Civil Rights Cases (1883)
These are cited to indicate the nature of governmental action and indicate when private action becomes public action. The Supreme Court in these cases defined private action as that "unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings".

In re Drummond Wren (1945)
In this case the Supreme Court of Ontario invalidated a restrictive covenant against a Jew on the grounds that racial and religious restrictive agreements are invalid under provincial and Dominion public policy, as well as void restraints at common law. In addition, the court held that the objectives of the covenant were contrary to the objectives of the United Nations Charter to which Canada is a signator.

Principal Arguments

For the petitioners:

1. a. The United States Supreme Court has never heretofore decided the question of the constitutionality of judicial enforcement of race restrictive housing covenants.

   b. In Buchanan v. Warley, Harmon v. Tyler and the City of Richmond v. Deans, the Supreme Court ruled that legislative action to effect residential segregation violates the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and, therefore, is unconstitutional. Enforcement of covenants by judicial action is the very essence of state action and it too is unconstitutional.

   c. Analyses of the effect of covenants illustrate that the social and economic effects of judicial enforcements of restrictive covenants is clearly incompatible with the due process clauses of the Constitution,

   d. Nor is there valid economic justification for judicial enforcement of covenants since a change in racial occupancy does not per se result in a loss in property values. The present income distribution in the Negro community indicates that many of its residents are financially able to purchase and maintain desirable property, while the findings of the National Association of Real Estate Boards and the experience in public housing show that Negroes maintain property at the same standards as whites of comparable income levels,

2. Judicial enforcement of race restrictive covenants would deny the right to purchase property (since denial of the right to occupy is usually a deterrent to a potential home owner to buy and since some racial covenants specifically deny the right to buy) solely on the basis of race. This is a clearer violation of Section 1978, Revised Statutes (see above).

3. According to Article VI of the Constitution, "all treaties made ....,under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land". One of the basic human rights the United States is pledged to uphold for all, regardless of race, is the right and freedom to acquire a home and live in it. Judicial enforcement of racial covenants clearly violates the obligations under the Charter (see above) of the Government not to lend its aid to racial discrimination.

4. a. Racial covenants and their judicial enforcement are contrary to the Declaration of Independence, Constitution, Statutes, Treaties and International Agreements, Decisions of the Supreme Court, Statements of the President of the United States, thus they are contrary to public policy.

   b. The drastic effect of racial covenants in accentuating the housing shortage facing Negroes and confining them involuntarily to congested ghettoes, with resulting jeopardy of health, safety and morals of the community indicate that their enforcement by the judicial branch of the government is contrary to the public policy of the country.

5. The extreme hardship which judicial enforcement of a racial covenant inflicts directly on the petitioner, and indirectly on all members of the excluded group as well as the general community, clearly outweighs any benefits to the respondent. The nature of this hardship is shown by the socio-economic sections of the petitioners' briefs which set forth in detail the adverse social and economic consequences of racial covenants. Such discrimination as results is contrary to our national tradition.

6. It is a fundamental principle of our economic system that all property be freely alienated. Such restraints as are permissible have been clearly defined, and the conditions of restraint imposed by racial covenants are not covered by permissible exceptions to the general rule. According to the American Law Institute, justification of restraints on alienation "must be found in the objective that is thereby sought to be accomplished or on the grounds that the alienation....is so negligible that the major policies furthered by freedom of alienation are not materially hampered". Race restrictive covenants are not, therefore, permissible exceptions.

7. Covenants restricting the use of land are entirely different from racial covenants which, solely on the basis of race or creed, restrict the occupancy of land. While enforcement of use covenants often results in advantages to society, enforcement of racial covenants occasions no analogous benefits.

The basic differences between the two types of restrictions is that the former relates to what an occupant does to land or property, while the latter relates to who occupies the land or property, ignoring all reasonable consideration and base their discrimination pointedly on race alone. But in a democracy, the skin color, national origin or religion of the occupant of property cannot be recognized as a legal injury to a neighbor or a concern to the state.

8. The brief of the Attorney General for the United States as amicus curiae supported most of the arguments outlined above. In addition, it set forth the effects of judicial enforcement of racial covenants upon the health, housing and territorial administrative programs of the Federal Government. The Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency was quoted at length to the effect that the widespread prevalence of racial covenants impeded the progress of federal programs for housing while increasing the costs of such programs to the Federal Government. At the same time, the amount of shelter made available to Negroes is diminished by the operations of race restrictive covenants.

For the respondents:

1. Race restrictive covenants are private agreements and contracts. As such they should be enforced in the courts.

2. Restrictions on property use have long been accepted and subjected to judicial enforcement. Racial covenants are reasonable restrictions on property use and should also be enforced by the courts.

Possible Decisions

There are a number of possible decisions in the current litigation on the race restrictive covenants. The Court may rule that

1. court enforcement of race restrictive covenants[1] is constitutional in the states and in the District of Columbia;

2. court enforcement of such agreements is unconstitutional, both in the District of Columbia (as a federal territory) and in the states;

---

[1] Although briefs for the petitioners did not directly challenge the constitutionality of race restrictive covenants, but stressed court enforcement of them, the Supreme Court may reverse its earlier decision in Corrigan v. Buckley and declare that the racial covenant itself (even in the absence of judicial enforcement) is unconstitutional.

3. court enforcement of racial covenants in the District of Columbia is unconstitutional, but permissible in the states.[2]

Since three Justices, Reed, Jackson and Rutledge, have withdrawn, a unanimous ruling would be 6 to 0. But a 4 to 2 decision is required to invalidate covenants, whereas a 3 to 3 decision maintains the status quo (court enforcement of covenants). There is, in light of the delay in a decision, the possibility that the Court will request a reargument of any or all of the cases before rendering a decision. In the case of a 3 to 3 or a 4 to 2 decision, however, additional litigation may arise.

Probable Long-run Effects of Supreme Court Approval of Racial Covenants

Race restrictive housing covenants are not the only existing or possible instruments for effecting enforced residential segregation. In addition to covenants, policies and practices of the organized real estate operators, attitudes of builders and subdividers, policies and practices of financial institutions, use of violence, action of municipal government, vested interests of neighborhood businesses and institutions of every kind, and social attitudes are operative. Each of these devices and attitudes is historically related to rise of racial covenants. Approval of racial covenants, therefore, will serve to strengthen the efficacy and toleration of other devices over the long-run by reinforcing their moral and pseudo-legal sanction.

Failure of the Supreme Court to outlaw judicial enforcement of racial covenants is likely to accelerate their use at a rapid rate. This will give support to the other devices of exclusion enumerated above, resulting in more effective restriction of minorities in too little living space. This, in turn, will further complicate the problem of living space for colored residents in urban centers. It will mean that minorities will have little chance to participate in any possible forthcoming building boom. Meanwhile, as whites move out of old housing, Negroes will, covenants notwithstanding, move into much that is deserted by whites. Supreme Court approval of racial covenants will not prevent this economically motivated result; it will, however, give the appearance of legality and respectability to any and all actions taken by residents in the areas entered by Negroes to drive them out. Conflict seems inevitable in this situation. The incidence of tensions and possibilities of violence will probably be appreciably intensified by Supreme Court approval of racial covenants. Certainly a decision to that effect will perpetuate the situation out of which the chronic racial conflict for space in urban centers is developed.

---

[2] There is a fourth possible, though highly improbable, decision. It is that the Supreme Court may decide that court enforcement of racial covenants is unconstitutional in the States but is constitutional in the District of Columbia.

Current Reactions and Possible Future Developments Incident to Litigation

1. As soon as litigation on race restrictive covenants reached the Supreme Court, owners' and neighborhood improvement associations in some cities (notably Chicago, Detroit and Washington) launched new campaigns to spread the use of such agreements. Such activity, based on fear of Negro neighbors and the spread of racial stereotypes, increased racial tension in many sections of the city.

a. If the Supreme Court invalidates judicial enforcement of covenants, the immediate result will probably be great resentment and opposition on the part of all who have promoted and many who have signed the instrument.

b. Based on community reaction to Supreme Court decision on the white primary and unequal segregated schools in the South, it is probable that a decision invalidating judicial enforcement of racial covenants will be generally accepted by the American public. However,

(1) there may be agitation for more litigation, especially if there is a split decision;

(2) there will be an immediate camppaign to oppose the decision on the part of those who have vested interests in formulating covenants.

c. After the initial reaction, it is probable that there will be a lull in activity to promote racial covenants or substitutes.

d. Depending in large measure upon the volume of new construction, volume and location of vacancies, there will be expansion in areas open to Negroes. Immediate developments in this direction will probably not be appreciably greater in the present housing market as a result of a decision of the type under discussion.

e. There may, however, be fear that a revolutionary change is involved and certain groups may attempt to exploit the uncertainties in the situation.

Possible Results of Invalidation of Judicial Enforcement of Racial Covenants

1. The most pronounced and immediate effect of invalidation of judicial enforcement of race restrictive covenants will be a decline in the use of the instrument and the possibility of an end in its application in the future. Such a decision will render inoperative, for a time at least, one of the instruments that limits the free movement of colored Americans in their quest for shelter.

2. At the same time, counter forces will be set in motion. Among them are the following:

a. attempts to perfect alternative mechanisms to accomplish the same purpose, including the possibility of legislative proposals to circumvent the effect of such a Supreme Court decision;

b. more intense application of other existing methods for excluding minorities from certain areas, especially the use of

(1) violence, and

(2) non-violent intimidation.

3. Invalidation of judicial enforcement of racial covenants will not of itself solve the space problem facing minorities in American cities. It will, however, establish a legal framework in which the problem can be eased, since it will permit more rapid entrance of colored people into certain areas. It is in the middle-rental areas that surround the Black Belt that racial covenants are concentrated. It is into these areas that Negroes are already in the process of entering. Invalidation of racial covenants will accelerate the process. Three factors, however, should be kept in mind:

a. in the present housing shortage, transfer of title will often occur in such areas before there is a corresponding change in occupancy. Thus Negroes will, in the event of a decision invalidating racial covenants, rapidly acquire title to property that lies in the path of the geographic growth of the Black Belt, but the total volume of housing and resulting rates of vacancies in the areas affected by the transfers of ownership will determine the rate at which colored people enter the areas. These same forces will operate where investment property is acquired for rental to Negroes.

b. invalidation of racial covenants will, in the present tight housing market, do little to open surburban areas to colored people or to accelerate the rapid entrance of colored people in most of the areas that are removed from existing Black Belts.

c. but invalidation of racial covenants will probably unfreeze vacant land, some of which is already being considered as sites for new construction open to Negroes, and some of which would be put to such use were it available.

4. A decision banning judicial enforcement of racial covenants will have effects in fields outside housing, serving to weaken the whole pattern of segregation. This would follow because such a decision would

a. immediately remove some of the respectability of Negro exclusion from various community institutions and facilities;

b. probably eventually serve to break down the pattern of segregation in schools, health, welfare, recreation, and other public services and in quasi-public facilities in the North and in the border states by facilitating a wider distribution of Negroes in the cities and thereby encouraging their participation in facilities in all sections of the cities.

5. When, due to more construction and consequent competition of more desirable and newer shelter on the market, there are many vacancies in scattered sections of the city, invalidation of racial covenants would make it easier for Negroes to enter housing removed from present areas of their concentration.

This is at best a possible long-run result. It could result in the creation of many clusters of colored homes, or it could be a first step in a wider distribution of non-whites in many sections of the city. Much depends upon the volume of shelter available to the mass of Negroes at rents they can afford to pay. With such a supply, the movement would be of individual families rather than the disorganized rush of large numbers intent on securing shelter regardless of its suitability to their pocketbooks and family needs. In addition, invalidation of racial covenants might unfreeze vacant units which, if unhampered by such covenants, could serve to

a. offer space for Negro families displaced by urban redevelopment

b. increase the supply of shelter available to Negroes.

6. Once there is more housing on the market, the pressure of numbers in the Black Belt and the fear of Negro penetration in the areas contiguous to the Black Belt will open the latter areas to widespread activities of speculative operators. This will have two results. It will

a. necessitate conversions and overcrowding in order to compensate purchasers for the inflated prices paid and to accommodate the rent-paying ability of the new occupants to the new rental scale. This will be accentuated by the tendency to accept Negro tenants without regard to income or family size,

b. and possibly lead to panic selling of many of the present residences.

Such developments will lead to even more rapid entrance of Negroes than otherwise would take place. The Negro area of settlement will expand once more in the characteristic manner. Invalidation of the racial covenant may accelerate this type of expansion, but the volume of construction and the availability of housing for Negroes in other parts of the city will be the more important determining factors.

7. Invalidation of judicial enforcement of racial covenants will remove one of the threats that faces minorities in urban redevelopment. Many inlying areas now occupied by Negroes and destined for treatment in redevelopment programs are still covered by racial covenants. Were the instrument invalidated by the Supreme Court, there would no longer be the danger that the covenants would be revived once the land was acquired for redevelopment. (In only one state, Illinois, is such an eventuality prohibited in redevelopment legislation.)

uopwa-39-cio
dwo
4/23/48

Memorandum on Current Litigation Before the United States Supreme Court Involving Race Restrictive Housing Covenants.

PART II

Suggested Action

1. Immediate plans and programs should be undertaken to strengthen law enforcement agencies and create municipal and county intolerance of violence incident to minorities' entrance into new areas.

   a. regardless of the Supreme Court decision, non-whites will enter new areas at an accelerated rate in the months ahead.

   b. unless acts of violence are effectively curbed now and the community aroused to the dangers of toleration of such acts, changes in racial occupancy of areas in our cities, which seem imminent, will increase.

2. Immediate programs should be initiated to interpret the possible result of a decision invalidating judicial enforcement of racial covenants. Materials should be prepared now, discussed with newspaper editors and writers, and held in form which will permit immediate release at the time of the Supreme Court decision.

3. Plans and programs to increase the total supply of housing, at various rental and sales levels, and the Negroes' share of it should be underway at the present. This is the most important single action that can be taken.

In preparing a local program to provide materials for such a job of interpretation, the following steps are recommended:

   a. survey extent, nature and duration of existing racial covenants;

   b. determine the nature and extent of current violence or intimidation against minorities moving into new areas;

   c. make an inventory of organizations currently promoting covenants or campaigning against entrance of minorities into new areas, and

   d. prepare a bibliography on racial covenants and housing for minorities.

4. As a general approach to the problem, programs should be underway to avoid community-wide and neighborhood hysteria incident to the sharing of community and neighborhood facilities by new racial groups.

5. All the instruments of community planning should be brought to bear to establish understanding of the relationship between sound city planning, urban redevelopment and slum clearance and the need to open more space to minorities and establish racially democratic patterns of living. At the same time, it is important to point out to minority groups that while urban redevelopment may become an instrument for displacing them from desirably located areas, it can become an instrument for securing more space and establishing democratic racial patterns of living in some parts of the city. Plans to achieve the latter objective should be developed at once.

6. In the future, as in the past, the majority of Negroes will inherit old structures. One of the techniques for encouraging orderly entrance of Negroes into new areas is use of community conservation agreements establishing occupancy standards. This has limitations and can be rendered impotent unless these limitations are recognized. Community conservation agreements have little meaning or effectiveness in areas where

a. property has already been put into bad usage via doubling-up or dangerously high densities;

b. property has been sold at speculative prices which demand conversion and high rates of over-crowding;

c. area has just been transferred to Negro occupancy or is in advance stage of transfer in racial occupancy.

The community conservation agreement is applicable to a. areas composed of desirable structures and now in good use;

b. areas where racial change in occupancy is not yet advanced to the point where speculative prices and conversion are underway or imminent;

c. such agreements are applied in lieu of and not in addition to racial covenants; or

d. the area is one of new construction.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Race Restrictive Housing Covenants

Books

Drake, St. Clair and Cayton, Horace, Black Metropolis, Harcourt, Brace, 1945, Chapter 8.

Long, Herman H. and Johnson, Charles S., People vs. Property, Fisk University, 1947.

Myrdal, Gunnar, An American Dilemma, Harper, 1943, pp.622-32.

Pamphlets

Abrams, Charles, Race Bias in Housing, American Civil Liberties and others, 1947.

Sheil, Bernard J., The Most Reverend and Miller, Loren, Racial Restrictive Covenants, Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination.

Weaver, Robert C., Hemmed In, American Council on Race Relations, 1945.

Articles

Abrams, Charles, "Homes for Aryans Only," Commentary, May 1947, pp. 421-27.

Dean, John P., "None Other Than Caucasian: A Study of Race Covenants," Journal of Land and Public Utility Economics, November 1947, pp. 428-32.

Groner, Isaac N. and Helfeld, David M., "Race Discrimination in Housing," Yale Law Journal, January 1948, pp. 426-58.

"Good Neighbors," Architectural Forum, January 1946, pp. 16-20.

Hill, William E., "Racial Restrictive Housing Covenants," Opportunity, Summer issue, 1946, pp. 119-21, 147-9.

Kahen, Harold I., "Validity of Anti-Negro Restrictive Covenants: A Reconsideration," University of Chicago Law Review, February 1945, pp. 198-213.

McGroney, D.O., "Racial Residential Segregation by State Court Enforcement of Restrictive Agreements, Covenants or Conditions in Deeds is Unconstitutional," California Law Review, March 1945, pp. 4-39.

Weaver, Robert C., "Race Restrictive Housing Covenants," Journal of Land and Public Utility Economics, August 1944, pp. 183-93.

Community Conservation Agreements

Weaver, Robert C., "A Tool for Democratic Housing," Crisis, February 1947, pp.47-8.

Wright, Thomas H., Statement on Community Conservation Agreement, Chicago Commission on Human Relations, 54 W. Hubbard Street, Chicago, Illinois (copies available upon request).

uopwa-39-cio
April 1948

1-28-49 16 - Housing

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY
Office of the Administrator

The Housing Needs of the Nonwhite Population in Nonfarm Areas

[illegible]lthough it is commonly known that Negroes and other racial minority groups a[illegible]-housed, the extent of their housing requirements on a national basis is e[illegible]ed for the first time by Douglas Rosenbaum, formerly a racial relations a[illegible] Office of the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, and re-ce[illegible]n economist in the Home Loan Bank Board. The estimate, published in an ar[illegible] "The Housing Needs of the Nonwhite Population in Nonfarm Areas," in the No[illegible] 1948 issue of Land Economics,[1] calls for the construction of 200,000 non[illegible]nits annually for 12 years to accommodate the nonwhite population. The tab[illegible]w, extracted from the article, presents the estimate in relationship to the [illegible]ll findings of the Joint Congressional Committee on Housing.

Additional Nonfarm Dwelling Units Needed by 1960[2]
(in thousands)

Item	Total (Committee's[3] Estimate)	Nonwhite (Author's Estimate)	Nonwhite as Percent of Total
Estima[illegible]0 families	39,500	3,475	8.8
Allowan[illegible]4 percent effective vacancies (i.e., [illegible] actually for rent or sale, and ha[illegible]e year round)	1,600	145	9.1
Tota[illegible]lings needed in 1960	41,100	3,620	8.8
Subtract: [illegible]ctive Inventory	32,729	2,863	8.7
Numbe[illegible] of additional units needed from beginning of 1947	8,371	757	9.0
Subtract: Units added in 1947	1,000	15	1.5
Net additional number needed between 1948 and 1960 to bring requirements and supply into balance	7,371	742	10.1
Add:
For replacement of estimated losses from 1947 to 1960 (fire, demolition, floods, etc.)	520	45	8.7
For replacement of nonfarm units in need of major repairs and of urban units lacking private bath and toilet	5,200	1,360	26.2
For replacement of substandard units in surrounding suburban areas and for replacement of standard units deteriorating by 1960	2,000	150	7.5
For replacement of temporary structures	350	40	11.4
Total replacement, 1948-60	8,070	1,595	19.8
Minimum construction needed	15,441	2,337	15.1

1/ Sterling Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison.
2/ Reproduced with permission of the author and the publication.
3/ Joint Congressional Committee on Housing, Final Majority Report, March 15, 1948.

(OA-442)

RECEIVED
JAN 28 1949
Southern Regional Council

Opportunities in a Neglected Market

By MARGARET KANE
Office of the FHA Commissioner

Housing projects for minority groups, particularly Negroes, have proved successful under the FHA program in many sections of the country. The need, however, is still urgent and the opportunities in both rental and sales fields are analysed here

AN AREA of mortgage lending that has not been explored as thoroughly as it deserves to be is the financing of homes for minority groups. The urgent need of improved housing conditions for members of these groups is a vital part of the general housing problem. Negroes, who constitute by far the largest minority group, have access to a disproportionately limited part of the housing supply, and the amount of new housing built specifically for them is entirely inadequate. Much of the current demand by Negroes for public housing is caused by the failure of private enterprise to take advantage of a market that it could and should supply.

Although there was an increase of 11.6 percent in the nonwhite population of the United States between 1940 and 1947, compared to an increase of 7.5 percent in the white population, the number of dwelling units occupied by nonwhites increased only 6.9 percent, while the number occupied by whites increased 12.5 percent. In the same period the insufficiency of housing for the nonwhite population was aggravated by migrations which increased the nonwhite population of urban areas by 40 percent.

The bad effects of the excessive overcrowding to which these members of the community are subjected are self-evident. Overcrowding forces them to pay more for inferior living accommodations. It accelerates deterioration of properties. It makes necessary the use of substandard housing. It creates resentment against the forces that are felt to be responsible for it, and promotes the spread of physical, mental, and moral ills. These effects are bad for the community as a whole.

The economic status of the nonwhite population has improved greatly in the last decade. It is estimated that their earnings doubled in the period between 1940 and 1946. About half of the nonwhite nonfarm families in 1946 had total money incomes of more than $1,800. The comparable median income for whites was $3,100. About 16 percent of the nonwhite families received incomes of $3,000 and over. It is apparent, then, that although the problem of providing homes for nonwhite groups is closely tied in with the general problem of producing homes at lower sale and rental levels, there is nevertheless a substantial market for higher-priced properties among minority groups.

While the median rent paid by nonwhite tenants in 1947 was only $17, compared to $31 for whites, about 185,000 nonwhite families paid $40 a month or more, and many families could afford higher rents than they now pay if they could find better accommodations.

Numerous rental housing projects for minority groups have been undertaken in various parts of the country with FHA-insured financing, in addition to many individual homes. The fact that in general they have proved highly successful is evidence of the strong demand that exists among members of these groups who are willing and able to pay sales prices or rents at an economic level, and who appreciate good housing enough to devote effort and expense to its upkeep.

FHA mortgage forms contain no reference to race. Under the FHA system all mortgages are subject to the same risk rating procedure, which covers the borrower, the property, the neighborhood, and the mortgage pattern. It is only to be expected, therefore, that FHA experience when the mortgagor is a member of a minority group should be no different from that with any other mortgagor.

Directors of FHA insuring offices have frequently expressed opinions, based on personal knowledge, which confirm the belief that when the same standards are applied race is not a factor in mortgage experience. It has been their further observation that the chief hazards in financing homes for minority groups occur

An FHA Community for Negroes

Princeton Park homes for Negro families rank high among the rental housing projects built for minority groups in Chicago and in the Nation under the war housing program of the FHA. While started as a war housing project and financed under the emergency provisions of the National Housing Act (Section 608), Princeton Park was designed as a permanent addition to Chicago's better residential communities.

when the borrower pays more for the property than it is worth, or when the price is too high in relation to his income. The urgency of the need often makes members of these groups willing to undertake disproportionately large obligations.

The difficulty that Negroes experience in obtaining satisfactory homes seems to enhance their appreciation of and pride in good homes. Negroes who feel that they are getting good value for their money tend to keep their properties in good condition and to pay the cost even at great sacrifice.

The provision of homes for minority groups has long been a matter of concern to the Federal Housing Administration. FHA State and district directors are constantly reminded of their responsibility to encourage such provision in every way they can. The two major problems are sites and financing.

One of the chief services insuring offices have been able to render has had to do with the locating and laying out of acceptable sites. Sometimes the available sites are undeveloped; sometimes they must be cleared of existing undesirable housing or otherwise reclaimed in order to be acceptable for the proposed use. The experienced land planners employed by the FHA can estimate the possibilities of suggested sites and frequently recommend improvements that will greatly enhance their value.

Day Village in Baltimore, a Negro community of 500 units, has been built on a 38-acre tract of reclaimed land on which a few dilapidated dwellings formerly stood. This site, surrounded on three sides by water and located near industrial centers employing many Negroes, proved to be ideal for the sponsors' purpose after utilities had been installed and existing structures removed, and the existence of the attractive new community has influenced the improving of nearby properties.

Another Negro community in the Baltimore area which the FHA has had a part in developing is Cherry Hill, a short distance outside the city. A few Negroes were already living in the vicinity, but the site chosen for the new subdivision was entirely undeveloped. FHA land planning consultants cooperated with the Baltimore City Plan Commission in planning the layout. The site was planned to accommodate eventually about 3,200 units, of which 674 units in one- and two-family structures have now been built and occupied and 388 are under construction. The selling prices of the existing dwellings range from $4,700 to $5,700, and the rents are between $46.25 and $48.25. Although the tract has been planned as an integrated community, ownership of the land is dispersed among several developers.

Last year the FHA augmented its efforts to promote minority-group housing by appointing five racial relations advisers who work in the field under the direction of the FHA Zone Commissioners in Washington and in close cooperation with State and district directors. Their specific duties are to help in making determinations of local markets for minority-group housing and the availability of suitable land; to stimulate the interest of builders and lenders in the production of such housing; to encourage self-help among minority groups through greater participation by their own financial institutions and builders; and to assist in developing methods for using most effectively the resources of local, State, and Federal agencies.

Sponsors of projects built under the FHA program have used various approaches to the problems involved in producing minority-group housing. Mayfair Mansions, a rental development of 594 apartments in Washington, D. C., one of the outstanding projects in the country for Negroes, is owned by a Negro corporation, was designed by a Negro architect, and was built almost entirely by Negro workmen. The 17 structures are of steel and brick and cover only 18 per cent of the developed land, the remainder being devoted to mall, courts, landscaping, and play areas for children. The tenants include businessmen, doctors, university professors, lawyers, and members of other professions. The project occupies 28 acres of a 60-acre tract on which the owners plan eventually to build additional units that will double the present accommodations. Provision for future expansion is a significant feature of a number of Negro developments.

Suburban Gardens, the oldest FHA Negro rental project, also located in Washington, was built in 1941. The development, with 204 living units and 32 garages, is exceptionally attractive in layout, architectural design, and landscaping. Parks and play areas occupy a large part of the total ground area. The successful operation of this project is evidenced by the fact that it was refinanced in 1945 without FHA insurance, and also by the fact that 70 per cent of its original tenants still live in the project. There has been only one eviction in seven years.

In Day Village near Baltimore, with 500 dwelling units and a shopping center, an unusually high standard of maintenance without high rents results from efficient servicing on the part of the management as well as from the high degree of cooperation given to the resident manager by the tenants, who assume much of the responsibility for keeping the properties in order.

Princeton Park, the largest Negro rental project with FHA insured financing, is in Chicago. Its 908 rental units meet a small fraction of the need in that city. Although initiated to provide housing for war workers, it was planned from the beginning with a view to the sustained value and continuing profitability that are fundamental considerations in long-term rental housing investment.

Parkway Gardens, a cooperative project of 694 apartments, now under construction in Chicago, indicates another approach to the problem.

Carver Village, a low-cost development in Savannah, opened last June, has already been the means of bringing scores of families out of the slums in which lack of better facilities had forced them to live. This development, which eventually will contain over 600 homes as well as two parks and a commercial center, is the outgrowth of a community effort to provide new homes through private enterprise in order to make possible the destruction of substandard housing. The Carver Village homes sell for $4,500.

Washington Shores, in Orlando, Florida, now in course of development, was undertaken by civic effort which resulted in the purchase, by a non-profit corporation of prominent citizens, of a 1,500-lot tract for development over a ten-year period. The first group of houses has been completed and occupied and others are going ahead. Availability of adjoining land makes the development capable of almost unlimited expansion.

In Oklahoma City a firm of Negro builders, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Edwards, has undertaken over a period of years the development of a community with a total capacity of 728 single-family homes. The stores, service establishments, schools, and hospital in the development are all maintained and staffed by Negroes. Family incomes of home purchasers range from $150 to $200 a month. No mortgage default has ever been reported.

W. H. Aiken, a Negro contractor in Atlanta, has built over 1,000 homes for Negroes in the last six years. He has 157 homes under construction and plans to undertake next year construction of apartment buildings that will provide 3,000 dwelling units at a cost of $25,000,000.

The need for rental housing is particularly acute among minority groups. The amount built in recent years does not begin to meet the total requirements. A good rental project for Negroes, in which the rents are scaled to prevailing income levels in the area, is usually 100 per cent occupied at all times and frequently has a long waiting list of applicants. This makes it possible to be selective in the choice of tenants. The establishment of one desirable Negro project in a neighborhood often serves to demonstrate the existence of a further market and leads to the building of additional housing in the same area.

The provision of adequate housing for minority groups through private enterprise is essentially a local problem. Local planning commissions and other civic groups, the Federal Housing Administration, and private developers can cooperate in estimating the extent of the local need, in determining the appropriate type of development, and in planning the overall layout. FHA land planning services, appraisals, inspections, and mortgage insurance facilities are available to mortgagees on acceptable projects of whatever size.

(Reprinted from the Fourth Quarter 1948 FHA Insured Mortgage Portfolio)

84614

35- State Banks & Administration

RECEIVED
MAR 21
Southern Regional Council

GEORGIA BUSINESS

THE BUREAU OF BUSINESS RESEARCH

College of Business Administration The University of Georgia

Vol. VIII, No. 6 Supplement | Athens, Georgia | March 1949

Comments on A General Sales Tax

Professor Brooks submits an open reply to letters about his article in February GEORGIA BUSINESS on "Where is the Money Coming From?"

Mr. William T. Hicks
Bureau of Business Research
University of Georgia

Dear Mr. Hicks:

In the February issue of GEORGIA BUSINESS you printed a brief article I had been asked to prepare about ways of financing the proposed expanded program of state services. I laid especial stress upon three possible sources of important additional tax receipts—modifications of the income tax law (especially discontinuing the deduction of the Federal income tax in calculating the state tax), increasing the motor license charges, and the adoption of a sales tax.

I have received a surprisingly large number of letters from businessmen, legislators, and others commenting upon one or all of these suggestions. It is not possible for me to answer all these letters. Instead, I have decided to write you this letter with the suggestion that you print and distribute it as a Supplement to your March issue.

Since most of the barrage of criticism has been directed to the sales tax, I shall confine this communication to that tax. One letter from an important source complained that I failed to give my readers such a discussion of the merits and disadvantages of the sales tax as might enable them to vote more intelligently upon the problem, come April 5th. In my article I deliberately refrained from discussing the pros and cons of the sales tax. For one thing, the space you allotted me was insufficient for such a discussion. And then, too, I thought that most people were already familiar with the arguments, since sales taxes have been discussed for years in books, magazines, and newspapers. The following comments should not be interpreted as placing me among either the advocates or opponents of sales taxes. My purpose is merely to discuss the merits of the case. It will be understood, I hope, that I am talking about a "general" retail sales tax, i.e. one applying to all retail transactions not specifically exempt. We already have in Georgia several very important "special" sales taxes, such as those on gasoline, liquor, and tobacco products. These three taxes produced about 50 per cent of the total state tax collections in Georgia in 1948. Of course, such commodities as these would be exempt from the proposed general sales tax, since they already bear a much heavier burden than that proposed under the new tax.

Arguments for the Sales Tax

Productivity

The most important argument for the sales tax is that it is extraordinarily productive. In the twenty-seven states having sales taxes, $1.5 billion were collected last year. This was three times the amount produced by the individual income tax. When to this $1.5 billion the yield of special sales taxes is added, the total amount is upward of $4 billion, or more than 50 per cent of all taxes collected by the states.

The yield, of course, depends in considerable measure upon the coverage of the tax. It would be quite possible for any legislature so to weaken the tax by exemptions urged by various pressure groups as to make it worthless for revenue purposes. In my February article I estimated that a 2 per cent tax, with the usual exemptions and with average administration, would yield about $30 million of added revenue.

Painlessness Of the Tax

At its inception in a state, the sales tax encounters much popular opposition, but as the people become accustomed to it the opposition vanishes. It is significant that only one or two states have repealed their "emergency" sales taxes (most of them were imposed in the financial crisis of the thirties). The popular attitude of eventual acceptance of the sales tax is well illustrated by the gasoline tax. When regular gasoline is selling at 28 cents, of which 7 1/2 cents is tax (as is the case in Georgia), the customer is paying the outrageous sales tax of 34 per cent. And yet, how often does one hear any opposition to the tax voiced? We have simply become accustomed to it.

Any tax that is paid in minute driblets is not felt as a burden. It would be an altogether different matter if the consumer were asked to fork up $25 or $30 at the end of the year, representing 2 per cent of his normal purchases.

Everybody Pays

It is regarded as a merit of the sales tax that everyone contributes something to the support of state services. Most citizens have no real property and are not caught by the income tax. They pay practically nothing in direct taxes and hence do not feel any deep interest in keeping down state expenditures. Furthermore, even tourists are compelled to contribute something to the cost of government.

Low Cost of Administration

It has been claimed that the administrative costs of collecting the sales tax are relatively low. There is not much in this contention. A study made by Professor James W. Martin [1] showed that on the average the beverage tax costs 3 per cent to collect; the chain store tax 5.3 per cent; the gasoline tax .5 per cent; the income tax 1.5 per cent; the tobacco tax 1.4 per cent, and the sales tax 2 per cent. The average of these costs is 2.3 per cent. From an administrative point of view the tax is good because evasion is difficult, except in interstate trade, and because there is no problem of delinquency, one of the evils of the property tax.

Balancing The Tax System

It is sometimes said that despite its regressivity the sales tax is a desirable feature of the tax system of a state in which the income tax and the property tax bear heavily upon people in the upper income brackets. It would be difficult to justify a sales tax in states which, like Ohio, Illinois, Texas and Florida, have no income tax (Ohio and Illinois have sales taxes.) In Georgia, of course, we have an income tax and the balancing argument here has some validity. Our property tax for state purposes is negligible, and, since 1937, has been emasculated by the homestead exemptions. We do not need further relief from property taxes for state purposes, although in the counties and cities this tax is the principal burden on the people and some relief would be welcomed. However, at the present time the state is subsidizing local governments to the tune of $41 million annually, and they would get a big share of the new revenue that would come into the state treasury should a sales tax be enacted.

Arguments Against the Sales Tax

Regressivity

The leading argument against all forms of commodity taxes is that they are regressive in effect. This means that the burden of the tax is relatively greater upon the poor than upon the well-to-do. There is no denying the validity of this contention. Regressivity, in fact, charac-

1 Costs of Tax Administration. National Tax Association. Vol. XXIX No. 4.

2 R. P. Brooks, State Supervision of Local Affairs in Georgia. Bulletin of the University of Georgia. Volume XLIX, No. 5, P. 16.

terizes all taxes on values or upon units of commodities and all poll taxes. If the poor man is required to pay 2 per cent of the value of a pound of butter, this 2 per cent means much more to him than it does to a rich man; if both the poor and the rich pay a tax of 7 1/2 cents a gallon upon gasoline, the poor suffer much more. Real property taxes are regressive in that a larger per cent of real value is assessed against small properties than against large properties. Effort to adjust the tax burden to ability to pay is made only in the income and inheritance taxes. There is no way to graduate sales taxes according to ability to pay. In the light of its clear regresivity the only justification of such a tax is that the masses of the people enjoy great benefits from government expenditures for education, improved roads and other services, and there is some justice in requiring them to bear some part of the burden. This argument of benefits should not be pressed too far. Indigent wards of the state, cared for in various sorts of institutions, get 100 per cent of their support free, but it would be idle to attempt to tax them. A further consideration is that after all the money burden of sales taxes is not excessively great. A table prepared by the Tax Policy League in 1935[3] showed that a 2 per cent general sales tax would take $12.18 per thousand from an income of $1,000 or less; $11.72 from incomes between $1,000 and $2,000; and $9.88 from incomes between $2,000 and $3,000. These brackets would include the great majority of Georgia families. At present prices the tax would amount to more, but incomes are also much greater than they were in 1935.

Lessens Purchasing Power

It has been pointed out many times that the total of purchasing power is reduced by the amount of the tax collected. This is necessarily true, since the consumers, if they are spending practically their all for taxed articles, would not be able to buy as much with the tax as without. Or, if they had some small surplus after living costs which they had been putting into, say, life insurance, this desirable investment might have to be abandoned.

3 Tax Policy League. The Home Owner and the Sales Tax. New York, 1935, P. 6

Interstate Difficulties

Border county merchants in sales tax states have experienced great difficulty in shifting the tax to consumers, as the law uniformly intends. The recent war we have had between Columbus and Phoenix City, Alabama, illustrates the point. The sales and warehouse and license tax in Georgia force dealers to ask more for liquor than is asked by the Alabama state stores. So Georgians naturally cross the river and buy liquor in Alabama to the hurt of Georgia dealers. The recent advance in the price of cigarettes following the law passed by the last General Assembly has induced citizens of Georgia to buy cigarettes in North Carolina which imposes no tobacco taxes.

To some extent this avoidance of the law has been cured by the adoption of "use" taxes. A commodity brought into a sales tax state from a non-sales tax state is required under the "use" laws to pay the same amount as is imposed by the sales tax. When use taxes were first adopted many felt that they were unconstitutional because they violated the Federal prohibition of state taxes on interstate commerce, but the U. S. Supreme Court in 1937 upheld the constitutionality of state use taxes. The use tax works in a satisfactory way in some cases, such as automobiles. A car bought in a non-sales tax state and brought into a sales tax state is not permitted to purchase a license tag until the use tax is paid. In most cases, however, borderline merchants in a sales tax state cannot compete with merchants across the border in a non-sales tax state, which is tantamount to saying that the sales tax state merchants have to absorb the tax.

Stimulation of Mail-Order Business

Merchants have generally complained that sales taxes stimulate mail-order business, since goods moving through this channel are tax free. To some extent this form of tax avoidance can be checked, especially if the mail-order house has an office in the sales tax state.

Nuisance to Retailers

Retail merchants uniformly oppose sales taxes, sometimes because they believe that total sales are lessened, but more commonly because of the trouble they are put to in collecting the tax for the state. If the tax takes the form of a gross receipts tax on the merchants, they have to bear the initial burden of the tax and must recoup by shifting the legal percentage to retail sales and collecting many thousands of small amounts. This is quite a chore, one that no merchant would welcome. It has been pointed out many times that there are plenty of cases where the tax cannot be shifted at all (notably in the case of border county merchants). On the other hand it is sometimes possible for a merchant to profit by the tax. This occurs in cases where the tax is "pyramided." A tax upon the manufacturer is added to his price to the wholesaler; he in turn adds this tax plus the tax he has to pay when he bills the retailer; the retailer then proceeds to apply his usual mark-up, so that ultimately consumers will pay considerably more in increased prices than the government receives. It is the merchants who receive the difference and so-to-speak make a profit on the tax. Another case in which the merchant might profit arises from the difficulty of collecting a 2 per cent tax on a cheap article, say one that retails for 10 cents. If he adds one cent to the price, the consumer pays a 10 per cent tax. Of course this could be cured by the use of either brackets or tokens.

I have perhaps taken too much space to elaborate upon the well-known characteristics of sales taxes. I shall conclude by referring to a study in which I have been greatly interested. It was prepared by a professor in the Mississippi State College.[4] After pointing out that the tax had saved the financial life of the state, enabling it to emerge from practically a bankrupt position to the happy state of having a sizable surplus after meeting all obligations, the writer says:

> "The load is too small to be noticed. There certainly has been no noticeable increase in the cost of living traceable to the tax; nor any appreciable loss of business to foreign mail order houses. . . .
>
> 'To say that the 85 per cent of the people in the state that pay no property tax, regardless of race or the amount of intangible property possessed, bear their share of the tax burden indirectly is certainly a large assumption. The state of Mississippi acted upon some such theory until it found itself on the verge of bankruptcy.
>
> 'The general sales tax is not only forcing every buyer to contribute something to the support of the government, but it may even be contended that in its operations it tends to equalize the general burden among individuals possessing different abilities to pay and between the rural and city dwellers as well as between the different sections of the state. . . .
>
> In one of the most rural counties in the state the average monthly per capita sales tax burden for 1932 was only .7 cents. On the other hand, in the most urban county in the state the monthly per capita tax burden was 25.5 cents, or more than 36 times as great as it was in the rural county. These two counties represent the two extremes, it is true, and there were a number of factors in this case that helped to cause this difference. Yet a very striking difference is shown by a comparison between any of the other counties containing cities with those having none.
>
> 'The small per capita payment of the rural dweller as compared with his city neighbor does not necessarily mean that the standards of living of the former are lower than those of the latter. It may mean that the farmer grows more food crops for home consumption to escape the heavy part of the sales tax burden. In this way his standard of living would be pushed up since he would not only have more things to eat but would be left with money formerly spent for food with which to purchase clothes, other necessities and luxuries. That such is highly possible may be seen from the state tax commission report, showing that one of the large items for which the people spend their money is food. Also the federal census report indicates that the farmers in the county in which the sales tax burden was only .7 cents per capita per month, as cited above, used farm products grown at home in 1929 valued at $446,063."

Very truly yours,
R. P. Brooks,
Professor of Economics

4 Alfred W. Garner. Note on the Mississippi Sales Tax. Southern Economic Journal. Volume 1, No. 2

17- Illiteracy-
This Week Magazine - April 3, 1949

WHAT'S HAPPENING

TO OUR LITERACY RATE

In 1870, all but 20% of the people in the United States could read and write

By 1900, all but 10.7% of the people could read and write

TODAY only 2.7% are illiterate

BY RAY BETHERS Sources — Bureau of the Census and Graphics Institute

TW—4-3-

Southern Regional Council, Inc.
63 AUBURN AVENUE, N. E. ATLANTA 3, GEORGIA

July 14, 1949

The Honorable Brent Spence
United States Congress
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Spence:

I would be most grateful for the kindness of your office in sending me a copy of report No. 975 (the report of the committee on the housing act). I understand this provides the text of the act as passed.

May I add my warmest praise for your own persistence and effectiveness in getting the act through.

Sincerely,

George S. Mitchell
Executive Director

GSM:wgd

16 - Housing

Brief Summary
of Housing Legislation
Enacted Into Law 1949-1950
(81st Congress)

1. Housing Act of 1949 (Public Law 171, approved July 15, 1949)

National Housing Objectives and Policy Established

The Housing Act of 1949 enacted proposals which had been under consideration by the Congress since 1945, and established for the first time national housing objectives and the policies to be followed in attaining them. The declaration of national housing policy states that the general welfare and security of the Nation require the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family. The Act provides that private housing enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can; that local public bodies shall be encouraged to undertake positive programs to assist the development of well-planned residential neighborhoods, the development and redevelopment of communities, and the production at lower costs of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; and that governmental assistance shall be given where the need is not being met through reliance solely upon private enterprise.

Slum Clearance and Community Development and Redevelopment Program Established

Title I of the Act authorizes the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to make loans and grants to localities to assist locally initiated, locally planned, and locally managed slum clearance and urban redevelopment undertakings. The Act authorizes $1,000,000,000 in loans and $500,000,000 in grants over a five-year period. As a condition to Federal aid there must be a feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the slum clearance area and the permanent provision of decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings at prices and rents within the financial means of such families. (First preference to such displaced families of low income is required in low-rent public housing projects provided under title III of the Act.)

810,000 Additional Units of Low-rent Public Housing Authorized

Title III of the Act amends the United States Housing Act of 1937 by authorizing Federal contributions and loans for local programs involving not to exceed 810,000 additional units of low-rent public housing over a six-year period. (Note: The President's letter of July 18, 1950, requested the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, as a measure to lessen inflationary tendencies and to conserve materials for national defense purposes, to limit the commencement of construction of public housing to not more than 30,000 dwelling units in the first six months of fiscal year 1951, pending a reexamination of the public housing program in terms of the international situation.)

The 1937 Act was amended to strengthen the statutory safeguards to assure occupancy of the projects by low-income families in need of adequate housing. Eligible families displaced by slum clearance projects aided under title I of the Housing Act of 1949 are given first preference for admission to low-rent housing, with preferences among such families to veterans and families of deceased veterans and servicemen. As among families who have not been displaced by slum clearance, preference shall be extended to veterans and servicemen, and among such, families of veterans with service-connected disabilities have first preference and families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose death was service-connected have second preference.

The Act fixes the limitation on the cost of construction and equipment of dwelling facilities at $1,750 per room. An increase in the cost limitation of not more than $750 per room is authorized in areas where it would not be feasible without such increase to construct sound housing. In no event may a project be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

Housing Research Program Enlarged

The housing research program authorized by the Housing Act of 1948 was enlarged. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized by title IV of the Housing Act of 1949 to undertake and conduct technical research and studies which will promote reduction in housing construction and maintenance costs and stimulate the increased production of housing. The Administrator shall also prepare estimates of national housing needs and encourage and assist localities to make studies of their own housing needs and markets and plans for housing and community development.

FHA Housing Credit Insurance Program Extended

Title II of the Act provided for temporary extensions (through August 31, 1949) of FHA's title I and section 608 insurance operations; also for a $500,000,000 increase in FHA's title II mortgage insurance authorization. The extensions under title I relate to small loans for home alteration and improvement and new construction and under section 608 to rental housing. The title II mortgage insurance applies to owner occupied, small- and large-scale rental and sales housing, and cooperative housing.

Farm Housing Research and Financial Assistance Authorized

Title V provided a new program in the Department of Agriculture of technical services, loans and grants, and an expanded farm housing research program for the improvement of farm housing and other farm buildings.

Decennial Housing Census Directed

The Act directed the Director of the Census to take a census of housing in 1950 and decennially thereafter.

2. Appropriation to Carry Out the Housing Act of 1949

The Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1950, Public Law 358, approved October 14, 1949, appropriated funds to carry out the authorizations contained in the Housing Act of 1949.

3. Interim Housing Amendments - 1949

Public Law 278, approved August 30, 1949, extended FHA title I authority to insure loans for home modernization and improvement until November 1, 1949, extended FHA section 608 rental housing mortgage insurance until November 1, 1949, and increased the title II FHA mortgage insurance authorization to $6,000,000,000.

Public Law 387, approved October 25, 1949, was enacted as interim legislation pending continued consideration by the second Session of the 81st Congress in 1950 of other phases of the housing problem which had not been covered by the Housing Act of 1949, notably the need for developing means of providing additional housing for middle- and lower-middle-income families, and revisions in the Federal Government's secondary market facilities for GI and FHA loans.

Public Law 387 extended FHA mortgage insurance authorizations as follows: Title I from November 1, 1949, to March 1, 1950, and from $200,000,000 to $225,000,000. Title II from $6 000,000,000 to $6,750,000,000. Section 608 from October 31, 1949, through March 1, 1950, and from $6,150,000,000 to $6,650,000,000.

In addition, Public Law 387 exempted certain GI home loans from restrictions on the number of such loans which might be sold to the Federal National Mortgage Association by lenders.

4. Housing Act of 1950 (Public Law 475, approved April 20, 1950)

(Note: Greater down payments are now being required on FHA loans as part of inflation control - see item 10.)

New FHA Low-Cost Home Program Authorized

The Housing Act of 1950 added a new section 8 to the National Housing Act providing a new FHA mortgage insurance program for low-cost homes in suburban and outlying areas. This program replaces the former class 3 FHA loans. The section 8 authorization is limited to $250,000,000.

FHA Insurance of Modernization and Repair Loans Continued

The FHA title I authorization to insure lenders against losses on home modernization and repair loans was extended to July 1, 1955. A new formula was provided which limits the total amount of such outstanding insured loans to $1,250,000,000. This amounts to an increase in authorization of approximately $5,000,000.

FHA Title II Home Mortgage Insurance Program Improved to Provide Larger and Lower Cost Homes

The FHA title II home mortgage insurance authorization was increased by $2,250,000,000 to a total authorization of not more than $9,000,000,000, and the program was revised to stimulate more lower-cost homes of a size adequate for family life.

The section 207 FHA rental housing mortgage insurance program was amended to continue the stimulation of rental housing construction formerly provided by the temporary section 608 rental housing program. Provisions were added to section 207 requiring certification by the mortgagor that there will be no discrimination in the selection of tenants by reason of the fact that there are children in the families.

FHA Cooperative Housing Mortgage Insurance Liberalized

New provisions were added to the National Housing Act liberalizing the FHA program of mortgage insurance for projects of housing cooperatives. The Act required the appointment of a new Assistant Commissioner of FHA to administer cooperative housing mortgage insurance, and to furnish technical advice and assistance to such housing.

Temporary Section 608 FHA Rental Housing Program

An increase of $500,000,000 in the mortgage insurance authority under section 608 of the National Housing Act was provided in order that applications for section 608 mortgage insurance on rental housing received in the FHA field offices on or before March 1, 1950, might be processed. (Section 608 authority was a temporary emergency program and no more applications can be processed under that section.)

FHA Mortgage Insurance for War Housing Sales Provided

Section 610 of the National Housing Act was amended to make mortgage insurance in connection with the sale of war housing by the Government or any public housing agency applicable also to the sale of war housing constructed under Public Law 671, 76th Congress.

FHA Insurance of Loans for Manufactured Houses and Large-Scale Site Construction Liberalized

The FHA mortgage insurance authorization was liberalized covering insurance of loans to finance the manufacture of houses and to finance large-scale modernized site construction of housing.

GI Home Loan Guaranty Increased--Direct Loans to Veterans Provided

The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 was amended by raising the maximum maturity of GI loans from 25 to 30 years; by raising the maximum home loan guaranty from $4,000 or 50% of the loan to $7,500 or 60% of the loan; to require all homes financed by GI home loans to meet construction requirements prescribed by the Veterans' Administration; to abolish combination VA-FHA loans effective December 31, 1950; and to provide for standby direct home loans to veterans unable to obtain loans under the terms of the Act from private sources. (Note: Down payments and maximum maturities have been changed under new anti-inflation controls - see item 10.)

Disposal of War and Veterans' Housing Facilitated

The Housing Act of 1950 provided for the disposition of all war and veterans' housing under the jurisdiction of the Housing and Home Finance Agency and for the transfer of the farm labor camps under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture to the Public Housing Administration for management and disposal. (Program being reexamined due to international situation.)

Loans for Student and Faculty Housing Authorized

The Housing and Home Finance Administrator was authorized to make loans to educational institutions of higher learning for the construction of housing for their students and faculties. To provide funds for the loans the Administrator was authorized to issue and have outstanding at any one time obligations for purchase by the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $300,000,000. (Program temporarily suspended due to international situation.)

Home Mortgage Secondary Market Operations Enlarged

An additional authorization of $250,000,000 was provided to the Federal National Mortgage Association for the purchase of home mortgages. The new section 8 FHA home mortgages were made eligible for purchase by the Federal National Mortgage Association. GI farm home mortgages were added to the home mortgages exempted from the 50% limitation on the amount of eligible mortgages in a lender's portfolio which may be sold to the Association.

5. Military Housing Assisted by FHA Mortgage Insurance

Public Law 211, approved August 8, 1949, added a new title VIII to the National Housing Act providing additional incentives through FHA mortgage insurance to rental housing for military and civilian personnel in areas adjacent to military installations. The Act also permitted the armed forces to lease portions of military reservations and to furnish utilities on a long-term basis for such housing.

Public Law 498, approved May 2, 1950, amended title VIII to permit the military services to employ architects to draft plans for military housing projects. Upon the basis of these plans and specifications prospective sponsors of projects bid competitively for the privilege of supplying the housing so that the necessity of each prospective sponsor preparing separate plans and specifications is eliminated, thus expediting and encouraging the provision of military housing by private enterprise.

6. Special Housing Program for Alaska Established - Alaska Housing Act

Public Law 52, the Alaska Housing Act, approved April 23, 1949, authorized more liberal FHA mortgage insurance in Alaska, housing loans and a more liberal secondary mortgage market through the Federal National Mortgage Association, construction of sales or rental housing by the Alaska Housing Authority, housing construction and certain repair loans by the Alaska Housing Authority, and $15,000,000 in loans to the Alaska Housing Authority (through the purchase of the Authority's obligations) by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

The Third Deficiency Appropriation Act, 1949, Public Law 343, approved October 10, 1949, appropriated $10,000,000 to the Housing and Home Finance Administrator for loans to the Alaska Housing Authority pursuant to Public Law 52. The Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1950, Public Law 430, approved October 28, 1949, authorized the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to purchase obligations issued by the Alaska Housing Authority to obtain funds for its general overhead expenses in the development of the housing program provided by Public Law 52.

Public Law 264, approved August 24, 1949, authorized the appropriation of $70,000,000 for public works in Alaska and provided that 50% of the aggregate cost of the projects may be borne by the United States and the remainder by the local areas in which the construction takes place. The Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1950, Public Law 430, approved October 28, 1949, appropriated $1,000,000 for public works and authorized contracts in an amount not exceeding $4,000,000 for public works in Alaska. Public Law 759, approved September 6, 1950, appropriated an additional $9,000,000 for Alaska public works.

7. Home Mortgage Secondary Market Operations Enlarged

Public Law 176, approved July 19, 1949, increased the Federal National Mortgage Association authorization to purchase FHA and GI home mortgages to $1,500,000,000. The Association's authorization was further increased to $2,500,000,000 by the Interim Housing Amendments of 1949, supra, and to $2,750,000,000 by the Housing Act of 1950 (supra). See the Interim Housing Amendments of 1949 and the Housing Act of 1950 for other provisions enlarging secondary market operations.

8. Administration of Housing and Community Facility Programs Further Coordinated

Three Reorganization Plans were put into effect which further coordinated the housing and community facilities functions and activities of the Federal Government into the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Reorganization Plan No. 17 (effective May 24, 1950) transferred two programs from the General Services Administration to the Housing and Home Finance Agency - (1) administration of advances to State and local governments for the planning of public works, and (2) management and disposal of sewers, schools, hospitals, and other community facilities constructed under title II of the Lanham Act, the World War II war housing Act.

Reorganization Plan No. 22 (effective September 7, 1950) transferred the Federal National Mortgage Association to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. The Association provides a secondary market for home mortgages insured or guaranteed by Federal Government agencies through the purchase, service, and sale of such mortgages. In addition, it is authorized to make direct loans for housing in Alaska.

Reorganization Plan No. 23 (effective September 7, 1950) transferred from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency the lending functions of the Government with respect to the production and distribution of prefabricated houses and components.

9. Loans and Advances Authorized for Local Planning of Public Works

Public Law 352, approved October 13, 1949, authorizes the making of advances during a two-year period to States and local governments to finance the cost of surveys, engineering investigations, and plans preliminary to the construction of local public works. Appropriations not to exceed a total of $100,000,000 are authorized to carry out the Act.

The Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1950, Public Law 430, 81st Congress, appropriated $8,000,000 and authorized contracts in an amount not to exceed $17,000,000 for loans and advances for public works planning pursuant to Public Law 352. The General Appropriation Act, 1951, Public Law 759, approved September 6, 1950, provided $20,000,000 and an additional $27,000,000 in contract authorizations.

10. Housing Inflation Controls -- Conservation of Construction Materials for Defense Purposes

The Defense Production Act of 1950, Public Law 774, approved September 8, 1950, authorized the control of real estate credit in order to conserve materials for defense use and to protect the national economy against inflation. The Act provides that regulations may be prescribed governing maximum loan or credit values, minimum down payments, and trade-in values, as well as the amount, form and time of various payments involving real estate credit. The President had previously (on July 18, 1950,) issued administrative instructions to Government agencies requesting certain curtailments of housing credit extended by them in order to assist in curbing inflation and to conserve materials for national defense purposes. Credit controls on Government-aided housing (old or new houses financed with the aid of FHA, VA, etc.) are to be administered by the Housing and HomeFinance Agency, and controls on new construction the financing of which is not aided by Government agencies are to be administered by the Federal Reserve Board in consultation with the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

The Act provides for priority and allocation powers which are designed to conserve materials for defense purposes. The hoarding of scarce materials (including building materials) may be prohibited. The first regulation issued under the Act by the new National Production Authority designated cement, gypsum board, sheathing, lath, and various iron and steel products as scarce materials. The Act will not only assure conservation of materials for defense purposes but, if it becomes necessary, will be used to allocate available materials for the most essential housing purposes, such as housing for military personnel and war workers, and lower cost housing.

11. Savings and Loan Industry Strengthened

Public Law 576, approved June 27, 1950, contained provisions designed to strengthen the savings and loan industry, thus further aiding in the financing of homes and the encouragement of savings.

The Act requires lending institutions which are members of Federal home loan banks (principally savings and loan associations) to maintain a certain minimum liquidity. In order to assure a source of funds to savings and loan associations to meet demands upon them for mortgage funds and to meet withdrawal requests by savers and account holders, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase the obligations of Federal Home Loan Banks up to $1,000,000,000. The proceeds of these obligations would be used for advances by the banks to savings and loan associations and other members of the Federal home loan banks.

The insurance protection afforded by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to the accounts of savers in savings and loan associations is increased from $5,000 to $10,000 for each account. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is also authorized by Public Law 576 to borrow from the Treasury such funds as in the judgment of the Home Loan Bank Board are required for insurance purposes.

The Act also accelerates retirement of the Government-owned capital stock in the Federal home loan banks and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

12. Sale of Suburban Resettlement Projects Assisted

Public Law 65, approved May 19, 1949, authorized the sale of the suburban resettlement projects known as Greenbelt, Maryland; Greendale, Wisconsin; and Greenhills, Ohio, by means of negotiated sale and without competitive bidding or public advertising, with a sales preference being given to nonprofit organizations of veterans and tenants.

13. Transfer of Temporary Veterans' Reuse Housing to Public Bodies Authorized -- Time for Receiving Applications Extended

The General Appropriation Act, 1951, Public Law 759, approved September 6, 1950, extended to December 31, 1950, the time during which applications may be accepted from State and local bodies, educational institutions or nonprofit organizations for the transfer to them of temporary Lanham Act housing under the terms of the McGregor Act, Public Law 796, 80th Congress. Public Law 266, approved August 24, 1949, authorized the transfer of title V temporary housing to public bodies within 120 days after August 24, 1949. Prior to Public Law 266 transfer was authorized only to nonprofit educational institutions.

14. Payments in Lieu of Taxes on Low-rent Public Housing Restricted -- Restriction Later Repealed

Public Law 266, the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1950, approved August 24, 1949, provided that none of the appropriations to the Public Housing Administration for annual contributions to the public housing agencies should be used for payments in lieu of taxes in excess of the amount specified in the original contract between a public housing agency and the Public Housing Administration. Public Law 358, approved October 14, 1949, the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1950, repealed this provision effective August 24, 1949.

15. Territories Enabled to Undertake Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment

The Territorial Enabling Act of 1950, Public Law 615, approved July 18, 1950, enabled the governments of Puerto Rico, Alaska, Hawaii, and the Virgin Islands to authorize public bodies or agencies to undertake slum clearance and urban redevelopment activities. The low-rent public housing enabling statutes of Puerto Rico, Alaska, and Hawaii were revised to assist that program in those territories.

Public Law 418, approved October 27, 1949, authorized the Government and municipalities of the Virgin Islands to issue general obligation bonds and other obligations to construct, maintain, and operate all types of public works, or to clear slums, accomplish urban redevelopment, or provide low-rent housing.

16. Veterans' Preference in Occupancy of New Housing Continued

Public Law 31, approved March 30, 1949, continued veterans' preference and priority of opportunity in the sale or rental of new housing completed after June 30, 1947, until June 30, 1950. Public Law 574, approved June 23, 1950, extended the preference until June 30, 1951.

17. Grants for Housing for Veteran Paraplegics Authorized to Additional Veterans

Public Law 286, 81st Congress, made additional groups of veterans deprived of the use of both legs eligible for grants by the Veterans Administration for special-type homes for paraplegics.

18. Rent Control Continued

Public Law 31, approved March 30, 1949, extended rent control through June 30, 1950. Public Law 574, approved June 23, 1950, continued rent control until December 31, 1950, except where local governments adopt resolutions requiring the continuance of rent control. In such instances rent control will cease June 30, 1951. The Act also provides that rent control shall be terminated in localities where the local governing body adopts a resolution after public hearing, that the shortage of housing is no longer such as to require rent control in that community.

19. Criminal Statute Amended to Protect Savings and Loan Associations

Public Law 634, approved August 3, 1950, amended the criminal provisions of the United States Code to include savings and loan associations within the definition of the word "bank" as used in the provisions of the Code with respect to bank robbery and incidental crimes.

16- Housing

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY

OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR WASHINGTON 25, D. C.

July 25, 1949

Dr. George S. Mitchell, Dir.
Southern Regional Council, Inc.
Rm. 432, 63 Auburn Avenue, N. E.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

RECEIVED
JUL 27 1949
Southern Regional Council

Dear Dr. Mitchell:

Knowing that you have need for materials and information on the new programs authorized by the recently enacted Housing Act of 1949, we are enclosing a kit of information about each of the four new programs. We have made a special effort to get this to you as early as possible for use in connection with Fall program materials. We know that your group, along with others, will want to play a responsible role as the programs begin to take shape and form.

Even though national housing policy and program continue to be important, the major emphasis now clearly moves to the local level. Over and over again the legislative history of the new Act emphasized local responsibility for initiating, planning, and administering the public housing and slum clearance programs. As the programs get into operation, there is hardly a single phase of the planning and the operation that will not be of concern to citizens' groups with an interest in housing and community development.

The beginning job is obviously to create as much understanding as possible of the provisions of the legislation, how the programs may operate in local communities, and what potentialities the programs have for making communities better places in which to live. As this task is firmly accomplished, citizen groups will be in an effective position to relate themselves to the immediate operations in their own communities.

We know your organization wants to do its part of this important task. Please keep us informed of your interests and activities, and call on this office whenever we can be of service.

Sincerely yours,

Flora Y. Hatcher

FLORA Y. HATCHER
Director, Group Services

16 - Housing

RECEIVED
JUL 25 1949
Southern Regional Council

[PUBLIC LAW 171—81ST CONGRESS]
[CHAPTER 338—1ST SESSION]

[S. 1070]

AN ACT

To establish a national housing objective and the policy to be followed in the attainment thereof, to provide Federal aid to assist slum-clearance projects and low-rent public housing projects initiated by local agencies, to provide for financial assistance by the Secretary of Agriculture for farm housing, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Housing Act of 1949".

DECLARATION OF NATIONAL HOUSING POLICY

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares that the general welfare and security of the Nation and the health and living standards of its people require housing production and related community development sufficient to remedy the serious housing shortage, the elimination of substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, and the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family, thus contributing to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation. The Congress further declares that such production is necessary to enable the housing industry to make its full contribution toward an economy of maximum employment, production, and purchasing power. The policy to be followed in attaining the national housing objective hereby established shall be: (1) private enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can; (2) governmental assistance shall be utilized where feasible to enable private enterprise to serve more of the total need; (3) appropriate local public bodies shall be encouraged and assisted to undertake positive programs of encouraging and assisting the development of well-planned, integrated residential neighborhoods, the development and redevelopment of communities, and the production, at lower costs, of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; (4) governmental assistance to eliminate substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, to facilitate community development and redevelopment, and to provide adequate housing for urban and rural nonfarm families with incomes so low that they are not being decently housed in new or existing housing shall be extended to those localities which estimate their own needs and demonstrate that these needs are not being met through reliance solely upon private enterprise, and without such aid; and (5) governmental assistance for decent, safe, and sanitary farm dwellings and related facilities shall be extended where the farm owner demonstrates that he lacks sufficient resources to provide such housing on his own account and is unable to secure necessary credit for such housing from other sources on terms and conditions which he could reasonably be expected to fulfill. The Housing and Home Finance Agency and its constituent agencies, and any other departments or agencies of the Federal Government having powers, functions, or duties with respect to housing, shall exercise their powers, functions, and duties under this or any other law, consistently with the national housing policy declared by this Act and in such manner as will facilitate sustained progress in attaining the national housing objective hereby established, and in such manner as will encourage and assist (1) the production of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; (2) the reduction of the costs of housing without sacrifice of such sound standards; (3) the use of new designs, materials, techniques, and methods in residential construction, the use of standardized dimensions and methods of assembly of home-building materials and equipment, and the increase of efficiency in residential construction and maintenance; (4) the development of well-planned, integrated, residential neighborhoods and the development and redevelopment of communities; and (5) the stabilization of the housing industry at a high annual volume of residential construction.

TITLE I—SLUM CLEARANCE AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT AND REDEVELOPMENT

LOCAL RESPONSIBILITIES

SEC. 101. In extending financial assistance under this title, the Administrator shall—

(a) give consideration to the extent to which appropriate local public bodies have undertaken positive programs (1) for encouraging housing cost reductions through the adoption, improvement, and modernization of building and other local codes and regulations so as to permit the use of appropriate new materials, techniques, and methods in land and residential planning, design, and construction, the increase of efficiency in residential construction, and the elimination of restrictive practices which unnecessarily increase housing costs, and (2) for preventing the spread or recurrence, in such community, of slums and blighted areas through the adoption, improvement, and modernization of local codes and regulations relating to land use and adequate standards of health, sanitation, and safety for dwelling accommodations; and

(b) encourage the operations of such local public agencies as are established on a State, or regional (within a State), or unified metropolitan basis or as are established on such other basis as permits such agencies to contribute effectively toward the solution of community development or redevelopment problems on a State, or regional (within a State), or unified metropolitan basis.

LOANS

SEC. 102. (a) To assist local communities in eliminating their slums and blighted areas and in providing maximum opportunity for the redevelopment of project areas by private enterprise, the Administrator may make temporary and definitive loans to local public agencies for the undertaking of projects for the assembly, clearance, preparation, and sale and lease of land for redevelopment. Such loans (outstanding at any one time) shall be in such amounts not exceeding the expenditures to be made by the local public agency as part of the gross project cost, bear interest at such rate (not less than the applicable going Federal rate), be secured in such manner, and be repaid within such period (not exceeding, in the case of definitive loans, forty years from the date of the bonds evidencing such loans), as may be deemed advisable by the Administrator.

(b) In connection with any project on land which is open or predominantly open, the Administrator may make temporary loans to municipalities or other public bodies for the provision of public buildings or facilities necessary to serve or support the new uses of land in the project area. Such temporary loans shall be in such amounts not exceeding the expenditures to be made for such purpose, bear interest as such rate (not less than the applicable going Federal rate), be secured in such manner, and be repaid within such period (not exceeding ten years from the date of the obligations evidencing such loans), as may be deemed advisable by the Administrator.

(c) Loans made pursuant to subsection (a) or (b) hereof may be made subject to the condition that, if at any time or times or for any period or periods during the life of the loan contract the local public agency can obtain loan funds from sources other than the Federal Government at interest rates lower than provided in the loan contract, it may do so with the consent of the Administrator at such times and for such periods without waiving or surrendering any rights to loan funds under the contract for the remainder of the life of such contract, and, in any such case, the Administrator is authorized to consent to a pledge by the local public agency of the loan contract, and any or all of its rights thereunder, as security for the repayment of the loan funds so obtained from other sources.

(d) The Administrator may make advances of funds to local public agencies for surveys and plans in preparation of projects which may be assisted under this title, and the contracts for such advances of funds may be made upon the condition that such advances of funds shall be repaid, with interest at not less than the applicable going Federal rate, out of any moneys which become available to such agency for the undertaking of the project or projects involved.

(e) To obtain funds for loans under this title, the Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, issue and have outstanding at any one time notes and obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $25,000,000, which limit on such outstanding amount shall be increased by $225,000,000 on July 1, 1950, and by further amounts of $250,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1951, 1952, and 1953, respectively: Provided, That (subject to the total authorization of not to exceed $1,000,000,000) such limit, and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased, at any time or times, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $250,000,000 upon a determination by the President, after receiving advice from the Council of Economic Advisers as to the general effect of such increase upon the conditions in the building industry and upon the national economy, that such action is in the public interest.

(f) Notes or other obligations issued by the Administrator under this title shall be in such forms and denominations, have such maturities, and be subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Administrator, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or other obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of such notes or other obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any notes and other obligations of the Administrator issued under this title and for such purpose is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of such notes and other obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the notes or other obligations acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such notes or other obligations shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

(g) Obligations, including interest thereon, issued by local public agencies for projects assisted pursuant to this title, and income derived by such agencies from such projects, shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States.

CAPITAL GRANTS

SEC. 103. (a) The Administrator may make capital grants to local public agencies to enable such agencies to make land in project areas available for redevelopment at its fair value for the uses specified in the redevelopment plans: Provided, That the Administrator shall not make any contract for capital grant with respect to a project which consists of open land. The aggregate of such capital grants with respect to all the projects of a local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have been made under this title shall not exceed two-thirds of the aggregate of the net project costs of such projects, and the capital grants with respect to any individual project shall not exceed the difference between the net project cost and the local grants-in-aid actually made with respect to the project.

(b) The Administrator, on and after July 1, 1949, may, with the approval of the President, contract to make capital grants, with respect to projects assisted under this title, aggregating not to exceed $100,000,000, which limit shall be increased by further amounts of $100,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, and 1953, respectively: Provided, That (subject to the total authorization of not to exceed $500,000,000) such limit, and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased, at any time or times, by additional amounts aggregating not more than $100,000,000 upon a determination by the President, after receiving advice from the Council of Economic Advisers as to the general effect of such increase upon the conditions in the building industry and upon the national economy, that such action is in the public interest. The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of all capital grants contracted for under this title, and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amounts necessary to provide for such payments.

REQUIREMENTS FOR LOCAL GRANTS-IN-AID

SEC. 104. Every contract for capital grant under this title shall require local grants-in-aid in connection with the project involved which, together with the local grants-in-aid to be provided in connection with all other projects of the local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have theretofore been made, will be at least equal to one-third of the aggregate net project costs involved (it being the purpose of this provision and section 103 to limit the aggregate of the capital grants made by the Administrator with respect to all the projects of a local public agency on which contracts for capital grants have been made under this title to an amount not exceeding two-thirds of the difference between the aggregate of the gross project costs of all such projects and the aggregate of the total sales prices and capital values referred to in section 110 (f) of land in such projects).

LOCAL DETERMINATIONS

SEC. 105. Contracts for financial aid shall be made only with a duly authorized local public agency and shall require that—

(a) The redevelopment plan for the project area be approved by the governing body of the locality in which the project is situated, and that such approval include findings by the governing body that (i) the financial aid to be provided in the contract is necessary to enable the land in the project area to be redeveloped in accordance with the redevelopment plan; (ii) the redevelopment plans for the redevelopment areas in the locality will afford maximum opportunity, consistent with the sound needs of the locality as a whole, for the redevelopment of such areas by private enterprise; and (iii) the redevelopment plan conforms to a general plan for the development of the locality as a whole;

(b) When land acquired or held by the local public agency in connection with the project is sold or leased, the purchasers or lessees shall be obligated (i) to devote such land to the uses specified in the redevelopment plan for the project area; (ii) to begin the building of their improvements on such land within a reasonable time; and (iii) to comply with such other conditions as the Administrator finds, prior to the execution of the contract for loan or capital grant pursuant to this title, are necessary to carry out the purposes of this title;

(c) There be a feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the project area, and that there are or are being provided, in the project area or in other areas not generally less desirable in regard to public utilities and public and commercial facilities and at rents or prices within the financial means of the families displaced from the project area, decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings equal in number to the number of and available to such displaced families and reasonably accessible to their places of employment: Provided, That in view of the existing acute housing shortage, each such contract entered into prior to July 1, 1951, shall further provide that there shall be no demolition of residential structures in connection with the project assisted under the contract prior to July 1, 1951, if the local governing body determines that the demolition thereof would reasonably be expected to create undue housing hardship in the locality.

(d) No land for any project to be assisted under this title shall be acquired by the local public agency except after public hearing following notice of the date, time, place, and purpose of such hearing.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 106. (a) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this title, the Administrator, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, shall—

(1) appoint a Director to administer the provisions of this title under the direction and supervision of the Administrator and the basic rate of compensation of such position shall be the same as the basic rate of compensation established for the heads of the constituent agencies of the Housing and Home Finance Agency;

(2) prepare annually and submit a budget program as provided for wholly owned Government corporations by the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended;

(3) maintain an integral set of accounts which shall be audited annually by the General Accounting Office in accordance with the principles and procedures applicable to commercial transactions as provided by the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended, and no other audit shall be required: Provided, That such financial transactions of the Administrator as the making of advances of funds, loans, or capital grants and vouchers approved by the Administrator in connection with such financial transactions shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government; and

(4) make an annual report to the President, for transmission to the Congress, to be submitted as soon as practicable following the close of the year for which such report is made.

(b) Funds made available to the Administrator pursuant to the provisions of this title shall be deposited in a checking account or accounts with the Treasurer of the United States. Receipts and assets obtained or held by the Administrator in connection with the performance of his functions under this title shall be available for any of the purposes of this title (except for capital grants pursuant to section 103 hereof), and all funds available for carrying out the functions of the Administrator under this title (including appropriations therefor, which are hereby authorized), shall be available, in such amounts as may from year to year be authorized by the Congress, for the administrative expenses of the Administrator in connection with the performance of such functions.

(c) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this title, the Administrator, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, may—

(1) sue and be sued;

(2) foreclose on any property or commence any action to protect or enforce any right conferred upon him by any law, contract, or other agreement, and bid for and purchase at any foreclosure or any other sale any project or part thereof in connection with which he has made a loan or capital grant pursuant to this title. In the event of any such acquisition, the Administrator may, notwithstanding any other provision of law relating to the acquisition, handling, or disposal of real property by the United States, complete, administer, dispose of, and otherwise deal with, such project or part thereof: Provided, That any such acquisition of real property shall not deprive any State or political subdivision thereof of its civil jurisdiction in and over such property or impair the civil rights under the State or local laws of the inhabitants on such property;

(3) enter into agreements to pay annual sums in lieu of taxes to any State or local taxing authority with respect to any real property so acquired or owned, and such sums shall approximate the taxes which would be paid upon such property to the State or local taxing authority, as the case may be, if such property were not exempt from taxation;

(4) sell or exchange at public or private sale, or lease, real or personal property, and sell or exchange any securities or obligations, upon such terms as he may fix;

(5) obtain insurance against loss in connection with property and other assets held;

(6) subject to the specific limitations in this title, consent to the modification, with respect to rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal or interest, security, amount of capital grant, or any other term, of any contract or agreement to which he is a party or which has been transferred to him pursuant to this title; and

(7) include in any contract or instrument made pursuant to this title such other covenants, conditions, or provisions (including such covenants, conditions, or provisions as, in the determination of the Administrator, are necessary or desirable to prevent the payment of excessive prices for the acquisition of land in connection with projects assisted under this title) as he may deem necessary to assure that the purposes of this title will be achieved. No provision of this title shall be construed or administered to permit speculation in land holding.

(d) Section 3709, as amended, of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to any contract for services or supplies on account of any property acquired pursuant to this title if the amount of such contract does not exceed $1,000.

(e) Not more than 10 per centum of the funds provided for in this title, either in the form of loans or grants, shall be expended in any one State.

PAYMENT FOR LAND USED FOR LOW-RENT PUBLIC HOUSING

SEC. 107. If the land for a low-rent housing project assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is made available from a project assisted under this title, payment equal to the fair value of the land for the uses specified in accordance with the redevelopment plan shall be made therefor by the public housing agency undertaking the housing project, and such amount shall be included as part of the development cost of the low-rent housing project.

SURPLUS FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY

SEC. 108. The President may at any time in his discretion, transfer, or cause to be transferred, to the Administrator any right, title, or interest held by the Federal Government or any department or agency thereof in any land (including buildings thereon) which is surplus to the needs of the Government and which a local public agency certifies will be within the area of a project being planned by it. When such land is sold to the local public agency by the Administrator, it shall be sold at a price equal to its fair market value, and the proceeds from such sale shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

PROTECTION OF LABOR STANDARDS

SEC. 109. In order to protect labor standards—

(a) Any contract for financial aid pursuant to this title shall contain a provision requiring that not less than the salaries prevailing in the locality, as determined or adopted (subsequent to a determination under applicable State or local law) by the Administrator, shall be paid to all architects, technical engineers, draftsmen, and technicians employed in the development of the project involved and shall also contain a provision that not less than the wages prevailing in the locality, as predetermined by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the Davis-Bacon Act (49 Stat. 1011), shall be paid to all laborers and mechanics employed in the development of the project involved; and the Administrator shall require certification as to compliance with the provisions of this paragraph prior to making any payment under such contract;

(b) The provisions of title 18 U. S. C., section 874, and of title 40 U. S. C., section 276c, shall apply to any project financed in whole or in part with funds made available pursuant to this title;

(c) Any contractor engaged on any project financed in whole or in part with funds made available pursuant to this title shall report monthly to the Secretary of Labor, and shall cause all subcontractors to report in like manner, within five days after the close of each month and on forms to be furnished by the United States Department of Labor, as to the number of persons on their respective pay rolls on the particular project, the aggregate amount of such pay rolls, the total man-hours worked, and itemized expenditures for materials. Any such contractor shall furnish to the Department of Labor the names and addresses of all subcontractors on the work at the earliest date practicable.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 110. The following terms shall have the meanings, respectively, ascribed to them below, and, unless the context clearly indicates otherwise, shall include the plural as well as the singular number:

(a) "Redevelopment area" means an area which is appropriate for development or redevelopment and within which a project area is located.

(b) "Redevelopment plan" means a plan, as it exists from time to time, for the development or redevelopment of a redevelopment or project area, which plan shall be sufficiently complete (1) to indicate its relationship to definite local objectives as to appropriate land uses and improved traffic, public transportation, public utilities, recreational and community facilities, and other public improvements; and (2) to indicate proposed land uses and building requirements in the project area: Provided, That the Administrator shall take such steps as he deems necessary to assure consistency between the redevelopment plan and any highways or other public improvements in the locality receiving financial assistance from the Federal Works Agency.

(c) "Project" may include (1) acquisition of (i) a slum area or a deteriorated or deteriorating area which is predominantly residential in character, or (ii) any other deteriorated or deteriorating area which is to be developed or redeveloped for predominantly residential uses, or (iii) land which is predominantly open and which because of obsolete platting, diversity of ownership, deterioration of structures or of site improvements, or otherwise substantially impairs or arrests the sound growth of the community and which is to be developed for predominantly residential uses, or (iv) open land necessary for sound community growth which is to be developed for predominantly residential uses (in which event the project thereon, as provided in the proviso of section 103 (a) hereof, shall not be eligible for any capital grant); (2) demolition and removal of buildings and improvements; (3) installation, construction, or reconstruction of streets, utilities, and other site improvements essential to the preparation of sites for uses in accordance with the redevelopment plan; and (4) making the land available for development or redevelopment by private enterprise or public agencies (including sale, initial leasing, or retention by the local public agency itself) at its fair value for uses in accordance with the redevelopment plan. For the purposes of this title, the term "project" shall not include the construction of any of the buildings contemplated by the redevelopment plan, and the term "redevelopment" and derivatives thereof shall mean develop as well as redevelop. For any of the purposes of section 109 hereof, the term "project" shall not include any donations or provisions made as local grants-in-aid and eligible as such pursuant to clauses (2) and (3) of section 110 (d) hereof.

(d) "Local grants-in-aid" shall mean assistance by a State, municipality, or other public body, or any other entity, in connection with any project on which a contract for capital grant has been made under this title, in the form of (1) cash grants; (2) donations, at cash value, of land (exclusive of land in streets, alleys, and other public rights-of-way which may be vacated in connection with the project), and demolition or removal work, or site improvements in the project area, at their cost; and (3) the provision, at their cost, of parks, playgrounds, and public buildings or facilities (other than low-rent public housing) which are primarily of direct benefit to the project and which are necessary to serve or support the new uses of land in the project area in accordance with the redevelopment plan: Provided, That, in any case where, in the determination of the Administrator, any park, playground, public building, or facility is of direct and substantial benefit both to the project and to other areas, the Administrator shall provide that, for the purpose of computing the amount of the local grants-in-aid for such project, there shall be included an allowance of an appropriate portion (as determined by the Administrator) of the cost of such park, playground, public building, or facility. No demolition or removal work, improvement, or facility for which a State, municipality, or other public body has received or has contracted to receive any grant or subsidy from the United States, or any agency or instrumentality thereof, for such work, or the construction of such improvement or facility, shall be eligible for inclusion as a local grant-in-aid in connection with a project or projects assisted under this title.

(e) "Gross project cost" shall comprise (1) the amount of the expenditures by the local public agency with respect to any and all undertakings necessary to carry out the project (including the payment of carrying charges, but not beyond the point where the project is completed), and (2) the amount of such local grants-in-aid as are furnished in forms other than cash.

(f) "Net project cost" shall mean the difference between the gross project cost and the aggregate of (1) the total sales prices of all land sold, and (2) the total capital values (i) imputed, on a basis approved by the Administrator, to all land leased, and (ii) used as a basis for determining the amounts to be transferred to the project from other funds of the local public agency to compensate for any land retained by it for use in accordance with the redevelopment plan.

(g) "Going Federal rate" means the annual rate of interest (or, if there shall be two or more such rates of interest, the highest thereof) specified in the most recently issued bonds of the Federal Government having a maturity of ten years or more, determined at the date the contract for advance of funds or for loan is made. Any contract for loan made may be revised or superseded by a later contract, so that the going Federal rate, on the basis of which the interest rate on the loan is fixed, shall mean the going Federal rate, as herein defined, on the date that such contract is revised or superseded by such later contract.

(h) "Local public agency" means any State, county, municipality, or other governmental entity or public body which is authorized to undertake the project for which assistance is sought. "State" includes the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories, dependencies, and possessions of the United States.

(i) "Administrator" means the Housing and Home Finance Administrator.

TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

SEC. 201. The National Housing Act, as amended, is hereby amended—

(1) by striking out of the first sentence of section 2 (a) "July 1, 1949" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 1, 1949";

(2) by striking out of the proviso in section 203 (a) "$4,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,300,000,000" and by striking out of such proviso "$5,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,500,000,000"; and

(3) by striking out of the second proviso in section 603 (a) "June 30, 1949" in each place where it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "August 31, 1949".

SEC. 202. This title shall take effect as of June 30, 1949.

TITLE III—LOW-RENT PUBLIC HOUSING

LOCAL RESPONSIBILITIES AND DETERMINATIONS; TENANCY ONLY BY LOW-INCOME FAMILIES

SEC. 301. The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by adding the following additional subsections to section 15:

"(7) In recognition that there should be local determination of the need for low-rent housing to meet needs not being adequately met by private enterprise—

"(a) The Authority shall not make any contract with a public housing agency for preliminary loans (all of which shall be repaid out of any moneys which become available to such agency for the development of the projects involved) for surveys and planning in respect to any low-rent housing projects initiated after March 1, 1949, (i) unless the governing body of the locality involved has by resolution approved the application of the public housing agency for such preliminary loan; and (ii) unless the public housing agency has demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Authority that there is a need for such low-rent housing which is not being met by private enterprise; and

"(b) the Authority shall not make any contract for loans (other than preliminary loans) or for annual contributions pursuant to this Act with respect to any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1, 1949, (i) unless the governing body of the locality involved has entered into an agreement with the public housing agency providing for the local cooperation required by the Authority pursuant to this Act; and (ii) unless the public housing agency has demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Authority that a gap of at least 20 per centum has been left between the upper rental limits for admission to the proposed low-rent housing and the lowest rents at which private enterprise unaided by public subsidy is providing (through new construction and available existing structures) a substantial supply of decent, safe, and sanitary housing toward meeting the need of an adequate volume thereof.

"(8) Every contract made pursuant to this Act for annual contributions for any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1, 1949, shall provide that—

"(a) the public housing agency shall fix maximum income limits for the admission and for the continued occupancy of families in such housing, that such maximum income limits and all revisions thereof shall be subject to the prior approval of the Authority, and that the Authority may require the public housing agency to review and to revise such maximum income limits if the Authority determines that changed conditions in the locality make such revisions necessary in achieving the purposes of this Act;

"(b) a duly authorized official of the public housing agency involved shall make periodic written statements to the Authority that an investigation has been made of each family admitted to the low-rent housing project involved during the period covered thereby, and that, on the basis of the report of said investigation, he has found that each such family at the time of its admission (i) had a net family income not exceeding the maximum income limits theretofore fixed by the public housing agency (and approved by the Authority) for admission of families of low income to such housing; and (ii) lived in an unsafe, insanitary, or overcrowded dwelling, or was to be displaced by another low-rent housing project or by a public slum-clearance or redevelopment project, or actually was without housing, or was about to be without housing as a result of a court order of eviction, due to causes other than the fault of the tenant: Provided, That the requirement in (ii) shall not be applicable in the case of the family of any veteran or serviceman (or of any deceased veteran or serviceman) where application for admission to such housing is made not later than five years after March 1, 1949;

"(c) in the selection of tenants (i) the public housing agency shall not discriminate against families, otherwise eligible for admission to such housing, because their incomes are derived in whole or in part from public assistance and (ii) in initially selecting families for admission to dwellings of given sizes and at specified rents the public housing agency shall (subject to the preferences prescribed in subsection 10 (g) of this Act) give preference to families having the most urgent housing needs, and thereafter, in selecting families for admission to such dwellings, shall give due consideration to the urgency of the families' housing needs; and

"(d) the public housing agency shall make periodic reexaminations of the net incomes of tenant families living in the low-rent housing project involved; and if it is found, upon such reexamination, that the net incomes of any such families have increased beyond the maximum income limits fixed by the public housing agency (and approved by the Authority) for continued occupancy in such housing, such families shall be required to move from the project."

VETERANS' PREFERENCES

SEC. 302. The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended as follows:

(a) By adding the following new subsection to section 10:

"(g) Every contract made pursuant to this Act for annual contributions for any low-rent housing project shall require that the public housing agency, as among low-income families which are eligible applicants for occupancy in dwellings of given sizes and at specified rents, shall extend the following preferences in the selection of tenants:

"First, to families which are to be displaced by any low-rent housing project or by any public slum-clearance or redevelopment project initiated after January 1, 1947, or which were so displaced within three years prior to making application to such public housing agency for admission to any low-rent housing; and as among such families first preference shall be given to families of disabled veterans whose disability has been determined by the Veterans' Administration to be service-connected, and second preference shall be given to families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose death has been determined by the Veterans' Administration to be service-connected, and third preference shall be given to families of other veterans and servicemen;

"Second, to families of other veterans and servicemen and as among such families first preference shall be given to families of disabled veterans whose disability has been determined by the Veterans' Administration to be service-connected, and second preference shall be given to families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose death has been determined by the Veterans' Administration to be service-connected."

(b) By adding the following new subsection to section 2:

"(14) The term 'veteran' shall mean a person who has served in the active military or naval service of the United States at any time on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to July 26, 1947, or at any time on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 11, 1918, and who shall have been discharged or released therefrom under conditions other than dishonorable. The term 'serviceman' shall mean a person in the active military or naval service of the United States who has served therein on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to July 26, 1947, or at any time on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 11, 1918."

COST LIMITS

SEC. 303. Subsection 15 (5) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(5) Every contract made pursuant to this Act for loans (other than preliminary loans), annual contributions, or capital grants for any low-rent housing project completed after January 1, 1948, shall provide that the cost for construction and equipment of such project (excluding land, demolition, and nondwelling facilities) shall not exceed $1,750 per room ($2,500 per room in the case of Alaska): Provided, That if the Administrator finds that in the geographical area of any project (i) it is not feasible under the aforesaid cost limitations to construct the project without sacrifice of sound standards of construction, design, and livability, and (ii) there is an acute need for such housing, he may prescribe in such contract cost limitations which may exceed by not more than $750 per room the limitations that would otherwise be applicable to such project hereunder. Every contract made pursuant to this Act for loans (other than preliminary loans), annual contributions, or capital grants with respect to any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1, 1949, shall provide that such project shall be undertaken in such a manner that it will not be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials, and economy will be promoted both in construction and administration. In order to attain the foregoing objective, every such contract shall provide that no award of the main construction contract for such project shall be made unless the Authority, taking into account the level of construction costs prevailing in the locality where such project is to be located, shall have specifically approved the amount of such main construction contract."

PRIVATE FINANCING

SEC. 304. In order to stimulate increasing private financing of low-rent housing projects, the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended as follows:

(a) The last proviso of subsection (b) of section 10 is repealed, and subsection (f) of said section is amended to read as follows:

"(f) Payments under annual contributions contracts shall be pledged, if the Authority so requires, as security for any loans obtained by a public housing agency to assist the development or acquisition of the housing project to which the annual contributions relate.";

(b) The following is added after section 21:

"PRIVATE FINANCING

"SEC. 22. To facilitate the enlistment of private capital through the sale by public housing agencies of their bonds and other obligations to others than the Authority, in financing low-rent housing projects, and to maintain the low-rent character of housing projects—

"(a) Every contract for annual contributions (including contracts which amend or supersede contracts previously made) may provide that—

"(1) upon the occurrence of a substantial default in respect to the covenants or conditions to which the public housing agency is subject (as such substantial default shall be defined in such contract), the public housing agency shall be obligated at the option of the Authority, either to convey title in any case where, in the determination of the Authority (which determination shall be final and conclusive), such conveyance of title is necessary to achieve the purposes of this Act, or to deliver possession to the Authority of the project, as then constituted, to which such contract relates;

"(2) the Authority shall be obligated to reconvey or to redeliver possession of the project, as constituted at the time of reconveyance or redelivery, to such public housing agency or to its successor (if such public housing agency or a successor exists) upon such terms as shall be prescribed in such contract and as soon as practicable: (i) after the Authority shall be satisfied that all defaults with respect to the project have been cured, and that the project will, in order to fulfill the purposes of this Act, thereafter be operated in accordance with the terms of such contract; or (ii) after the termination of the obligation to make annual contributions available unless there are any obligations or covenants of the public housing agency to the Authority which are then in default. Any prior conveyances and reconveyances, deliveries and redeliveries of possession shall not exhaust the right to require a conveyance or delivery of possession of the project to the Authority pursuant to subparagraph (1), upon the subsequent occurrence of a substantial default.

"(b) Whenever such contract for annual contributions shall include provisions which the Authority, in said contract, determines are in accordance with subsection (a) hereof, and the annual contributions, pursuant to such contract, have been pledged by the public housing agency as security for the payment of the principal and interest on any of its obligations, the Authority (notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act) shall continue to make annual contributions available for the project so long as any of such obligations remain outstanding, and may covenant in such contract (in lieu of the provision required by the first sentence of subsection 15 (3) of this Act and notwithstanding any other provisions of law) that in any event such annual contributions shall in each year be at least equal to an amount which, together with such income or other funds as are actually available from the project for the purpose at the time such annual contribution is made, will suffice for the payment of all installments, falling due within the next succeeding twelve months, of principal and interest on the obligations for which the annual contributions provided for in the contract shall have been pledged as security: Provided, That such annual contributions shall not be in excess of the maximum sum determined pursuant to the first proviso of subsection 10 (b), or, where applicable, the second proviso of subsection 10 (c); and in no case shall such annual contributions be in excess of the maximum sum specified in the contract involved, nor for longer than the remainder of the maximum period fixed by the contract.";

(c) In the fourth sentence of section 9 the words "going Federal rate at the time the loan is made," are deleted; in the first proviso of subsection 10 (b) the words "going Federal rate of interest at the time such contract is made" are deleted; and in lieu thereof in each case there are substituted the words "applicable going Federal rate"; and subsection 2 (10) is amended to read as follows:

"(10) The term 'going Federal rate' means the annual rate of interest (or, if there shall be two or more such rates of interest, the highest thereof) specified in the most recently issued bonds of the Federal Government having a maturity of ten years or more, determined, in the case of loans or annual contributions, respectively, at the date of Presidential approval of the contract pursuant to which such loans or contributions are made: Provided, That for the purposes of this Act, the going Federal rate shall be deemed to be not less than 2½ per centum.";

(d) Section 9 is amended by striking out the period at the end of said section and adding a colon and the following: "Provided, That in the case of projects initiated after March 1, 1949, with respect to which annual contributions are contracted for pursuant to this Act, loans shall not be made for a period exceeding forty years from the date of the bonds evidencing the loan: And provided further, That, in the case of such projects or any other projects with respect to which the contracts (including contracts which amend or supersede contracts previously made) provide for loans for a period not exceeding forty years from the date of the bonds evidencing the loan and for annual contributions for a period not exceeding forty years from the date the first annual contribution for the project is paid, such loans shall bear interest at a rate not less than the applicable going Federal rate.";

(e) Subsection 10 (c) is amended by striking out the period at the end of the last sentence and adding a colon and the following: "Provided, That, in the case of projects initiated after March 1, 1949, contracts for annual contributions shall not be made for a period exceeding forty years from the date the first annual contribution for the project is paid: And provided further, That, in the case of such projects or any other projects with respect to which the contracts for annual contributions (including contracts which amend or supersede contracts previously made) provide for annual contributions for a period not exceeding forty years from the date the first annual contribution for the project is paid, the fixed contribution may exceed the amount provided in the first proviso of subsection (b) of this section by 1 per centum of development or acquisition cost.";

(f) The first sentence of subsection 10 (c) is amended to read as follows: "Every contract for annual contributions shall provide that whenever in any year the receipts of a public housing agency in connection with a low-rent housing project exceed its expenditures (including debt service, administration, maintenance, establishment of reserves, and other costs and charges), an amount equal to such excess shall be applied, or set aside for application, to purposes which, in the determination of the Authority, will effect a reduction in the amount of subsequent annual contributions.";

(g) Section 14 is amended by inserting the following after the first sentence: "When the Authority finds that it would promote economy or be in the financial interest of the Federal Government, any contract heretofore or hereafter made for annual contributions, loans, or both, may, with Presidential approval, be amended or superseded by a contract of the Authority so that the going Federal rate on the basis of which such annual contributions or interest rate on the loans, or both, respectively, are fixed shall mean the going Federal rate, as herein defined, on the date of Presidential approval of such amending or superseding contract: Provided, That contracts may not be amended or superseded in a manner which would impair the rights of the holders of any outstanding obligations of the public housing agency involved for which annual contributions have been pledged.";

(h) Section 20 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. The Authority may issue and have outstanding at any one time notes and other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount not to exceed $1,500,000,000. Such notes or other obligations shall be in such forms and denominations, shall have such maturities, and shall be subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Authority with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or other obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of the notes or other obligations by the Authority. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any notes or other obligations of the Authority issued hereunder and for such purpose is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of such obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the notes or other obligations acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such notes or other obligations shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.";

(i) Subsection 2 (5) is amended to read as follows:

"(5) The term 'development' means any or all undertakings necessary for planning, land acquisition, demolition, construction, or equipment, in connection with a low-rent housing project. The term 'development cost' shall comprise the costs incurred by a public housing agency in such undertakings and their necessary financing (including the payment of carrying charges, but not beyond the point of physical completion), and in otherwise carrying out the development of such project. Construction activity in connection with a low-rent housing project may be confined to the reconstruction, remodeling, or repair of existing buildings."; and

(j) The following additional subsection is added to section 15:

"(9) Any contract for loans or annual contributions, or both, entered into by the Authority with a public housing agency, may cover one or more than one low-rent housing project owned by said public housing agency; in the event such contract covers two or more projects, such projects may, for any of the purposes of this Act and of such contract (including, but not limited to, the determination of the amount of the loan, annual contributions, or payments in lieu of taxes, specified in such contract), be treated collectively as one project."

ANNUAL CONTRIBUTIONS

SEC. 305. The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended as follows:

(a) By inserting the following after the first sentence of subsection (e) of section 10: "With respect to projects assisted pursuant to this Act, the Authority (in addition to the amount authorized by the first sentence of this subsection) is authorized, with the approval of the President, to enter into contracts, on and after July 1, 1949, for annual contributions aggregating not more than $85,000,000 per annum, which limit shall be increased by further amounts of $55,000,000 on July 1 in each of the years 1950, 1951, and 1952, respectively, and by $58,000,000 on July 1, 1953: Provided, That (subject to the total additional authorization of not more than $308,000,000 per annum) such limit, and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased at any time or times by additional amounts aggregating not more than $55,000,000 upon a determination by the President, after receiving advice from the Council of Economic Advisers as to the general effect of such increase upon conditions in the building industry and upon the national economy, that such action is in the public interest: And provided further, That 10 per centum of each amount of authorization to enter into contracts for annual contributions becoming available hereunder shall, for a period of three years after such amount of authorization becomes available, be available only for annual contributions contracts with respect to projects to be located in rural nonfarm areas. With respect to projects initiated after March 1, 1949, the Authority may authorize the commencement of construction of not to exceed one hundred and thirty-five thousand dwelling units after July 1, 1949, which limit shall be increased by further amounts of one hundred and thirty-five thousand dwelling units on July 1 in each of the years 1950 through and including 1954, respectively: Provided, That (subject to the authorization of not to exceed eight hundred and ten thousand dwelling units) such limit, and any such authorized increase therein, may be increased at any time or times by additional amounts aggregating not more than sixty-five thousand dwelling units, or may be decreased at any time or times by amounts aggregating not more than eighty-five thousand dwelling units, upon a determination by the President, after receiving advice from the Council of Economic Advisers as to the general effect of such increase or decrease upon conditions in the building industry and upon the national economy, that such action is in the public interest: And provided further, That contracts for annual contributions with respect to low-rent housing projects initiated after March 1, 1949, shall not provide for the commencement of construction of more than eight hundred and ten thousand dwelling units without further authorization from the Congress: And provided further, That in no event shall the Authority permit the commencement of construction of more than two hundred thousand dwelling units in any fiscal year."; and

(b) By deleting the third sentence of subsection 10 (a) and adding the following new subsection to section 10:

"(h) Every contract made pursuant to this Act for annual contributions for any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1, 1949, shall provide that no annual contributions by the Authority shall be made available for such project unless such project is exempt from all real and personal property taxes levied or imposed by the State, city, county, or other political subdivisions, but such contract may authorize the public housing agency to make payments in lieu of such taxes in an annual amount not in excess of 10 per centum of the annual shelter rents charged in such project: Provided, That, with respect to any such project to be located in any State where, by reason of constitutional limitations or otherwise, such project is not exempt from all real and personal property taxes levied or imposed by the State, city, county, or other political subdivision, such contract may provide, in lieu of the requirement for tax exemption and the authorization of payments in lieu of taxes, that no annual contributions by the Authority shall be made available for such project unless and until the State, city, county, or other political subdivision in which such project is situated shall contribute, in the form of cash, at least 20 per centum of the annual contributions paid by the Authority. In respect to low-rent housing projects initiated prior to March 1, 1949, the Authority may, after the effective date of the Housing Act of 1949, authorize payments in lieu of taxes for each of the project fiscal years in respect to which annual contribution dates occurred during the two-year period ending June 30, 1949, in amounts which, together with amounts already paid, will not exceed the greater of either (i) 5 per centum of the shelter rents charged in such projects for each of such project fiscal years, or (ii) the amounts specified in the cooperation agreements in effect July 1, 1947, between the public housing agencies and the political subdivisions in which the projects are located, or in the ordinances or resolutions of such political subdivisions in effect on such date. In respect to such low-rent housing projects initiated prior to March 1, 1949, the contracts for annual contributions may be amended as to project fiscal years in respect to which annual contribution dates occur on or after July 1, 1949, so as to require exemption from real and personal property taxes in lieu of any other requirements as to local contributions and to permit payments in lieu of taxes on the terms prescribed in the first sentence of this subsection; in the event that the contracts for annual contributions are not so amended, payments in lieu of taxes in respect to such project fiscal years shall be limited to the amount specified in the cooperation agreements or ordinances or resolutions in effect July 1, 1947."

SPECIAL PROVISIONS FOR LARGE FAMILIES OF LOW INCOME

SEC. 306. In order to enable low-rent housing to better serve the needs of large families of low income, the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended by deleting the second sentence of subsection 2 (1) and substituting therefor the following: "The dwellings in low-rent housing as defined in this Act shall be available solely for families whose net annual income at the time of admission, less an exemption of $100 for each minor member of the family other than the head of the family and his spouse, does not exceed five times the annual rental (including the value or cost to them of water, electricity, gas, other heating and cooking fuels, and other utilities) of the dwellings to be furnished such families. For the sole purpose of determining eligibility for continued occupancy, a public housing agency may allow, from the net income of any family, an exemption for each minor member of the family (other than the head of the family and his spouse) of either (a) $100, or (b) all or any part of the annual income of such minor. For the purposes of this subsection, a minor shall mean a person less than 21 years of age."

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 307. The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended as follows:

(a) By deleting from section 1 the words "rural or urban communities" and by substituting therefor the words "urban and rural nonfarm areas";

(b) (1) By adding at the end of subsection 2 (11) the following new sentence: "The Authority shall enter into contracts for financial assistance with a State or State agency where such State or State agency makes application for such assistance for an eligible project which, under the applicable laws of the State, is to be developed and administered by such State or State agency."; and

(2) By adding the following new subsection to section 2:

"(15) The term 'initiated' when used in reference to the date on which a project was initiated refers to the date of the first contract for financial assistance in respect to such project entered into by the Authority and the public housing agency.";

(c) By adding to section 6 the following new subsection:

"(e) With respect to all projects under title II of Public Law 671, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved June 28, 1940, references therein to the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, shall include all amendments to said Act made by the Housing Act of 1949 or by any other law thereafter enacted.";

(d) By deleting the proviso in subsection 10 (a) and the proviso in subsection 11 (a), and in each case changing the colon preceding the word "Provided" to a period; and by adding at the end of said subsection 10 (a) the following new sentence: "The Authority shall not make any contract for loans (other than preliminary loans) or for annual contributions or for capital grants pursuant to this Act with respect to any low-rent housing project initiated after March 1,1949, unless the governing body of the locality involved has entered into an agreement with the public housing agency providing that, subsequent to the initiation of the low-rent housing project and within five years after the completion thereof, there has been or will be elimination, by demolition, condemnation, effective closing, or compulsory repair or improvement, of unsafe or insanitary dwelling units situated in the locality or metropolitan area substantially equal in number to the number of newly constructed dwelling units provided by such project: Provided, however, That where more than one family is living in an unsafe or insanitary dwelling unit the elimination of such unit shall count as the elimination of units equal to the number of families accommodated therein: Provided further, That such elimination may, in the discretion of the Authority be deferred in any locality or metropolitan area where there is an acute shortage of decent, safe, or sanitary housing available to families of low income: And provided further, That this requirement shall not apply in the case of any low-rent housing project located in a rural nonfarm area, or to any low-rent housing project developed on the site of a slum cleared subsequent to the date of enactment of the Housing Act of 1949 and that the dwelling units which had been eliminated by the clearance of the site of such project shall not be counted as elimination for any other low-rent project."

(e) By amending the second sentence of subsection 13 (a) to read as follows: "The Authority may bid for and purchase at any foreclosure by any party or at any other sale, or (pursuant to section 22 or otherwise) acquire or take possession of any project which it previously owned or in connection with which it has made a loan, annual contribution, or capital grant; and in such event the Authority may complete, administer, pay the principal of and interest on any obligations issued in connection with such project, dispose of, and otherwise deal with, such projects or parts thereof, subject, however, to the limitations elsewhere in this Act governing their administration and disposition.";

(f) By amending subsection 16 (2) to read as follows:

"(2) Any contract for loans, annual contributions, capital grants, sale, or lease pursuant to this Act shall contain a provision requiring that not less than the salaries or wages prevailing in the locality, as determined or adopted (subsequent to a determination under applicable State or local law) by the Authority, shall be paid to all architects, technical engineers, draftsmen, and technicians, employed in the development and to all maintenance laborers and mechanics employed in the administration of the low-rent housing or slum-clearance project involved; and shall also contain a provision that not less than the wages prevailing in the locality, as predetermined by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the Davis-Bacon Act (49 Stat. 1011), shall be paid to all laborers and mechanics employed in the development of the project involved; and the Authority shall require certification as to compliance with the provisions of this paragraph prior to making any payment under such contract.";

(g) By amending subsection 21 (d) to read as follows:

"(d) Not more than 10 per centum of the total annual amount of $336,000,000 provided in this Act for annual contributions, nor more than 10 per centum of the amounts provided for in this Act for grants, shall be expended within any one State."; and

(h) By renumbering sections 22 to 30, inclusive, so that they become sections 23 to 31, inclusive.

TITLE IV—HOUSING RESEARCH

SEC. 401. Title III of Public Law 901, Eightieth Congress, approved August 10, 1948, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 301. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall—

"(a) Undertake and conduct a program with respect to technical research and studies concerned with the development, demonstration, and promotion of the acceptance and application of new and improved techniques, materials, and methods which will permit progressive reductions in housing construction and maintenance costs, and stimulate the increased and sustained production of housing, and concerned with housing economics and other housing market data. Such program may be concerned with improved and standardized building codes and regulations and methods for the more uniform administration thereof, standardized dimensions and methods for the assembly of home-building materials and equipment, improved residential design and construction, new and improved types of housing components, building materials and equipment, and methods of production, distribution, assembly, and construction, and sound techniques for the testing thereof and for the determination of adequate performance standards, and may relate to appraisal, credit, and other housing market data, housing needs, demand and supply, finance and investment, land costs, use and improvement, site planning and utilities, zoning and other laws, codes, and regulations as they apply to housing, other factors affecting the cost of housing, and related technical and economic research. Contracts may be made by the Administrator for technical research and studies authorized by this subsection for work to continue not more than four years from the date of any such contract. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of the Act of June 20, 1874, as amended (31 U. S. C. 713), any unexpended balances of appropriations properly obligated by contracting with an organization as provided in this subsection may remain upon the books of the Treasury for not more than five fiscal years before being carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury. All contracts made by the Administrator for technical research and studies authorized by this or any other Act shall contain requirements making the results of such research or studies available to the public through dedication, assignment to the Government, or such other means as the Administrator shall determine. The Administrator shall disseminate, and without regard to the provisions of 39 United States Code 321n, the results of such research and studies in such form as may be most useful to industry and to the general public. Notwithstanding any other provisions of law except provisions enacted expressly in limitation hereof, the Administrator is authorized to consolidate, with the functions and activities performed under this subsection, any functions or activities now being performed or which, otherwise, would be performed by any constituent agency of the Housing and Home Finance Agency with respect to housing market data, and with respect to any other function or activity which the Administrator is authorized to perform by this subsection, if he determines that such consolidation is practicable and will promote more effective administration. The Administrator shall utilize the authority under this subsection with respect to housing market data to secure such information and data as may be required in connection with the functions of the constituent agencies within the Housing and Home Finance Agency and his supervision and coordination of the functions of said agencies, and in connection with determinations and approvals under section 15 (7) (b) (ii) and section 15 (8) (a) of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended: Provided, That this sentence shall not be construed as a limitation upon the authority conferred upon the Administrator by this subsection.

"(b) Prepare and submit to the President and to the Congress estimates of national urban and rural nonfarm housing needs and reports with respect to the progress being made toward meeting such needs, and correlate and recommend proposals for such executive action or legislation as may be necessary or desirable for the furtherance of the national housing objective and policy established by this Act, with respect to urban and rural nonfarm housing, together with such other reports or information as may be required of the Administrator by the President or the Congress.

"(c) Encourage localities to make studies of their own housing needs and markets, along with surveys and plans for housing, urban land use and related community development, and provide, where requested and needed by the localities, technical advice and guidance in the making of such studies, surveys, and plans. To facilitate the cooperation of Federal agencies in carrying out such studies or surveys, such Federal agencies are hereby authorized to accept funds and reimburse their appropriation for the cost of such studies or surveys.

"SEC. 302. In carrying out research and studies under this title, the Administrator shall utilize, to the fullest extent feasible, the available facilities of other departments, independent establishments, and agencies of the Federal Government, and shall consult with, and make recommendations to, such departments, independent establishments, and agencies with respect to such action as may be necessary and desirable to overcome existing gaps and deficiencies in available housing data or in the facilities available for the collection of such data. The Administrator is further authorized, for the purposes of this title, to undertake research and studies cooperatively with industry and labor, and with agencies of State or local governments, and educational institutions and other nonprofit organizations. For the purpose of entering into contracts with any State or local public agency or instrumentality, or educational institution or other nonprofit agency or organization, in carrying out any research or studies authorized by this title, the Administrator may exercise any of the powers vested in him by section 502 (c) of the Housing Act of 1948.

"SEC. 303. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

"SEC. 304. The Administrator shall appoint a Director to administer the provisions of this title under the direction and supervision of the Administrator, and the basic rate of compensation of such position shall be the same as the basic rate of compensation established for the heads of the constituent agencies of the Housing and Home Finance Agency."

TITLE V—FARM HOUSING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BY THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

SEC. 501. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") is authorized, subject to the terms and conditions of this title, to extend financial assistance, through the Farmers Home Administration, to owners of farms in the United States and in the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii and in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, to enable them to construct, improve, alter, repair, or replace dwellings and other farm buildings on their farms, to provide them, their tenants, lessees, sharecroppers, and laborers with decent, safe, and sanitary living conditions and adequate farm buildings as specified in this title.

(b) For the purpose of this title, the term "farm" shall mean a parcel or parcels of land operated as a single unit which is used for the production of one or more agricultural commodities and which customarily produces or is capable of producing such commodities for sale and for home use of a gross annual value of not less than the equivalent of a gross annual value of $400 in 1944, as determined by the Secretary. The Secretary shall promptly determine whether any parcel or parcels of land constitute a farm for the purposes of this title whenever requested to do so by any interested Federal, State, or local public agency, and his determination shall be conclusive.

(c) In order to be eligible for the assistance authorized by paragraph (a), the applicant must show (1) that he is the owner of a farm which is without a decent, safe, and sanitary dwelling for himself and his family and necessary resident farm labor, or for the family of the operating tenant, lessee, or sharecropper, or without other farm buildings adequate for the type of farming in which he engages or desires to engage; (2) that he is without sufficient resources to provide the necessary housing and buildings on his own account; and (3) that he is unable to secure the credit necessary for such housing and buildings from other sources upon terms and conditions which he could reasonably be expected to fulfill.

LOANS FOR HOUSING AND BUILDINGS ON ADEQUATE FARMS

SEC. 502. (a) If the Secretary determines that an applicant is eligible for assistance as provided in section 501 and that the applicant has the ability to repay in full the sum to be loaned, with interest, giving due consideration to the income and earning capacity of the applicant and his family from the farm and other sources, and the maintenance of a reasonable standard of living for the owner and the occupants of said farm, a loan may be made by the Secretary to said applicant for a period of not to exceed thirty-three years from the making of the loan with interest at a rate not to exceed 4 per centum per annum on the unpaid balance of principal.

(b) The instruments under which the loan is made and the security given shall—

(1) provide for security upon the applicant's equity in the farm and such additional security or collateral, if any, as may be found necessary by the Secretary reasonably to assure repayment of the indebtedness;

(2) provide for the repayment of principal and interest in accordance with schedules and repayment plans prescribed by the Secretary;

(3) contain the agreement of the borrower that he will, at the request of the Secretary, proceed with diligence to refinance the balance of the indebtedness through cooperative or other responsible private credit sources whenever the Secretary determines, in the light of the borrower's circumstances, including his earning capacity and the income from the farm, that he is able to do so upon reasonable terms and conditions;

(4) be in such form and contain such covenants as the Secretary shall prescribe to secure the payment of the loan with interest, protect the security, and assure that the farm will be maintained in repair and that waste and exhaustion of the farm will be prevented.

LOANS FOR HOUSING AND BUILDINGS ON POTENTIALLY ADEQUATE FARMS

SEC. 503. If the Secretary determines (a) that, because of the inadequacy of the income of an eligible applicant from the farm to be improved and from other sources, said applicant may not reasonably be expected to make annual repayments of principal and interest in an amount sufficient to repay the loan in full within the period of time prescribed by the Secretary as authorized in this title; (b) that the income of the applicant may be sufficiently increased within a period of not to exceed five years by improvement or enlargement of the farm or an adjustment of the farm practices or methods; and (c) that the applicant has adopted and may reasonably be expected to put into effect a plan of farm improvement, enlargement, or adjusted practices or production which, in the opinion of the Secretary, will increase the applicant's income from said farm within a period of not to exceed five years to the extent that the applicant may be expected thereafter to make annual repayments of principal and interest sufficient to repay the balance of the indebtedness less payments in cash and credits for the contributions to be made by the Secretary as hereinafter provided, the Secretary may make a loan in an amount necessary to provide adequate farm dwellings and buildings on said farm under the terms and conditions prescribed in section 502. In addition, the Secretary may agree with the borrower to make annual contributions during the said five-year period in the form of credits on the borrower's indebtedness in an amount not to exceed the annual installment of interest and 50 per centum of the principal payments accruing during any installment year up to and including the fifth installment year, subject to the conditions that the borrower's income is, in fact, insufficient to enable the borrower to make payments in accordance with the plan or schedule prescribed by the Secretary and that the borrower pursues his plan of farm reorganization and improvements or enlargement with due diligence.

This agreement with respect to credits or principal and interest upon the borrower's indebtedness shall not be assignable nor accrue to the benefit of any third party without the written consent of the Secretary and the Secretary shall have the right, at his option, to cancel the agreement upon the sale of the farm or the execution or creation of any lien thereon subsequent to the lien given to the Secretary, or to refuse to release the lien given to the Secretary except upon payment in cash of the entire original principal plus accrued interest thereon less actual cash payments of principal and interest when the Secretary determines that the release of the lien would permit the benefits of this section to accrue to a person not eligible to receive such benefits.

OTHER SPECIAL LOANS AND GRANTS FOR MINOR IMPROVEMENTS TO FARM HOUSING AND BUILDINGS

SEC. 504. (a) In the event the Secretary determines that an eligible applicant cannot qualify for a loan under the provisions of sections 502 and 503 and that repairs or improvements should be made to a farm dwelling occupied by him, in order to make such dwelling safe and sanitary and remove hazards to the health of the occupant, his family, or the community, and that repairs should be made to farm buildings in order to remove hazards and make such buildings safe, the Secretary may make a grant or a combined loan and grant, to the applicant to cover the cost of improvements or additions, such as repairing roofs, providing toilet facilities, providing a convenient and sanitary water supply, supplying screens, repairing or providing structural supports, or making other similar repairs or improvements. No assistance shall be extended to any one individual under this subsection (1) in the form of a loan, or combined loan and grant, in excess of $1,000, or (2) in the from of a grant (whether or not combined with a loan) in excess of $500. Any portion of the sums advanced to the borrower treated as a loan shall be secured and be repayable in accordance with the principles and conditions set forth in this title. Sums made available by grant may be made subject to the conditions set out in this title for the protection of the Government with respect to contributions made on loans by the Secretary.

(b) In order to encourage adequate family-size farms the Secretary may make loans under this section and section 503 to any applicant whose farm needs enlargement or development in order to provide income sufficient to support decent, safe, and sanitary housing and other farm buildings, and may use the funds made available under clause (b) of section 513 for such purposes.

MORATORIUM ON PAYMENTS UNDER LOANS

SEC. 505. During any time that any such loan is outstanding, the Secretary is authorized under regulations to be prescribed by him to grant a moratorium upon the payment of interest and principal on such loan for so long a period as he deems necessary, upon a showing by the borrower that due to circumstances beyond his control, he is unable to continue making payments of such principal and interest when due without unduly impairing his standard of living. In cases of extreme hardship under the foregoing circumstances, the Secretary is further authorized to cancel interest due and payable on such loans during the moratorium. Should any foreclosure of such a mortgage securing such a loan upon which a moratorium has been granted occur, no deficiency judgment shall be taken against the mortgagor if he shall have faithfully tried to meet his obligation.

TECHNICAL SERVICES AND RESEARCH

SEC. 506. (a) In connection with financial assistance authorized in sections 501 to 504, inclusive, the Secretary shall require that all new buildings and repairs financed under this title shall be substantially constructed and in accordance with such building plans and specifications as may be required by the Secretary. Buildings and repairs constructed with funds advanced pursuant to this title shall be supervised and inspected, as may be required by the Secretary, by competent employees of the Secretary. In addition to the financial assistance authorized in sections 501 to 504, inclusive, the Secretary is authorized to furnish, through such agencies as he may determine, to any person, including a person eligible for financial assistance under this title, without charge or at such charges as the Secretary may determine, technical services such as building plans, specifications, construction supervision and inspection, and advice and information regarding farm dwellings and other buildings. The Secretary is further authorized to conduct research and technical studies including the development, demonstration, and promotion of construction of adequate farm dwellings and other buildings for the purposes of stimulating construction, improving the architectural design and utility of such dwellings and buildings, utilizing new and native materials, economies in materials and construction methods, new methods of production, distribution, assembly, and construction, with a view to reducing the cost of farm dwellings and buildings and adapting and developing fixtures and appurtenances for more efficient and economical farm use.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and submit to the President and to the Congress estimates of national farm housing needs and reports with respect to the progress being made toward meeting such needs, and correlate and recommend proposals for such executive action or legislation necessary or desirable for the furtherance of the national housing objective and policy established by this Act with respect to farm housing, together with such other reports or information as may be required of the Secretary by the President or the Congress.

PREFERENCES FOR VETERANS AND FAMILIES OF DECEASED SERVICEMEN

SEC. 507. As between eligible applicants seeking assistance under this title, the Secretary shall give preference to veterans and the families of deceased servicemen. As used herein, a "veteran" shall be a person who served in the land or naval forces of the United States during any war between the United States and any other nation and who shall have been discharged or released therefrom on conditions other than dishonorable. "Deceased servicemen" shall mean men or women who served in the land or naval forces of the United States during any war between the United States and any other nation and who died in service before the termination of such war.

LOCAL COMMITTEES TO ASSIST SECRETARY

SEC. 508. (a) For the purposes of this subsection and subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary may use the services of any existing committee of farmers operating (pursuant to laws or regulations carried out by the Department of Agriculture) in any county or parish in which activities are carried on under this title. In any county or parish in which activities are carried on under this title and in which no existing satisfactory committee is available, the Secretary is authorized to appoint a committee composed of three persons residing in the county or parish. Each member of such existing or newly appointed committee shall be allowed compensation at the rate of $5 per day while engaged in the performance of duties under this title and, in addition, shall be allowed such amounts as the Secretary may prescribe for necessary traveling and subsistence expenses. One member of the committee shall be designated by the Secretary as chairman. The Secretary shall prescribe rules governing the procedures of the committees, furnish forms and equipment necessary for the performance of their duties, and authorize and provide for the compensation of such clerical assistance as he deems may be required by any committee.

(b) The committees utilized or appointed pursuant to this section shall examine applications of persons desiring to obtain the benefits of this title and shall submit recommendations to the Secretary with respect to each applicant as to whether the applicant is eligible to receive the benefits of this title, whether by reason of his character, ability, and experience, he is likely successfully to carry out undertakings required of him under a loan or grant under this title, and whether the farm with respect to which the application is made is of such character that there is a reasonable likelihood that the making of the loan or grant requested will carry out the purposes of this title. The committees shall also certify to the Secretary their opinions of the reasonable values of the farms. The committees shall, in addition, perform such other duties under this title as the Secretary may require.

GENERAL POWERS OF SECRETARY

SEC. 509. (a) The Secretary, for the purposes of this title, shall have the power to determine and prescribe the standards of adequate farm housing and other buildings, by farms or localities, taking into consideration, among other factors, the type of housing which will provide decent, safe, and sanitary dwelling for the needs of the family using the housing, the type and character of the farming operations to be conducted, and the size and earning capacity of the land.

(b) The Secretary may require any recipient of a loan or grant to agree that the availability of improvements constructed or repaired with the proceeds of the loan or grant under this title shall not be a justification for directly or indirectly changing the terms or conditions of the lease or occupancy agreement with the occupants of such farms to the latter's disadvantage without the approval of the Secretary.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 510. In carrying out the provisions of this title, the Secretary shall have the power to—

(a) make contracts for services and supplies without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, when the aggregate amount involved is less than $300;

(b) enter into subordination, subrogation, or other agreements satisfactory to the Secretary;

(c) compromise claims and obligations arising out of sections 502 to 505, inclusive, of this title and adjust and modify the terms of mortgages, leases, contracts, and agreements entered into as circumstances may require, including the release from personal liability, without payments of further consideration, of—

(1) borrowers who have transferred their farms to other approved applicants for loans who have agreed to assume the outstanding indebtedness to the Secretary under this title; and

(2) borrowers who have transferred their farms to other approved applicants for loans who have agreed to assume that portion of the outstanding indebtedness to the Secretary under this title which is equal to the earning capacity value of the farm at the time of the transfer, and borrowers whose farms have been acquired by the Secretary, in cases where the Secretary determines that the original borrowers have cooperated in good faith with the Secretary, have farmed in a workmanlike manner, used due diligence to maintain the security against loss, and otherwise fulfilled the covenants incident to their loans, to the best of their abilities;

(d) collect all claims and obligations arising out of or under any mortgage, lease, contract, or agreement entered into pursuant to this title and, if in his judgment necessary and advisable, to pursue the same to final collection in any court having jurisdiction: Provided, That the prosecution and defense of all litigation under this title shall be conducted under the supervision of the Attorney General and the legal representation shall be by the United States attorneys for the districts, respectively, in which such litigation may arise and by such other attorney or attorneys as may, under law, be designated by the Attorney General;

(e) bid for and purchase at any foreclosure or other sale or otherwise to acquire the property pledged or mortgaged to secure a loan or other indebtedness owing under this title, to accept title to any property so purchased or acquired, to operate or lease such property for such period as may be necessary or advisable, to protect the interest of the United States therein and to sell or otherwise dispose of the property so purchased or acquired by such terms and for such considerations as the Secretary shall determine to be reasonable and to make loans as provided herein to provide adequate farm dwellings and buildings for the purchasers of such property;

(f) utilize with respect to the indebtedness arising from loans and payments made under this title, all the powers and authorities given to him under the Act approved December 20, 1944, entitled "An Act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to compromise, adjust, or cancel certain indebtedness, and for other purposes" (58 Stat. 836), as such Act now provides or may hereafter be amended;

(g) make such rules and regulations as he deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

LOAN FUNDS

SEC. 511. The Secretary may issue notes and other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in such sums as the Congress may from time to time determine to make loans under this title (other than loans under section 504 (b)) not in excess of $25,000,000 on and after July 1, 1949, an additional $50,000,000 on and after July 1, 1950, an additional $75,000,000 on and after July 1, 1951, and an additional $100,000,000 on and after July 1, 1952. The notes and obligations issued by the Secretary shall be secured by the obligations of borrowers and the Secretary's commitments to make contributions under this title and shall be repaid from the payment of principal and interest on the obligations of the borrowers and from funds appropriated hereunder. The notes and other obligations issued by the Secretary shall be in such forms and denominations, shall have such maturities, and shall be subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the issuance of the notes or obligations by the Secretary. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any notes and other obligations of the Secretary issued hereunder and for such purpose is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act are extended to include any purchases of such obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the notes or obligations acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such notes or obligations shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

CONTRIBUTIONS

SEC. 512. In connection with loans made pursuant to section 503, the Secretary is authorized, on and after July 1, 1949, to make commitments for contributions aggregating not to exceed $500,000 per annum and to make additional commitments, on and after July 1 of each of the years 1950, 1951, and 1952, respectively, which shall require additional contributions aggregating not more than $1,000,000, $1,500,000, and $2,000,000 per annum, respectively.

SEC. 513. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary (a) such sums as may be necessary to meet payments on notes or other obligations issued by the Secretary under section 511 equal to (i) the aggregate of the contributions made by the Secretary in the form of credits on principal due on loans made pursuant to section 503, and (ii) the interest due on a similar sum represented by notes or other obligations issued by the Secretary; (b) an additional $2,000,000 for grants pursuant to section 504 (a) and loans pursuant to section 504 (b) on and after July 1, 1949, which amount shall be increased by further amounts of $5,000,000, $8,000,000, and $10,000,000 on July 1 of each of the years 1950, 1951, and 1952, respectively; and (c) such further sums as may be necessary to enable the Secretary to carry out the provisions of this title.

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

ADVISORY COMMITTEES

SEC. 601. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator may appoint such advisory committee or committees as he may deem necessary in carrying out his functions, powers, and duties, under this or any other Act. Service as a member of any such committee shall not constitute any form of service or employment within the provisions of sections 281, 283, or 284 of title 18 United States Code.

AMENDMENTS OF NATIONAL BANKING ACT

SEC. 602. (a) The last sentence of paragraph Seventh of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by inserting before the colon, after the words "obligations of national mortgage associations", a comma and the following: "or such obligations of any local public agency (as defined in section 110 (h) of the Housing Act of 1949) as are secured by an agreement between the local public agency and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator in which the local public agency agrees to borrow from said Administrator, and said Administrator agrees to lend to said local public agency, prior to the maturity of such obligations (which obligations shall have a maturity of not more than eighteen months), monies in an amount which (together with any other monies irrevocably committed to the payment of interest on such obligations) will suffice to pay the principal of such obligations with interest to maturity thereon, which monies under the terms of said agreement are required to be used for the purpose of paying the principal of and the interest on such obligations at their maturity, or such obligations of a public housing agency (as defined in the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended) as are secured either (1) by an agreement between the public housing agency and the Public Housing Administration in which the public housing agency agrees to borrow from the Public Housing Administration, and the Public Housing Administration agrees to lend to the public housing agency, prior to the maturity of such obligations (which obligations shall have a maturity of not more than eighteen months), monies in an amount which (together with any other monies irrevocably committed to the payment of interest on such obligations) will suffice to pay the principal of such obligations with interest to maturity thereon, which monies under the terms of said agreement are required to be used for the purpose of paying the principal of and the interest on such obligations at their maturity, or (2) by a pledge of annual contributions under an annual contributions contract between such public housing agency and the Public Housing Administration if such contract shall contain the covenant by the Public Housing Administration which is authorized by subsection (b) of section 22 of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, and if the maximum sum and the maximum period specified in such contract pursuant to said subsection 22 (b) shall not be less than the annual amount and the period for payment which are requisite to provide for the payment when due of all installments of principal and interest on such obligations".

(b) Section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(11) Obligations of a local public agency (as defined in section 110 (h) of the Housing Act of 1949) or of a public housing agency (as defined in the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended) which have a maturity of not more than eighteen months shall not be subject under this section to any limitation, if such obligations are secured by an agreement between the obligor agency and the Housing and Home Finance Administrator or the Public Housing Administration in which the agency agrees to borrow from the Administrator or Administration, and the Administrator or Administration agrees to lend to the agency, prior to the maturity of such obligations, monies in an amount which (together with any other monies irrevocably committed to the payment of interest on such obligations) will suffice to pay the principal of such obligations with interest to maturity, which monies under the terms of said agreement are required to be used for that purpose.".

NATIONAL HOUSING COUNCIL

SEC. 603. The Secretary of Labor or his designee, and the Federal Security Administrator or his designee, shall hereafter be included in the membership of the National Housing Council in the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

AMENDMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT CORPORATIONS APPROPRIATION ACT, 1948, AND THE GOVERNMENT CORPORATIONS APPROPRIATION ACT, 1949

SEC. 604. (a) The second proviso in the paragraph under the heading "Federal Public Housing Authority" in title I of the Government Corporations Appropriation Act, 1948, is hereby repealed as of July 1, 1947.

(b) The second proviso in the paragraph under the heading "Public Housing Administration" in title I of the Government Corporations Appropriation Act, 1949, is hereby repealed as of July 1, 1948.

(c) The first proviso in the paragraph under the subheading "Public Housing Administration" in title II of the Government Corporations Appropriation Act, 1949, is hereby repealed.

DEPUTY HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE ADMINISTRATOR

SEC. 605. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall appoint a Deputy Housing and Home Finance Administrator, and the basic rate of compensation of such position shall be the same as the basic rate of compensation established for the heads of the constituent agencies of the Housing and Home Finance Agency. The Deputy Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence or disability of the Administrator or in the event of a vacancy in that office, and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

CONVERSION OF STATE LOW-RENT OR VETERANS' HOUSING PROJECTS

SEC. 606. Any low-rent or veterans' housing project undertaken or constructed under a program of a State or any political subdivision thereof shall be approved as a low-rent housing project under the terms of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, if (a) a contract for State financial assistance for such project was entered into on or after January 1, 1948, and prior to January 1, 1950, (b) the project is or can become eligible for assistance by the Public Housing Administration in the form of loans and annual contributions under the provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, and (c) the public housing agency operating the project in the State makes application to the Public Housing Administration for Federal assistance for the project under the terms of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended: Provided, That loans made by the Public Housing Administration for the purpose of so converting the project to a project with Federal assistance shall be deemed, for the purposes of the provisions of section 9 and other sections of the United States Housing Act of 1937, to be loans to assist the development of the project. Section 503 of the Housing Act of 1948 is hereby repealed.

CENSUS OF HOUSING

SEC. 607. (a) The Director of the Census is authorized and directed to take a census of housing in each State, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Alaska, in the year 1950 and decennially thereafter in conjunction with, at the same time, and as a part of the population inquiry of the decennial census in order to provide information concerning the number, characteristics (including utilities and equipment), and geographical distribution of dwelling units in the United States. The Director of the Census is authorized to collect such supplementary statistics (either in advance of or after the taking of such census) as are necessary to the completion thereof.

(b) All of the provisions, including penalties, of the Act providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved June 18, 1929, as amended (U. S. C., title 13, ch. 4), shall apply to the taking of the census provided for in subsection (a) of this section.

NATIONAL CAPITAL HOUSING AUTHORITY

SEC. 608. Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the National Capital Housing Authority is hereby authorized to acquire sites within the District of Columbia for low-rent public housing projects assisted under the provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PARTICIPATION

SEC. 609. To make available to the District of Columbia, and to authorize the appropriate agencies operating therein to accept, the benefits provided by titles I and III of this Act, the District of Columbia Redevelopment Act of 1945 is hereby amended by renumbering sections 20, 21, and 22 thereof as sections 21, 22, and 23, respectively, and by adding after section 19 a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. (a) As an alternative method of financing its authorized operations and functions under the provisions of this Act (in addition to that provided in section 16 of this Act), the Agency is hereby authorized and empowered to accept financial assistance from the Housing and Home Finance Administrator (hereafter in this section referred to as the Administrator), in the form of advances of funds, loans, and capital grants pursuant to title I of the Housing Act of 1949, to assist the Agency in acquiring real property for redevelopment of project areas and carrying out any functions authorized under this Act for which advances of funds, loans, or capital grants may be made to a local public agency under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, and the Agency, subject to the approval of the District Commissioners and subject to such terms, covenants, and conditions as may be prescribed by the Administrator pursuant to title I of the Housing Act of 1949, may enter into such contracts and agreements as may be necessary, convenient, or desirable for such purposes.

"(b) Subject to the approval of the District Commissioners, the Agency is authorized to accept from the Administrator advances of funds for surveys and plans in preparation of a project or projects authorized by this Act which may be assisted under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, and the Agency is authorized to transfer to the Planning Commission so much of the funds so advanced as the District Commissioners shall determine to be necessary for the Planning Commission to carry out its functions under this Act with respect to the project or projects to be assisted under title I of the Housing Act of 1949.

"(c) The District Commissioners are authorized to include in their annual estimates of appropriations items for administrative expenses which, in addition to loan or other funds available therefor, are necessary for the Agency in carrying out its functions under this section.

"(d) Notwithstanding the limitation contained in the last sentence of section 110 (d) or in any other provision of title I of the Housing Act of 1949, the Administrator is authorized to allow and credit to the Agency such local grants-in-aid as are approvable pursuant to said section 110 (d) with respect to any project or projects undertaken by the Agency under a contract or contracts entered into under this section and assisted under title I of the Housing Act of 1949. In the event such local grants-in-aid as are so allowed by the Administrator are not sufficient to meet the requirements for local grants-in-aid pursuant to title I of the Housing Act of 1949, the District Commissioners are hereby authorized to enter into agreements with the Agency, upon which agreements the Administrator may rely, to make cash payments of such deficiencies from funds of the District of Columbia. The District Commissioners shall include items for such cash payments in their annual estimates of appropriations, and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amounts necessary to provide for such cash payments. Any amounts due the Administrator pursuant to any such agreements shall be paid promptly from funds appropriated for such purpose.

"(e) All receipts of the Agency in connection with any project or projects financed in accordance with this section with assistance under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, whether in the form of advances of funds, loans, or capital grants made by the Administrator to the Agency, or in the form of proceeds, rentals, or revenues derived by the Agency from any such project or projects, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of a special fund or funds, and all moneys in such special fund or funds are hereby made available for carrying out the purposes of this Act with respect to such project or projects, including the payment of any advances of funds or loans, together with interest thereon, made by the Administrator or by private sources to the Agency. Expenditures from such fund shall be audited, disbursed, and accounted for as are other funds of the District of Columbia.

"(f) With respect to any project or projects undertaken by the Agency which are financed in accordance with this section with assistance under title I of the Housing Act of 1949—

"(1) sections 3 (f), 3 (k), and 7 (g), and the last sentence of section 6 (b) (2) of this Act shall not be applicable to those pieces of real property which, in accordance with the approved project area redevelopment plan, are to be devoted to public housing to be undertaken under Public Law 307, Seventy-third Congress, approved June 12, 1934, as amended;

"(2) the site and use plan for the redevelopment of the area, included in the redevelopment plan of the project area pursuant to section 6 (b) (2) of this Act, shall include the approximate extent and location of any land within the area which is proposed to be used for public housing to be undertaken under Public Law 307, Seventy-third Congress, approved June 12, 1934, as amended;

"(3) notwithstanding any other provisions of this Act, the Agency, pursuant to section 7 (a) of this Act, shall have power to transfer to and shall at a practicable time or times transfer by deeds to the National Capital Housing Authority those pieces of real property which, in accordance with the approved project area redevelopment plan, are to be devoted to public housing to be undertaken under Public Law 307, Seventy-third Congress, approved June 12, 1934, as amended, and, in accordance with the requirements of section 107 of the Housing Act of 1949, the National Capital Housing Authority shall pay for the same out of any of its funds available for such acquisition.

"(g) It is the purpose and intent of this section to authorize the District Commissioners and the appropriate agencies operating within the District of Columbia to do any and all things necessary to secure financial aid under title I of the Housing Act of 1949. The District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency is hereby declared to be a local public agency for all of the purposes of title I of the Housing Act of 1949. As such a local public agency for all of the purposes of title I of the Housing Act of 1949, the Agency is also authorized to borrow money from the Administrator or from private sources as contemplated by title I of the Housing Act of 1949, to issue its obligations evidencing such loans, and to pledge as security for the payment of such loans, and the interest thereon, the property, income, revenues, and other assets acquired in connection with the project or projects financed in accordance with this section with assistance under title I of the Housing Act of 1949, but such obligations or such pledge shall not constitute a debt or obligation of either the United States or of the District of Columbia.

"(h) Nothing contained in this section or in any other section of this Act shall relieve the Administrator of his responsibilities and duties under section 105 (c) or any other section of the Housing Act of 1949. The Administrator shall not enter into any contract of financial assistance under title I of this Act with respect to any project of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Land Agency for which a budget estimate of appropriation was transmitted pursuant to law and for which no appropriation was made by the Congress."

ACT CONTROLLING

SEC. 610. Insofar as the provisions of any other law are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the provisions of this Act shall be controlling.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 611. Except as may be otherwise expressly provided in this Act, all powers and authorities conferred by this Act shall be cumulative and additional to and not in derogation of any powers and authorities otherwise existing. Notwithstanding any other evidences of the intention of Congress, it is hereby declared to be the controlling intent of Congress that if any provisions of this Act, or the application thereof to any persons or circumstances, shall be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder of this Act or its applications to other persons and circumstances, but shall be confined in its operation to the provisions of this Act or the application thereof to the persons and circumstances directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 612. No part of any appropriation, loan, fund, or expenditure authorized by or provided pursuant to this Act, shall be used directly or indirectly to pay the salary or wages of any officer or employee of the Housing and Home Finance Agency or the Department of Agriculture who engages in a strike against the Government of the United States or who is a member of an organization of Government employees that asserts the right to strike against the Government of the United States, or who advocates, or is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence: Provided, That for the purposes hereof an affidavit shall be considered prima facie evidence that the officer or employee making the affidavit has not contrary to the provisions of this section engaged in a strike against the Government of the United States, is not a member of an organization of Government employees that asserts the right to strike against the Government of the United States, or that such officer or employee does not advocate, and is not a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence: Provided further, That any person who engages in a strike against the Government of the United States or who is a member of an organization of Government employees that asserts the right to strike against the Government of the United States, or who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates, the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence and accepts an office or employment in the Housing and Home Finance Agency or the Department of Agriculture the salary or wages for which are paid from any appropriation, loan, fund, or expenditure authorized by or provided pursuant to this Act shall be guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both: Provided further, That the above penalty clause shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any other provisions of existing law.

Approved July 15, 1949.

THE HOUSING ACT OF 1949

Questions and Answers

INDEX

Question	Page
GENERAL SUMMARY
What is the purpose of the Housing Act of 1949?	1
What is the Declaration of National Housing Policy?	1
TITLE I - SLUM CLEARANCE
What is the purpose of the slum clearance title?	2
What types of Federal assistance are made available?	2
Who operates the slum clearance program?	2
How will a typical slum clearance project be financed under this title?	2
May Federal funds made available under this title be used for housing construction?	3
What is the relationship of the slum clearance program to housing?	3
Will the cleared slum sites be redeveloped with public housing?	3
TITLE II - AMENDMENTS TO THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT
What is the purpose of these amendments to the National Housing Act?	4
TITLE III - LOW-RENT PUBLIC HOUSING
What is the purpose of the public housing title?	5
How much low-rent public housing may be assisted under this Act?	5
Is this a new program?	5
Who operates the public housing program?	5
What types of Federal assistance are authorized?	5
How will the capital cost of the low-rent public housing projects be financed?	6
In what ways are the costs of the public housing limited?	6
How will low rents be achieved?	6
Will the maximum contribution be paid every year?	7
How will the rents be determined?	7
How is the eligibility of tenants determined?	7
Is the low-rent public housing program limited to large cities?	8

RECEIVED
JUL 27 1949
RECEIVED V LL
Southern Regional Co

Question | Page

TITLE IV - HOUSING RESEARCH

What is the purpose of the Federal research program authorized in Title IV? 9
Who will conduct the research program? 9

TITLE V - FARM HOUSING

What is the purpose of the farm housing program in Title V? 10
May housing for farm workers not living on the farms be financed under this title? 10
Who operates the farm housing program? 10
What types of financial aid for farm housing will be available? 10

GENERAL SUMMARY

Q. What is the purpose of the Housing Act of 1949?

A. The Housing Act of 1949 establishes a comprehensive national housing policy and objective, provides Federal financial assistance for slum clearance, low-rent public housing and farm housing, and authorizes a comprehensive Federal program of housing research. Its purpose is to meet, in cooperation with local communities, housing needs which cannot be served by private enterprise, even with available Federal financing aids. It also extends temporarily certain private financing aids which expired June 30, 1949.

Q. What is the Declaration of National Housing Policy?

A. The Declaration of National Housing Policy establishes, for the first time, a statement of national housing objectives and policies to be followed in their attainment, applicable to all Federal housing activities. The basic objective is stated as the realization as soon as feasible of a decent home in a suitable environment for every American family. In the attainment of that objective, according to the statement, primary reliance shall be placed on and maximum assistance given to private enterprise, but Federal assistance is to be extended to those needs which cannot be met by reliance on private enterprise.

TITLE I - SLUM CLEARANCE

Q. What is the purpose of the slum clearance title?

A. To provide Federal financial assistance to local communities which desire to clear slums and blighted areas, in which millions of American families live under unhealthful and demoralizing conditions, and to make the land available for redevelopment in accordance with the best use of the land for the community's welfare and growth.

Q. What types of Federal assistance are made available?

A. Two types of Federal financial assistance are provided as follows:

1. Repayable loans, which may not aggregate more than $1 billion at any one time, to finance local costs of acquiring, clearing, and preparing the sites for redevelopment. The interest rate may be not less than the going rate for Federal bonds of 10 years or more maturity.

2. Grants, which may not aggregate more than $500,000,000, which may be used to absorb up to two-thirds of the loss, or net cost, which generally will be realized from the slum clearance operation.

Q. Who operates the slum clearance program?

A. Local public agencies, authorized under state law and directed generally by boards of citizens appointed by local governing officials, will have responsibility for operating slum clearance programs. Subject to the approval of local governing bodies, these agencies will acquire the sites by negotiation or condemnation, clear the land, prepare the sites, and sell or lease the land for redevelopment in accordance with local plans. The Federal government's role is limited to providing the financial assistance as authorized in the bill and to seeing that the purposes of the Act are achieved. This role is assigned to the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Q. How will a typical slum clearance project be financed under this title?

A. Let us assume a 50-acre project in a moderate-sized city. Let us assume further that the capital cost of acquisition, clearance and site preparation will be $2,500,000 and that the land is sold for a total price of $1,000,000. The loss, or net cost of the project, would thus be $1,500,000.

The expenditures of the local public agency, or any part required, could be financed with a temporary Federal loan. This loan would be retired on completion of the project from the proceeds of the sale of the land and from the Federal and local grants covering the loss.

The loss of $1,500,000 would be shared by the Federal and local grants. The Federal grant could cover up to two-thirds of the loss, or $1,000,000, and the local contribution would have to cover the remaining $500,000, or at least one-third of the loss. The local contribution could be in the form of cash or essential local public facilities (except public housing) and services provided in connection with the development or redevelopment of the area (such as utilities, street work, municipal labor or equipment).

If any part of the cleared land is leased instead of sold for redevelopment, the leased portion could be refinanced at its reuse value with long-term Federal loan, repayable in not more than 40 years.

Federal loans (but not grants) may be used also to finance the acquisition of open land (to permit the desired dispersion of population from slum areas) and to provide temporary financing for certain public facilities essential for the development of such land.

Q. May Federal funds made available under this title be used for housing construction?

A. No.

Q. What is the relationship of the slum clearance program to housing?

A. The Act clearly recognizes that the primary purpose for Federal assistance is the assurance of better living conditions for slum dwellers. The slum clearance program is therefore a part of an Act which has as one of its principal purposes the provision of decent housing for low-income families, who make up the bulk of slum dwellers. Specifically, the Act requires assurance of adequate housing for families displaced in slum clearance projects and provides preference for such families in public housing projects assisted under Title III. It also limits Federal assistance to areas which consist predominantly of residential slums (which may be redeveloped for any use or combination of uses) or to other areas if such other areas are to be redeveloped for predominantly residential use.

Q. Will the cleared slum sites be redeveloped with public housing?

A. The Act requires that in their redevelopment plans the local agencies give maximum opportunity to private enterprise. There will undoubtedly be cases where the local communities will determine that the most feasible use of some of the land will be for low-rent public housing. In such cases the public housing projects will be charged the reuse value of the land on the same basis as private redevelopers.

TITLE II - AMENDMENTS TO THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Q. What is the purpose of these amendments to the National Housing Act?

A. To assure the continuing availability of certain types of loans insured by the Federal Housing Administration for the financing of housing construction and improvement, while Congress is considering, in separate legislation, longer term improvements and revisions in financing aids for private homebuilding and finance.

Specifically this Act extends to September 1, 1949, the authority of the Federal Housing Administration to insure loans financing repairs, modernization, alterations or small house construction under Title I of the National Housing Act and to insure mortgages financing the provision of rental housing under Title VI of the National Housing Act. This insurance authority had expired on June 30, 1949.

The Act also increases by $500,000,000 the amount of FHA mortgage insurance which may be outstanding under Title II of the National Housing Act to finance sales and rental housing. The previous insurance authority of $5 billion had been practically used up.

TITLE III - LOW-RENT PUBLIC HOUSING

Q. What is the purpose of the public housing title?

A. To make available Federal financial assistance to urban and rural non-farm communities desiring to provide decent housing for families which, because of their low incomes, are presently forced to live in slums and other bad housing.

Q. How much low-rent public housing may be assisted under this Act?

A. 810,000 dwelling units. These units may be started at the rate of 135,000 per year, over 6 years beginning July 1, 1949, unless the annual rate is increased or decreased by the President as authorized under the bill.

Q. Is this a new program?

A. No. The public housing title expands and amends the United States Housing Act of 1937. Under this and related acts, 191,700 dwellings have been provided in 268 localities, located in 37 states and in the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

Q. Who operates the public housing program?

A. Local housing authorities, authorized and established under state laws and governed by citizen boards appointed generally by local governing officials, have responsibility for initiating, constructing and operating the low-rent public housing projects. The local programs must be approved by local governing bodies. The Federal government's role is limited to the provision of financial assistance and seeing that the purposes of the bill are achieved. This role is assigned to the Public Housing Administration, a constituent agency of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

Q. What types of Federal assistance are authorized?

A. Two types of Federal assistance are authorized, as follows:

1. $700,000,000 in repayable loans, increasing the present $800,000,000 loan authorization to $1,500,000,000 which is placed on a revolving fund basis. The interest rate may not be less than the going rate of interest on Federal bonds of 10 years or more maturity.

2. Annual contributions not in excess of $308,000,000 per year, payable for not more than 40 years.

Q. How will the capital cost of the low-rent public housing projects be financed?

A. Under the perfecting amendments of this Act, it is expected that local housing authorities will be able to obtain their capital financing through the sale of securities at low interest rates in the private bond market. Long-term bonds, amortized over not more than 40 years, may be secured by the pledge of Federal annual contributions sufficient to cover interest and payments on principal. Temporary notes financing construction may be secured by a contractual agreement of the Federal government to refinance such notes on maturity. It is to provide adequate security for such private temporary financing that the loan authorization is increased to $1,500,000,000.

Q. In what ways are the costs of the public housing limited?

A. Limitations on the capital cost include the following:

a. The requirements that the projects be of economical and unelaborate design, materials and construction, and that the Federal government approve construction contracts before they are awarded.

b. The specific limitation of average construction cost, in a project, to $1,750 per room for the dwelling facilities. This limitation may be increased to not more than $2,500 per room where necessary in certain high cost areas.

c. The limitations on annual contributions. The commitments for annual contributions may not exceed, at the current level of Federal interest rates, 4½ per cent of the total cost of a project, including all construction, land, site preparation and overhead. Thus the maximum contributions authorization of $308,000,000 per year will permit a total construction cost of not more than $6,844,000,000 ($308,000,000 capitalized at 4½ per cent). For 810,000 units the average total cost per unit may not exceed $8,450.

Q. How will low rents be achieved?

A. Through the annual Federal contributions, through local tax exemption (less payments in lieu of taxes of up to 10 per cent of annual shelter rents) and through low financing costs. On a project having a total cost of $8,450 per unit, the Federal contribution could average $31.69 per unit per month. Assuming a monthly project cost of $47.23 per month, including operating costs, payments in lieu of taxes of 10 per cent of shelter rents and debt service, the maximum contribution would permit an average shelter rent as low as $15.54 per month, or a gross rent, including utilities, of $22.54 per month. Since there will be a range in rents charged, the rents on some of the apartments in this typical project could be substantially below this average.

Q. Will the maximum contribution be paid every year?

A. No. Except in years when tenant incomes are unusually low, it is expected that the average rents will be somewhat higher than the achievable minimum. Thus, the average low income tenant in the average community will be able to pay an average of $23 per month shelter rent, instead of $15.54 as shown in the example previously cited. This will reduce the annual Federal contribution to $24.23 per unit per month, or 77 per cent of the maximum.

Q. How will the rents be determined?

A. Rents will be based on the paying ability of tenants. The bill requires that the incomes of families on admission, less an allowance of $100 annually for each child, not exceed five times the gross rent, including utilities. Thus a family with three children which has an annual income of $1,800 per year would be required to pay a gross rent of at least $300 annually ($1,800 minus $300 divided by 5), or $25 per month. This rent will be adjusted upward or downward in accordance with changes in family income as shown in periodic reexaminations.

Q. How is the eligibility of tenants determined?

A. The United States Housing Act of 1937 limits occupancy of low-rent housing projects to families living in slums and bad housing whose incomes are so low that they may not obtain decent private housing in their communities. This limitation was modified during the war to permit the housing of essential war workers. Since the war, reconversion to a strictly low-rent purpose has been largely achieved. Families admitted to low-rent projects during the first half of 1948 had a median income of $1,481 and families already residing in the projects had a median income of $1,884, despite the continued presence of over-income families whose removal had not been accomplished because of the housing shortage.

The Housing Act of 1949 contains additional provisions to assure that occupancy will be limited to low income families unable to find decent private housing. Rents on admission (which, as explained in the previous answer, limit incomes) must be at least 20 per cent below the lowest rents at which an adequate supply of decent private housing, new or used, is available in the respective communities. Thus, if the lowest rent at which decent 2-bedroom apartments or houses are generally available in the communities is $37.50 per month, including utilities, a similar low-rent public housing unit could not be offered to a new tenant at more than $30 (and the family's income at admission could not exceed $1,800 per year, plus the allowance for children).

The Act also requires that families be admitted in accordance with the urgency of their housing needs and that there be no discrimination against welfare families. This requirement is subject to stated preferences. First preference is to be given to low-income families displaced in slum clearance projects.

Among such preferred families, as well as among other low-income families, disabled veterans, families of deceased veterans and servicemen and other veterans and servicemen, shall have preference in the order named. These preferences are applicable to veterans of both World War I and II. For a period of 5 years families of veterans and servicemen do not have to come from substandard housing, as required of other families.

Local housing authorities are required to establish maximum income limits, approved by the Federal government, for admission and continued occupancy (similar to those now in effect), to reexamine incomes of tenant families periodically and to obtain the removal of those families whose incomes have passed the maximum limits set for continued occupancy. Thus a family with three children, in a typical case, might be admitted if its income is less than the established limit of $2,100 for admission and continue to reside in the project until its income exceeds the established limit of $2,400 for continued occupancy.

Q. Is the low-rent public housing program limited to large cities?

A. No. Of the 268 localities in which present low-rent public housing is located, 104 had a 1940 population of less than 25,000. In addition to specifying that aids be available for housing in both urban and rural non-farm areas, the Act specifically reserves 10 per cent of the annual contributions authorization for three years after the amounts are made available. Enabling acts in a number of the states authorize regional housing authorities for economical operation of housing scattered in various small localities.

TITLE IV - HOUSING RESEARCH

Q. What is the purpose of the Federal research program authorized in Title IV?

A. To provide a comprehensive Federal housing research program. This program is directed to the encouragement of better housing at lower costs through improved techniques, materials and methods and through improved building codes and includes the development of more adequate housing data and standards.

Q. Who will conduct the research program?

A. The Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency has responsibility for the housing research program. The Act, however, directs him to utilize to the fullest extent, available facilities elsewhere in the Federal government and authorizes him to cooperate with industry and labor, with State and local agencies and with educational institutions and other non-profit organizations.

TITLE V - FARM HOUSING

Q. What is the purpose of the farm housing program in Title V?

A. To provide Federal financial assistance, in the form of loans, subsidies and grants, for the provision and improvement of housing and other farm buildings for farm owners who are otherwise unable to finance them for themselves or their farm tenants and workers and also to provide research and adequate data on farm housing.

Q. May housing for farm workers not living on the farms be financed under this title?

A. No. Such farm workers of low income may be housed in low-rent public housing projects in rural areas provided under Title III of this Act.

Q. Who operates the farm housing program?

A. The Secretary of Agriculture who shall utilize, in the case of financial aids, the Farmers Home Administration. The Secretary is authorized to utilize and to compensate local committees of farmers for the examination of applications and the submission of recommendations.

Q. What types of financial aid for farm housing will be available?

A. The financial aids will be available as follows:

a. Loans for Adequate Farms — A farm owner whose income is considered sufficient to carry the payments but who is unable to obtain credit elsewhere may be eligible to receive a 33-year loan at 4 per cent interest to finance the provision of housing or other farm buildings for himself and his farm workers. The loan will be secured by the farmer's equity in the farm, or other such security as the Secretary of Agriculture may require, and thus will not impair the security of existing mortgage indebtedness on the farm.

b. Loans and Subsidies for Potentially Adequate Farms -- A farmer whose income is insufficient to carry a loan as described above, but whose income could be sufficiently increased within five years through a program of farm improvement or enlargement may be eligible to receive, in addition to the previously described loan, annual subsidies for not more than 5 years covering the amount of the inadequacies but not exceeding the annual payments of interest and half the annual payments of principal on the loan.

c. Loans and Grants for Inadequate Farms -- In such cases loans and grants will be available only to finance minimum improvements on the owner's property, such as a new roof, privy, or screens, which are essential to health and safety. The total amount available to any individual may not exceed $1,000 of which not more than $500 may be a grant.

d. Loans to finance the enlargement or development of farms in order that the incomes of the farmers may become sufficient to support adequate housing and other farm buildings.

To finance these aids the Act authorizes Congress to make available to the Secretary of Agriculture first, $250,000,000 in loan funds for the purposes described in (a), (b) and (c) above; second, appropriations for annual contributions as described in (b), for which commitments may not exceed $5,000,000 per year; and third, up to $25,000,000 for grants as described in (c) and for loans as described in (d).

# # #

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
Farmers Home Administration

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON RURAL HOUSING

SECTION OF HOUSING ACT OF 1949

Q-1 What does the legislation provide?

A-1 It has six titles. Title V provides loans and grants and other assistance to improve farm housing and buildings. The other five titles deal with the improvement of urban housing.

Q-2 How great is the need for rural housing?

A-2 The most recent complete survey was prepared in 1945 by the Department of Agriculture Interbureau Committee on Post-War Programs and submitted to the Senate Special Committee in Post-War Economic Policy and Planning. Much of the information contained in it is based on 1940 census data which show the following selected characteristics:

ITEM	Rural Percentage	Urban
Overcrowding (more than 1.5 persons per room)	16%	6%
Having electric lighting	32%	96%
Having running water	18%	94%
Private flush toilet	11%	83%
Private bath	12%	78%

According to the census data about 2.5 to 3 million farm houses did not meet the Housing Act standard of "decent, safe, and sanitary" housing. The report goes on to say "An important reason for inadequate farm housing has been the lack of sufficiently remunerative employment to pay for better structures. For the country as a whole it appears reasonable to assume that unless a family was able to produce at least $1,500 gross farm income per year under 1939 conditions, it was not able to finance an acceptable dwelling from farm income". One clue to the present need for farm housing is the fact that nearly three million farm families grossed less than $1,500 farm income by 1945 census data; and the number would be even greater if we converted the 1945 income to 1939 purchasing power. A second reason for the continued need for improved farm housing has been the inability to obtain materials, labor, or equipment for such construction during the war and immediate post-war years, so that existing bad housing has continued to deteriorate.

Q-3 Has there been any improvement in rural housing since the 1940 census?

A-3 Yes. Sample surveys made by the BAE in 1947 indicated that new houses were under construction on 240,000 of the Nation's six million farms and 23 percent of the farmers interviewed reported some form of construction or repair to their dwellings. However, 67.3 percent of the rural farm dwellings still lacked running water, 80 percent lacked a bath and flush toilet, 40 percent lacked electric lights, and 10 percent were overcrowded.

Q-4 Will this gradual improvement solve the problem?

A-4 No. The figures do not show that construction is taking place on the farms of those who would be helped most by the housing legislation--those who are unable to obtain private financing.

Q-5 Why was it necessary to deal with rural housing separately in the legislation?

A-5 While assistance to families of low income in rural areas formerly was authorized under provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937, the special and different problems of farm housing require special provisions. In the Housing Act of 1949 it is recognized that an intimate relationship exists between farm housing and the entire farm economy--that the farm house and buildings are really a part of the farm.

Q-6 How is this done?

A-6 By authorizing the Department of Agriculture rather than the Housing and Home Finance Agency to provide assistance to farm owners so that they may acquire adequate farm buildings. This makes possible an integrated farm program which provides adequate housing as part of the total farm economy.

Q-7 What rural housing loans will the Department of Agriculture be able to provide under the Act?

A-7 Section 501 authorizes the Secretary to provide loans to farm owners (in the United States, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands) to enable them to provide decent farm dwellings and buildings for themselves, their tenants, lessees, sharecroppers or laborers.

Q-8 May a tenant obtain this financial aid to erect needed housing on a farm which he is operating under lease?

A-8 No. The financial aid provisions are applicable only to owners of farms but an owner may get a loan to improve buildings occupied by a tenant.

Q-9 And may all farm owners participate in the provisions of this Act?

A-9 No. The law explicity limits such financial assistance to those owners who are without sufficient resources to provide the necessary housing on their own account and who are unable to secure credit necessary for such housing from other sources on terms and conditions which they could reasonably expect to fill.

Q-10 How large must a farm be to qualify an applicant for assistance?

A-10 For the purpose of this title, a farm is considered to mean a parcel or parcels of land operated as a single unit for the production of one or more agricultural commodities for sale or home use which have an annual gross value equivalent to at least $400 computed on 1944 commodity prices.

Q-11 What loan limits are set up in the bill?

A-11 There are no dollar limits specified in the Act. A farmer who has income sufficient to support a high cost house will be able to get his financing elsewhere.

Q-12 What are the terms of such financial assistance?

A-12 Section 502 authorizes loans for periods not in excess of 33 years, bearing interest at no more than 4 percent per year.

Q-13 What security must be given to obtain such loans?

A-13 The unpaid balance of the loan is secured by the owner's equity in his farm, and such additional security or collateral as may be necessary to reasonably assure repayment of the loan.

Q-14 Does that mean that a borrower may take the entire 33 years to repay his loan?

A-14 Not necessarily. The Act provides that the borrower shall refinance his indebtedness through cooperative or private credit sources whenever he is able to do so.

Q-15 Is a farmer eligible for assistance even though the present anticipated income from his farm and other sources would not repay the loan in the scheduled period?

A-15 Under certain conditions this is possible. Section 503 provides for aid to farm owners over and above the long-term low-interest credit provided in Section 502. If the farm enterprise is capable of being improved or enlarged or if farm practices can be adopted to bring the unit up to adequate level of production within a reasonable period of time (not to exceed 5 years) loan assistance provided under Section 502 may be supplemented by annual contributions. All such contributions shall take the form of credits against the installments of interest and principal due for the period, and may be no larger than the total annual interest plus half the annual principal installment due. Such contributions shall be made only if the owner is unable to make the full amortized annual payment, and if he is pursuing the plan of farm reorganization with due diligence.

Q-16 If the owner sells the farm before the repayment in full of the loan, what is the status of these "contributions" by the Department?

A-16 This agreement with respect to credits or principal and interest upon the borrower's indebtedness shall not be assignable nor accrue to the benefit of any third party without the written consent of the Secretary. The Secretary shall have the right, at his option, to cancel the agreement upon the sale of the farm or the execution of any lien given to the Secretary; or he may refuse to release the lien given the Secretary except on the payment of all original principal plus accrued interest if he determines that a release of the lien would benefit a person not eligible to receive such benefits.

Q-17 Can loans be made for the purchase or development of land?

A-17 Yes, when the land is needed to enlarge a farm or development such as clearing, draining, fencing or terracing is needed to enable the family to repay their housing loan.

Q-18 Is there any assistance available to the owner whose unit is not now an economic unit, and which seems unlikely to permit suitable development within the 5-year maximum allowable period?

A-18 Yes. Section 504 (a) provides for assistance in the form of special loans and grants to owner occupants for farm dwelling and building improvements in order to make his dwelling safe and sanitary and remove hazards to the health of the occupant, his family, or the community, and that repairs should be made to farm buildings in order to remove hazards and make such buildings safe.

Q-19 For what purposes can such loans and grants be made?

A-19 Loans and grants can be made to make roof repairs, provide toilet facilities, arrange for a sanitary water supply, provide structural supports, or make similar repairs.

Q-20 How large may such loans and grants be?

A-20 Such assistance is limited to a maximum of $1,000 to any one person of which no more than $500 may be in the form of grants.

Q-21 Does the research sections of Title IV include provisions for research in farm housing?

A-21 A separate section (506) has been set up under Title V to provide for farm research and technical services. This is to further permit the Secretary of Agriculture to have overall supervision of the entire rural phases of this housing bill. Section 506 authorizes the Secretary to furnish, without charge, or at such charges as he may determine, technical services such as building plans, specifications, construction supervision and inspection, and any necessary advice or information on rural dwellings or other farm buildings.

Q-22 Do veterans have preference for the services under this Act?

A-22 Yes, section 507 provides for preference to veterans and families of deceased servicemen. The Title defines a veteran as one who served in the military or naval services during any war between the United States and any other Nation, and received a discharge other than dishonorable. "Deceased servicemen" are defined as persons who died in service prior to the end of the war.

Q-23 What use is made of county committees in administration of the Act?

A-23 The committees certify as to the eligibility of the applicants and the adequacy and reasonable value of the farms. The county committees already active in the Farmers Home Administration program will perform this service.

Q-24 What further powers are given the Secretary under this Act?

A-24 The Secretary shall within the limitations set up in the Act itself, determine and prescribe the standards of adequate farm housing, individually and by localities. He shall take into consideration such factors as the best type of housing to provide decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings; the type and character of the farming operations; and the size and earning capacity of the land. Further, the Secretary may require the borrower to agree that any improvements so provided shall not be used as justification for increasing the cost of rent or otherwise changing terms of any lease he may have with tenant or sharecropper residing therein, to the disadvantage of the resident, without prior approval of the Secretary's office.

Q-25 List the appropriations which may be made under this Act.

A-25 The Secretary may issue notes and other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of Treasury in such sums as Congress may, from time to time, determine to be used for making loans under this Act. This sum shall not be in excess of $25 million on or after the first day of July, 1949, an additional $50,000,000 on or after July 1, 1950; an additional $75,000,000 on or after the first day of July 1951, and an additional $100,000,000 on or after July 1, 1952. In connection with loans made pursuant to Section 503, the Secretary is authorized to make commitments for contributions not to exceed $500,000 per annum for five years on or after July 1, 1949; and this amount shall be progressively increased on July 1, 1950, 1951, and 1952 to $1 million, $1.5 million and $2 million respectively, or a total of $25,000,000. Further, there is authorized to be appropriated sufficient funds to make payments on notes issued by the Secretary covering contributions made pursuant to Section 503, and an additional amount for loans and grants made pursuant to Section 504 which shall be no more than $2 million, $5 million, $8 million, $10 million respectively for the years 1949, 1950, 1951, and 1952; plus such further sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Title.

Q-26 Who will do the work under the proposed legislation?

A-26 The bill authorizes the Secretary to extend financial assistance through the Farmers Home Administration. Economic research in farm housing is to be handled by BAE. Technical assistance and advice in farm housing will be provided by Extension Service. Technical research studies will be made by ARA.

Q-27 How will Farmers Home Administration perform its functions under the Act?

A-27 The loan and grant program will be handled at the county level by Farmers Home Administration committees and Farmers Home Administration county supervisors. It will operate in conjunction with the regular loaning programs, and the staff at the county level will be increased only to the extent necessary to handle the increased work load. All present personnel in the county office would be used to handle loan making and servicing. In the 40 Farmers Home Administration State Offices, additional construction engineers and farm appraisers would be added to provide such needed service on a state-wide basis, while in the National office a small staff of engineers and rural housing specialists would be formed. Additional employees in the four Area Finance offices would be necessary to handle the additional loan vouchers and accounting.

Q-28 What protection is given the borrower against losing his farm if he cannot meet payments on the housing loan?

A-28 If the farmer cannot meet his payments because of circumstances beyond his control, the Secretary may grant a moratorium for as long as necessary. In cases of extreme hardship, interest may be cancelled during the moratorium.

Q-29 When will provisions of the rural housing section of the Act become effective?

A-29 The financial and other services authorized in the rural housing section of the Act will become available shortly after funds are appropriated. All applications for financial assistance will be filed at the county offices of the Farmers Home Administration.

July, 1949

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

TITLE IV -- HOUSING RESEARCH

HOUSING ACT OF 1949

I. The Problem

II. The Scope of the Program

III. How It Is To Be Carried Out

IV. First Steps Under the Program

Housing and Home Finance Agency
Office of the Administrator
Washington 25, D. C.

July, 1949

Title IV - Housing Research

The Problem

For many years the chief obstacle to housing progress has been the rising cost of housing in relation to the purchasing power of most home-seekers. The problem of housing costs is complex and difficult, and has resisted the effect of most of the advances toward larger production and lower unit costs that have generally characterized the rest of our modern economy.

Almost everyone in the nation has a stake in an expanding housing market. First and most obvious is the consumer, seeking to better his housing within his financial means. Then there is the housing industry. Production and marketing of housing for rent and sale is one of our basic industries. A sustained large volume of housing production at moderate prices would not only provide an answer to the problem of a decent home for more of our families, but would also help to stabilize the entire economy. Workers would be assured of steadier work at good wages more weeks in the year, contractors a continuing market instead of past ups and downs, materials producers a stable market for their products, and mortgage lenders a protection against the wild fluctuations of past building booms and breaks.

The rise in the cost of housing in relation to the ability of most people to pay underlies the entire housing problem. This disparity has been recognized throughout Congressional studies and hearings on housing and has become particularly pronounced since the war.

The Joint Congressional Committee on Housing in its report on March 15, 1948, said: "This long-continued rise in costs reflects a lag in the productivity of our housing industry which makes it compare unfavorably with most other industries. . . In a relative sense our residential building technology has fallen behind. A vicious circle is created by this lag, in which the high costs resulting from an obsolescent technology make it harder and harder to give the public as much for its money in housing as in other commodities. . ."

The Committee in recommending a Federally coordinated program of housing research further said: "The progressive reduction of housing costs and expansion of the private housing market appear to lie in a coordinated program of technical research . . . Private industry cannot be expected to organize or carry out the comprehensive program of technical housing research that is needed, although many parts of what industry can and is doing in the general field can be fitted into such a program."

These statements, in brief, give the analysis of the housing cost problem on which the housing research program is authorized in the Housing Act of 1949 is based. The Act specifically includes in its statement of policy the following as national housing objectives:

1. The production of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life.

2. The reduction of the costs of housing without sacrifice of such sound standards.

3. The use of new designs, materials, techniques, and methods in residential construction, the use of standardized dimensions and methods of assembly of homebuilding materials and equipment, and the increase of efficiency in residential construction and maintenance.

4. The development of well-planned, integrated, residential neighborhoods and the development and redevelopment of communities.

5. The stabilization of the housing industry at a high annual volume residential construction.

The New Approach

Title IV of the Housing Act of 1949 authorizes for the first time a comprehensive and coordinated housing research program. It directs the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to carry out a program of research and studies concerned with housing economics and other housing market data and with the development, demonstration, and promotion of the acceptance of and application of new and improved building materials, methods, and techniques, directed toward increased and sustained production and lower costs.

The Scope of the Research Program

The Act authorizes economic and technical research in the housing field on a broad front. The scope of the program contemplated by the Act is indicated by the following fields of investigation and research that it specifically points out as being of appropriate concern:

Improved and standardized building codes and regulations and their more uniform administration.

Standardized dimensions and methods for the assembly of homebuilding materials and equipment.

Improved residential design and construction.

New and improved types of housing components, building materials and equipment, and methods of production, distribution, assembly, and construction.

Sound techniques for the testing of materials and types of construction and for the determination of adequate performance standards.

Appraisal, credit, and other housing market data.

Housing needs, demand and supply, finance and investment.

Land costs, use and improvement, site planning and utilities.

Zoning and other laws, codes, and regulations as they apply to housing.

How the Research Program Will Be Carried Out

The Act augments the Housing and Home Finance Administrator's existing administrative authority to enable him to carry out the broad research program authorized by the Housing Act of 1949.

Title IV provides that the HHFA Administrator shall make use as far as feasible of existing facilities of the Federal Government adapted to technical research. It also requires the Administrator to consult with and make recommendations to other Federal agencies engaged in the collection of housing data with respect to action necessary or desirable to overcome existing gaps and deficiencies in such data or in available collection facilities.

The Act authorizes the Administrator to enter into contracts on a negotiated basis (that is, without advertising for bids) with public, educational and other nonprofit organizations for carrying out projects under the Housing and Home Finance research program with Federal funds through their laboratories and technical facilities. Such contracts may extend for periods up to four years.

The Administrator is also authorized to undertake studies and research cooperatively with industry and labor, state and local governments, and educational institutions, and other nonprofit organizations.

While much of the research and study authorized will be carried out by the Administrator through the Agency's own staff and facilities, for projects requiring such special facilities as laboratories, the Housing and Home Finance Agency will, to the extent feasible, utilize facilities already available, such as those operated by the Federal Government or by state universities or various nonprofit foundations or institutions that are suitable for technical research and testing work in the housing field.

The Housing and Home Finance Agency will also seek to serve as a central coordinating point for research that is already being done and to fill in the gaps with studies and projects which it undertakes. It will make use of existing techniques wherever possible. For example, data collected for mortgage insurance purposes by the Federal Housing Administration on typical costs of building materials can be valuable in analyzing housing costs; techniques and methods developed for many years by the Bureau of the Census in their population and family income surveys can be profitably employed in housing market analyses for developing local housing market analysis.

The Administrator is also directed to disseminate the results of research and studies in such form as may be most useful to the industry and general public, and information developed under the Government's research contracts is to be made available to the public through dedication, assignment to the Government, or other means.

Other Functions Authorized

In addition to the direction to undertake and conduct a program of research and studies, the Title provides:

1. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator shall submit to the President and to the Congress national estimates of urban and rural nonfarm housing needs and report on progress being made toward meeting them, and to correlate and recommend proposals for executive action or legislation to further the objective and policy established by the Housing Act of 1949. (A similar requirement is made of the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to farm housing in Title V.)

2. He shall encourage localities to make studies of their own housing needs and markets and surveys and plans for housing, urban land use, and related community development, and, where requested, to assist them with technical advice and guidance.

Operation of the Program

The Act provides that the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency shall appoint a Director to have charge of the housing research program under the Administrator's direction and supervision. The Director will have such policy, programming, and operating staff as the operations require. In addition, under authority contained in Title IV of the Act, advisory committees may be named, as needed, from representatives of industry, labor, finance, consumer, and Government groups, as well as such professional groups as architects. Experts on special subjects and problems in the technical and economic field will be called in as consultants when their assistance is needed.

First Steps Under the Program

The Housing Act of 1949 authorizes appropriations to carry out the program and the extent of the initial year's program, as well as that of any succeeding year, will be determined by the Congress through the appropriations it makes available on the basis of recommendations submitted by the President and documented by the Agency.

Housing research, however, does not start entirely from scratch. The Housing Act of 1948 directed the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to undertake and conduct technical research and studies with reference to the improvement and standardization of building codes and regulations and their administration, and standardized dimensions and methods for the assembly of housing materials and equipment (known as modular coordination). In addition, certain technical studies have been conducted incident to the regular operating and administrative needs of the Agency in past years.

The first year's operations under the program are expected to be generally of four kinds:

1. Projects under way that are to be carried to completion: These include work already launched on building codes and standardized dimensions, including the development of an interim model code for construction on which considerable work has already been done, and longer-range work on establishing the foundation for a complete model code based on performance standards.

2. Studies and research that can be started where past work or present knowledge has shown the need and the goal: Possible projects in this field include a needed study of the elements of housing costs to determine how they can be most effectively attacked to produce worth-while results; practical demonstrations of new construction techniques or materials to determine their value for general use; and developing means for filling in the more vital "missing links" in housing information and data needed by both Government and industry to provide a sound basis for a high, continuing level of production at lower costs.

3. Organization of the considerable body of existing knowledge and research that needs to be assembled, appraised, related, and disseminated for practical use.

4. A survey of existing housing research being carried on and an inventory of available research facilities: This is necessary to determine what are the most important gaps needed to be undertaken through the Federal Government.

Obviously, such a comprehensive program as the Act calls for is a long-range undertaking. It cannot all be accomplished overnight--nor over-week or over-year. The research program would not be aimed at a single miracle solution that would scrap all known and used methods of homebuilding, but rather at progressive and cumulative results, large and small, than can be put to practical day-to-day use as they become available to lower housing costs and increase production.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON
TITLE I - SLUM CLEARANCE AND URBAN REDEVELOPMENT
HOUSING ACT OF 1949

I. The Problem and Purpose

II. What Title I of the Act Provides

Types of Projects

Types of Assistance

What the Community Must Do

Rehousing the People

What Happens After Clearance

III. Readiness to Participate

State Legislation

City Preparations

IV. How a Slum Clearance and Redevelopment Program Works

A Theoretical Example

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY
Office of the Administrator
Washington 25, D. C.

July, 1949

BACKGROUND INFORMATION ON
TITLE I - SLUM CLEARANCE AND URBAN REDEVELOPMENT
HOUSING ACT OF 1949

Problem

Practically every city in the United States, both large and small, contains slum and other blighted or deteriorated areas which are major civic liabilities, unsound both economically and socially.

One of the main obstacles to clearance of slums and blighted areas is cost. Generally, the cost of acquiring an existing slum area at its current market value, and of clearing and preparing it for redevelopment is greater than the value of the land when redeveloped for its most appropriate uses. Furthermore, the large amounts of capital needed to finance large scale clearance and redevelopment of slums and other blighted areas are generally unavailable either through city resources or private investment.

Chiefly because of this cost neither private enterprise, nor local communities with their limited sources of revenue, have been able to make much headway in effective slum clearance.

Another major obstacle is the problem of providing adequate rehousing for families displaced when slums are cleared. Lack of adequate housing for these displaced families to live in has made it impossible for most cities to clear slums and blighted areas on any large scale.

* * *

The Purpose of Slum Clearance

The Housing Act of 1949 recognizes slums as a national problem. A person who becomes a juvenile delinquent or a tuberculosis case because of slum conditions is no less a national than a local liability. A slum neighborhood that requires more than its proportionate share of health and welfare services is a drain on national as well as local resources, and seriously affects the development of good citizenship and confidence in the values of democracy.

Here, briefly, is the principle behind Title I of the Housing Act of 1949: from any angle--citizenship, health, appearance, taxes, or property protection--it is better to pay now for the cost of clearing slums and thereby get rid of them than to continue paying the mounting costs of slums and suffer their destructive effects upon human lives and property indefinitely.

The Housing Act makes possible, for the first time in our history, a comprehensive attack upon slums and blighted areas by local communities. It provides the leverage that cities have long needed to get their redevelopment programs going. First, it attacks the obstacles of large capital outlays and high write-down costs for preparing slum lands for reuse by authorizing the Federal government to make loans for acquiring, clearing, and preparing the area and to make Federal grants to pay up to two-thirds of the net cost incurred.

Second, the Housing Act of 1949 helps remove the road-block of rehousing. It requires cities applying for Federal loans and grants to prepare solid plans for temporary accommodations, where needed, and permanent relocation in decent quarters of people who have to leave slum areas because of clearance operations. Under Title III it provides financial assistance to localities for 810,000 units of public housing in which priority must be given to eligible low-income families displaced by slum clearance projects. Under Title I it offers loans to acquire open land which is to be developed for primarily residential purposes, thus opening up space to assist construction to provide rehousing for those having to leave slum clearance sites, and helping to relieve the pressure of overcrowding in present and soon-to-be-torn-down slums.

It should be noted that Federal financial aid is used only to acquire, clear, and prepare the land. It is not available for rebuilding an area. However, in the case of projects on open or predominantly open land, loans can be made to municipalities and other public bodies for schools and other public facilities necessary to support the new uses of the land. The reconstruction of the area is undertaken by private and public interests that acquire the property for its proposed new uses, since the price to be paid will be consistent with its economical development for such purposes.

Achieving Broad Redevelopment

Throughout the Housing Act of 1949, and particularly in title I, continual strong emphasis is placed on the elimination of unsafe, insanitary and inadequate existing housing and stimulation of provision of decent, safe, and sanitary new housing. The reason for this emphasis is simple: The Housing Act of 1949 sets forth as a national objective of a comprehensive housing program the realization of a decent home in a good living environment for every American family as soon as feasible. This objective cannot be achieved without a comprehensive, soundly-planned slum clearance and redevelopment program.

The slum clearance program aims not only to eliminate present slums, but also to prevent their recurrence. That is why a redevelopment plan must conform to a general local plan as a requirement for Federal loan and grant assistance. Such planning is necessary to insure orderly community growth, prevent the recurrence of slums, and to stabilize and protect property values and investments in the future. If good new housing is to stay good, it must have readily available the necessary public facilities, such as parks, playgrounds, schools, and streets; convenient access to commercial and industrial areas; and assurance that its new use will be related to future as well as present development and needs.

WHAT TITLE I OF THE HOUSING ACT PROVIDES

Types of Projects: Federal assistance is available for four types of projects. Such projects, to qualify for Federal assistance under the Act, must be predominantly residential either before or after their redevelopment.

1. Residential slum or blighted areas: Any slum area or any deteriorating or deteriorated areas which, prior to redevelopment, is predominantly residential in character. Federal assistance is available in such case without restriction or limitation as to the types or categories of uses for which such an area is to be redeveloped. Thus such an area may be redeveloped for any locally approved use or combination of uses. Both loans and grants are available for this type of project. Typical of this classification are the familiar slum areas, with their overcrowded tenement and ramshackle old dwellings and other structures, that are found in virtually every city.

2. Non-residential blighted areas: Any deteriorated or deteriorating area which, prior to redevelopment, is not predominantly residential in character. Federal assistance is available in such cases only if the area is to be redeveloped for predominantly residential uses. Both loans and grants are available for this type of project. Examples are run-down areas that ring the centers of many cities, with commercial plants and shops that could more suitably be located elsewhere and be replaced by good houses and apartments for people who prefer or need to live close to the center of the city.

3. Predominantly open areas: Any land which is predominantly open and which because of obsolete platting, diversity of ownership, deterioration of structures or of site improvements, or otherwise, substantially impairs or arrests the sound growth of the community. Federal assistance is available in such case only if the land is to be developed for predominantly residential uses. Both loans and grants are available for this type of project, but it is expected that both the acquisition and write-down costs for this type of project will usually be much less than for a built-up slum area. Typical of such land are the optimistic subdivisions of the 1920's, where crumbling sidewalks and tax-delinquent, weed-grown lots are choking city growth, although they already have streets and utilities and if redeveloped and replanned, may lend themselves to redevelopment as good residential tax payers.

4. Open areas: Any open land—land inside or outside the corporate limits on which there has been virtually no urban development necessary for sound community growth. Federal assistance is available in such case only if the land is to be developed for predominantly residential uses. Loans are available for this type of project, but grants are not available. Such development may be needed to provide more living space for those now crowded in slums and blighted areas and who will have to leave clearance areas.

Types of Assistance: Three types of financial assistance are available.

1. Advance of funds. Advances of funds may be made to local public agencies for surveys and plans in preparation of projects which may be assisted under Title I of the Act. A condition of such advances will be that projects planned are consistent with all requirements of Title I. Such advances must be repaid, with interest, out of any moneys which become available to such agency for the project or projects involved.

2. Loans.

Amount. A total of $1,000,000,000 to become available over a period of five years--$25,000,000 as of July 1, 1949, $225,000,000 on July 1, 1950, and $250,000,000 for each of the three following fiscal years. The President has authority to increase the authorization in any one year by $250,000,000, but the total authorization of $1,000,000,000 remains the same.

Temporary loans may be made to local public agencies to finance the initial costs of planning a project, assembling, clearing and preparing the land for sale or lease, and selling and leasing the land.

In the case of any project on land which is open or predominantly open, temporary loans may be made to municipalities or other public bodies for the provision of schools or other public facilities necessary to serve or support the new uses of the land. Such loans must be repaid in not to exceed 10 years.

Long-term loans are also authorized. Such loans would in all probability be used only in cases where all or part of the land acquired in a project area is leased for redevelopment, since, if the land were sold, the proceeds received from the sale thereof plus the capital grants paid would be used to repay the temporary loans. The long-term loans must be repaid in not to exceed 40 years.

3. Capital Grants.

Amount: The Act authorizes $500,000,000 for capital grants for slum clearance and redevelopment projects, becoming available at the rate of $100,000,000 per year for five years. The President has authority to increase the amount authorized in any one year by $100,000,000, but the $500,000,000 total remains the same.

Federal capital grants are available for assisting local public agencies to finance the "net project cost"--the difference between necessary costs of acquiring, clearing, and making slum land available for new uses consistent with sound planning and good living standards and the capital proceeds received from the sale or lease of land when it is disposed of. Cities obtaining Federal capital grants must pay at least one-third of the total net project cost of all projects undertaken with Federal assistance, either in cash or in certain donations of land, improvements, and services that can be substituted by the city for cash. Federal grants may be obtained for paying the balance.

Not more than 10 percent of the funds authorized for either Federal loans or Federal grants can be expended in any one State.

Rate of Interest. Advances of funds and temporary and long term loans bear interest at not less than the "going Federal rate" defined as the annual rate of interest specified in the most recently issued bonds of the Federal government having a maturity of 10 years or more. Currently, the going Federal rate is 2½ per cent a year.

What the Community Must Do: Slum clearance and redevelopment projects must be local undertakings, locally planned, approved, and managed, and designed to serve local needs.

To qualify for Federal assistance, there are certain statutory requirements which the community must meet, among which are:

1. A local public agency established under State law and fully authorized to undertake the project.

2. A detailed plan, approved by the governing body of the locality in which the project is situated, for the redevelopment of the project area which conforms to the general plan for the development of the locality.

3. A general plan for the development of the locality as a whole.

4. Findings by the local governing body that the Federal assistance is necessary to enable the project area to be redeveloped in accordance with the locally approved plan.

5. Maximum opportunity, consistent with the sound needs of the locality, for the redevelopment of the project areas by private enterprise.

6. A public hearing, prior to the acquisition of the land, after notice of the date, time, place, and purpose of such hearing.

7. Ability to furnish the required amount of local grants-in-aid.

8. A feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the project area.

9. Assurance that there is or will be permanent housing at rents or prices within the financial means of the families displaced from the project area equal to the number of and available to such displaced families, and in areas not generally less desirable in regard to public utilities and facilities and reasonably accessible to their places of employment.

Rehousing the People: Families living in an area to be cleared must be assured both of temporary housing during the clearance period and of permanent housing after it is completed. Some may be rehoused in the rebuilt area, though others may be permanently housed elsewhere, either because they prefer to live elsewhere or they cannot be accommodated in the area under its new uses. The city, however, must assure that decent, safe, and sanitary permanent housing within the financial means of such families exists or is being provided in time to meet the need. Private housing may be available for this purpose. Also, the community, if authorized by State public housing laws, may obtain Federal aid under Title III of the act to provide public housing for low-income families displaced from slum clearance projects. Under the Housing Act of 1949, such families have first preference in public housing projects assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended.

The Act also provides that demolition of housing in project areas may not begin before July 1, 1950 if the local governing body finds that such demolition would result in undue housing hardship in the community.

What Happens After the Area is Cleared: After the area has been acquired, cleared, and prepared for redevelopment, the land may be sold, leased, or transferred for uses consistent with approved redevelopment plans; such as, housing, industrial, business or commercial use, parks, schools, public housing projects. When the area is disposed of at its new-use value, the temporary loans will be repaid from the proceeds of sale received plus the Federal capital grants and the local grants-in-aid, together with the proceeds of permanent loans made to cover any long-term leases of land in the project area.

Ready for Participation: Before a community can participate in the benefits of the slum clearance program under Title I, it must have a duly authorized local agency with the necessary powers under state or local law to carry out the functions and fulfill the obligations of a slum clearance and redevelopment program as provided for under the Housing Act of 1949.

Twenty-seven states, plus the District of Columbia, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, do have some type of specific slum clearance and urban redevelopment enabling legislation. However, existing laws, such as public housing legislation, in some of the remaining 21 states, may also confer the part or all of the necessary authority on local communities to participate in the Title I program. Full information on these existing laws is not yet available. Furthermore, local communities in states having enabling legislation may still have to take some type of local action, in addition to that required by the Federal Act, to complete their authority to initiate a slum clearance program.

States: The thirty political jurisdictions that have some type of specific slum clearance and urban redevelopment enabling legislation are:

Arkansas	Kansas	New York
California	Kentucky	Ohio
Colorado	Louisiana	Oregon
Connecticut	Maryland	Pennsylvania
District of Columbia	Massachusetts	Puerto Rico
Florida	Michigan	Rhode Island
Georgia	Minnesota	South Carolina
Hawaii	Missouri	Tennessee
Illinois	New Hampshire	Virginia
Indiana	New Jersey	Wisconsin

However, in three of these States--Indiana, Missouri, and New York--the slum clearance laws themselves do not specifically authorize borrowing of Federal funds or acceptance of Federal grants, and Kansas and Kentucky slum clearance laws authorize redevelopment by private corporations only. The remaining 25 jurisdictions specifically permit participation in the Title I program, with 8 authorizing development by specially created local redevelopment agencies, 4 authorizing the cities to undertake it directly, and 13 designating local housing authorities as their redevelopment agencies. Adjustments of an administrative nature and in some cases possibly further legislative action may be necessary in some of these States to conform State authorizations to specific Federal requirements as contained in the Housing Act of 1949.

Cities: On the basis of recent information available to the Housing and Home Finance Agency, several cities have redevelopment plans and projects ready to go and should be in a position to apply, if they so desire, for Federal loans and grants within the coming year. They include: Baltimore, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Norfolk, Philadelphia, Providence, Miami.

About 70 cities have made considerable progress with redevelopment planning and are apparently at the stage where they could qualify for advances to get started on planning for specific clearance projects. These cities include Los Angeles, San Francisco, Pontiac, Little Rock, Ark., Augusta and Columbus, Ga., and Duluth, Minn.

While the above information on readiness of cities to participate in the Federal loan and grant program is the best currently available, it is not comprehensive, and should be used in connection with more detailed and current local information. The actual decision to participate, however, is a local matter, and requires official local action.

How A Slum Clearance and Redevelopment Program Works: Following is a hypothetical example of a slum clearance and redevelopment program as it might operate under Title I. Figures used are not to be taken literally since they do not represent costs of any actual project, but are given for illustrative purposes only.

Suppose Central City decides it wants to get rid of an undesirable slum area, but is unable to finance the undertaking without Federal assistance. Since the Housing Act of 1949 states that loans and grants will be made to a local public agency which is authorized to carry on slum clearance work (this may be a public housing authority, a special redevelopment agency, or a department of the city government), Central City has chosen to create a redevelopment agency as authorized by the urban redevelopment laws of its state.

In addition, Central City meets Federal loan and grant assistance requirements by having a general city plan for the development of the locality as a whole, and land use, health, and sanitary codes for halting or preventing further growth of slums and has taken steps to encourage the reduction of housing costs through modernization of its building code. In short, Central City and its redevelopment agency mean business-slum clearance business. What the community needs at this time is an advance of funds of about $20,000 to finance surveys of its slum area and the preparation of a specific project. On the basis of the agency's application for these funds meeting with Federal approval, it receives a $20,000 advance, to be repaid when a project is approved and aided by Federal loans and grants.

Some months later the agency is ready for a temporary loan to carry out a specific project. By now it can show in black-and-white estimates of how much money it needs to undertake the project, including a complete breakdown of costs and anticipated returns. It has definite plans both for the work to be done in the project and for its future development; it has official city approval of the project; and it has a plan for rehousing families that will be displaced by clearance operations. In addition, Central City has agreed to contribute about $350,000 in donations of land, services, such as demolition work, and such site improvements as streets and utilities, and other public improvements that will serve the project - schools, playgrounds, etc.

The agency estimates that the project will call for $1,650,000, in addition to the $350,000 in local contributions, to acquire, clear, and prepare the project area for redevelopment. The agency's application is approved by the Federal government and it enters into a contract to receive a Federal loan to finance the project expenditures to be made by the agency, and a commitment for a Federal grant to meet up up to two-thirds of the loss the agency incurs when the cleared land is sold or leased for redevelopment.

The slum area is bought, cleared, and readied for redevelopment by the agency. The gross cost, including the $20,000 advance for planning, the $350,000 contributed by Central City in land, services and improvements, and the $1,650,000 spent by the redevelopment agency, totals $2,020,000. The land in the area is sold for $820,000, leaving the project $1,200,000 in the red.

Towards this loss the city can count on $800,000 from the Federal government in the form of capital grants, since the contract with the redevelopment agency states that the government will meet up to two-thirds of the deficit incurred by an agency in buying, clearing, and preparing slum lands and disposing of them for redevelopment. The $400,000 balance must be made up by Central City. However, the $350,000 that Central City has already contributed in land, services, and improvements for the project are applied against the balance, so that the city needs to pay $50,000 in cash.

If the agency has decided to lease rather than sell certain portions of the cleared land in the project, it could have refinanced the leased portions at their reuse value with a Federal loan that could run as long as 40 years, bearing interest at the going Federal rate. The amount of this loan would have appeared in the proceeds just as though the land had been sold.

# #

12 QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS
ABOUT THE PUBLIC LOW-RENT HOUSING PROGRAM

1. Why is public housing necessary?

Food, clothing and shelter are the essentials of life. Most American families -- even those well down on the income scale -- can obtain enough good food and decent clothing to sustain life and health.

With shelter, it's different. Although most Americans can meet their housing needs without help, families at the bottom of the scale can't afford to buy or rent good homes. They can take care of their food and clothing needs. But good housing is beyond their reach. Economic necessity sends them to live in the slums. Slum housing is neither decent, safe, nor sanitary. It is a hazard to its occupants and to the community.

Public housing uses a subsidy to put decent, safe and sanitary housing within the reach of these low income families from the slums. It is the only method yet devised for providing good housing to rent at prices that families in the lowest income groups can afford.

2. What's new about this program?

The size, but not the idea. The Federal government has been helping localities to build and operate low-rent public housing since 1937. The U. S. Housing Act of 1937 provided capital loans to get such housing built and annual contributions (subsidies) to keep rents low. A total of 191,700 dwelling units in 268 localities are being operated under that program.

The Housing Act of 1949 simply extends this program by amendments to the 1937 Act. It raises available loan funds to $1,500,000,000, and authorizes as much as $308,000,000 to be spent for subsidy each year for 40 years. With these aids, an additional 810,000 public housing units may be put under construction in the next six years.

3. Are there any differences -- other than size -- between the old program and the new?

Yes, there are several. Most of them are refinements drawn from the 12 years' experience that has gone before. Some merely write into law policies and practices already in effect.

For instance: The new law requires that a substantial gap be left between the bottom of the market served by private housing and the top of the market served by public housing. It also requires local housing authorities to set dollar income limits for tenants to make sure that only low income families are housed in the projects. Both of these things have been done by administrative practice for years. Now they are a matter of law.

One important change is in the statutory limit on how much public housing can cost. Under the 1937 Act, the cost to build and equip public housing could be no more than $1,000 a room, or $1,250 in cities of more than half a million population. That was reasonable 12 years ago.

But fireproof, apartment-type projects can't be built for that today. So the 1949 Act sets the maximum cost at $1,750 per room. An extra $750 may be allowed in some high-cost areas. That brings the law into line with today's construction costs.

The original act also contained a per dwelling cost limit. The new limit is on a per room basis only. This change was made to permit construction of larger units for big families. Many low income families are larger than average.

Big families get another break in the new law. When their incomes are examined to see if they are eligible for public housing, they are allowed a $100 exemption for each child. This consideration recognizes that it costs big families more to live than small families.

There are also a number of technical changes designed to make securities issued by local housing authorities more attractive to private investors. This will result in lower interest rates and, in the end, save the government money.

4. Who can get these loans and subsidies?

They go only to local housing authorities. These are local public bodies established under state statutes. Forty-two states, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands already have the necessary laws authorizing creation of such authorities. Nearly 500 authorities now exist and have experience with public housing programs. The only states which have not yet adopted such laws are Iowa, Kansas, Utah, Wyoming, Oklahoma and South Dakota.

5. How does a local authority get into the program?

When a local housing authority finds there is a need in its locality for low-rent housing for low income families that is not being met by private housing, it may make an application to the Public Housing Administration for a "program reservation." This application must be accompanied by pertinent data proving the existence and extent of the need for public housing. The program reservation merely sets aside a certain number of units for the community from the quota available for allocation at the time.

Then the authority may get a small preliminary loan to pay for planning its project. The city council must approve the local authority's application for this loan.

When the project is planned and approved, PHA will contract with the authority for the necessary loans and agree to pay the annual contributions required to keep rents low. This contract for assistance will be conditioned, of course, on the authority's agreement to house only low income families, to maintain the gap between public housing and private housing, to stay within the cost limits and otherwise abide by the purposes and requirements of the program. With these contracts and agreements made, the local authority can go ahead with building the project and putting it into operation.

6. How fast will the program move?

The law permits PHA to authorize construction of 135,000 units a year for six years. The President can step up the rate to 200,000 units a year or slow it down to 50,000 units a year if economic conditions warrant. Much will depend, of course, on how quickly the localities undertake their programs, complete plans, acquire sites and get construction underway. It is expected that about 50,000 units will get under construction in the next 12 months.

7. Who lives in public housing?

Only low income families are eligible to be admitted and to live in low-rent public housing projects. Each locality will establish income limits for admission and continued occupancy to make sure that tenant families fall within the low income group. Other factors also figure in determining eligibility. These include requirements of citizenship, residence in substandard housing and preferences for veterans and persons displaced by public slum clearance, and urban redevelopment projects.

8. Will public housing compete with private housing?

Not with standard housing -- just with slum housing. The system of income limits and the gap between public and private housing insure that public housing will serve only those families who cannot afford the cheapest of the adequate housing provided by private enterprise. Since the tenants of public housing will be families who can't afford standard housing, they are not part of the market that private housing serves.

9. What does private business get out of the program?

All construction is done by private contractors who get the work by competitive bidding. This means business for private architects, engineers, materials manufacturers and suppliers, too. Since the project will be financed in large part by private borrowings, this means business for bankers and investors. Other business in the community stands to gain because the tenants of public housing, paying rents commensurate with their incomes, will have enough money left over for such essentials as food and clothing.

10. Is public housing "low cost" housing?

It is "low cost" to the tenant. That is why "low rent housing" is a more precise name for it.

Every possible economy consistent with minimum standards, long life and low upkeep is made in building and operating the projects. But public housing has no magic formula for cutting costs. The costs of building public housing are the costs of private construction. The projects are built by private contractors, paying prevailing wages and using materials bought in the same way as though the job were being done for a private owner.

In the prewar program, the average total cost was $4,649 a dwelling. This compares favorably with the costs of comparable housing built for private owners. If the full authorizations in the new program are used, the maximum cost per unit would average $8,450.

11. Will public housing clear slums?

In urban areas, the law requires that substantially the same number of slum dwellings be eliminated as the number of public housing units built in the locality. This may be done by demolishing, closing, or rehabilitating existing substandard housing within five years after the public housing project is completed. The slum elimination may be deferred in places where there is an acute shortage of adequate housing for low income families and is not required if a public housing project is built on a slum site cleared since the Housing Act of 1949 was enacted.

Title I of the Housing Act of 1949 -- the slum clearance and urban redevelopment program -- establishes a broader attack on the slums. Public housing is closely related to urban redevelopment and essential to it because slums cannot be cleared unless other housing is available for the people who live in them. For the most part, these are families in the lowest income group who can be adequately housed only through public housing.

12. How much will the program cost?

The $1,500,000,000 in loan funds for the public housing program is not an out-of-pocket cost. All loans will be repaid in full, with interest. The only out-of-pocket cost to the Federal government is for annual contributions. These may go no higher than $308,000,000 a year for 40 years, a total of $12,320,000,000. However, the subsidy is paid only to the extent needed each year. In the past, the public housing program has actually used only 58.5 percent of the maximum subsidy available. For the new program, it is estimated that the actual expenditure for subsidies over the full span of the program will amount to between $7,000,000,000 and $8,000,000,000.

7-27-49

BRIEF SUMMARY OF THE HOUSING ACT OF 1949

Short Title and Declaration of National Housing Policy

The short title of the Act is the "Housing Act of 1949".

Section 2 of the Act establishes national housing objectives and the policies to be followed in attaining them. The declaration states that --

> "the general welfare and security of the Nation and the health and living standards of its people require housing production and related community development sufficient to remedy the serious housing shortage, the elimination of substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, and the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family, thus contributing to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation."

The Act provides that private housing enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can; that local public bodies shall be encouraged to undertake positive programs to assist the development of well-planned, residential neighborhoods, the development and redevelopment of communities, and the production, at lower costs, of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; and that governmental assistance shall be given to eliminate substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, to provide adequate housing needed for urban and rural nonfarm families of low incomes where such need is not being met through reliance solely upon private enterprise, and to provide decent, safe and sanitary farm dwellings and related facilities where the farm owner demonstrates that he lacks sufficient resources and credit to provide such housing.

The Act requires the Housing and Home Finance Agency, and any other departments or agencies of the Federal Government having functions with respect to housing to exercise their functions consistently with these national housing objectives and policies and in such manner as will encourage and assist (1) the production of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; (2) the reduction of the costs of housing without sacrifice of such sound standards; (3) the use of new designs, materials, techniques, and methods in residential construction and the increase of efficiency in residential construction and maintenance; (4) the development of well-planned, residential neighborhoods and the development and redevelopment of communities; and (5) the stabilization of the housing industry at a high annual volume of residential construction.

RECEIVED
JUL 27 1949

Title I - Slum Clearance and Community Development and Redevelopment

This title authorizes the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to make loans and grants to localities to assist locally initiated, locally planned, and locally managed slum-clearance and urban redevelopment undertakings. A local public agency would, after public hearing, acquire (through purchase or condemnation) a slum or blighted or deteriorating area selected in accordance with a general city plan for the development of the locality as a whole. The local public agency would then clear the land and make it available, by sale, or lease, for private or public redevelopment or development in accordance with a predetermined local redevelopment plan for the area.

The Act authorizes $1,000,000,000 in loans over a five-year period. Advances of funds would be available to finance the planning of local projects, and temporary loans for the acquisition and clearance of land, and the preparation of the land for reuse; these loans would be repayable when the land is sold or leased for redevelopment. Long-term Federal loans would be available to refinance the portions of the sites which are leased and would be secured by the rentals from the leased land.

The Act also authorizes $500,000,000 in Federal capital grants over a five-year period, in order to help meet the loss involved in connection with slum clearance operations. This loss would be shared on a 2-to-1 basis - the Federal Government making up two-thirds of the loss and the local government making up one-third. Thus the Federal capital grants may not exceed two-thirds of the losses on all clearance projects undertaken in any one locality. The local public agencies may provide their share either in cash or through the provision of parks or schools or other public facilities necessary to serve or support the new uses of land in the project areas, the installation of streets, utilities, and other site improvements, or the use of municipal labor and equipment to clear a project area. While Federal loan assistance is available for projects involving open land, no capital grants may be made for such projects.

Federal assistance would be available to defray the costs of acquisition and clearance of slum areas and the preparation of the sites for redevelopment; none of the funds would be available for building construction on the cleared sites, except that, in connection with the development of open or predominantly open areas, provision is made for temporary loans (repayable in not to exceed 10 years) for schools or other public facilities necessary to serve or support the new uses of land in the area.

As a further condition to Federal aid there must be a feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the project area and the permanent provision of decent, safe and sanitary dwellings at prices and rents within the financial means of such families. (First preference to such displaced families of low income is required in public housing projects provided under title III of the Act). The demolition of residential structures in connection with slum clearance projects is prohibited until July 1, 1951, if the local governing body determines that it would create undue housing hardship in the locality.

Not more than 10 per centum of the funds provided for loans or grants may be expended in any one State.

Title II - Amendments to National Housing Act

This title (pending further action by the Congress) provides for temporary extensions (through August 31, 1949) of FHA's title I and section 608 mortgage insurance operations; also for a $500 million increase in its title II insurance authorization. The extensions under title I relate to small loans for alteration and improvement and new construction and under section 608 to rental housing. The increase in insurance authorization applies to all types of housing under title II, owner-occupied, small and large scale rental and sale housing, including cooperative housing.

Title III - Low-Rent Public Housing

This title amends the United States Housing Act of 1937 by authorizing Federal contributions and loans for local programs involving not to exceed 810,000 additional units of low-rent public housing over a six-year period. The Public Housing Administration may authorize local authorities to commence construction of 135,000 units each year. The President, however, is authorized to accelerate the program to not more than 200,000 units per year or to retard the program to not less than 50,000 units per year, subject to the total authorization of 810,000 units, if he determines, after advice from the Council of Economic Advisers, that such action is in the public interest.

Federal annual contributions may not exceed the amounts which, with the required local tax exemption, are necessary to make up the difference between the rents which the low-income families can afford to pay and the annual costs incurred in the operation of the projects, including interest and amortization of all capital borrowings. In no event may they exceed the aggregate annual contributions authorization, reaching a maximum rate of $308,000,000 per year after the total program is in operation.

The Act reduces the maximum period for loans and annual contributions from 60 to 40 years and adjusts the basis for Federal contributions in accordance with the increased annual amortization requirements.

Provisions in this title strengthen the statutory safeguards to assure that occupancy of projects is limited to low-income families in need of adequate housing. As in the past, annual incomes of families on admission may not exceed five times the rent, including utilities, but the Act recognizes the needs of larger families by exempting from income $100 per year for each minor dependent. The title further requires local authorities (1) to establish upper rental limits for admission to projects at least 20 percent below the lowest rents at which private enterprise unaided by public subsidy is providing an adequate supply of decent housing in the respective localities, (2) to provide maximum income limits for admission and continued occupancy, (3) to require the removal of families found to be ineligible as the result of periodic reexaminations of tenant incomes, (4) not to discriminate against welfare cases, and (5) subject to specific preferences stated below, to give preference to families having the most urgent needs. In determining the eligibility of families for continued occupancy, the local housing authorities may exempt $100 for each minor or any part of the income received by minor members of the families (since such income normally will be available to the tenant families only for a short period).

Families who are otherwise eligible and who are displaced or are about to be displaced by public slum clearance, redevelopment or low-rent housing projects will be given a first preference for admission to low-rent housing. Among such displaced families, veterans with service-connected disabilities have first preference, families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose death was service-connected have second preference, and other veterans or servicemen have a third preference. As among families who have not been displaced by slum clearance, preference shall be extended to veterans and servicemen and among such families of veterans with service-connected disabilities have first preference and families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose death was service-connected have second preference. These preferences are extended to veterans and servicemen of World War I and World War II.

The Act fixes the limitation on the cost of construction and equipment of dwelling facilities to $1,750 per room. An increase in this cost limitation of not more than $750 per room is authorized in areas where it would not be feasible without such increase to construct sound housing. In no event may a project be undertaken which is of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

The Act repeals existing equivalent elimination requirements, but substitutes a requirement that no financial assistance (other than preliminary loans) shall be made available for any low-rent housing project unless the governing body of the locality involved agrees that there will be eliminated within 5 years after completion of the project unsafe or insanitary dwellings substantially equal in number to the number of newly constructed dwelling units provided in the project. Under the old requirement only one unsafe or insanitary dwelling unit could be counted, even though it may have accommodated several families. But under the new formula, if more than one family is living in an unsafe or insanitary dwelling unit the elimination of such unit shall count as the elimination of units equal to the number of families accommodated. The elimination requirement does not apply to rural nonfarm housing projects or to any public housing projects located on a slum site that has been cleared for urban redevelopment under title I of the Act. The Public Housing Administration may defer beyond 5 years the required elimination in any locality or metropolitan area where there is an acute shortage of decent, safe, or sanitary housing available to families of low income.

Title IV - Housing Research

This title authorizes the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to undertake and conduct technical research and studies which will promote reduction in housing construction and maintenance costs and stimulate the increased production of housing.

The research may also be concerned with improved building codes; standardized dimensions and methods for the assembly of home building materials and equipment; improved residential design and construction; new types of materials, equipment and construction; and may relate to appraisal, credit, housing needs, demand and supply, land costs, use and improvement, and related technical and economic research. The Administrator shall also prepare estimates of national housing needs and encourage and assist localities to make studies of their own housing needs and markets and plans for housing and community development.

The Administrator shall utilize to the fullest extent feasible the available facilities of other Federal agencies and is authorized to undertake research and studies cooperatively with industry and labor and with State or local governments, educational institutions and other nonprofit organizations.

Title V - Farm Housing

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to extend financial assistance to farm owners to enable them to construct, improve, or repair farm housing or other farm buildings as follows:

1. Loans up to 33 years at not to exceed 4 per centum interest, to owners of self-sustaining farms who are otherwise unable to finance adequate housing or other needed building improvements for themselves or others working on the farms.

2. Similar loans, supplemented by annual contributions, to owners whose farms are not presently self-sustaining but which may be brought up to a self-sustaining level through a satisfactory program of enlargement, improvement, or adjusted farm practices. The subsidies, applied as a partial credit on interest and principal payments, could not be made available to an owner for more than 5 years and, in the aggregate, could not exceed $5,000,000 annually after the third year of the program; lesser amounts would be authorized for the earlier years.

3. Loans and grants for minor improvements and minimum repairs to farm dwellings and buildings on farms which cannot be made self-sustaining. The amount available would be limited to $1,000 for any one farm or dwelling or building owned by one individual, and the grant portion with respect to any one dwelling or building could not exceed $500.

4. Loans to encourage adequate family size farms where a farm needs enlargement or development in order to provide income sufficient to support decent, safe, and sanitary housing and other farm buildings.

This title authorizes loans aggregating $250,000,000, contributions for a period of 5 years not exceeding $5,000,000 per year, and loans and grants for a period of 5 years totalling $25,000,000 for minor improvements and land purchases.

Title VI - Miscellaneous Provisions - Housing Census

Among the miscellaneous provisions in the bill, the Director of the Census is directed to take a census of housing in 1950 and decennially thereafter.

This title amends and supersedes existing provisions for the conversion of eligible State-aided low-rent or veterans' housing projects to low-rent housing assisted under the United States Housing Act of 1937.

The National Banking Act is liberalized with respect to the authority of national banks and State member banks of the Federal Reserve System to purchase or underwrite certain obligations of local public housing and slum clearance agencies.

This title also restores the right of the National Capital Housing Authority (which is the low-rent public housing agency for the District of Columbia) to acquire sites within the District of Columbia for low-rent public housing projects.

The District of Columbia is also authorized, to participate, on the same basis as other authorized localities, in the slum clearance and urban redevelopment benefits authorized in Title I of the Act, but no loans or grants under Title I may be extended for the District of Columbia, with respect to any project for which Congress, after being presented with a budget estimate to make an appropriation under provisions of the District of Columbia Redevelopment Act, makes no funds available.

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY
Office of the Administrator
Washington 25, D. C.

July, 1949

16 Housing

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY

WASHINGTON 25, D. C.

OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR

December 2, 1949

Mrs. M. E. Tilly, Secretary
Christian Social Relations and Local Church Activities
Women's Society of Christian Services
Southeastern Jurisdiction of the Methodist Church
1013 Highland View, N. E.
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mrs. Tilly:

It is a great pleasure for us to be able to advise you concerning an important step which the Federal Housing Administration is taking in connection with racial restrictive covenants. The enclosed statement will supply you with the details of the action.

Sincerely yours,

Franklin D. Richards

Franklin D. Richards
Commissioner
Federal Housing Administration

I Raymond M Foley

Raymond M. Foley
Administrator
Housing and Home Finance Agency

Enclosure

Not to be released before
1:30 P. M., Friday,
December 2nd, 1949

STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL PHILIP B. PERLMAN AT LUNCHEON SESSION OF STATE-WIDE CONFERENCE OF
NEW YORK STATE COMMITTEE ON DISCRIMINATION IN HOUSING
HOTEL MARTINIQUE, 32ND STREET, BROADWAY,
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1949 AT 1 P. M.

President Truman and Housing and Home Finance Administrator Foley have authorized Attorney General McGrath, for whom I speak today, to tell you that the Federal Housing Administration is amending its rules so as to refuse to aid the financing of any properties the occupancy or use of which is restricted on the basis of race or creed or color.

Under the amendments to be issued no property will be eligible for FHA mortgage insurance if, after a date to be specified in the amendments and before the FHA insured mortgage is recorded, there has been recorded a covenant racially restricting the use or occupancy of the property.

Because of the important questions of law and public policy involved, the decision of FHA Commissioner Richards was reached after consultations held at the White House and the Department of Justice with the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, of which FHA is a constituent agency, and with the legal representatives of both agencies. Consultations have also been held with Veterans Administrator Gray who has authorized the statement that he is taking action to amend G. I. regulations along lines parallel to those of the FHA.

In addition to the basic rule on the ineligibility of racially restricted properties in the future, the amendments will require the mortgagor to certify that until the insured mortgage is paid in full or the contract of insurance otherwise terminated, he will not file for record any restriction upon the sale or occupancy of the mortgaged property on the basis of race, creed or color or execute any agreement, lease or conveyance which imposes any such restriction upon its sale or occupancy. The amendments will also require the insured mortgage to contain a covenant to the same effect which in the event of violation will give the mortgagee the right at its option to declare the unpaid balance of the mortgage immediately due and payable.

The new rules will not affect mortgage insurance already in force and will apply only to properties where the covenant in question and the insured mortgage are recorded after the date to be specified.

These actions are designed to bring the mortgage insurance operations of the Federal Housing Administration fully into line with the policy underlying the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the covenants cases to the effect that, although individuals may be free to impose or comply with restrictive racial covenants, governmental support of such covenants is contrary to the public policy of the United States and cannot be enforced by State or Federal Courts.

These actions also extend the existing FHA policies ~~to which~~ already eliminate type of occupancy based on race, creed or color as a determining factor in the approval of mortgages for FHA insurance. They will extend the policy by making future loans on properties that may be subject to private agreement to restrict occupancy by reason of race, creed or color ineligible for Government assistance through mortgage insurance if such a restrictive covenant is filed for record after the specified date.

Regulations putting the action into effect have already been prepared by the FHA and will be issued as soon as the new FHA forms of mortgages and commitments required by the changed regulations can be printed.

The amendments to the FHA regulations will apply to all types of mortgage insurance under Titles II, VI and VIII of the National Housing Act, and also the guaranty of yield on investments in rental housing projects under Title VII of the Act.

These amendments of the FHA rules and regulations give effect to the public policy expressed on so many occasions by the President; and they also implement the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the covenants cases. The Government participated in those cases, and argued for the decision which paved the way for such action as is now to become a permanent part of the Government's operations in guaranteeing or insuring loans for private housing.

President Truman has been working on this matter for some time, and is most happy over the result of his efforts.

Administrator Foley, in connection with this announcement, said: "I consider the FHA's action to be in full conformance with the public policy of the United States and essential to the public interest. The housing problem has its most acute and critical manifestations in the area of minority housing. There is growing realization of this in the housing industry itself and more is being done than ever before, though still far too little, toward making good housing available to the minorities, particularly Negroes.

"We have no greater challenge ahead of us than to achieve a more democratic distribution of our expanding housing supply. The action the FHA, in line with the Supreme Court decision, is now taking is a positive step in that direction."

Commissioner Richards said: "The FHA has laid much emphasis on the need for more adequate housing for Negroes with increasingly greater results and it will always, as in this matter, adjust its policies in any legitimate way that promises to make its services more effective to all American families."

Attorney General McGrath had hoped to be able to make this announcement personally. He regrets he was not able to accept your invitation to be with you on this occasion, so that he could tell you that he believes the action announced today marks an important and far-reaching gain in the effort to eliminate discriminations based on race or creed or color from American life.

Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment

The What and Why of Title I Housing Act of 1949

Housing and Home Finance Agency
Office of the Administrator
Division of
Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment
November 1950

For sale by the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C. - Price 10 cents
GPO: 1951—O 915901

"The Congress hereby declares that the general welfare and security of the Nation and the health and living standards of its people require . . . the elimination of substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, and the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family, thus contributing to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation. . . .

"The policy to be followed . . . shall be (1) private enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can; (2) governmental assistance shall be utilized where feasible to enable private enterprise to serve more of the total need; (3) appropriate local public bodies shall be encouraged and assisted to undertake positive programs of encouraging and assisting the development of well-planned, integrated residential neighborhoods, the development and redevelopment of communities, and the production, at lower costs, of housing of sound standards of design, construction, livability, and size for adequate family life; (4) governmental assistance to eliminate substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas . . ."

—Declaration of National Housing Policy, Housing Act of 1949

Why a Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment Program?

Practically every large city and many smaller localities contain slums. In fact, one-fifth of our urban families—somewhere between 10 and 15 million people who live in cities and towns—live in slums and blighted areas. For years these areas have been recognized as major civic liabilities . . . unsound both economically and socially.

And for years communities and private groups have tried to get rid of these undesirable places, but with very little success. First, the cost has been too great—usually the expense involved in acquiring slum land at its market value, clearing it, and getting it ready for redevelopment has been more than communities or private developers could afford.

Second, when slums are cleared, people are displaced and must have other living quarters. The shortage of good housing for these people has blocked most slum clearance plans.

Housing Act of 1949:
A Start Towards a Solution

The Housing Act of 1949 is designed to help localities solve their slum problem. It authorizes the Federal Government to make loans up to $1 billion outstanding at any one time and capital grants totaling $500 million to localities to enable them to overcome the high cost of clearing and making slum areas available for redevelopment. Further, it requires cities undertaking slum clearance projects with Federal assistance to see that decent housing is provided for families displaced by clearance operations. A considerable part of the rehousing obstacle will be eliminated through additional new units of low-rent public housing authorized by Title III of the act in which priority must be given to eligible low-income families displaced by redevelopment projects.

It Is Better To Pay Now . . .

The Housing Act of 1949 recognizes slums as a national problem and responsibility. Behind Title I—the slum clearance and urban redevelopment section of the act—is the principle that, from any angle—citizenship, health, appearance, taxes, or property values—it is better to pay now for the cost of clearing slums and thereby get rid of them than to continue paying the evermounting costs of slums and suffer their destructive effects upon human lives and property indefinitely.

"Locally Planned, Locally Approved, Locally Executed"

Title I is a national program only because it helps each community do a job that it cannot do by itself. Under the law, all projects must be local undertakings—they must be started by the community, approved by the community, and carried out by the community. The community decides what areas it wants to clear and for what purposes it wants to redevelop them. The Federal Government's job is to review plans developed by the community to see that they conform with the requirements and objectives that Congress has laid down for Federal assistance, and to make sure that they will result in the removal of slums and blight today and in the future.

AREAS ELIGIBLE FOR FEDERAL AID

The key to the Housing Act of 1949 is improvement of housing and living conditions. Therefore, all slum clearance projects undertaken with Federal assistance must be areas consisting mainly of housing either before or after redevelopment. Either way, the community will obtain better housing conditions.

Four types of projects are eligible for Federal aid:

Residential slums or blighted areas. Federal aid is authorized to acquire, clear, and prepare these areas for any kind of redevelopment—housing, commercial, industrial, or public uses.

Nonresidential slums or blighted areas. Federal assistance is available only if the area is to be redeveloped for predominantly residential uses.

Predominantly open areas. Any land which is predominantly open and which, because of obsolete platting, diversity of ownership, deterioration of site improvements, or otherwise, substantially impairs or arrests sound growth of the community. Redevelopment—primarily for residential uses.

Open areas. Federal loans—but not grants—are available only if the land is needed for sound community growth and is to be redeveloped for residential purposes to facilitate the general redevelopment program. (Prime purpose for such open areas is to provide more living space in the community so that sufficient housing can be built to enable displaced families to find decent homes elsewhere.)

TITLE I IN OPERATION

Briefly, here is how the program operates:

The local community must decide on its own initiative that it wants to undertake slum clearance with Federal help. To participate, it must first obtain a capital grant reservation—an earmarking of funds for expected slum clearance projects. After it has set up an administrative organization with the necessary powers under State and local laws it may then obtain loans to map out slum areas that it wants to clear, make plans for rehousing and redevelopment, buy the slum properties, clear them, and get them ready for rebuilding or redevelopment.

Where the project involves clearance of a residential slum, the land may be made available for any purposes for which the locality wants to redevelop it, provided, of course, that those uses are in line with the approved redevelopment plan of the area and the locality. They may be housing, industrial, commercial, schools, low-rent public housing projects, or any other uses needed and approved by the community.

After the land is sold or leased, the community can get Federal grants to pay up to two-thirds of the deficit between what it cost to get the slums ready for redevelopment and what the city obtains for the land through sale or lease. The community pays the balance, either in cash, donations of land, or in improvements—parks, schools, sewers, streets, playgrounds, and other facilities—that will serve the new uses of the area.

Maximum Opportunity For Private Enterprise

The redevelopment of a cleared area will depend upon the locality's plan for its future use. The Housing Act of 1949 says, however, that private enterprise must be given maximum opportunity, consistent with the sound needs of the locality as a whole, to take part in the redevelopment. Congress, in passing that act, recognized that in general large-scale slum clearance cannot be undertaken unless a large part of the job is carried out by private enterprise.

That does not mean that public uses, such as parks, schools, and low-rent public housing for low-income families may not properly be a part of redevelopment. However, if the redevelopment plan for any project area includes such public uses for any or all of the project area, the local public agency will have to show that there are compelling reasons for these uses and that they conform to the development plan of the area and the community.

Federal slum clearance and urban redevelopment assistance will benefit private enterprise, among other ways, by enabling private developers to buy cleared slum lands—many of them in desirable close-in locations and already served by public transportation and utilities—at fair value for their intended new use. This should encourage private builders to construct not only housing at various prices and rentals, but also other types of needed construction.

Community Responsibilities

Federal assistance under this program is not just a blank check. The local community assumes certain responsibilities that must be carried out during the undertaking of a project. Localities must have necessary authority under state and local laws. They must have a general plan so that project redevelopment will be related to the locality as a whole. They must be giving serious attention to modernizing and improvement of building, housing, and zoning regulations to reduce housing costs and to prevent further growth of slums. As previously noted, communities must provide at least one-third of the net cost of their slum clearance programs in cash, land, work or facilities. Perhaps most important of all, they must see that the people displaced by the slum clearance operations are assured of decent, adequate housing, either in the cleared area or elsewhere.

Rehousing the People

Many slum clearance operations will hinge on this rehousing requirement. It was made a key part of the Housing Act of 1949 because if slums are torn down and families forced to live in other slums the whole purpose of the act—betterment of housing and living conditions—will be defeated. A good many of these people can and should be rehoused in private housing. But many slum dwellers of low-income are unable to afford decent private housing. For them, in most cases, low-rent public housing is the only practical answer. That is why the Housing Act of 1949 in a separate title provided Federal aid to localities to build public housing, and gave priority in that housing to families displaced from slums being cleared.

Relationship Between Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment and Low Rent Public Housing

The Housing Act of 1949 sets up two separate but related programs aimed to improve housing and environmental conditions: Title I, for clearing slums and blight, and Title III, the low-rent public housing program, through which the Federal Government furnishes financial assistance to communities so that they can provide decent housing for low-income families who form such a large proportion of the families living in slums.

Both programs are under the supervision of the Housing and Home Finance Administrator. The Federal responsibilities for slum clearance are administered through the Division of Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment in the Office of the HHFA Administrator, and those for low-rent public housing through the Public Housing Administration, a constituent agency of the HHFA.

Under the Housing Act of 1949, low-rent public housing is one of several tools that can be used in a broad attack upon slums and blight. It can do the best job for the community only when fitted into a broad approach in which not only public housing, but also private housing and community development as well are used in a joint effort to remove slums and to replan and rebuild these areas.

"A Decent Home and A Suitable Living Environment..."

During the past two decades various types of Federal assistance have been developed to meet varying needs and situations, with most of them designed to get better housing for more people through Federal aids to private enterprise. The Housing Act of 1949, in its Declaration of Policy, for the first time set up a common objective for all these Federal housing activities and for any others that might be developed.

It establishes as a national goal "the realization as soon as feasible . . . a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family." Slum clearance and urban redevelopment is a vital aid in reaching that goal, for to many Americans a "suitable living environment" means not so much a vine-covered cottage out in the country, as a house or apartment in an urban or suburban area, convenient to their places of work and recreation.

Federal assistance for slum clearance can be used only when the people in a community decide they want to make use of it. Further, it can provide only a start toward cleaning up all our areas of slum and blight. But it can be a powerful aid in making our cities better places in which to work and live if the people of a community—local government, local organizations, private industry, labor, and citizens—use it as a springboard for a general attack upon their whole slum problem. In doing so, they will be contributing, as the Congress of the United States declared in the Housing Act of 1949, "to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation."

RESEARCH: THE IMPACT OF NEGRO POPULATION MOVEMENT ON PROPERTY VALUES IN A SELECTED AREA IN DETROIT.

DATE: January 16, 1950.

BY: Richard Marks, Information and Research Assistant
City of Detroit Mayor's Interracial Committee.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

We wanted to find out if there was any reality in the belief that "Negroes devalue property" because (1) the belief is closely related to the system of racial restrictions, and (2) the belief is one which people "act in terms of" whether it be by moving or through hostility patterns. We raised some doubts about the possibilities of finding a definition of "true property value," and decided that for our purposes the final arbiter of value is what people will pay.

Since we needed something to equate price with, we used property assessments to create an index which would reflect property demand and inflatory conditions over a period of four years. A city-wide ratio for types of property for the years 1945-47 was used as a measure to hold inflatory conditions constant and also as a measure of the importance of the data that was collected for two sample areas: Area A, an area of high Jewish occupancy with in-migration of Negro families currently taking place; and Area B, an all-white area not religiously identified. These two areas were equated with each other (in so far as possible) except that Negro families were living in one area and not in the other. We were not very concerned about whether or not a white home owner felt that the "area in which Negroes were also living was less desirable"; our purpose was to see what happened to property and why. We found:

Sales

1. That property in the racially mixed area was sold more and was bought more.

Price

2. That the average price which was paid for two-family flats and single homes in the area into which Negroes were moving went up from what it sold for on the average in 1946, and that it has come down only slightly.

3. That the two types of property in the all-white area during the study period also went up, but

   a. in the case of two-family flats, came down to the 1946 level; and

   b. the single homes dropped well below 1946 average prices.

Index of Property Value

4. That while the ratio between sales price and assessed value has fluctuated a good deal over the four-year period for both areas, the most marked fluctuation appears in the all-white area.

5. That there is every indication of factors other than race determining the fluctuation of the average ratio in the two areas for the four-year period.

6. That when the ratios for the area into which Negroes were moving was specifically compared with that for the all-white area and the city-wide ratio (during the two years, 1946 and 1947, for which we have data on all three), we find a. that the ratio for single homes and two-family flats in Area A was lower (in other words, the price of the home was higher in terms of its constant, taxable value) than the city-wide ratio for single homes and two-family flats during 1946 and 1947;

   b. that the ratio for single homes and two-family flats in Area A was lower than the ratio for these types of property in Area B in 1946 and the same as that ratio in 1947; and

   c. that the ratio for Area B for both single homes and two-family flats was higher than the ratio for these types of property in the city-wide ratio in 1946, and lower than that ratio in 1947.

THUS, we find that the belief that "Negroes devalue property" to be completely unsubstantiated by the data of this study.

7. That the analysis of the significant individual case data for Area A points rather definitely to the role of the real estate operator in relation to the creation of housing supply, favorable market conditions, and high availability, and the tapping of existing high demand among Negro buyers.

8. That population movement can take place for a multitude of reasons--prejudice against an immigrant group being only one of many factors. In Area A, however, the movement of both Jewish families out, and Negro families in, had the appearance of "caste" movement, while "class" movement was more obvious in Area B.

   In addition, other factors--such as personal definitions of value and desirability; other alternatives, age or newness of home, site and location, amount of space and housing needs, family growth cycle, desire to get away from factories or to new schools--were operative on the individual home owner as a rational base for action.

FROM THE DESK OF

Alex Miller

Housing

TO Dr. George Mitchell

For your information...

RECEIVED
FEB 10 1950
Southern Regional Council

JOINT MEMORANDUM

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

To: AJC Chapters, ADL Regional and CRC Offices

From: Sol Rabkin and Alexander Brooks

Date: January 11, 1950

Subject: Restrictive Covenant Decision in Missouri

Since 1948, when the United States Supreme Court declared the judicial enforcement of racial restrictive covenants unconstitutional in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, opponents of that decision have argued that, whether there still exists a right to money damages for the breach of such agreements is an open question. In a recent decision of interest in the field of civil rights, the Supreme Court of Missouri has held that damages can be recovered for the breach of a racial restrictive covenant, even though "specific performance" is no longer available.

In Weiss et al. v. Lewis et al. the defendants were white persons who were about to sell to Negroes a lot in Kansas City, Missouri which was subject to a racial restrictive agreement. The plaintiffs owned adjacent lots and were parties to the restrictive covenant. Originally they sued both the white sellers and the Negro buyers in an attempt to enforce their coventant. They asked for an injunction against the sale, a cancellation of any deed which might have effectuated it, and an injunction against occupation of the property by the Negroes.

The trial court dismissed their petition on the basis of Shelley v. Kraemer, which had declared that, although a racial restrictive covenant is not an illegal instrument, the enforcement of it by a state court is an act of state discrimination in volation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The trail court also rejected the plaintiff's petition for damages for breach of the restrictive covenant.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court of Missouri, which ruled that the tiral court's refusal to enforce the covenant by injunctive measures was proper. But the Missouri Supreme Court held that a suit for monetary damages for breach of the agreement was not foreclosed by the United States Supreme Court ruling in the Shelley case. The judgment of the trial court dismissing the suit for damages, was, therefore, reversed, and the matter remanded for trial of the damage issue.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has seen fit to interpret the Shelley case in an extremely narrow fashion. In doing so, the Court accepts the doctrine of the Shelley case that "enforcement" by a state court of a racial restrictive covenant is a violation of the "equal protection of the laws" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But it rules that all that the United States Supreme Court meant by "enforcement" was to compel specific performance of the covenant by the use of equitable injunctive powers, and no more. Said the Missouri court,

> "The fact that another remedy, specific performances, is ruled out because of constitutional reasons, need not necessarily effect the remedy by way of damages unless it, too, is unconstitutional under the circumstances."

But the United States Supreme Court obviously intended to give a much broader significance to the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment, and to the meaning of the term "enforcement."

The rationale of the Shelley case was that the state cannot give effect to a racial restrictive covenant through any of its organs, including its courts. As the United States Supreme Court pointed out in the restrictive covenant cases, by implementing the restrictive covenants, the states "made available the full coercive power of government to deny to petitioners, on the grounds of race or color, the enjoyment of property rights in premises which petitioners are willing and financially able to acquire and which the grantors are willing to sell."

Under this reasoning, if a state compels payment of money damages to a plaintiff suing for disregard of a restrictive agreement it is giving effect to the covenant as forcefully as if it grants an order compelling specific performance. As the United States Supreme Court stated,

> "State action, as that phrase is understood for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment, refers to exertions of state power in all forms. And when the effect of that action is to deny rights subject to the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is the obligation of this Court to enforce the constitutional commands."

The decision of the Missouri Supreme Court might, in practical effect, nullify for Missourians the gains derived from the Shelley case in the campaign against restrictive covenants. For if the covenant were enforceable in an action at law for monetary damages, it would become as effective a deterrent to would-be sellers as the threat of an injunction was prior to the Shelley case. What could not be secured by injunction might be obtained through a suit for damages. It seems unlikely that the United States Supreme Court will uphold such an interpretation, should this case reach it on appeal.

SR:hn

JOINT MEMORANDUM

American Jewish Committee
386 Fourth Ave.
New York 18, N. Y.

Anti-Defamation League
327 South La Salle St.
Chicago, Ill.
212 Fifth Ave.
New York, N. Y.

RECEIVED
MAR 6 1950
Southern Regional Council

TO: AJC Chapters, ADL Regional and CRC Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Alexander Brooks

DATE: January 11, 1950

SUBJECT: Restrictive Covenant Decision in Missouri

Since 1948, when the United States Supreme Court declared the judicial enforcement of racial restrictive covenants unconstitutional in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, opponents of that decision have argued that, whether there still exists a right to money damages for the breach of such agreements is an open question. In a recent decision of interest in the field of civil rights, the Supreme Court of Missouri has held that damages can be recovered for the breach of a racial restrictive covenant, even though "specific performance" is no longer available.

In Weiss et al. v. Lemon et al. the defendants were white persons who were about to sell to Negroes a lot in Kansas City, Missouri which was subject to a racial restrictive agreement. The plaintiffs owed adjacent lots and were parties to the restrictive covenant. Originally they sued both the white sellers and the Negro buyers in an attempt to enforce their covenant. They asked for an injunction against the sale, a cancellation of any deed which might have effectuated it, and an injunction against occupation of the property by the Negroes.

The trial court dismissed their petition on the basis of Shelley v. Kraemer, which had declared that, although a racial restrictive covenant is not an illegal instrument, the enforcement of it by a state court is an act of state discrimination in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court also rejected the plaintiff's petition for damages for breach of the restrictive covenant.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court of Missouri, which ruled that the trial court's refusal to enforce the covenant by injunctive measures was proper. But the Missouri Supreme Court held that a suit for monetary damages for breach of the agreement was not foreclosed by the United States Supreme Court ruling in the Shelley case. The judgment of the trial court dismissing the suit for damages was, therefore, reversed, and the matter remanded for trial of the damage issue.

The Supreme Court of Missouri has seen fit to interpret the Shelley case in an extremely narrow fashion. In doing so, the Court accepts the doctrine of the Shelley case that "enforcement" by a state court of a racial restrictive covenant is a violation of the "Equal protection of the laws" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But it rules that the United States Supreme Court meant by "enforcement" was to compel specific performance of the covenant by the use of equitable injunctive powers, and no more. Said the Missouri court,

> "The fact that another remedy, specific performance, is ruled out because of constitutional reasons, need not necessarily affect the remedy by way of damages unless it, too, is unconstitutional under the circumstances."

But the United States Supreme Court obviously intended to give a much broader significance to the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment, and to the meaning of the term "enforcement."

The rationale of the Shelley case was that the state cannot give effect to a racial restrictive covenant through any of its organs, including the courts. As the United States Supreme Court pointed out in the restrictive covenant cases, by implementing the restrictive covenants, the states "made available the full coercive power of government to deny to petitioners, on the grounds of race or color, the enjoyment of property rights in premises which petitioners are willing and financially able to acquire and which the grantors are willing to sell."

Under this reasoning, if a state compels payment of money damages to a plaintiff suing for disregard of a restrictive agreement it is giving effect to the covenant as forcefully as if it grants an order compelling specific performance. As the United States Supreme Court stated,

> "State action, as that phrase is understood for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment, refers to exertions of state power in all forms. And when the effect of that action is to deny rights subject to the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is the obligation of this Court to enforce the constitutional commands."

The decision of the Missouri Supreme Court might, in practical effect, nullify for Missourians the gains derived from the Shelley case in the campaign against restrictive covenants. For if the covenant were enforceable in an action at law for monetary damages, it would become as effective a deterrent to would-be sellers as the threat of an injunction was prior to the Shelley case. What could not be secured by injunction might be obtained through a suit for damages. It seems unlikely that the United States Supreme Court will uphold such an interpretation should this case reach it on appeal.

SR:hm

Housing - Pub Proj + Non Discrim

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
212 Fifth Avenue — Suite 601
New York 10, N. Y.

MEMORANDUM

To: ADL Regional Offices

From: Sol Rabkin

Date: March 17, 1950

Subject: Legislation Banning Discrimination in Publicly-Assisted Housing

This is to advise you that the New York State Assembly today unanimously approved the so-called Wicks-Austin bill, a bill designated to prohibit racial and religious discrimination in publicly-assisted housing erected in the State of New York on or after July 1, 1950. Publicly-assisted housing is defined in the bill as any housing which is either wholly or partially tax-exempt or which is constructed on land sold below cost by the state or any of its subdivisions in accordance with the Federal Housing Act of 1949, or which is built, in whole or in part, on property acquired or exempted by the state or any of its subdivisions through the use of the power of condemnation or otherwise, or which received funds or other financial assistance from the state or any of its subdivisions in connection with its acquisition, construction, repair, or maintenance. The bill grants to any person aggrieved by discrimination in violation of the Act the right to bring a suit for damages. In addition, it provides that any person aggrieved or any taxpayer may bring a suit to have discrimination in connection with any such state-assisted housing project terminated by injunction.

Since this bill has the endorsement of Governor Dewey, it is certain that it will be signed by him in the near future.

This bill is important because it is the first state legislation of this type enacted anywhere in the country, and because it sets a pattern in connection with the utilization of funds made available to states and communities throughout the country under the Federal Housing Act of 1949.

We are attaching hereto for your information a copy of the text of the bill as originally introduced in both Houses. It is our information that the bill as finally passed by both Houses is substantially identical to the form in which it was introduced.

It should be pointed out that the bill is applicable only to housing to be constructed within the state after July 1, 1950. Hence, it does not affect the Stuyvesant Town project in New York City.

S. R.

SR:hn
att.

JUSTICE MEIER STEINBRINK
National Chairman

RICHARD E. GUTSTADT
Executive Vice-Chairman

BENJAMIN R. EPSTEIN
National Director

STATE OF NEW YORK

No. 2219 Int. 2068

IN SENATE

February 20, 1950

Introduced by Mr. WICKS - read twice and ordered printed, and when printed to be committed to the Committee on Judiciary

AN ACT

To amend the civil rights law, in relation to prohibiting discrimination and segregation because of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry in housing accommodations acquired, constructed, repaired or maintained, in whole or in part, with the assistance or support of the state or any of its political subdivisions

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly do enact as follows:

Section 1. The civil rights law is hereby amended by inserting therein a a new article, to be article two-A, to read as follows:

ARTICLE 2-A

EQUAL RIGHTS TO PUBLICLY-AIDED HOUSING

Section 18-a. Findings and declarations of policy.
18-b. Definitions.
18-c. Discrimination prohibited.
18-d. Restraint of discrimination; damages for violations.
18-e. Applicability.

§ 18-a. Findings and declarations of policy. 1. This article shall be deemed an exercise of the police power of the state for the protection of the welfare, health and peace of the people of this state and the fulfillment and enforcement of the provisions of the constitution of this state concerning civil rights.

2. The practice of discrimination because of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry in any publicly assisted housing accommodations is hereby declared to be against public policy.

§ 18-b. Definitions. When used in this article:

1. The term "person" includes one or more individuals, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy and receivers or other fiduciaries.

2. The term "housing accommodation" includes any building, structure, or portion thereof which is used or occupied or is intended, arranged or designed to be used or occupied, as the home residence or sleeping place of one or more human beings, but shall not include any accommodations operated by a religious or denominational organization as part of its religious or denominational activities.

3. The term "publicly assisted housing accommodation" includes any housing accommodation to be constructed within the state of New York

(a) which is to be exempt in whole or in part from taxes levied by the state or any of its political subdivisions;

(b) which is to be constructed on land sold below cost by the state or any of its political subdivisions or any agency thereof, pursuant to the federal housing act of nineteen hundred forty-nine;

(c) which is to be constructed in whole or in part on property acquired or assembled by the state or any of its political subdivisions or any agency thereof through the power of condemnation or otherwise for the purpose of such construction; or

(d) for the acquisition, construction, repair or maintenance of which the state or any of its political subdivisions or any agency thereof supplies funds or other financial assistance.

4. The term "owner" includes the lessee, sub-lessee, assignee, managing agent, or other person having the right of ownership or possession or the right to rent or lease housing accommodations and includes the state and any of its political subdivisions and any agency thereof.

5. The term "discriminate" includes to segregate or separate.

§18-c. Discrimination prohibited. It shall be unlawful:

1. For the owner of any publicly assisted housing accommodation to refuse to rent or lease or otherwise to deny to or withhold from any person or group of persons such housing accommodation because of the race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry of such person or persons.

2. For the owner of any publicly assisted housing accommodation to discriminate against any person because of the race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry of such person in the terms, conditions or privileges of any publicly assisted housing accommodations or in the furnishing of facilities or services in connection therewith.

3. For any person to cause to be made any written or oral inquiry concerning race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry of a person seeking to rent or lease any publicly assisted housing accommodation.

§18-d. Restraint of discrimination; damages for violations.

1. Any person aggrieved by a violation of section eighteen-c of this chapter and any person whose assessment shall amount to more than one thousand dollars and who shall be liable to pay taxes on such assessment in any county, town, village or municipal corporation in the state or who has been assessed or who has paid taxes upon any assessment of the above-named amount within one year previous to the initiation of an action under this section shall have a right of action in any court of appropriate jurisdiction for restraint of such violation and for other equitable remedies including such affirmative relief as may be necessary to undo the effects of such violation.

2. Any person aggrieved by a violation of section eighteen-c of this chapter shall in addition have a right of action in any court of appropriate jurisdiction for damages caused by such violation.

§18-e. Applicability. The provisions of this section shall not apply to privately owned housing accommodations which are not publicly assisted within the meaning of section eighteen-b (3) of this chapter.

§2. This act shall take effect July first, nineteen hundred fifty.

June 1950

DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF RESTRICTIVE RACIAL COVENANTS

The Supreme Court of Missouri recently allowed a recovery of damages for breach of a restrictive racial covenant.[1] The Missouri Court was careful to point out that the United States Supreme Court had not expressly ruled on this question in the precedent-shattering case of Shelley v. Kraemer[2], but whether or not the holding of the Missouri Court is in accord with the spirit of the decision of Shelley v. Kraemer is not free from doubt, and it is the purpose of this note to show why.

As a background to the Shelley case it is suggested that the reader see Racial Residential Segregation by State Court Enforcement of Restrictive Agreements, Covenants or Conditions in Deeds is Unconstitutional,[3] by D. O. McGovney. The practice prior to the Shelley case may be summarized by quoting from American Jurisprudence:

> "The ordinary remedy that is invoked in actions concerning restrictive covenants is the equitable remedy of injunction. An action at law for damages for a breach lies in favor of the covenantee and, according to some authorities, in favor of a subsequent holder of the property entitled to enforce the agreement."[4]

The Missouri Court appears to be the only court to have had the question before it since the Shelley case and various law reviews have disposed of the question in one of two ways, i. e., either by saying that the Supreme Court did not pass on the matter in the Shelley case or that it would be inconsistent to allow damages in view of the prohibition of state action as the term is used in the Shelley case. The Supreme Court stated through Chief Justice Vinson:

> "Nor is the Amendment ineffective simply because the particular pattern of discrimination, which the State has enforced, was defined initially by the terms of a private agreement. State action, as that phrase is understood for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment,[5] refers to exertions of the state power in all forms. And when the effect of that action is to deny rights subject to the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment, it is the obligation of this Court to enforce the constitutional commands.[6] * * * *

1. Weiss v. Leaon, 225 S. W. 2d 127 (Mo. 1949).
2. 334 U. S. 1 (1948), 3 A. L. R. 2d 441.
3. 33 CAL. L. REV. 5 (1945).
4. 14 AM. JUR. 663; also see 3 A. L. R. 2d 474.
5. AMEND. XIV, S 1, U. S. CONST.: "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States".
6. See note 2, supra, p. 20.

> And it would appear beyond question that the power of the state to create and enforce property interests must be exercised within the boundaries defined by the Fourteenth Amendment.[7] * * * * It is clear that but for the active intervention of the state courts, supported by the full panoply of state power, petitioners would have been free to occupy the properties in question without restraint."[8]

The Arkansas Law Review reacted to the language of the Supreme Court by saying:

> "The concept of state action as now extended means that every private contract partakes of 'state action' the moment judicial aid is invoked to enforce it."[9]

The writer for the George Washington Law Review was obviously conscious of the weight of Chief Justice Vinson's word when he posed his, as yet unanswered, query:

> "If all state court judgments are 'state action' within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, it may be wondered whether a union shop agreement is enforceable lest it discriminate against non-union labor as a class, or whether any contract of hire is enforceable, lest it discriminate against those who were not hired. Similarly, one may wonder whether a dealer-producer marketing agreement, the lease of an apartment, or any executory contract, could be enforced without an examination by the Court, to determine whether the parties had treated all outside persons with that scrupulous regard for fairness and equality which the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments demand of those who enjoy the public trust as state and federal officials."[10]

One writer, among others,[11] thinks invocation of any court action based on a restrictive covenant would be unsuccessful and also states:

> "The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the racial restrictive covenant cases may be subjected to varying interpretations but they are landmarks, admittedly, in legal and constitutional thinking. It is necessary to reconsider and revalue all the comments of judges and legal writers bearing a date prior to May 3, 1948."[12]

---

7. Id., p. 22.
8. Id., p. 19.
9. 3 ARK. L. REV. 96 (1948).
10. 17 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 398 (1949).
11. See 48 COL. L. REV. 1241 (1948) and 21 SO. CAL. L. REV. 358 (1948).
12. 1 ALA. L. REV. 15 (1948)

Another writer asserts:

> "The Supreme Court will be reluctant to sanction the giving of legal effect to any discriminatory agreement, the enforcement of which would intensify the pressing social problem [of discrimination]."[13]

A well reasoned statement is made in the University of Cincinnati Law Review as follows:

> "These cases [Shelley v. Kraemer, McGhee v. Sipes[14]] failed to provide a specific answer to the question of whether a state court can enforce a provision incorporated in many racial covenants providing for liquidated damages for breach of the covenant. It is suggested that such a provision will be held unenforceable insofar as state court enforcement of a liquidated damage provision would be state action, and just as the covenant itself is unenforceable so surely would be one of its clauses specifying an alternative remedy. The damage provision is only an alternative method of attempting to effectuate the discrimination and has the same fatal defect of the covenant, that is, it has as its purpose the accomplishment of racial discrimination. For a state court to enforce it is for the state court to lend its aid and authority to consummate an otherwise incomplete individual act of discrimination,"[15]

The Wisconsin Law Review says:

> "It cannot be that Chief Justice Vinson was distinguishing between the different methods by which the covenants could be enforced so as to say the courts could enforce them by awarding damages but could not do so by fine or imprisonment arising out of an injunction. In the first place Chief Justice Vinson is talking about 'voluntary adherence'. You do not act voluntarily when to act otherwise your property would be diminished by an execution issued by a court. In the second place, such a distinguishment would be to make a mockery of the rest of his decision. * * * * Most certainly he did not mean to say that the covenant could be enforced by the obtaining of damages."[16]

In affirming the judgment of a lower court which sustained a demurrer to an action seeking to enforce restrictions against occupation

13. 61 HARV. L. REV. 1452 (1948).
14. Decided with Shelley v. Kraemer, supra, note 2.
15. 17 U. OF CIN. L. REV. 77 (1948), p. 82.
16. 1948 WIS. L. REV. 508.

of certain lots by non-Caucasians, the Supreme Court of California said:

> "Counsel for the respective parties have agreed that the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Shelley v. Kraemer * * * * holding that such restrictions cannot be enforced through court action, is controlling here. Accordingly, we do not reach the question as to whether any tenable cause of action for relief or recovery other than specific enforcement of the racial restrictions is, or could be stated."[17]

In a Texas case the plaintiff held the land under a deed executed to him by the owner of the reversion after breach of the condition in the defendant's chain of title that the land would not be sold to "persons of Mexican descent" (the defendant was such a person) and in the event of violation of the covenant "all title to the then owner and occupant shall be forfeited to the grantor, and upon demand, such property and all improvements thereon shall be surrendered to the seller". Although admitting that he could not maintain an action on the covenant in view of the Shelley case, the plaintiff contended that he was not precluded from relying upon the covenant as a defense to the defendant's cross-action (presumably to regain possession of the land) but the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas in affirming judgment for the defendant gave its interpretation of the holding of the Shelley case in clear language:

> "It is as much an enforcement of the covenant to deny to a person a legal right to which he would be entitled except for the covenant as it would be to expressly command by judicial order that the terms of the covenant be recognized and carried out. * * * * Under the decision of the Supreme Court, above referred to [Shelley v. Kraemer], judicial recognition or enforcement of the racial covenant involved here by a state court is precluded by the 'equal protection of the laws' clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."[18] (Emphasis added.)

Although it is not the writer's purpose to discuss alternative remedies for breach of restrictive racial covenants, there have been recent discussions of this problem which the reader may find informative.[19] Of particular interest to members of the bar in the South is a re-

---

17. Morin v. Crane, 32 Cal, 2d 896, 197 P. 2d 162 (1948).
18. Clifton v. Puente, 218 S. W. 2d 272 (Tex. 1948).
19. See 2 VANDERBILT L. REV. 123 (1948); 37 CAL. L. REV. 493 (1949); 3 A. L. R. 2d 473.

freshing article in the Tennessee Law Review[20] dealing with the practical aspect of the non-enforceability of such restrictive covenants in a Southern state.

The reluctance of the Missouri Court to extend the holding of Shelley v. Kraemer beyond the express language of that decision can be understood if one considers the long established practice of enforcing covenants of that type. It should be remembered that the Supreme Court did not declare such covenants unconstitutional but merely unenforceable by state action and the importance of that difference has yet to be fully appreciated, for, as one writer[21] observes, has the Supreme Court held the covenants to be unconstitutional that would have been the "go" signal for Congress to enact legislation making it a crime to enter into such agreements. However, it is felt that the spirit of the Supreme Court's decision, as expressed by its all-inclusive language defining "state action" to be "exertions of state power in all forms", does not permit an alternative remedy for breach of such covenants inasmuch as it is difficult to see how one type of action would be "state action" and the other not. Heretofore when a state court felt that it would be inequitable to enforce such a covenant, because of changed conditions or for other reasons, it would leave the petitioner to his remedy at law for damages. But there should be no confusing of this practice with the holding of the Shelley case because the Supreme Court's decision resulted from an application of the Fourteenth Amendment and not from a weighing of the equities. The Texas court seems to have correctly interpreted the Supreme Court's decision because any recognition of such a covenant in a proceeding in any state court will constitute action by the state.

HOOVER C. BLANTON.

20. TENN. L. REV. 679 (1949).
21. 11 GA. BAR J. 88 (1948).

ADL

ATLANTA REGIONAL OFFICE
11 PRYOR ST., S. W.-ATLANTA, GA.

For your information

Harold Fleming:

You may be interested in making wide-spread use of this, possibly by including it in your "(Not so) New (you should pardon the expression) South".

Regards

Art Levin

16-Housing

This article originally appeared in the

Minneapolis Star, July 13, 1950

- DOES NEGRO OCCUPANCY AFFECT PROPERTY VALUES? -

To the Editor: In the Star for July 1st, Richard Wentworth asked W. E. Cratic of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People: "Why is it that when a Negro moves into a white district, the surrounding property value drops, yet the tax does not?"

My first interest on reading the letter was to ascertain whether property values do invariably drop under such circumstances. I telephoned a well-known sociologist at the University of Minnesota and the office of the Minneapolis Mayor's Council on Human Relations. Among other authorities, they quoted Dr. Robert C. Weaver, Harvard trained advisor on Negro affairs to the Department of the Interior. Dr. Weaver prepared the socio-economic memoranda used in arguments before the United States Supreme Court in the Shelly vs. Kaemer and Hurd vs. Hodges cases, which brought forth the recent decision that racial restrictive covenants on land are unenforceable in state or federal courts.

Weaver states that there is no one universal effect on property value of Negro occupancy, that there are many factors involved, which produce different results under different circumstances. A huge body of statistics accumulated by the United States Housing Authority and the Federal Housing Authority, from 34 states shows that Negroes and Whites of comparable incomes have practically identical records of property maintenance and prompt payment, regardless of whether they live in a mixed or in a segregated district. The very slight difference is in favor of the Negro. So, it would appear, Negroes can not be accused of running property values down by slovenliness or neglect.

Weaver states further that "it is the rapid and panic-inspired movement of whites out rather than movement of a few Negroes in that leads to a fall in the property price in areas where Negroes enter." In other words, a general unquestioning acceptance by a large number of whites residing in the area of the traditional pattern of segregation, and the natural operation of the laws of supply and demand when these whites flood the market by dumping their property, may start prices falling.

Unscrupulous real estate men have some times created panics in order to manipulate the market to their advantage. They have urged the whites to sell out quickly at low prices and have later resold the property at a sizeable profit, to Negroes, who have been accustomed to having to pay more than whites for the same kind of property. Frank Fager, executive secretary of the Mayor's Council on Human Relations, informs me there are such cases in Minneapolis right now.

Declining property values which might appear to the superficial observer to be due to entrance of a few Negroes into a community are some times due to other causes, such as the encroachment of industry.

Whether or not property values drop when a Negro moves into a white district depends largely upon how the situation is handled. Fager informs me that in Minneapolis a number of Negro families have been living quietly in various predominantly white, good residential sections of Minneapolis, some of them for many years. He read me a list of about 16 addresses where a single Negro family is completely surrounded by white neighbors. I happen to know two of these families. They are the kind of people any of us should be glad to have as neighbors---loyal, constructive, intelligent, law-abiding citizens, quiet, self-respecting people with sound ideals.

A well-known University of Minnesota professor, now retired, stopped a panic among his neighbors a few years ago when a Negro family was moving into the neighborhood, by asking, "Did you people buy your homes for speculation or to live in?" When they replied that they had bought them to live in, he pointed out that there needed to be no devaluation. If the people themselves were not prejudiced and did not begin selling homes in great numbers, the neighborhood would remain stable and practically unchanged.

Wentworth might have asked, "Why do some white people wish to move out of a neighborhood when a Negro family moves in?" The white people may never have met Negroes of their own class and may have a stereotype idea of the Negro which makes him out to be ignorant or shiftless or loud or even dangerous.

But more often it is a question of social prestige. The whites are afraid that they will be suspected of associating with people who are not acceptable to the crowd with whom they wish to associate, or they might be found living in a neighborhood which might be sized up as beneath the social standards to which they aspire. They do not realize that times are changing and that we must grow with the times, even if it costs us some personal discomfort in breaking old habits; else the social prestige we insist upon in our small local group will cost our country the prestige she needs to win the peoples of the world to the cause of democracy.

Wentworth suggests that we should "all live happily the Memphis way," which as he says, is "Negroes and whites each in their own district." But he can not have read Gunnar Myrdal's scholarly work, "The American Dilemma" or any of a number of current books, nor can he have followed the recent Supreme Court decisions or the cases now crowding the courts of the south, if he thinks that even the white people of the south are happy under their ghetto system. I, too, have lived in the south for a number of years, and I still have relatives and friends there. The southern states are making progress, but they have serious and difficult problems.

That Minneapolis and St. Paul are working out a much better system than the "Memphis way" is demonstrated by the fact that they were presented in February 1949 with a national award, honoring them as the cities in the United States which had made the greatest progress in the field of human relations.

Minneapolis - Mrs. John W. Gruner

16- Housing

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC and ADL Regional Offices and AJC Chapters

FROM: Arnold Forster and Edwin J. Lukas

DATE: October 9, 1950

SUBJECT: Suit for Damages Based on Breach of Racial Restrictive Covenants

Set out below is the complete text of a decision handed down by Judge Holtzoff in the United States District Court of the District of Columbia on October 5, 1950, in the case of Roberts v. Curtis, an action for damages for breach of a restrictive covenant banning sale of residential property to Negroes. The action was brought by a group of white covenantors against a white seller who had transferred his real estate to a Negro in defiance of a racial restrictive covenant. This decision is noteworthy because it is the first by a court of record contrary to the decision of the Missouri Supreme Court in Weiss v. Leaon, which had held, despite Shelley v. Kraemer, that even though a court could not entertain an injunction suit to enforce a racial restrictive covenant, it could entertain a suit for damages for breach of such a covenant.

The text of Judge Holtzoff's decision is as follows:

"This is an action for damages for breach of a restrictive covenant not to sell to members of the colored race. For a great many years covenants of this type were regarded as valid and were enforcible by the courts. However, in the case of Hurd v. Hodge and Shelley v. Kraemer, the Supreme Court reversed and overruled the prior rules of law applicable to these covenants. The Supreme Court held that such agreements are not invalid so long as their purposes are achieved by voluntary adherence to the terms of the agreements. The Supreme Court further held that it was contrary to the 14th and 15th Amendments to the Constitution and contrary to public policy to aid in the enforcement of such covenants by judicial proceedings. True, the actions involved in Shelley v. Kraemer and Hurd v. Hodge were actions for injunctive relief, but the ruling is broad enough to cover actions in damages as well. I construe the holdings of the Supreme Court as withholding any judicial assistance for enforcement of such restrictive covenants. These rulings are obviously binding on this court and in view of these considerations and line of reasoning which is inescapable, the motion to dismiss must be granted."

Also attached hereto is a copy of the motion for leave to file a brief amicus in the case, and the brief amicus submitted in connection with that motion by our agencies.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

MALCOLM I. ROBERTS, et al,	)
Plaintiffs	)
vs.	)	Civil Action No.
EDWARD R. CURTIS, et al,	)	2192-50
Defendants	)

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AND BRIEF OF ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH AND AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE AS AMICI CURIAE

The undersigned, as counsel for the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the American Jewish Committee and on their behalf, respectfully move this Court for leave to file a brief in this case as amici curiae.

Each of these organizations has among its fundamental tenets the preservation of the rights guaranteed every citizen by our Federal Constitution. Each has recognized that any invasion of the democratic right of any individual or group undermines the foundation of our democratic system.

The American Jewish Committee is a corporation created by an Act of the Legislature of the State of New York in 1906. Its charter states:

> "The object of this corporation shall be to prevent the infraction of the civil and religious rights of Jews, in any part of the world; to render all lawful assistance and to take appropriate remedial action in the event of threatened or actual invasion or restriction of such rights, or of unfavorable discrimination with respect thereto..."

B'nai B'rith, founded in 1843, is the oldest civic organization of American Jews. It represents a membership of 300,000 men and women and their families. The Anti-Defamation League was organized in 1913, as a section of the parent organization, in order to cope with racial and religious prejudice in the United States. The program developed by the League is designed to achieve the following objectives: to eliminate and counteract defamation and discrimination against the various racial, religious and ethnic groups which comprise our American people; to counteract un-American and anti-democratic activity; to advance goodwill and mutual understanding among American groups; to encourage and translate into greater effectiveness the ideals of American democracy.

Organizations dedicated to the defense of American democracy cannot stand by silently while the residential areas of our cities and towns are overrun by a spreading flood of restrictive covenants banning occupancy by members of specific racial or religious groups. The dangers to our democratic way of life arising from racial residential segregation are obvious. Organizations such as those sponsoring this brief cannot acquiesce in the application in America of discriminatory practices to so vital an aspect of our economy as housing.

For these reasons, when the precedent-making cases on restrictive covenants were before the Supreme Court in 1947, we filed a brief amici curiae urging that Court to outlaw judicial enforcement of racial covenants. For the same reasons, we deem it important to submit our legal views of this case to the Court. The present racial restrictive covenants case is one with which we are deeply concerned. In our judgment, plaintiffs' action, if successful, would have the effect of undermining the Supreme Court's decision in Shelley v. Kraemer and Hurd v. Hodge, and would restore direct government sanction for ghettoized housing.

For these reasons, we respectfully move the Court for leave to file the attached brief amici curiae.

Robert E. Sher
1026 Woodward Bldg.
Attorney for Amici Curiae,
Anti-Defamation League and
American Jewish Committee

Certificate of Mailing

I certify that copies of the foregoing motion and attached brief were, on October 3, 1950, mailed, postage prepaid to John H. Connaughton, Esq., and Harry W. Goldberg, Esq., Attorneys for Plaintiff and Defendant, Respectively.

William P. Bernton

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

MALCOLM I. ROBERTS, et al,	)
Plaintiffs	)
vs.	)	Civil Action No.
EDWARD R. CURTIS, et al,	)	2192-50
Defendants	)

BRIEF OF ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH AND AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE AS AMICI CURIAE

STATEMENT OF FACTS

This is an action for damages for alleged breach of restrictive covenants against sale to Negroes.

Plaintiffs are the owners of certain real property in the 4000 block of Fifth Street, Northwest. The original developers of the tract in which this property is located, recorded and placed in all deeds to purchasers a covenant providing that "said property shall never be rented, leased, sold, transferred, or conveyed unto or in trust for any Negro or colored person or any person of Negro extraction under a penalty of $2,000.00 which shall be a lien against said property." Thereafter, plaintiffs (or their grantors) executed and recorded an agreement in 1946 reciting that they "hereby mutually covenant, promise and agree ... that no part of the land now owned by the parties hereto ... shall ever be used or occupied by, or sold, conveyed, leased, rented, given to or held in trust for Negroes or any person or persons of the Negro race or blood." The agreement further provided that "this covenant shall run with the land and bind the respective heirs and assigns of the parties hereto for the period of fifty (50) years from and after the date of these presents."

The defendants acquired title to the property involved in this proceeding from one of the signers of the 1946 agreement. In April 1950, defendants conveyed their property to one Hightower and his wife, both Negroes.

This action was instituted by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants damages for alleged breach of both the 1946 agreement and the original covenant. As a first cause of action, plaintiffs each ask for damages in the amount of $5,000 for breach of the 1946 agreement. As a second cause of action, each plaintiff seeks $2,000 for breach of the original covenant.

This brief is limited to consideration of the single issue: is judicial enforcement of a racial restrictive covenant in an action for money damages contrary to the public policy of the United States and in violation of the Civil Rights Act? It does not consider the question (a) whether the covenants are void as unreasonable restraints on alienation, (b) whether the amount of damages which the plaintiffs may recover, if any, is limited to the amount named in the original covenant, (c) whether the penalty named in the original covenant is for the benefit of the plaintiffs individually or whether it represents the extent of the liability of the defendants to all the plaintiffs as a class, or (d) whether the original covenant is still in force or whether it has been superseded by the 1946 agreement so that the plaintiffs are restricted solely to an action on the 1946 agreement. These questions are covered in the principal brief submitted by the defendants.

I

Judicial enforcement of racial restrictive covenants, including money judgments for breach of such covenants, is barred by the Civil Rights Act and the public policy of the United States.

The main issue presented for determination by this Court is whether an action for damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant has been outlawed by the decisions of the Supreme Court in Shelley v. Kraemer and McGhee v. Sipes, 334 U.S.1 (1948), and the companion cases of Hurd v. Hodge and Urciolo v. Hodge, 334 U.S.24 (1948). It is a question which must be answered in the affirmative because the reasoning of the Supreme Court makes it abundantly clear that a suit for damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant, like a complaint for injunctive relief, is now barred in the states by the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and in the District of Columbia by the Civil Rights Act, Section 1978 Revised Statutes (8 U.S.C., Sec. 42) and the public policy of the United States. While both the Shelley and Hurd cases concerned complaints for injunctive relief, the scope of the ruling in those cases is not limited to complaints for injunctive relief but is equally applicable to any judicial action to enforce the discriminatory covenant. The logical application of the court's doctrine precludes any sound distinction based on the nature of the judicial relief sought.

The Supreme Court has made it clear that enforcement by state courts of racial restrictive covenants constitutes state action prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment (Shelley v. Kraemer, McGhee v. Sipes), and that enforcement by federal courts of such covenants is governmental action proscribed by the Civil Rights Act and contrary to the public policy of the United States. Hurd v. Hodge and Urciolo v. Hodge. These decisions make such covenants unenforceable - irrespective of the form of action involved or the character of the judicial relief sought. What is determinative is not the method or the procedure by which the agreement is sought to be enforced, but that an agency of government is participating in the enforcement of the discriminatory restrictions. The decisions of the Supreme Court are directed at judicial intervention in support of the discriminatory acts of private persons. The parties are free to contract but resort to the courts to enforce the discriminatory objectives of the agreement is barred. "The major thrust of the court's decisions is aimed at the prohibition of judicial participation in the maintenance of residential segregation." Ming, Racial Restriction and the Fourteenth Amendment: The Restrictive Covenant Cases, 16 U of Chi. L. Rev. 203, 216 (1949).

It is fundamental that a contract is merely an agreement judicially enforceable either by an action at law for damages or by a suit in equity for specific performance. Specific performance is the exceptional remedy - applied only where damages for the breach are inadequate. The usual, and frequently the sole, remedy for a breach of contract is an action for damages, the object of which is to put the injured plaintiff in as good a position as he would have been had the contract been fully performed. Damages are merely "the judicial method of satisfying the contract." Campbell Building Co. v. State Road Commission, 70 P(2d) 857, 862 (1937); Horn v. Matagorda County, 213 S.W. 934, 935 (1919). Plainly, therefore, actions for damages and specific performance are the judicial techniques designed to secure for a party injured as a consequence of a breach of contract precisely what he bargained for or a money equivalent so that he will "be placed in the same situation ... as if the contract had been performed." Robinson v. Harmon, 1 Ex. 850, 154 Eng.Rep. 363 (1848).

This action to enforce the penalty provision in the original covenant and to collect damages for breach of the 1946 agreement, like an action for injunctive relief, is intended to enforce and to maintain a pattern of racial residential segregation. It is manifest that a threat of legal liability will compel a party to a covenant to obey its terms. As Justice Holmes said in his dissenting opinion in Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219, 246 (1911) "Any legal liability for breach of a contract is a disagreeable consequence which tends to make the contractor do as he said he would. Liability to an action for damages has that tendency as well as a fine." It is evident that if an action for damages can be maintained, property owners will refrain from selling to members of the excluded class. For if a property owner who is disposed to sell in disregard of racial restrictions is to be judicially compelled to respond in an action at law for damages, he will be deterred from selling. If he obeys the condition in order to avoid being sued, clearly his compliance is not voluntary but the result of judicial compulsion. What could not be attained through the injunctive process, could thus be accomplished as effectively through the medium of an action for damages. It would indeed be anomalous for this Court to hold that courts which are forbidden to prevent willing vendors from selling to Negroes may nevertheless do so by the threat of a money judgment. This Court would thus be accomplishing by indirection that which it has been barred from doing directly although it is a maxim that "what the state may not do directly, it may not do indirectly." Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219, 244 (1911). A decision by this Court that an action for damages is not banned equally with a suit for injunctive relief would thus break down "the broad barrier to segregation by judicial decree" (Ming, supra, pg. 216) erected by the Supreme Court in the Shelley and Hurd cases, and would resurrect and restore the effectiveness of the restrictive covenant as a major device for ghettoizing racial and religious minorities and denying them the opportunity to obtain adequate housing.

That judicial action is governmental action is no longer in dispute. Clearly, it is no less a direct exercise of state power when property is seized and sold by a sheriff to satisfy a judgment for damages than when a person is held in contempt for refusal to obey the command of an injunction. It is obvious, therefore, whether the restriction is enforced either in a suit for injunctive relief or in an action for damages for breach of the covenant, "the full panoply" of governmental power is being made available to those who, like the plaintiffs, are seeking to enforce the restriction and perpetuate the discrimination.

In Buchanan v. Warley, 234 U.S.60 (1917) and Harmon v. Tyler, 273 U.S.668 (1927), the Supreme Court acknowledged "the right of white sellers to dispose of their properties free from restrictions as to potential purchasers based on consideration of race or color," Shelley v. Kraemer, supra pg. 9. If this Court should now hold defendants liable in damages for selling to Negro purchasers, it would clearly be impairing their right to sell their property free from such improper restrictions. It would be creating and enforcing a duty not to sell to colored purchasers and it is immaterial whether that duty is enforced by the threat of imposing a liability to pay money damages for a violation thereof or by enjoining a threatened violation.

In Buchanan v. Warley, the Supreme Court held that the state could not, consistent with the due process clause, deny a white owner of property the right to sell that property solely because of the color of the prospective purchaser. In Harmon v. Tyler the Supreme Court in a per curiam opinion, on the authority of Buchanan v. Warley, held invalid an ordinance forbidding a Negro from residing in a predominantly white area or any white person from establishing a home in a predominantly Negro area without the consent of a majority of the residents. The Ordinance was invalidated at the instance of a white property owner in a suit brought against him by another white owner who sought to restrain him from renting a home to a Negro without obtaining the necessary consents. In Urciolo v. Hodge, a companion case to Hurd v. Hodge, the petitioner, Urciolo, a white real estate dealer, had sold three restricted properties to Negroes who were then occupying them, and still owned three other lots subject to the covenants. The District Court enjoined the petitioner, Urciolo, from selling any of the lots to any Negro or colored person. The Supreme Court in reversing the judgment held that the action of the District Court directed against the white seller as well as the Negro purchasers denied rights intended by Congress to be protected by the Civil Rights Act. In thus protecting the petitioner, Urciolo, the court was merely relying on its earlier decision in the Buchanan case where the ordinance was invalidated on complaint of the white property owner.

Just as the action of the municipal legislature in seeking to prevent a white property owner from selling to Negroes was held in Buchanan v. Warley to be an unconstitutional interference with his right to sell freely to Negroes, so, too, if this Court should now hold the defendants liable in damages for breaching the covenant and selling to Negroes, its action would impair the right of the defendants to sell their property to any purchaser free from any restriction based on color or race. Without the intervention of this Court, defendants would be free to dispose of their property without being penalized on account of the color of their purchasers.

The only court which has thus far considered the question has concluded that an action for damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant may still be maintained. Weiss et al v. Leaon, 225 S.W.(2d) 127 (Mo. 1950). The court was of opinion that an action for damages was not outlawed by the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Shelley and Hurd cases. It is submitted that the Missouri court has narrowly and erroneously interpreted the import of the Supreme Court decisions. Law review writers have uniformly rejected the Missouri decision as unsound, 30 Bost.U.L.Sev. 273 (Apr. 1950); 18 Geo. Wash. L.Rev. 417 (Apr. 1950); 38 Geo.L.J. 678 (May 1950); 63 Harv.L.Rev. 1062 (Apr. 1950); 98 U.ofPa.L.Rev. 588 (Mar. 1950); 18 J.B.A. Kans. 359 (May 1950) just as earlier writers in commenting upon the Shelley and Hurd cases generally agreed that a logical application of the principle of those cases would require the dismissal of an action for damages just as it precludes a suit for injunctive relief, 48 Col. L.Rev. 1241, 1244 (1948); Scanlon, Racial Restrictions in Real Estate - Property Values vs. Human Values, 24 Notre Dame Lawyer, 157, 182 (1949), Ming, supra 203, 216. At least one court has already held that the scope of those decisions is not restricted to complaints for injunctive relief but extends to any type of judicial action which seeks to enforce and give effect to the restriction. In Clifton v. Puente, 218 S.W.(2d) 273 (Tex. Civ. App. 1948) the court held that a breach of the covenant could not be relied upon as a defense to an action in trespass to take possession of restricted property brought by a member of the proscribed group.

The Missouri court itself recognized that the remedy by way of damages like the remedy of specific performance might be outlawed constitutionally. But it concluded -- with a diffidence and lack of conviction apparent on its face -- that the ruling of the Supreme Court did not necessarily extend to actions for damages, or at least since the Court had not expressly ruled on this precise question, it was free to conclude subject to review by the Supreme Court that an action for damages was not barred by the Court's decisions. In so doing, the Missouri court ignored these decisions of the Supreme Court holding that legislative and judicial action restricting the right of a white property owner to sell to colored purchasers imposed an unconstitutional restraint on the white property owner's freedom to dispose of his property. In holding that the white property owner who sold his property to a member of the excluded class could be sued in an action for damages, the Missouri court clearly infringed on his constitutional right to dispose of his property free from any restraint based on the color of his purchaser.

A decision by this Court that a suit for damages may be lawfully maintained, would clearly establish a substantive rule of law. The fact that the rule would be judicial rather than legislative in origin would make it no less an expression of governmental action. And if an otherwise willing vendor subsequently refused to sell covenanted property to a Negro in order to avoid being sued, the prospective Negro purchaser could properly claim that the judicially formulated rule deprived him of rights protected by the Civil Rights Act and was contrary to public policy - or, in the case of a rule adopted by a state court, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Clearly it would be a vain and purposeless gesture and a futile exercise of judicial power to prescribe a rule of law which could thereafter be promptly and successfully challenged as being constitutionally or otherwise unenforceable.

In both Shelley v. Kraemer and Hurd v. Hodge, the Supreme Court recognized that restrictive covenants are not interdicted "so long as the purposes of those agreements are achieved by the parties through voluntary adherence to the terms," without the support or sanction of governmental authority. In the instant case, there has been no voluntary compliance with the terms of the restrictive agreement. On the contrary, defendants refused to observe the agreement and sold their property to Negroes, and plaintiffs are now calling upon this court for its aid and for the exercise of its coercive power to enforce the agreement through an award of damages. Such judicial enforcement is, however, clearly foreclosed by the decisions of the Supreme Court. If Congress were to enact a statute authorizing the relief the plaintiffs are now seeking from this Court -- the levy of damages against an owner of property for selling to a Negro -- it is clear that the statute would be held to violate the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The fact that the rule of law is judge-made rather than statutory is not material. In either case the property owner would be penalized because of the color of the purchaser. A ruling by this Court allowing an action for damages would result in the formulation of a substantive rule of law which by its very terms would make race or color relevant in its application. Such a rule of law would violate the Civil Rights Act and be clearly inconsistent with and contrary to the public policy of the United States as expressed in the Hurd case. "Where the enforcement of private agreements would be violative of (public) policy, it is the obligation of the courts to refrain from such exertion of judicial power." Hurd v. Hodge. The public policy of the United States against enforcement of racial restrictive covenants imposes on this court no lesser obligation to dismiss this action for damages than to dismiss a complaint for injunctive relief.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons herein stated, it is respectfully requested that the motion of the defendant to dismiss the complaint be granted.

Respectfully submitted

Robert E. Sher
1026 Woodward Bldg.
Attorney for Amici Curiae,
Anti-Defamation League and
American Jewish Committee

David A. Brody,
Of Counsel
1003 K Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

OCCUPIED DWELLING UNITS IN DILAPIDATED CONDITION
1 9 5 0
Percentage Distribution

State	White	Negro
Alabama	15	45
Arkansas	18	43
Florida	7	38
Georgia	13	46
Kentucky	15	36
Louisiana	11	41
Mississippi	16	47
North Carolina	11	37
Oklahoma	11	35
South Carolina	12	43
Tennessee	15	40
Texas	11	35
Virginia	8	34

Source: 1950 Census of Housing

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Arnold Forster and Edwin J. Lukas

DATE: February 19, 1951

SUBJECT: Phillips v. Knaff

On January 30, 1951, the Circuit Court of Wayne County, Michigan, handed down a decision in the case of Phillips v. Knaff, in which it threw out a suit brought to collect damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant.

The restrictive covenant in the case was directed against occupancy and use by persons other than "a white person of the Caucasian race". The plaintiffs and the defendants were owners of adjoining lots subject to the restrictive covenant. The defendants sold their property to Negroes in disregard of the covenant. The plaintiffs then brought an action for damages based on the claim that the defendant's sale to Negroes had damaged plaintiffs' property to the extent of $5,000. The defendants asked the dismissal of the complaint on the ground that it did not state a cause of action.

The Wayne County Circuit Court dismissed the complaint. It pointed out that the parties believed, when they entered into the racial restrictive covenant, that it was enforcible in the courts by an injunction, and that therefore, they had made no provision in the contract for alternative remedies such as a damage suit in case of breach of the covenant. At the time the parties signed the covenant, it could be enforced in the courts of Michigan by injunction. Thereafter, in 1948, the United States Supreme Court, in its decision in Shelley v. Kraemer, ruled that such covenants could not be enforced by state courts. The court then cited a number of cases holding that, where two persons enter into a contract based on certain assumptions as to their legal rights and are mistaken in their assumptions, the contract is void, and will be set aside upon application to the courts. After stating that the restrictive covenant is a contract the court applied the rule described above, and held that the racial restrictive covenant upon which the suit was based was void and that, therefore, the suit must be dismissed.

In discussing the impact of the decision in Shelley v. Kraemer, on the case before it, the court said: "Since it is the policy of the courts of this state, under the law of this state, not to take direct action in enforcing adherence to racial covenants, it should be the policy of the state not to do indirectly what it is forbidden to do directly in the courts of this state, and the court should deny plaintiffs a right of action for damages." It should be noted, however, that the court based its decision, not on the foregoing language, but on the rule of law that "if the parties entered into a contract which they believed could be enforced in a court of equity, under the decisions of this state at the time of its making, and later the courts of this state held that they would not enforce the contract, said contract is void and unenforcible."

Joint Memorandum

16-Housing

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
100 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Regional Offices

RECEIVED
MAR 19 1951
Southern Regional Council

FROM: Frances Levenson and Sol Rabkin

DATE: March 15, 1951

SUBJECT: New York City Ordinance Prohibiting Discrimination in All Publicly-Assisted Housing Projects

Victory at last has been achieved in the long struggle to obtain an ordinance barring discrimination in the vast Stuyvesant Town housing development in New York City. On March 14 Mayor Vincent Impellitteri signed into law the Brown-Isaacs ordinance which makes it a misdemeanor for any housing project constructed with any direct or indirect financial aid from the city to discriminate in the selection of tenants on the basis of race, color, or ancestry. A fine of $500 for each violation is provided and any aggrieved person may seek injunctive relief.

Stuyvesant Town, built pursuant to a contract with the City entered into in 1943, was one of the first post-war projects to be constructed under an urban redevelopment statute. It consists of 18 square city blocks and houses a population of approximately 25,000. The City condemned all the land on which the development is located and granted partial tax exemption on the improvements for 25 years. Since 1943 when the contract between New York City and Metropolitan was entered into, Metropolitan consistently stated that its policy was not to rent to Negroes.

In 1944, in order to prevent a repetition of the Stuyvesant Town pattern, New York City enacted a city ordinance outlawing discrimination in publicly-assisted developments built after that date. In 1950 New York State legislature passed the history-making Austin-Wicks law which bars discrimination and segregation in all public and publicly-assisted developments throughout the State constructed after July 1950. Thus, while all new projects built with any government aid were prohibited from selecting tenants on the basis of race, Stuyvesant Town, the largest such development in the State, was free to continue to discriminate.

The highest court in New York in a 4-to-3 decision upheld Stuyvesant Town's legal right to select its tenants on any basis whatsoever, and the United States Supreme Court refused to review the case. In August 1950 Metropolitan admitted "some qualified Negroes" to Stuyvesant Town but reiterated that it did not contemplate any change in its basic policy.

Stuyvesant Town had become a national symbol of discrimination, and community organizations, led by the New York State Committee on Discrimination in Housing, united in a drive to enact a law applicable to Stuyvesant Town. The Brown-Isaacs ordinance is such a law.

* * *

11-51

Housing

PRINCIPLES OF LAW AND PUBLIC POLICY AND OTHER STATEMENTS SIGNIFICANTLY RELEVANT TO CURRENT RACIAL CONSIDERATIONS IN HOUSING AND LAND USE

-0-

Legal Principles

§1978 U. S. Code:

"All citizens of the United States shall have the same rights, in every State and Territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property."

Shelley v. Kraemer, Nos. 72 and 87 - October Term, 1947, U. S. Supreme Court:

"We hold that in granting judicial enforcement of the restrictive agreements in these cases, the States have denied petitioners the equal protection of the laws and that, therefore, the action of the state courts cannot stand. We have noted that freedom from discrimination by the States in the enjoyment of property rights was among the basic objectives sought to be effectuated by the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment. That such discrimination has occurred in these cases is clear. Because of the race or color of these petitioners they have been denied rights of ownership or occupancy enjoyed as a matter of course by other citizens of different race or color."

Brief for the United States as Amicus Curiae in the case of Shelley v. Kraemer, No. 72, Supreme Court of the U. S., October Term, 1947:

"The Government is of the view that judicial enforcement of racial restrictive covenants on real property is incompatible with the spirit and letter of the Constitution and laws of the United States. It is fundamental that no agency of government should participate in any action which will result in depriving any person of essential rights because of race or color or creed."

Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60. November 5, 1917. U. S. Supreme Court:

The Court held that "the police power, broad as it is, cannot justify the passage of a law or ordinance which runs counter to the limitations of the Federal Constitution" on the power of government to deny "those fundamental rights in property which it was intended to secure upon the same terms to citizens of every race and color."

Declaration of National Housing Policy

Public Law 171 - 81st Congress, Section 2.

"The Congress hereby declares that the general welfare and security of the Nation and the health and living standards of its people require housing production and related community development sufficient to remedy the serious housing shortage, the elimination of sub-standard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, and the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family, thus contributing to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation."

Public Housing

Public Law 171 - 81st Congress, Section 301 (8)(c).

". . . In initially selecting families for admission to dwellings of given sizes and at specified rents the public housing agency shall give preference to families having the most urgent housing needs, and thereafter, in selecting families for admission to such dwellings, shall give due consideration to the urgency of the families' housing needs."

Public Law 171 - 81st Congress, Section 302 (10)(g).

The public housing agency, as among low-income families eligible for occupancy, shall extend the first preference". . . to families which are to be displaced by any low-rent housing project or by any public slum-clearance or redevelopment project initiated after January 1, 1947, or which were so displaced within three years prior to making application to such public housing agency for admission to any low-rent housing . . ."

(Among the various categories of families eligible for low-income housing, families of disabled veterans and veterans have priority.)

Low-Rent Housing Manual, Section 102.1, February 21, 1951.

Racial Policy

The following general statement of racial policy shall be applicable to all low-rent housing projects developed and operated under the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended:

1. Programs for the development of low-rent housing, in order to be eligible for PHA assistance, must reflect equitable provision for eligible families of all races determined on the approximate volume and urgency of their respective needs for such housing.

2. While the selection of tenants and the assigning of dwelling units are primarily matters for local determination, urgency of need and the preferences prescribed in the Housing Act of 1949 are the basic statutory standards for the selection of tenants.

Low-Rent Housing Manual, Section 102.2, May 29, 1951.

Racial Equity in Communities with Small Minority Population

In urban communities of small minority group population, where there are inflexible patterns of racial occupancy, there is the possibility that, because of the size of the group, it may be inadvertently overlooked in planning Development Programs for low-rent housing. Special measures are prescribed below to assure compliance with PHA policy requiring equitable provision of low-rent public housing for eligible families of all races, determined by the urgency of their respective needs for such housing.

1. No Development Program shall be approved unless the Local Authority agrees that, whenever an analysis of survey data reveals existence of an eligible market among families in the minority group in the locality, dwelling units will be constructed for such minority group families at the same market ratio which is being used for the majority group families in the locality, if the application of such ratio will produce a market among families of the minority group of two or more units.

2. In every case where survey findings fail to show a sufficient effective market among families of minority groups, the Field Office Racial Relations Officer, in order to protect the Local Authority and the PHA from possible later charges of discrimination, shall make a field investigation.

3. If no eligible market of minority families is found at the time of the Racial Relations Officer's investigation, but one subsequently develops, the PHA and the Local Authority must

(a) if the program is at a stage where this is practical, revise the Development Program to provide housing for eligible minority families; or

(b) if the Development Program has progressed beyond the stage where revision is practical, include in any subsequent program for this locality equitable provisions for eligible racial minority families.

Low-Rent Housing Manual, Section 213.2, May 15, 1951.

Relocation and Site Occupants

1. Introduction

If a Local Authority proposes to use a slum site, in order that displacement of site occupants will not result in undue hardship to such occupants, the Local Authority shall:

(1) As a condition to preliminary approval of the site demonstrate to the satisfaction of the PHA that relocation of site occupants is feasible;

(2) As a condition to approval of the Development Program establish a plan satisfactory to the PHA for relocating site occupants; and

(3) In the Annual Contributions Contract agree to carry out the relocation plans set forth in the Development Program.

Proposals for use of slum sites involving the displacement of minority groups will be subject to careful scrutiny by the PHA, because such groups are often seriously restricted as to the neighborhoods in which they can find other dwellings.

2. Demonstration of Feasibility

To demonstrate the feasibility of relocation the Local Authority must show:

(1) A reasonably sound estimate of the number of families to be displaced from the site, including appropriate data as to income and race;

(2) The approximate time of displacement, particularly when demolition and rebuilding is to be carried out in stages;

(3) With respect to families apparently eligible for public low-rent housing, that such families can be offered dwellings in low-rent housing projects at the time of displacement or that they can reasonably be expected to find temporary dwelling accommodations of some kind and later be accommodated in low-rent housing projects;

(4) With respect to families not eligible for public low-rent housing, that they can reasonably be expected to find dwelling accommodations no worse than those on the site and at rents within their financial means.

The demonstration of feasibility must recognize any restrictions in the supply of housing for minority group families.

The demonstration must recognize the demands of any other relocation which will take place in the community, particularly any slum clearance assisted under Title I of the Housing Act of 1949.

* * *

Slum Clearance (Law)

Public Law 171 - 81st Congress. Section 105(c).

"Contracts for financial aid shall be made only with a duly authorized local public agency and shall require that--. . . There be a feasible method for the temporary relocation of families displaced from the project area, and that there are or are being provided, in the project area or in other areas not generally less desirable in regard to public utilities and public and commercial facilities and at rents or prices within the financial means of the families displaced from the project area, decent, safe, and sanitary dwellings equal in number to the number of and available to such displaced families and reasonably accessible to their places of employment. . . ."

Section 105(d).

"No land for any project to be assisted under this title shall be acquired by the local public agency except after public hearing following notice of the date, time, place, and purpose of such hearing."

(Policy)

A Guide to Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment (Revised April, 1950) Office of the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, p. 24.

"Every contract for financial assistance . . . will require that the local public agency (a) shall cause to be removed or abrogated any covenant or other provision in any agreement, lease, conveyance or other instrument restricting, upon the basis of race, creed or color, the sale, lease or occupancy of any land which it acquires as part of a project; and (b) shall adopt effective measures to assure that no covenant, agreement, lease, conveyance or other instrument may be validly executed by the local public agency, the redevelopers or his successors in interest, restricting the sale, lease or occupancy of any real estate in the project areas upon the basis of race, creed or color."

Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment Program, Local Public Agency Manual, Part 2, Chapter 6, Section 2.

Rehousing

In order that the rehousing requirements (other than temporary relocation) be met, the Local Public Agency must assure that:

a. Dwellings provided or to be provided are at least equal in number to the aggregate of the number of families being displaced and are available to such families. The relocation requirements will not be fulfilled if the housing needs of any family or any group of families cannot be satisfied from the supply of acceptable accommodations, existing or projected. The availability factor is particularly significant in meeting the needs of displaced minority group families.

b. Such dwellings are available ". . . at rents or prices within the financial means of families displaced from the project area . . ." Gross rents, including utilities, generally should not exceed 25 per cent of gross family income and sales prices generally should not exceed two and one half times annual income, subject to variances owing to family sizes and income categories.

c. Dwellings located off the project site are ". . . not generally less desirable in regard to public utilities and public and commercial facilities . . ." and are in a location reasonably accessible to the places of employment of working members of the displaced families.

d. Dwellings are "decent, safe, and sanitary."

Private Housing

Letter from Commissioner, Federal Housing Administration to Directors and Chief Underwriters of all Field Offices, February 18, 1949.

"No application for mortgage insurance shall be rejected solely on the grounds that the subject property or the type of occupancy might affect the market attitude toward other properties in the immediate neighborhood. . . .

. . . mortgage insurance shall not be precluded (1) because of a different type of occupancy regardless of whether or not it is in violation of a restrictive covenant, (2) nor shall such insurance be precluded on the ground that the introduction of a different occupancy type may affect the values of other properties in the area."

Amendments to Underwriting Manual, Federal Housing Administration, December 16, 1949.

Section 242. "Underwriting considerations shall recognize the right to equality of opportunity to receive the benefits of the mortgage insurance system in obtaining adequate housing accommodations irrespective of race, color, creed or national origin. Underwriting considerations and conclusions are never based on discriminatory attitudes or prejudice."

Section 303. "Requirements and standards applying to real estate pertain to characteristics of the property and neighborhood in which the real estate is located, and are technical in character. They do not pertain to the user groups, because homogeneity or heterogeneity of neighborhoods as to race, creed, color, or nationality is not a consideration in establishing eligibility."

Amendments to Administrative Rules, Federal Housing Administration, December 16, 1949.

"A mortgagor must certify that until the mortgage has been paid in full, or the contract of insurance otherwise terminated, he will not file for record any restriction upon the sale or occupancy of the mortgaged property on the basis of race, color, or creed or execute any agreement, lease, or conveyance affecting the mortgaged property which imposes any such restriction upon its sale or occupancy."

National Association of Real Estate Boards News Service. (Release for June 14, 1949.)

"The National Association of Real Estate Boards, representing the organized real estate industry, announced that it is recommending to local real estate boards throughout the nation that they undertake to provide better housing for Negro families. . . . Reluctance of financial institutions to purchase mortgages on Negro property must be gradually overcome. Such facts as we now have in hand indicate that the Negro is a good economic risk. . . . Responsible builders should be encouraged to undertake the construction of Negro housing, both in areas now available and in the form of new neighborhood projects . . . Management of Negro rental properties should be of a kind and character which is on a parity with that given to other types of property. We believe that it will be found that Negroes will respond if given opportunity to avail themselves of facilities and services of modern character."

The Mortgage Banker (December 1949, p. 9).

"It is the policy of the Mortgage Bankers Association of America to make loans available to all people without distinction as to race, color or creed, within the limitations of sound lending practices."

NAHB Correlator, March 1950. (Memorandum to members of National Association of Home Builders from Frank Cortright, President.)

"Housing for minority groups and lower income families comprises a vast new market for home builders.... In order to encourage more construction of sale and rental housing for the lower income groups...regardless of race, color or creed... we are now advocating a new insuring device to be used exclusively for financing minimum housing projects in Federally subsidized slum-cleared land. This is our NEW frontier in housing construction.... Supplying homes...for rent and for sale...for minority groups and families farther and farther down the income scale...is a challenge to the ingenuity and capacity of our industry."

One of the chief keys to the local application of the above principles is participation by minority groups themselves in the planning, development and administration of local slum clearance and housing programs. This means membership on and consultation with such local agencies as: the local housing authority, the local land or redevelopment agency, city planning commission, real estate board, home builders association, savings and loan, mortgage bankers, or other lending institutions.

The resources of the racial relations advisers in Washington and field offices of the various Federal housing agencies should be fully utilized. Field advisers are located in all of the Public Housing Administration area offices and in each of the Federal Housing Administration zones. Information concerning these services may be secured by addressing the Public Housing Administration or the Federal Housing Administration, Washington 25, D. C. Their services are available upon request in any community. If in doubt as to the program involved, address requests to: Office of the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, 1626 K Street, N.W., Washington 25, D. C.

See also: "Selected References on Housing of Minorities" - Housing and Home Finance Agency, Racial Relations Service, Washington 25, D. C.

"Non-Discrimination Clauses in Regard to Public Housing and Urban Redevelopment Undertakings" - Housing and Home Finance Agency, Racial Relations Service, Washington 25, D. C.

—Excerpts by the Racial Relations Service,
Housing and Home Finance Agency
November 1951

Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination

Chairman of Board
PAUL G. ANNES

Co-Chairmen
BERNARD J. SHEIL — JOHN B. THOMPSON

Secretary
WILLIAM JONES

Treasurer
ROBERT A. CLELAND

Founded in 1943 as a non-profit organization to coordinate efforts to eliminate inter-group tensions by education, legislation, and direct action.

123 West Madison Street - Room 610 • Chicago 2, Illinois • Telephone RAndolph 6-0593

WAITSTILL H. SHARP, Director

462

Housing

THE CICERO RIOTS OF 1951

Compiled by Dr. Homer A. Jack

Introduction

On July 10-12th, 1951, mob violence in Cicero broke out over the prospective occupancy of an apartment by a Negro veteran and his family. Law and order broke down so completely that Cook County Sheriff Babb requested Governor Adlai Stevenson to call in the national guard. This was done and it was the first time in almost three decades that troops were used in the Chicago area to quell racial disturbances.

This description of the events the riots and the events leading up to them is prepared for use by the organizations affiliated with the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination.

Cicero

Cicero is a separate, incorporated municipality located west of Chicago. It begins at 4600 West and runs to 6200 West, extending from 39th Street on the South (bordering Chicago and Stickney) to 12th Street on the North (bordering Chicago and Oak Park). Its 70,000 residents comprise more than 22 nationality groups, with a predominance of persons of Czechoslovak lineage, with many of Polish, Lithuanian, Italian, and German parentage. There are nine large Roman Catholic churches and eleven small Protestant churches. There is no synagogue, although there are approximately 900 Jewish adults living in the city. It is said that no Negroes live within the limits of Cicero.

A large proportion of Cicero's wage-earners work for the Western Electric Company. The second largest industry is Hurley Manufacturing (Hot Point). Cicero has had a reputation of being Al Capone's town, although it is said that he never lived there, but had large gambling and beer supply interests there. The municipality is governed by a 7-man board of trustees, with Henry Sandusky as town president. He was first elected in 1944. The chief of police, Ervin Konovsky, was appointed by the town president in 1944.

June 8th to July 10th

Some years ago the 20-apartment building at 6132-42 W. 19th Street on the northwestern section of Cicero was purchased by Miss Camille De Rose. She increased rents and was harassed by tenants. In March, 1951, she leased the apartment in the building in which she was living to Mr. and Mrs. Harvey E. Clark, Jr., a Negro veteran and his wife. They did not attempt to move in immediately. On March 31st, Miss De Rose found police stationed outside her apartment because they felt a Negro family would move in. Later Cicero City Attorney, Nicholas Berkos, told her that they would not and could not afford to permit Negroes to be in the neighborhood because it would cause bloodshed and they would not be responsible for their safety. Later two police officers visited her in her apartment and she said they told her that if she attempted to rent it to a Negro, she would not be able to get away with it. (Miss De Rose's interest in the trust owning the whole apartment has been transferred to Jewel Young, 4757 S. Parkway).

On June 8th, Charles S. Edwards, the rental agent, went to the apartment with Mrs. George C. Adams. At 2:30 p.m. a moving van with Mr. and Mrs. Clark drove to the building. Two plainclothesmen stopped the truck and said the furniture could not be moved into the building without a permit. The two women went into the apartment. Mr. Edwards was later ordered to go into the building and bring the women out. Mr. Edwards said he was followed by a policeman with a drawn revolver who said, "All of you get out of here right away -- we are all going out." They left the building with the officer following with a drawn revolver. The attorney checked with Cicero authorities and was told that no permit to move furniture was ever required. Following is an affidavit from Charles S. Edwards describing subsequent events:

> "About 6 p.m. the Chief of Police of Cicero rushed out of the alley nearby followed by about 20 men and rushed up and grabbed my arm. The police in the cars out front got out of their cars and rushed up toward us. The chief said to me, 'You should know better -- get going -- get out of here fast. There will be no moving into this building. I'm not going to endanger the lives of 19 families for the likes of you.' During these statements, the chief held my left arm with his strong left hand and he kept hitting me in the back with his right fist, especially at my right shoulder and on my right side below the shoulder. He hit me about eight times while he was pushing me ahead of him toward my car which was parked across the street. I was trying to walk, but he was trying to make me move faster. When we reached my car, I opened the door and the chief shoved me inside and said, 'Get out of Cicero and don't come back in town or you'll get a bullet through you.' There were 3-4 officers with the Chief . . . I have not been back to Cicero since and my clients the Clarks have not been allowed to move into the apartment which is theirs."

Mr. Edwards and Mr. Clark brought this matter to the attention of the NAACP and other defense agencies. It was decided to bring criminal prosecution against the civic authorities of Cicero under the United States code -- the civil rights statutes -- for conspiring to deprive citizens of their right of freedom of movement by force and violence and under authority. They also filed a $200,000 damage suit against the town.

On June 26th, United States District Judge, John P. Barnes heard the appeal for a preliminary injunction restraining the town of Cicero from stopping Mr. Clark and family from moving into the apartment. Cicero Attorney Nicholas Berkos, representing Cicero Police Chief Ervin Konovsky, argued that all the accusations were denied by town officials. Judge Barnes issued the temporary injunction warning, "If you don't obey the order, you're going to be in serious trouble. I'll tell you what you are going to do. You are going to exercise the same diligence in seeing that these people move in as you did in trying to keep them out." When Joseph Lustfield, attorney for the town trustees, interrupted to say that there had been "some trouble" about the ownership of the building, Judge Barnes said, "You don't need to worry about who the owners are. From now on you are going to treat these people like anybody else." The order restrains the town, its president, its chief of police, and other officials and agents from "shooting, beating and otherwise harassing" Mr. Clark and his family. Judge Barnes set September 11th for a hearing on the permanent injunction and the $200,000 damage claim. He refused to order hearings by a mastery in chancery and said, "I want to hear this case myself." Later the Clarks appeared before U. S. Attorney Otto Kerner for questioning to determine if the case should be presented to a federal grand jury for possible action under the 1870 civil rights law, originally an anti-Ku Klux Klan measure.

With this temporary injunction, the Clarks prepared to move into the apartment, with the date kept a secret. The Illinois Interracial Commission, the Chicago Council Against Discrimination, and other groups tried to do what they could to prepare the community for the move-in. For example, on June 28th, The Church Federation of Greater Chicago sent a communication to all Protestant ministers in Cicero and Berwyn, asking them to make a statement from their pulpits on July first to help maintain peace and order. They enclosed a statement written by a pastor in a similar disturbed area in Chicago.

The Clarks moved their furniture into the apartment building on Tuesday, June 10th. Although the date of move-in was a closely-guarded secret, observers on the scene on June 10th heard neighbors discuss that the family was moving-in that day. Their furniture was moved into the apartment, although they did not stay that night. A crowd gathered, and the windows of the Clark apartment were broken.

Wednesday, July 11th

The nineteen other families in the building moved out most of their furniture and put it in storage during the day.

An observer from the American Civil Liberties Union made this report of what he saw that evening: "When I arrived at 7:30 p.m., a crowd of 800-900 people were gathering. By dusk it had grown to 4000-5000 people. There were people of all ages, many women and children. The most active were teen-agers, some in gangs. Police did nothing to break up the gangs. There was a large pile of stones in lot near apartment and later in evening police watched women pass stones from a rockpile back to throwers in the crowd and they made no effort to stop this. The police for the most part were in a jovial mood, cracked jokes with the crowd, and some made Jim Crow remarks. By dark the ropes were cut by the gangs and the crowd came close to the apartment. Stones were thrown in the windows on all three floors, with increasing intensity on the South side of the building. There was one feeble effort by the County Police to re-rope the area, but this was soon abandoned. Firecrackers were thrown and one man, said to be a plainclothesman, went up to the group of kids and was heard to say, 'Cut out the firecrackers. In case you're searched, don't have any on you. We don't care how many stones you throw, but get rid of the firecrackers.'

"By 10:30 p.m., the frames of windows were being knocked out. Then a gang climbed into the apartment building from first-floor windows and kicked out sections of the windows. They went upstairs and vandalized apartments and turned on water and gas. One came out saying, 'get back, maybe there'll be an explosion.' They threw furniture out of the window and this was burned by others below. By 11:30 p.m., the gang was in the basement tearing up the plumbing. Then one boy rushed outside and said that they were being held downstairs. A large gang then moved into the basement and police used tear gas, which seemed to be effective for ten minutes. Later a loud speaker announced that Mr. Clark said he would not return to the apartment."

A similar first-hand account of Wednesday night appears in the Friday Chicago Sun-Times, written by reporter David Anderson. It was estimated that 30 Cicero policemen and 20 of the Sheriff's deputy policemen were on the scene. One policeman was hit in the head with a brick and hospitalized. Sheriff Babb said he was "disappointed at the degree of cooperation received from Cicero." His deputies asked the Cicero firemen to connect hoses and keep the crowd back, but they wouldn't do it except with an order from their lieutenant and he couldn't be found. The chief of police of Cicero was reportedly unavailable both on Tuesday and Wednesday evening. The president of the town council was out of town on Wednesday evening, summering at Antioch, Illinois.

Sheriff Babb was on the scene on Wednesday evening and talked to the crowd in an effort to disperse them. There are conflicting reports of just what he told them. Early in the morning on Thursday, young men even pulled down a half dozen 25-foot high poplar trees in front of the apartments. As each tree ripped, there was a crackle -- and cheers. Although late in the evening it was announced by police loudspeaker, that the Clark family agreed not to return to the apartment, this report was labeled false by the NAACP. Clark's attorney on Thursday said, "He (Clark) doesn't believe Cicero residents can afford to deny him his civil rights after he made such a sacrifice and helped to win the war and to establish the safety of those who live in Cicero."

Community Reaction

The press gave much more coverage to these disorders than any previous similar situation in the Chicago area for several years. Thursday morning papers had moderate stories of what happened on Wednesday night. As soon as it was revealed that the National Guard was called, the story was on the front pages of all the Chicago newspapers. The Chicago Sun-Times had an especially fine editorial on July 13th and also a column on the affair written by Clifton Utley (a reprint of his television broadcast on Thursday evening). The Chicago Daily News also ran a good editorial on Friday afternoon. There was full coverage by radio, both local and by national hook-ups.

Civic groups met on Thursday to discuss the situation. Organizations affiliated with the Chicago Council Against Discrimination met on Thursday afternoon to discuss several important measures and the Chicago Division of the American Civil Liberties Union also discussed the legal implications on Thursday. At a meeting of the Chicago Branch of the NAACP, it was announced that a mass meeting would be held within two weeks to collect money to reimburse the Clark family for damage they suffered.

Thursday, July 12th

Sheriff Babb, as chief law enforcement officer of Cook County, talked by telephone to Governor Stevenson at 12:30 p.m., at the instigation of Alderman Archibald Carey and others. The Governor was at first reluctant to call out the National Guard without a request from the Mayor of Cicero. Babb replied, "If you can find the Mayor, let me know." (Elsewhere he was reported as having said that Cicero authorities turned their backs on the disorders). Then Babb said although the Mayor was at his summer place near Antioch, Illinois, he wanted the National Guard called immediately, as chief law enforcement officer of the county. Gov. Stevenson then sent the following telegram to Sheriff Babb: "Proceeding in accordance with our understanding. Please confirm formally by wire your official request for National Guard forces to maintain law and order in Cicero." Sheriff Babb immediately replied, "Confirming my telephone conversation, I hereby notify you that the police forces available to me are unable to preserve the peace in Cicero, Cook County, Ill., and I therefore call upon you to dispatch necessary military forces to me in Cook County for the purpose of preserving the peace." Gov. Stevenson then issued this statement: "The Sheriff of Cook County has informed me that it is impossible to maintain law and order in Cicero and has formally requested assistance from the Illinois National Guard. The state's attorney of Cook County, acting through his first assistant, has made the same representations and the same request. Accordingly, I have ordered units of the Illinois National Guard into Cicero to assist the local police and the sheriff's police to maintain order."

Since the Chicago division of the National Guard was still at summer maneuvers at Camp Grayling, Michigan -- several hundred miles north -- Maj. Gen. Leo M. Boyle, Illinois Adjutant-General, dispatched five companies within a 40-mile radius: Company A of Woodstock, C of Elgin, D of Waukegan, G of Joliet, and H of Aurora. Gen. Boyle notified Col. Clifford Hodgin, commanding officer of the 129th Infantry at Peoria, to proceed to Cicero. First units arrived at the temporary Guard headquarters at the Cicero Town Hall at 4932 W. 25th Place, between 7:30 and 8:00 p.m. Sheriff Babb was then informed that he had to issue a written directive to the commanding officer and this did not arrive until 9:42 p.m.

In the meantime, Sheriff Babb tried to mobilize the maximum number of Sheriff'. deputies to protect the building. Of the 118 officers and men under his command for the whole of Cook County, he mobilized 60, asking the police of other Cook County towns to respond to county police calls. Also at the scene were many of the 80 police of Cicero. They formed a cordon at all intersections within two blocks of the apartment building in all directions. This was complicated by the fact that the city of Cicero ends a block west of the apartment, and Berwyn begins, but many Berwyn police were on duty just within Berwyn. While large crowds gathered at the periphery -- estimated to number almost 10,000 persons -- none were able to get within two blocks of the building. At 9:30 p.m., however, the police line two blocks west of the apartment broke and a crowd of 2000-3000 persons surged to within 300 feet of the west end of the building. The police lines in the other three directions held.

When the police lines were broken, a call was made for the troops and they arrived in vehicles from the Cicero City Hall at 10:20 p.m. For more than an hour they made a shoulder-to-shoulder line to keep the crowd back of the western end of the building, but for more than an hour they did not push the crowd back. Young men, aged 16-20, about 300 feet from the apartment and about 100 feet inside the crowd from the National Guard, began throwing stones and bricks at the apartment building. No attempt was made to push the crowd back beyond the reach of stones or to arrest the vandals. In fact, the spotlight of one police car (M-5000) surrounded by the crowd in the field was used by the boys to illuminate the windows of the building as a target for the rocks. Every time a window was hit or borken, great cheers went up from the crowd. Also some firecrackers and flares were thrown toward the apartment.

Beginning at 11:30 p.m., the National Guard slowly pushed the crowd gathered west of the apartment back 600 or more feet from the apartment. In the meantime, the crowd was focusing attention on the north side of the apartment and surged to only 50 feet from it. They threw in flares, bricks, and finally burning torches. Several fires were started within the apartment. The fire trucks, standing in the vicinity, rushed to the building and threw water on the apartment and put out the fire. Fire-hoses were used to wet the south side of the building to prevent flares from burning and, earlier in the day, the whole building was purposely soaked by firemen to prevent fire.

By 12:15 a.m., the National Guard had pushed the crowd away from the northwest corner of the building. In the melee, one police-car was overturned. It was reported that three other police-cars were overturned during the evening and an attempt was made to burn one vehicle. During the evening and early morning, 19 persons were reported injured, 13 being treated at MacNeal Memorial Hospital in Berwyn before being released. Among those injured were four National Guardsmen, four police officers, and nine civilians (including four; three men and one woman bayoneted by Guardsmen).

Approximately 70 persons were arrested and are scheduled to appear before the Police Magistrate in the Cicero Town Hall on the afternoon of Monday, July 16th. Four were charged with unlawful assembly and destruction of public property and bond was set at $50 for each charge. Ten were charged with unlawful assembly and assault to kill and bond was set at $100 for each charge. Fifty-six persons were charged with unlawful assembly and their bonds were set at $50 each. One of the rioters pointed out to police by National Guardsmen as especially troublesome was a GI home from Korea on 30-day leave. Police escorted him from the area and released him. Those arrested for participating in assaults were taken to the Bureau of Identification at the Chicago police headquarters for fingerprinting and to have their pictures taken.

Lt. Jack Johnson of the Bedford Park sheriff's office stated that he would ask for a sweeping U. S. investigation of the clashes.

Henry J. Sandusky, town president, in a belated statement said, "I deeply regret this incident which has made it necessary to call upon the militia to reestablish law and order in this particular area. Our officers, limited in number, coped valiantly with the problem, but it became evident by Wednesday night's disorders that outsiders had invaded our town, stormed our police lines and damaged the homes and properties of innocent citizens. Therefore to cope with these vandals, Sheriff Babb and I have felt it necessary to call for aid."

Col. Hodgin declared the area bounded by Highland Avenue on the West (Berwyn), and Austin Blvd. on the East, between 16th Street and Cermak Road (22nd) to be under martial law. In imposing this, Col. Hodgin said, "We're here to maintain law and order. We will cooperate with local authorities. All persons living in the half-mile square area and those having places of business there will be required to show credentials before they enter the region and upon leaving it. The martial law will be in force until the troops are released from duty there."

The mob was under control by 12:45 a.m. early Friday morning and by 3:00 a.m. only a sprinkling of the crowd remained. A full company of Guardsmen remained on duty at the scene, while others went to nearby restaurants.

Who is Harvey E. Clark, Jr.?

Mr. Clark, who so far has been prevented from moving into his apartment, is 29 years old. He was born in Mississippi. After finishing high school, he entered Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, where he majored in political science. While there he married a fellow student, Johnette, now 26 years old. They were married nine years ago and have two children, Michelle, aged 8, and Harvey III, aged 6. Clark left Fisk to join the army air force in 1942 and was assigned as an aviation instructor at Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. He served there and in two other southern fields until he was discharged in 1945. He returned to Fisk and finished his education under the GI bill of rights. While there he played baseball and was a member of the university debating team.

In 1949, Clark graduated from Fisk and brought his family to Chicago. He first got a job as an insurance agent. A year ago he began work as a bus driver for CTA. He lived for a while at 6725 St. Lawrence, but is now living temporarily at 921 E. 44th Street in a one-room apartment.

What You and Your Organization Can Do*

1. Stay away from the area. It is dangerous to become involved in any continuing gathering under martial law. Tell your friends to keep away.

2. Commend Gov. Stevenson (Executive Office, Springfield) and Sheriff Babb (County Building, Chicago) for calling out the militia so rapidly - law enforcement authorities in several similar situations in other states have tended to act slowly in similar situations.

3. Write letters to newspapers and radio stations. Commend their handling of the story - when it has been commendable. Watch for editorials and write letters to the editor.

4. Watch for signs of racial violence elsewhere. The disturbances in Cicero might well touch off smouldering situations in other suburbs or in tension areas in Chicago. For disturbances outside Chicago, notify immediately the Illinois Interracial Commission (RAndolph 6-0072). For disturbances within Chicago, notify immediately the Commission on Human Relations (WHitehall 4-4483).

5. Help mobilize constructive citizen action in Cicero and Berwyn. If you and your organization have contacts with democratically-minded individuals or organizations in these two suburbs, give their names immediately to the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination (RAndolph 6-0593). The main role of citizens' organizations is to mobilize public opinion within the area of the disturbances to turn public opinion against the violence and discrimination.

*As recommended at an emergency meeting of Affiliates of the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination, Friday, July 13, 1951.

3-52 Housing

VALUES IN TRANSITION AREAS: SOME NEW CONCEPTS

BELDEN MORGAN, South Pasadena, California

The author is an independent appraiser, and was formerly deputy chief appraiser of the FHA's Los Angeles office. A Senior member of the Society, he is a past president of both the Chicago and Los Angeles Chapters. This challenging article was developed from the subject matter of his recent talk before the Los Angeles Chapter.

A STUDY of the current impact of Negro population movements on property values reveals the truth of the statement that real estate economics are not only exceedingly complex, but are of an evolutionary character as well. It is well known that real estate appraising is a fluid art. Conclusions true one year are apt to be false in another year. Generalizations valid in one instance are invalid under different circumstances. Even our most widely accepted laws and theories are but statements of probabilities that are subject to change as the premises of the arguments shift with varying conditions. As Dr. Richard T. Ely so aptly stated years ago, "There is no system of economics applicable unchanged to all times."

Right now a change is taking place in appraisal thought with respect to the opinion held on the effect of the "infiltration" or "invasion" of minority groups on white neighborhoods. In discussing the implications of this change, no cause is to be espoused. This is an objective analysis. Nothing is to be advocated except a strong appeal to make every appraisal an honest report of the facts as they are found to exist without prejudice, bias or a preconceived notion that might be false.

To approach this problem without prejudice is difficult indeed. Over the years we have been brought up with deeply ingrained emotional feelings that we cannot shake off with ease simply by saying we will. Inevitably, some reservation of prejudice will be retained, and we probably will not be free of it for several generations.

Most appraisal texts treat the problem from the viewpoint of 20 years ago when it was commonly believed by nearly all that the presence of Negroes or other minorities in a neighborhood was a serious value-destroying influence. Appraisers were considered remiss in their duty if they failed to discover and report the presence of any minority member anywhere in the neighborhood of the subject property. Some appraisers kept maps outlining all the neighborhoods occupied by minorities for ready reference. This type of thinking is undergoing a change. There are many locations where such generalizations are no longer true.

ILLEGAL

On May 3, 1948, the United States Supreme Court rendered its historic decision that restrictive covenants were contrary to public policy and unenforceable by court action. This focused the attention of nearly everyone on a problem which had become increasingly acute for many years.

During World War II, when the population of Los Angeles increased by 30%, the non-white population increased by more than 100%. This was typical of the influx of the minorities into many of our large metropolitan centers where thousands crowded in to join the shipbuilding and aircraft trades and other war-born industries. The rapid increase of Negroes in American cities is a twentieth century phenomenon which was accelerated by war, but which will probably continue until the Negro population is more evenly dispersed.

The residential areas to which the Negro had been habitually confined literally bulged and broke at the seams. The housing conditions within those areas were unbelievably bad and a disgrace to the country. The problem of housing accommodations for Negroes was a complex one of low income, neighborhood restrictions which confined them to small areas plus a housing shortage within those areas. This resulted in over-crowding, congestion and blight; slums were created or accentuated. The advancing age of the structures coupled with the lack of maintenance by indifferent and greedy absentee owners, who knew it was not necessary to maintain the properties to hold tenants when the shortage was so acute, was the primary cause of the slum condition—the dwellers were not.

Whites observing Negroes living under those conditions are prone to blame the Negro for that condition, whereas the Negro was the victim—not the cause. (Blaming Negroes for the slums is akin to blaming the prisoners for the existence of the concentration camps of Russia.)

PROJECTS FILLED

The FHA annually makes a survey of all the large scale rental housing projects financed with FHA mortgages which reveals the vacancies, rent levels, turnover, etc., in each of these rental properties. The reports from the Negro projects in the Los Angeles area disclosed that there were fewer vacancies, higher rents and smaller turnover in those units than in comparable units in white neighborhoods. A typical remark by the owner of a 12-unit apartment in a neighborhood on the southwest side of Los Angeles which is in transition from white to non-white was, "Our building has 100% Negro occupancy. Rent payments are prompt and we have a waiting list of prospective tenants." A look at the rents makes this statement even more startling. The one-bedroom units were rented at $85 and the two-bedroom apartments at $110 per month, which was considerably higher than the rents for comparable units in white neighborhoods.

During the war certain priority allotments were issued to builders for the sole purpose of providing housing for Negro war workers. Several thousand residential units in tract developments that were built in Los Angeles under this program have been most successful. Foreclosures have been very few—less percentagewise than for the area as a whole—and there have been no mortgage losses sustained in any of these tracts. The resale market has been excellent. This favorable loan experience has attracted the attention of many mortgage lenders, and more and more of them are becoming interested in this type of security.

VALUES UPHELD

It has been apparent that Negro families have responded readily to the standards of good neighborhood living. A report by the FHA on one neighborhood stated, "The infiltration of Negro owner-occupants has tended to appreciate property values and neighborhood stability in contrast to its depreciating use by white families as a rental area."

Appraising properties in neighborhoods which are in transition from one type of occupancy to another or in a neighborhood which is already predominantly occupied by minority races really tests the skill of the appraiser. His huge stock of sales data is probably based on an entirely different market for an entirely different user group. He is going to have to start at the very beginning and find out what Negroes are paying for housing comparable to the subject property. That is the only type of sales data that will support a conclusion on property in a Negro neighborhood.

PRACTICAL TEST

Most appraisers through many years of experience can look at a house and approximate the rental and probable sales price obtainable. But this is not so with housing for Negroes. It is necessary to investigate and find out what Negroes can and do pay for housing.

Not long ago an application was received for a mortgage on a proposed duplex to be built in the heart of a

BELDEN MORGAN gives reasons why recent comparable sales data are the only support for valuations in Negro or mixed neighborhoods—

1. Because of increasing movements of minorities into previously un-mixed neighborhoods, properties must be judged by their probable marketability to the potential user group, not according to what they were worth to former owners and renters.
2. The demand for housing by minority groups is so strong that rentals and sales prices may be much higher than warranted by the condition and type of property.
3. Improved employment conditions have raised the incomes of Negroes, so that they will be able to maintain higher values.

Negro neighborhood. The location was surrounded by 40-year old and older frame rooming houses, apartments and single-family residences. It was not a slum district. Twenty years ago it was a well regarded white neighborhood in the upper medium price range. From the point of view of a Negro it was a very desirable residential neighborhood. Negroes of a relatively high economic level predominated in the area. Most of the occupants were civil service employees, public utility workers and professional people. Inasmuch as this would be the only new house for miles around, the application ordinarily would have been rejected because the value found would be substantially below replacement cost. The opinion would have been formed that the adverse effect of the environment would greatly restrict the marketability and rentability of this new property. An investigation revealed, however, that the demand from Negroes for rentals in this neighborhood was so great that they would pay higher rents than the casual observer would think possible. It was also found that a real market existed for the purchase of properties of this type by proposed owner-occupants who would live in one unit and rent the other. The conclusion was ultimately reached that the risk on this property was less than the risk on many new duplexes which were being built in new neighborhoods. This one had virtually no competition. It would be in strong demand for a long time. It was capable of earning more rent than similar structures in white neighborhoods. As a result it was appraised at its full cost of replacement.

The point is that properties in minority neighborhoods must be appraised, rated and judged from the viewpoint of their desirability, marketability and rentability to the user group involved. The old test of marketability must be applied to these properties.

What is meant by marketability? Marketability means the ability of a property to be sold and resold again and again. It means a property possessing the characteristics to attract many purchasers to it. Appraisers don't care what the race, creed or color of those purchasers might be, just so there are enough of them with the ability to pay to create a really strong and sustaining demand. Marketability is linked to desirability. As it varies, so does marketability. But in weighing desirability it must be thought of from the viewpoint of the potential users of the property, uninfluenced and unbiased by personal prejudices.

No attempt is being made to build up a case for all minority housing, for all Negroes or all minorities. There are many sub-standard properties. There are many sub-standard locations. Large masses of these groups of people lack the necessary financial ability to meet the obligations of home ownership; these present unacceptable mortgage risks by any standard. On the other hand there are many acceptable risks to be found in this field which shouldn't be overlooked because of blind prejudice.

RISK LESSENED

The continued financial ability to meet the obligation is the requirement that raises many doubts. It is apparent that a sizeable segment of the minority population have unstable incomes and are employed in low wage occupations. Percentagewise very few of these people earn over $40 per week. Obviously not many of this group can afford home ownership at today's high costs. But an increasing number of Negroes belong to another group. Today, the civil service employee, the public utility worker and the professional man earn as much as their white co-workers and enjoy equal economic stability. Conditions have changed. This was not true 20 years ago —20 years ago was a whole generation ago. Those of the current generation through compulsory education and the changed attitudes of government and large employers, sparked by the civil rights program, are infinitely better off than their fathers. Their span of available occupations covers the range formerly open only to whites. The Negro population will never again suffer the tremendous labor cutbacks of both wages and opportunities which occurred in the past. There is a large segment of the minority group which presents no additional risk because of its race. Consequently value changes in the future in the better Negro sections will be much the same as in predominantly white sections. (Editor's Note: See the report of the Greater Detroit Chapter's October meeting in THE REVIEW, December, 1951, for another view of the same subject.)

Now, what happens when Negroes enter a heretofore all white neighborhood? Sometimes, but not always, because whites are generally uninformed regarding the effect of Negro "invasions" on property values, the whites become panic stricken and desert the neighborhood "en masse" when Negro families first move into the neighborhood. The story of the "invasion" spreads, and occasionally the hysteria of the whites leaps beyond control. The insistent, desperate drive of the Negroes for self-betterment results in violence and bloodshed. Often the word spreads that property values will be wiped out when the neighborhood becomes predominantly Negro. Then everybody tries to sell in a hurry while they can still get a price, and offer their properties for a little less than their neighbors so as to sell first and get out first. This hysteria of course depresses prices, giving proof to the statement that prices fall with a Negro "invasion." But it is the mass exodus that temporarily gluts the market with offerings that depresses prices—not the influx. It is like a bank run engendered by fear. The fears produce an unwarranted condition that could be avoided if people would stay put.

STRONG MARKET

After the first hysterical selling phase passes prices become stabilized, then gradually increase under the pressure of Negro bidding. Whites who hold on to their property are often able to sell at prices substantially higher than prevailed prior to the "invasion." The old law of supply and demand asserts itself. The limited property available to Negroes coupled with the desperate need by the Negroes for adequate housing and their intense desire to better themselves exerts a pressure on the price structure that doesn't exist in older white neighborhoods.

People are learning this. Many districts today go through a transitional period in occupancy without any signs of hysteria and without any collapse in prices. The only effect from an economic viewpoint is a broadening and strengthening of the market by virtue of the increased demand. This is true in some areas, but not all. Whether prices rise or fall depends upon the ability of the newcomers to bid up prices.

RAPID TURNOVER

It usually will be found that sales activity is greater in racially mixed areas, especially in the low and moderate price ranges, and that the high effective demand among Negro buyers not only sustains price levels but often increases them.

Actually whether prices rise or fall depends upon the extent of the demand and the ability of the market to bid up prices, and has nothing to do whatsoever with racial characteristics. Generally speaking the Negro home owner pays higher prices than his white prototype because his color restricts his field of operations.

More Negroes have more money than ever before. They enjoy greater stability of employment than ever before, but still there are relatively few who are able to buy in the higher price ranges. When a few of these Negroes in the upper income brackets move into a neighborhood of high priced homes, some depression in prices and a restriction in market activity is usually observed. Some white prospective purchasers lose interest in that neighborhood and there are not enough Negro purchasers in that price range to take their place.

EXCEPTION

This condition prevails in at least two neighborhoods in the Los Angeles area which were investigated by the writer. In one, a $20,000 to $30,000 neighborhood on the southwest side of Los Angeles, the first Negro family moved in about two years ago. Today there are only nine Negro families among the several hundred white families in this area. Sales are very slow, and prices are down 10% to 15% below former levels in contrast to a general price increase throughout the area.

In contrast to this, the adjoining neighborhood which is a little older and in the $10,000 to $15,000 price range has had an entirely different experience. Prior to 1948 this was a restricted white neighborhood. The first Negro family didn't move in until the spring of 1950. Now the neighborhood is about 20% nonwhite. Actual sales histories on a number of typical properties in this area were obtained through brokers and verified by present owners. But changes in sales prices in themselves are meaningless unless related to the trend of market prices generally. In the Los Angeles area for the past ten years the Los Angeles Residential Research Committee has maintained an accurate index of residential market prices. Each sale obtained in this neighborhood was related to the curve of fluctuating market prices for the whole area to obtain a true picture of the effect of the minority "invasion" on the price structure in this neighborhood.

CASE HISTORIES

Property A sold in 1948 at $12,500 when the market price index was at 265. In 1950 a Negro moved next door. There was a subsequent sale in 1950 to a white at $13,500 which was an 8% increase and represented 287 on the index scale. But the market price index for the whole metropolitan area moved down in those two years to 230, a decline of 13%. Now the same property is listed for sale at $16,500 which is 300 on the market price scale and 32% higher than the 1948 scale, whereas the levels generally as revealed by the RRC index are about the same as in 1948 with an index level of 262. Evidently this owner doesn't think property values are being destroyed by the change in occupancy which is taking place.

Property B sold in December, 1949 for $15,000 when the index was at 232. It resold to a Negro in August, 1951 for $23,000, an increase of 53% during the period when market prices on an average were advancing only 13% to an index level of 262.

Property C sold in October, 1949 for $11,500 when the index was at 232. It resold to another white in May, 1951, a year after the "invasion" started when there were several minorities in the same block, for $12,500. This 9% rise represents about the same increase as market prices generally, which had advanced 11% to a level of 257. Then the property sold again in October, 1951, this time to a Negro at $13,500 which was 17% higher than the "pre-invasion" sale and slightly higher than the market price index which advanced only 13% to 262 during the same period.

These cases are typical for this neighborhood. There are many others and they all tell the same story. Prices have advanced more here than in neighborhoods unaffected by population movements. Furthermore, this advance was evidenced during all three stages of the change—in the period of threatening "invasion," during the early stages of transition and in the later stages of mutation.

There is an old motto of the Society of Residential Appraisers which says "We have no moral right to decide on the basis of opinion that which may be determined as a matter of fact." For the purpose of this article that motto should be paraphrased into, "We have no moral right to decide on the basis of prejudice that which may be determined as a matter of fact."

The facts must be ascertained before rendering an appraisal report in a neighborhood affected by minority population movements. Things may not be what they seem. Prejudiced belief or hearsay information cannot be trusted. An honest report of the facts is the only solution.

Reprinted from THE REVIEW of the Society of Residential Appraisers, 221 No. LaSalle Street, Chicago 1, Illinois.

Housing - Restrictive Covenants

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Frances Levenson and Sol Rabkin

DATE: April 15, 1952

Digest:

Supreme Court of Michigan bars a suit for damages for the breach of a race restrictive covenant.

* * * * * * * *

On March 6, 1952, the Supreme Court of Michigan, in the case of Phillips v. Naff (___ Mich. ___), unanimously barred a suit for damages for the breach of a racial restrictive covenant.

The restrictive covenant involved was directed against occupancy and use by persons other than "a white person of the Caucasian race". The plaintiffs and the defendants were owners of adjoining houses subject to the restrictive covenant. The defendants sold their property to Negroes who occupied the property in disregard of the covenant. The plaintiffs then brought an action for damages based on the claim that defendants' sale to Negroes had damaged plaintiffs' property to the extent of $5,000. The Circuit Court of Wayne County dismissed the action (see joint memorandum dated February 19, 1951) and the plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court of Michigan.

The Michigan Supreme Court held that the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the case of Shelley v. Kraemer that the Fourteenth Amendment barred a state court from enforcing a race covenant, governed the situation and prevented the court from entertaining a suit for damages. In the Shelley case, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that courts may not enforce race covenants by injunction.

The Michigan court reasoned that suits for damages for breach of such a covenant constitutes an indirect method of enforcement. They conclude that:

> If the sale of property subject to a reciprocal restrictive covenant cannot be made without rendering the grantor liable to suits for damages, such fact, it may be assumed, would operate to inhibit freedom of purchase by those against whom the discrimination is directed and also to place a burden on the right of an owner to sell to a purchaser of his own selection.

The Michigan court went on to state that the Fourteenth Amendment, as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court, precludes the collection of damages for breach of a race restrictive covenant.

There is some disagreement among the courts on the question of whether the Supreme Court decision in the Shelley case bars this type of action. The Supreme Courts of Missouri and Oklahoma have held that it does not. However, the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia and lower courts in California and Minnesota have held that it does. It would seem that both the actual words and the spirit of the Shelley case opinion support the position taken by these courts and by the Supreme Court of Michigan.

fl-sr/bwl

Housing

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Frances Levenson

DATE: April 23, 1952

SUBJECT: Integration Achieved in Public Housing in Sacramento, California

RECEIVED
APR 29 1952
Southern Regional Council

Sacramento, the capital of California, has recently joined the constantly increasing number of cities which are ending racial segregation in public housing. Last November, a small committee on segregation in public housing was formed by the local NAACP. The committee made a survey of the public housing projects and found that a pattern of racial segregation was being followed. Discussions with the executive director and members of the Housing Authority proved fruitless with the city officials refusing to change their existing policy.

The NAACP committee then formed a new, larger committee broadly representative of all segments of the community including the various minority groups, religious groups, labor unions, social worker groups and liberal groups. The committee also had among its members prominent individuals including the local rabbis and a number of Catholic priests and Protestant ministers.

This committee released a public statement exposing the racial segregation that existed in public housing projects. This release was made available to local editors including church and labor publications. The committee also undertook to raise funds to finance publicity as well as the filing of a suit to compel termination of segregation. In addition, meetings were arranged with the housing authority, the city council, the city manager and even the Governor's legislative secretary.

When all these conferences resulted in no change of policy, the committee found three plaintiffs and brought court action attacking the constitutionality of the segregation policy.

The Housing Authority agreed to a consent judgment and bound itself to end racial segregation. It is noteworthy that in the stipulation ending the suit the Housing Authority of the City of Sacramento did not admit that it had engaged in racial segregation and stated that it had the right to "limit the occupancy" of its housing units "by 'non-whites' to a percentage of the total housing units determined in accordance with the housing needs in the area served by such projects." The plaintiffs accepted this quota provision only because they believed it to have no binding legal effect and because they thought it would help achieve integrated housing projects by making all-Negro ones less probable.

With the signing of the consent judgment, the committee worked in cooperation with the Authority in preparing the general community and the project tenants to accept interracial housing. Integration was instituted smoothly and is continuing with no adverse reaction whatever.

Meanwhile, the committee continues to watch the situation and to give what help and support it can to the Authority in advancing the policy of racial integration in all its projects.

The events in Sacramento and in other cities where a change-over from racial segregation in public housing to integration has been accomplished, underscore the need for and the strength of broadly constituted citizen groups in securing reform. In most instances, it is not until a committee is organized and brings pressure that city officials are wont to change existing patterns. Dire predictions of riots and disorders often deter Housing Authorities from acting to institute integration. It is only after they are assured that the community wants and is willing to fight for unsegregated public housing that a housing authority will change its policy. Experience then shows that integration can almost invariably be accomplished peaceably.

A city ordinance or a state law barring discrimination in public housing is to be desired but the Sacramento story is an example of what can be accomplished even without a statute so long as there is an alert and organized citizenry.

Finally, after a long uphill fight by community groups, segregation is also being ended in the public housing projects of Los Angeles County. (Racial integration has always been the rule in the city projects in the City of Los Angeles.)

Housing. Gen)

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: March 20, 1953

SUBJECT: Resolutions respecting public housing and urban redevelopment undertakings

Digest:
The Housing Authorities of Allegheny County, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; and Toledo, Ohio, adopt resolutions that dwelling units in public housing and redevelopment projects shall be allocated on the basis of need and in accordance with legal preferences, but without discrimination or segregation on the grounds of race, religion, color or national origin.

* * * * * * * *

The Race Relations Service of the Housing and Home Finance Agency has advised that three non-discrimination resolutions have been adopted recently in Pennsylvania and Ohio. The full text of the resolutions follows.

tl-sr/bwl

PUBLIC HOUSING RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE

ALLEGHENY COUNTY HOUSING AUTHORITY

on December 30, 1952

WHEREAS, the Allegheny County Housing Authority is a public corporation, created by state legislation and governed by state and federal laws,

WHEREAS, the Allegheny County Housing Authority is participating in federal and state programs under the Federal Housing Act of 1949, and the Pennsylvania Housing and Redevelopment Assistant Act of 1949, for the benefit of municipalities in Allegheny County outside the City of Pittsburgh,

WHEREAS, the Allegheny County Housing Authority is now receiving federal aid in the construction of public housing projects under the Federal Housing Act of 1949,

WHEREAS, the Allegheny County Housing Authority in compliance with the Federal Housing Act of 1949 has signed under Board Resolution various Development Agreements with the Federal Public Housing Administration,

WHEREAS, included in these Development Agreements is the following statement:

> The Local Authority will allocate dwelling units in all projects in accordance with preferences established under the Housing Acts of 1949 and in compliance with the non-discrimination housing laws of the State of Pennsylvania.

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED, that the policy of the Allegheny County Housing Authority in allocating dwelling units in all projects shall be patterned, governed and in compliance with federal and state laws, and that all dwelling units shall be allocated on the need and preference basis of the Federal Housing Act of 1949, regardless of Race, Color, Religion or National Origin.

PUBLIC HOUSING RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE

HOUSING AUTHORITY OF THE CITY OF PITTSBURGH

on December 18, 1952

WHEREAS, the Housing Authority of the City of Pittsburgh believes it is the intent and spirit of the United States Housing and the Pennsylvania Housing Acts of 1937 and the various amendments and supplements thereto, to provide housing to citizens of the United States, of low income, without regard to race, creed, color, religious principles, national origin or ancestry; and

WHEREAS, it is the belief of the Housing Authority of the City of Pittsburgh that discrimination and segregation, based on race, creed, color, religious principles, national origin or ancestry, in the provision and operation of public facilities are contrary to the public policy of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the City of Pittsburgh;

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED by the Housing Authority of the City of Pittsburgh that the following is adopted and reaffirmed as its policy of selection and occupancy for all dwelling units owned or managed by said Authority:

Section 1. That all housing units owned or managed by the Housing Authority of the City of Pittsburgh shall be rented to persons who qualify for admission without regard to race, creed, color, religious principles, national origin or ancestry.

Section 2. That all dwelling units under the supervision and control of the Housing Authority of the City of Pittsburgh shall be allocated to its tenants without discrimination or segregation on either as to project, areas within the project, or as to buildings located within the projects.

PUBLIC HOUSING RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE

TOLEDO METROPOLITAN HOUSING AUTHORITY

on December 4, 1952

WHEREAS, the Authority has followed the practice of housing eligible white families in three East Toledo projects, namely: Charles F. Weiler Homes, Ravine Park Village, and Birmingham Terrace, and eligible non-white families in four West Toledo projects, namely: Brand Whitlock Homes, Brand Whitlock Extension, Albertus Brown Homes, and Port Lawrence Homes; and

WHEREAS, that practice of housing eligible families in projects designated for white and non-whites is not constantly geared to the availability of vacancies; and

WHEREAS, the Authority is experiencing from the said practice tremendous vacancy loss in projects designated for white families because of the difficulty of maintaining an eligible list of white applicants, while a reasonable number of eligible non-white families are awaiting available dwelling assignments; and

WHEREAS, the above practice is not in keeping with the principles of sound economical and efficient housing operation nor the principles of our democratic way of life; and

WHEREAS, the Veterans Temporary Projects of Toledo have successfully operated on an integrated basis.

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT RESOLVED That the Director is hereby ordered to immediately discontinue the practice of assigning eligible families to vacant dwelling units on a segregated basis, and to house such eligible families on the basis of need in projects where vacancies occur, without regard to race, religion or national origin.

Among These Rights...

NEWSLETTER OF THE COUNCIL FOR CIVIC UNITY OF SAN FRANCISCO

WHOSE Freedom of Choice?

YOUNG MR SING SHENG, Chinese captain of intelligence in World War II, made a serious mistake in February. He put his right to residence up for a vote by homeowners of Southwood, small suburban tract in South San Francisco. Southwood residents then made an even more serious mistake which reverberated around the world to the aid and comfort of America's enemies. They voted to reject the Sheng family as prospective neighbors.

Though the vote lacked legal force, Sheng stuck to his promise to abide by it. He took back his $2,950 deposit on the home which was to have provided adequate space for his growing family, a safe, sunny play yard for three year old Richard, and easy access to his airplane mechanic job at Pan-American. Southwood was left to its presumed racial purity.

NOT SINCE THE MOB VIOLENCE OF CICERO last summer had a case of race bias in housing so stirred the nation's concern. Was it the disturbing fact that a "democratic" majority vote in effect denied the Shengs exercise of their constitutional right that made this story news for a long week? What was the meaning of the vote? Did something go wrong with the "democratic process," or was this a true reflection of American race views?

FULL DISCUSSION of these questions is not possible here. We may say, however, with reasonable certainty that the Southwood people would have accepted the Shengs but for the fear -- assiduously spread among them by neighborhood bigots and respectable homebuilders alike -- that their "property values" would inevitably suffer.

We do not presume to generalize as to practices elsewhere, but today the evidence mounts that at least in the San Francisco area entrance of non-white families into formerly all-white neighborhoods does not affect resale values. Negro and Oriental families now live in virtually every main area of San Francisco without disturbance of values. (See page 4.)

SHOULD MAJORITY HOMEOWNERS have the power -- as Senator Tenney and other "America Plus" promoters hold -- to turn thumbs down on new neighbors? They urge "freedom of choice" to select "our friends and neighbors."

The juxtaposition is clever. Selecting one's friends is obviously a private right. But as for neighbors: who can claim that privilege? We have every right to move out -- none to say who may move next door!

Both buyer and seller have the right today to act irrespective of race or creed. This is not and cannot be a matter for the ballot. We no longer live on a frontier. The family head cannot homestead a plot and build a cabin; he must enter the urban housing market to rent or buy. The right to residence therefore assumes unprecedented importance -- except to those whose concern for the American home is racially qualified.

NO ISSUE IS MORE URGENT or more confused today in American communities. Accordingly we devote this entire Newsletter to certain aspects of the race-property value question. It is hoped that readers will study and put to use the "ammunition" for better understanding herein set forth.

Edward Howden
Editor

March-April 1952

The San Francisco Chronicle merits high praise for full, fair, vigorous reportage and comment on the Sheng case and for printing dozens of letters.

ON THESE TWO PAGES we present two sections of a letter by CCU Director Edward Howden. The letter was too long for publication in full, but the Chronicle gave generous space to its main section which answered an earlier statement by builder George Williams. That part, as published March 17, is reprinted on the page to the right. The heretofore unpublished part appears below.

CHRONICLE COVERAGE of the Sing Sheng residential exclusion incident and of the Rollingwood affair was excellent.

Clarification is needed, however, on certain points, including the general statement on property values and race by homebuilder George W. Williams.

WHY DID A MAJORITY of Southwood residents vote to exclude the Sheng family?

Apart from the fact that Sing Sheng as buyer and Jack Denson, seller, were brought together by a broker and made a deal, the story began with instigation of opposition by three or four Southwood residents.

Many such transactions undoubtedly occur each month in the Bay Area in more or less "white" areas. In this case the seller was subjected to pressure and ugly threats were made to Sheng.

But Denson resented this pressure and -- though he had initially held no brief for or against Sheng -- refused to back down. So the little group opposing the sale called a protest meeting. Notice of the meeting reached only some Southwood residents; about 70 attended, representing not more than 50 households -- less than one-fifth of the 253 in Southwood.

This was the only open meeting held prior to the balloting. Sheng appeared on his own behalf, facing an obvious (though not unanimous) hostility. His appeal for understanding of the broader meaning of the issue evoked little support. Facing this situation, yet feeling that surely most Americans, in Southwood or elsewhere, would uphold non-discrimination, Sheng suggested the vote. His opponents, more astute as to how elections may be won or lost, warmly embraced the idea.

Subsequent events are known to Chronicle readers. The "why" of these events needs underscoring, however.

PRO-SHENG RESIDENTS of Southwood, following the vote, analyzed it this way:

MR and MRS SING SHENG and son RICHARD
--Photo courtesy The Chronicle

1-Sheng erred in proposing a vote rather than exercising his legal right to residence. Democracy entails safeguarding minority rights; not just majority rule.

2-No real airing of both sides occurred in Southwood prior to the balloting. This vital approach to a sound vote was absent.

3-Pro-Sheng residents neglected to campaign on his behalf. They just assumed that the desired result would come without action on their part. Meanwhile opponents worked hard to get out a negative vote, using wholesale misrepresentation and scare tactics among the homeowners.

4-The anti-Sheng majority acted mainly in the unfounded fear that their property values were threatened. They had no opportunity to consider the findings of a recent Bay Area study which tends to show that this fear is unwarranted here.

5-Southwood residents generally failed to recognize in time the serious national and international implications of such racial discrimination despite urgent last-minute appeals to them on this score.

These were the lessons of Southwood, as seen by a group of her own residents.

(Part two of letter continues next page)

Reprinted from the SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE, MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1952 CCCCAAA

A Letter on the Right of Residence
The Sing Sheng Case and Property Values

Numerous letters are still being received by The Chronicle on the questions raised by the efforts of Sing Sheng, a Chinese, and Wilbur Gary, a Negro, to obtain homes in all-white neighborhoods.

Gary insisted on his legal rights, and moved into a home in Rollingwood, near San Pablo. Violence threatened for a time but was averted by a strong stand taken by law enforcement officers.

Sheng put his case to a vote by Southwood (South San Francisco) home owners, lost by an overwhelming majority, and accepted the decision.

In this letter Edward Howden, Executive Director of the San Francisco Council for Civic Unity, challenges the arguments put forward by George Williams—Burlingame subdivider who developed the Southwood tract—in a letter printed in The Chronicle February 24, in particular the argument that property values inevitably decline when members of minority races move into all-white neighborhoods.

*The Laurenti findings mentioned in Howden's letter refer to a study conducted by Luigi Laurenti, while a research assistant at the University of California. Laurenti gathered statistics on home sales in a number of San Francisco neighborhoods in an effort to determine what does happen to property values when non-whites move into hitherto all-white neighborhoods. A summary of his findings was published in The Chronicle February 21.

Editor, The Chronicle:

The thoughtful reader will be wary of hasty conclusions as to what the Southwood incident "proved" except that the majority can be wrong, especially when denied full information and subjected to scare tactics; that there is still much confusion about the relation of "property values" to racial minority residency; and that despite this confusion a great many Americans strongly support the right to residence — as evidenced by the flood of letters to Sheng and to the newspapers.

But the story cannot be ended without certain observations on Mr. George Williams' pronunciamento on the legal status of residential race restrictions and the property value question.

First, the legal aspects.

Williams acknowledges that the U. S. Supreme Court decision of 1948 rendered race restrictive covenants in housing unenforceable. But he suggests that the possibility of damage suits still hovers over any seller who "violates" these restrictions.

The facts are these: The Supreme Court has ruled covenants unenforceable by any form of governmental action; how then could any court, an instrument of government, penalize covenant "violators"? A California case met the precise question in March, 1951. In Barrows v. Jackson, Los Angeles Superior Judge Daniel N. Stevens rejected such action for damages. He wrote: "For a California court to award damages for the breach of a race restriction covenant would be violative of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

PROPERTY VALUES

What then about the alleged loss in property values attendant on a "breach in tract restrictions" by a minority buyer?

1—Contrary to Williams' claims, the Laurenti study findings on property values as reported by The Chronicle are quite valid. The main finding is that entrance of non-whites into a good neighborhood does not adversely affect property values. Of 121 sales to whites in nine San Francisco neighborhoods subsequent to entry of non-whites, only five were at prices lower than the average — and these were "panic" sellers who unnecessarily accepted lower prices.

The study compared prices in districts which had begun to be racially "mixed" since 1945 with those in comparable all-white sections. Laurenti was guided in part by real estate brokers acquainted with these areas. And there was no evidence, apart from the negligible "panic" sales, that race was a factor affecting home prices.

Williams falls back on well-worn cliches still current in real estate circles. For example:

2—He speaks of white families "forced out" of neighborhoods which in turn are "taken over" by non-Caucasians. This language is loaded. Remember, we are discussing property values, i. e., resale values of decent homes in decent neighborhoods. No home-owner is ever "forced out" of such a neighborhood by the mere appearance of a few non-white families who, by virtue of their tastes and income, want and can afford such residence. Anybody who rushes to sell his home for this reason does so either because he is bigoted or because he allows himself to be panicked by unsound advice based on the race and property value myth.

Prejudice often hides behind pseudo-scientific talk of "property values." Distinguishing between such rationalization and objective calculation of resale values is a nice exercise. Perhaps there is a third possibility: that some people have simply failed to adjust their thinking to the fact that—at least in the San Francisco Bay Area—the old saws about race and property values have largely lost meaning.

3—Williams really lets the bars down when he refers to "panic among remaining home owners who suddenly realize that . . . their children are subject to an additional problem in a mixed community." This is a thinly veiled appeal for racial segregation of children—children who are born without prejudice — children who will be living their lives in a nation one-tenth of whose citizens are dark-skinned and in a world two-thirds of whose people are "colored." (Most San Francisco children, fortunately, can attend "mixed" schools and thereby achieve better adjustments with their world than those children living in "exclusive" tracts.)

The sober discussion of property values thus reveals a racist premise. The apologist for exclusion who gently, even regretfully, intones about property values actually promotes the interracial intolerance which he professes to deplore.

4—Williams and others of his persuasion seem to forget what factors basically determine residential values—e. g. quality, age, and location of a neighborhood, and the legitimate restrictions as to single-family or duplex homes only, non-commercial use, set-back lines, and such. They don't see that the snob value of race prejudice is on the way out. They forget that their theories as to "invasion" of a district once a "breach" has been made stem from the often sordid experiences of old apartment districts of the industrial cities of the Midwest and East which simply do not apply to typical single family home developments in the Bay Area in 1952.

They ignore the fact that non-white families are living in most "good" sections of San Francisco today without detriment to values.

5—It is worth recalling that Sergeant Kenneth Wills, USMC, who is living in and plans to buy a Southwood home immediately next door to the one the Shengs selected, was one of their staunchest supporters. If the resale value of any of Southwood's 253 homes were to be affected adversely, it would be that of Sergeant Wills. Yet his sense of values led him to welcome the Sheng family.

Hundreds of letters have come from Americans to the newspapers and to the Sheng family voicing respect for their rights in this case. Can property values be in grave jeopardy at the appearance of a non-Caucasian family when so many people are willing to welcome such families to their own neighborhoods?

6—Finally, discrimination in housing is doomed despite various delaying actions which are being fought by small handfuls of people in Cicero, Southwood, Rolling Wood, and elsewhere.

Moreover, this gradual, random distribution of minority families among various neighborhoods works counter to the alleged tendency of non-whites to "invade" a "breached" section in large numbers. As the barriers drop one by one under the impact of the Constitutional right to residence we are approaching a "normal" distribution of non-white householders in residential areas. The old fears of "invasion," whatever their past basis, may be dismissed. These observations are supported further by the Laurenti findings mentioned above.

The trend is inevitable and irreversible. And, ironically, if six or eight of the Bay Area's big home-builders and property managers were to agree to relax their remaining racial restrictions, allowing more normal factors of economic selection of buyers and tenants to operate freely in the market, all this mumbo-jumbo about property values would lose overnight what little plausibility still attaches to it.

EDWARD HOWDEN,
Executive Director
COUNCIL FOR CIVIC UNITY of San Francisco.
101 Post Street

* See back page for reprint of this summary of the Laurenti findings

Reprinted from the San Francisco CHRONICLE of February 21, 1952

The Sheng Story

Scientific Study Shows Property Loses No Value When Races Mix

By BERNARD TAPER

The argument of Southwood homemakers that their property values would drop if a Chinese family moved into the neighborhood has no basis in fact, according to a scientific study made recently at the University of California.

Conducted as a survey of nine San Francisco districts, the study showed that race did not appear to be a factor affecting home prices.

This was the report that Ed Howden, executive director of the San Francisco Council for Civic Unity, asked the Southwood property owners to wait for, before counting the ballots which were to decide whether Sing Sheng and his family moved into the home they had bought on West Orange avenue.

VOTE AGAINST SHENG

By a vote of 174 to 28, with 14 voting "no opinion," Sheng—a 26-year-old air line mechanic — was told that Southwood home owners objected to having his family in the neighborhood.

Before the vote they expressly stated they did not object to the Shengs as individuals. Some of them said, "The Shengs look like nice-type people." But, most of them stated, if the Shengs moved into their neighborhood — which hitherto had been 100 per cent white—the Shengs would be followed by other Chinese and then by Negroes.

What would happen, they said, was that the value of their homes would drop $3000 or $4000.

UC STUDY

The property value study—which was conducted by Luigi Laurenti, as a research assistant for the UC Bureau of Business and Economic Research—dealt with areas in San Francisco and Berkeley. The San Francisco portion is now being typed and put into final form.

This is how the survey was conducted, in its San Francisco aspect:

Nine neighborhoods were examined. These are in the southern part of San Francisco, lying in a band running from Silver Terrace, roughly westward through the Lakeview district, with one area in the Parkside district.

"These are neighborhoods which were once all-white neighborhoods and which have experienced nonwhite entry since 1945," Laurenti said.

As control areas, a similar number of areas elsewhere in the city were selected, which were originally in the same price brackets and have remained all white.

"Selection of these control areas was a very important matter. On this point we were guided by real-estate dealers familiar with the areas involved," Laurenti said.

SILVER TERRACE

For example, a typical test area was Silver Terrace. Until February, 1950 it was an all-white area. In February, 1950 its homes were selling in the $9750 bracket.

As a control area the Silver-Alemany district was used. In February, 1950 its homes were also selling for $9750.

Silver Terrace since 1950 has changed its racial character. Six Negro families have moved in. In all 27 sales have been made there since February, 1950—21 of them to white families.

The Silver - Alemany has remained an all-white neighborhood.

Yet prices for homes in both the Silver Terrace and the Silver-Alemany area have remained equivalent. In both districts prices have gone up about $1000. Houses in both districts are now in the $10,750 bracket.

As a double-check an additional control area was examined in some cases. In this instance, an all-units area within Visitacion Valley was used. It showed exactly the same results.

The statistics for all nine neighborhoods when compared with their control areas showed the same pattern.

Altogether, the prices on 165 sales were obtained and studied.

Of these sales, 44 were on homes purchased by nonwhites.

And 121 were on homes purchased by whites—purchased subsequent to the time the character of the neighborhoods began to change.

"This seems to refute the belief that once nonwhites buy into an area, homeowners in that area find it difficult to sell to whites," Laurenti said.

Only four of the 44 nonwhite purchasers, the study found, paid higher than the going prices for their houses. These four paid from $1000 to $2000 higher.

On the other side of the picture, only five of the 121 sales to whites were at prices lower than the average, again from $1000 to $2000 lower.

"In those cases, further investigation revealed that the owners of those houses were most anxious to get out of the area and accepted a price lower than they might have obtained had they not acted in panic," he said.

Another popular belief the study seems to belie is that there is a hierarchy of property values, based upon the race of the occupant—with the white occupying top place in this hierarchy, the Oriental being less financially satisfactory, and the Negro occupying the bottom position.

Of the 44 nonwhite purchases, 32 were made by Negroes. The other 12 were Chinese, Japanese and Filipinos.

"The figures showed no difference in property values in this regard," Laurenti said.

Here is the only presently available summary of the Laurenti race and property value study in San Francisco. The July Appraisal Journal will carry a full article. See also "The New Gresham's Law of Neighborhoods," by Charles Abrams, Appraisal Journal, July '51; and "The Self-Fulfilling Prophecy," by Robert Merton; Antioch Review, Summer 1948... Write or call CCU for further information or for speakers on San Francisco minority housing questions.

COUNCIL FOR CIVIC UNITY of San Francisco
101 POST ST., SAN FRANCISCO 8, CALIF.
TELEPHONE EXbrook 2877

An organization of citizens working for equal civil rights and opportunities in housing, employment, education, health, and recreation for people of all colors, creeds, and ancestries in San Francisco . . . toward achievement of the full democratic possibilities of this cosmopolitan city.

POSTMASTER: IF UNDELIVERABLE FOR ANY REASON, notify sender, stating reason, on Form 3547, postage for which is guaranteed.

RETURN POSTAGE GUARANTEED

SEC. 562, P. L. & R.
U. S. Postage
PAID
Permit 4520
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Southern Regional Council
63 Auburn Ave., N. E.
Atlanta, Georgia

5-9-52

Housing - U.S. act of 1949

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

Civil Rights Department
386 Fourth Avenue
New York 16, N.Y.

RECEIVED
JUN 23 1952
Southern Regional Council

To: CRC Offices
Civil Rights Organizations
AJC Area Offices

From: Edwin J. Lukas, Director

Urban redevelopment under the provisions of Title I of the Federal Housing Act of 1949 is being planned by cities throughout the country. In addition, other slum clearance operations are also taking place.

In many cases, the areas selected for redevelopment are currently occupied by large numbers of minority group families. The relocation problem for these families is a very grave one and every clearance project should be examined to determine whether its net effect would be to increase overcrowding and segregated patterns.

The Federal Housing & Home Finance Agency and local authorities have a statutory duty to provide a feasible plan for the relocation of displaced families.

It was felt that the plans presented for approval to the New York City Board of Estimate did not do this. The New York Chapter of the American Jewish Committee, therefore, presented the enclosed testimony on the subject. It is being sent to you to help you in evaluating plans presented in your community.

TESTIMONY BEFORE NEW YORK BOARD OF ESTIMATE ON URBAN REDEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

My name is Frances Levenson. I represent the Committee on Discrimination in Housing of the New York Chapter of the American Jewish Committee.

The American Jewish Committee is an organization devoted to improving relations among all groups and working toward healthy democratic communities. We are interested in any situation which threatens to create tension areas or which, in any way, operates unfairly toward any ethnic or religious group. We have been working against discrimination and segregation in housing for many years since we feel that this is a key problem in the field of intergroup relations. We, therefore, study proposals for housing from the point of view of their effect on democratic housing.

We feel that from this point of view, the present urban redevelopment plans have serious deficiencies.

Urban redevelopment under the provisions of Title I of the Federal Housing Act of 1949 has a high and lofty purpose—to aid in building a decent home and suitable living environment for every American family, and it holds promise of bettering the housing conditions of a vast number of New York citizens. The Mayor's Committee on Slum Clearance is to be congratulated for the speed with which it has made plans and the energy with which it has carried them forward. If improperly implemented, however, these plans could have a serious effect on the well-being of a great number of residents of New York.

The housing shortage in New York City, particularly for the middle class, is still desperate. This unfortunate situation is compounded a hundredfold for members of minority racial and ethnic groups. Therefore, a question which must be asked and faced squarely is what will happen to the families displaced by these proposed new projects. Will they be provided with decent, safe and sanitary homes at rents which they can afford to pay as required by §105(c) of the Housing Act of 1949?

This is a crucial issue and one which is already creating confusion and tension among residents on the proposed sites. The lack of clarity which exists in this vital area is supplying ammunition to those groups which thrive on confusion and desire to create more dissension.

It is your responsibility before you permit any condemnation to take place, to be certain that the displaced families will be taken care of and that no group of families will be made to suffer to make way for modern housing for others.

On three of the sites up for consideration today—West Park, Harlem and North Harlem—a large percentage of the site residents are members of minority racial or ethnic groups; in Harlem and North Harlem, 100% are, in West Park one estimate states that ½ the population is Puerto Rican and Negro and occupy 25% of the dwelling units.

I need not labor the point that these groups face incalculable difficulty in finding adequate shelter. Nowhere, however, in the plans submitted by the Mayor's Committee is this handicap taken into consideration in assaying the relocation problem. On-site families are presently beset by many fears and fall prey to rumor and distortion. This situation has been permitted to develop because no one has been able to answer the questions as to where they will live since a feasible plan for their relocation has not been developed. Nowhere in the elaborate brochures can any answers be found. Broad, undocumented statements are made by the Mayor's Committee on Slum Clearance sometimes that 1/3 and sometimes that ½ will be eligible for public housing. No facts are presented indicating how these estimates were arrived at. In addition, no appraisal has been made of the competing demands and priorities that exist among other families for space in public housing. Again, the Mayor's Committee on Slum Clearance states that a large group of on-site residents will prefer to relocate themselves. We fail to see how anyone can relocate himself if there is no housing available. Estimates as to the number of families that will be able to come back into the new projects are open to serious question. Proper data concerning the income of the on-site residents have not been presented and recent statements by the Mayor's Committee distort the rentals to be charged in the new projects. The Committee stated recently that rentals will vary from $16 to $30 per room. We would like to ask where apartments will be available at $16 a room, the number that will be available at that price, and particularly whether any down-payments will be required for such apartments.

The proposal put forth by the Mayor's Committee that relocation for each site shall be handled by different private real estate firms under the supervision of the Bureau of Real Estate is open to grave question. Regardless of the degree of supervision, which is not delineated by the Committee, it is inevitable that competition will arise among these firms for practically non-existent relocation housing. There should not be division of responsibility in a matter as delicate as this and affected with as grave public consequences.

A wise and far-sighted social development should not be permitted to bring individual hardship and an increase in segregation in its wake. I say increase in segregation because the only place available for minority group families earning between $3,600 to $5,000 a year is the already overcrowded ghetto areas of Manhattan, Brooklyn and the Bronx. To go ahead in this unplanned and haphazard fashion might leave the city open to law suits by discontented site tenants and jeopardize the whole urban redevelopment program, both in this city and, since New York's program is the most advanced urban redevelopment project, possibly for the entire country.

It need not be so. Wise handling can overcome these obstacles. We urge at this time, therefore, that the following steps be taken:

1. Begin immediately to make an accurate survey of the actual need that will be created by the displacement of families from these sites. Information must be collected concerning family income, family size, race and present rentals paid. At the same time, an inventory of existing resources must be made so that we can know definitely what housing is actually available for these families. The help of the state government, Federal Government, FHA and the City Housing Authority must be solicited so that new areas may be opened to minority groups if, as we fear, it will be apparent that sufficient existing housing is not available to them. Additional no-cash subsidy housing could do much to ease the situation.

2. Relocation cannot be done piecemeal. It must be done fully cognizant of the overall displacement of families throughout the city caused by public housing, urban redevelopment, and public improvements. This job can only be done by one public agency. The city itself is best equipped to take over this task and must not farm out its responsibility in this respect to private organizations. The city is the only agency which has comparable experience. We would also like to point out at this time that even the city, in its experience in relocating families displaced by public housing, was not faced with as vast a problem as presented by urban redevelopment. Families displaced by public housing are required by law only to be provided with homes no worse than those from which they were forced to move. Families displaced by urban redevelopment, however, are required by federal statute to be relocated in "decent, safe and sanitary dwellings."

The city is faced with grave responsibility in this field. We would like to see urban redevelopment go forward as quickly as possible. Not so quickly, however, as to trample upon the rights of the families now living on the sites. We hope that you will see the necessity for more adequate planning and preparation to avoid the development in our city of ugly situations which we have unhappily seen in other communities when racial tensions or jealous competition emerge.

5/9/52
fl/bwl

Joint Memorandum

Housing

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

RECEIVED
JUN 16 1952
Southern Regional Council

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Alexander Brooks

DATE: May 27, 1952

SUBJECT:

This is to supplement the attached summary and analysis of the decision of the California Supreme Court in the Fujii case. On Monday, May 12, Attorney General Edmund G. Brown of the State of California announced that there will be no appeal from the decision of the California Supreme Court in the Fujii case, striking down the California Alien Land Law as unconstitutional. His announcement stated, "My office is in full accord with the legal conclusions reached in that decision by the Court, speaking through Chief Justice Phil S. Gibson, as well as in full accord with the social justice of that decision." He declared that an appeal by the state to the United States Supreme Court would serve "no legal, useful, humane, nor any effective purpose."

Attorney General Brown cited the fact that the state of Oregon had also refused to appeal the 1951 decision of its Supreme Court holding its Alien Land Law to be unconstitutional. He expressed his accord with that part of the decision of the California Supreme Court which chose to rest the unconstitutionality of the California Alien Land Law on the Fourteenth Amendment and refused to hold the UN Charter applicable to it.

He concluded, "Every citizen of California, I believe, by the decision in the Fujii case recently in the California Supreme Court, can take pride that California will legally no longer persist in an adherence to a philosophy of a 'super race', nor insist upon being a vindictive outpost of racial discrimination -- that everyone of our residents here has an equal opportunity to share in the building of a greater destiny for our State -- and that our guide now, more than every before, is the U. S. Constitution which guarantees equal rights and equal protection for all."

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N.Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Alexander Brooks

DATE: May 13, 1952

SUBJECT: Decision of California Supreme Court in Fujii v. California, 38 A.C. 817

Digest: The Supreme Court of California, in a 4 - 3 decision, ruled that California's Alien Land Law violates the Fourteenth Amendment by denying equal protection of the law to Japanese aliens. It rejected the reasoning of the lower state court in the same case, that the California law against ownership of real property by Japanese aliens must be struck down because it violates the human rights provisions of the UN Charter.

On April 17, 1952, the California Supreme Court, in a 4 - 3 decision in the case of Fujii v. California, ruled that the California law barring ownership of land in the state to all aliens ineligible for citizenship under the laws of the United States is unconstitutional because it violates the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The case reached the California Supreme Court as an appeal by the state against the holding of a California intermediate appellate court striking down the California Alien Land Law on the ground that it violated the human rights provisions of the UN Charter, and that those provisions under Article VI of the Federal Constitution, which makes treaties the supreme law of the land, superseded the law barring ownership of real property by aliens ineligible for U.S. citizenship because that law is inconsistent with the provisions of the charter. The intermediate appellate court refused to strike down the California Alien Land Laws under the Fourteenth Amendment on the ground that two 1923 decisions of the United States Supreme Court in Terrace v. Thompson, 263 U.S. 197 and Porterfield v. Webb, 263 U.S. 225 had established their constitutionality and therefore bound the state courts.

The majority opinion of the California Supreme Court first dealt with the applicability of the UN Charter to the California Alien Land Laws. It pointed out that a treaty does not supersede local laws inconsistent with it unless the treaty provisions are self-executing. In determining whether a treaty is self-executing, a decisive factor is the intent of the signatory parties as manifested by the language of the instrument and, if the language is uncertain, by the circumstances surrounding its execution. Examining the language of the human rights provisions of the charter and the circumstances surrounding it, the court found that none of these provisions are self-executing. It said, "Although the member nations have obligated themselves to cooperate with the international organization in promoting respect for, and observance of human rights, it is plain that it was contemplated that future legislative action by the several nations would be required to accomplish the declared objectives, and there is nothing to indicate that these provisions were intended to become rules of law for the courts of this country upon the ratification of the charter." The court pointed out that the framers of the charter were very careful to make certain provisions effective without the aid of implementing legislation and employed language in those sections which is clear and definite and manifests that intention, whereas in the human rights provisions no such language was used.

Having overruled the basis of the intermediate appellate court's decision, the court then turned to the question of whether the Alien Land Law violates the "due process" and "equal protection" clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. It rejected the argument that a reaffirmation of the question was foreclosed by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the Terrace and Porterfield cases. The court found that the more recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court in Oyama v. California, 332 U.S. 633 and Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U.S. 410 apply concepts of rights under the Fourteenth Amendment that contradict the rationale of the Thompson and Porterfield cases, and the latter are therefore, "no longer to be regarded as settled law." The court said, "Constitutional principles declared in recent years are irreconcilable with the reasoning of the earlier cases, and lead us to conclude that the statute violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." The court emphasized that "Only the most exceptional circumstances can excuse discrimination [on the basis of race] in the face of the equal protection clause." It also found that the presumption of validity accorded to statutes is greatly narrowed in scope, if not entirely dispelled, whenever it is shown, as here, that legislation actually discriminates against certain persons because of their race or nationality.

The court rejected the contention that the California statute merely carries into effect a Congressional policy. It pointed out that Congress had enacted a naturalization law, not a property law, and that it has neither declared nor assumed that landowners ineligible for citizenship are a danger to the state.

The court next considered the grounds given by the Supreme Courtfor its decision in the Terrace case. These were that restricting the use and ownership of land to citizens is a means of insuring that land will be owned only by persons who are loyal and have an interest in the welfare of the state; and that it was within the realm of possibility that all of the real property in a state might ultimately be owned by persons ineligible to citizenship, and that such a situation might endanger the state.

The court pointed out that eligibility to citizenship does not automatically engender loyalty, nor does ineligibility establish a lack of loyalty or an absence of interest in the welfare of the country. Similarly, it pointed out that since 1923 our naturalization laws have been amended to make so many groups eligible for citizenship that only a very small group, Japanese and a small number of residents of a few other races such as Polynesians, are now ineligible for citizenship. Hence, it is most unlikely, if not practically impossible, for a substantial amount of real property to come into the ownership of persons ineligible for citizenship.

Finally, the court pointed out that the right to own real estate is no different from the right to earn a living, and that the Supreme Court, many years ago, in Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33 had ruled that a state may not constitutionally bar aliens from the right to earn a living. It said, "Legislation which results in such discrimination imposes upon the ineligible alien an economic status inferior to that of all other persons living in the state, and interferes with his right to earn a living."

Judge Carter, who concurred in the views of Chief Justice Gibson, pointed out in a separate concurring opinion, that he had always argued that the California Alien Land Laws were based upon a false premise, and contravened constitutional mandates. He made this point because the minority of three, in their dissent, attacked the majority for inconsistency, in that its members had refused to strike down these laws in their decision in the Oyama case, 29 Cal. 2d. 164 (later reversed by the U. S. Supreme Court). In his concurring opinion Judge Carter stressed that "there is no relationship between the character of the Japanese in the United States and the prohibition on ownership of land by them, insofar as concerns the public health, morals or welfare." He reviewed at length the excellent record of the Japanese in California for patriotism, conformity to law, energy and industry.

Judge Schauer, speaking in dissent for himself, and Judges Schenk and Spence, attacked the majority for disregarding the Supreme Court precedents which, he argued, bound the California State Supreme Court not to strike down the California Alien Land Laws as unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment. He emphasized that most of the members of the majority had claimed that they were so bound in their decision in the Oyama case, as well as in the Takahashi case, 30 Cal. 2d. 719. Resting on the letter of the law, he insisted that the statute was not directed against a racial group, but simply against aliens ineligible for citizenship. He referred to the danger during World War II of occupation and conquest of California by Japan and argued that the statute was a perfectly valid governmental action to prevent any such possibility. He denounced the majority for substituting their views of what is socially desirable for the views of the legislature.

Housing - Restrictive covenants

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

To: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

From: Sol Rabkin and Frances Levenson

Date: September 9, 1952

Subject: Suits for damages for violation of racial restrictive covenants on real property

Digest:

The District Court of Appeals of California, an intermediate appellate court, has upheld a ruling of a lower court that state courts cannot constitutionally entertain a suit for damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant.

* * * * * *

In the case of Barrows v. Jackson, a California Court of Appeals on August 8, 1952, affirmed the ruling of a lower California court that state courts may not, under the Fourteenth Amendment, entertain a suit for damages for violation of a racial restrictive covenant.

In 1944 three of the plaintiffs and the defendant, the owners of four adjacent pieces of real property in Los Angeles, agreed in writing that no part of his property would "be used or occupied by any person or persons not wholly of the white or Caucasian race."

The agreement also provided that if any of the lots should be used or occupied by any person not wholly of the white or Caucasian race, then the covenantors and their successors whose lots were not so occupied were entitled to reimbursement for all damages which they may have suffered by reason of the breach.

In 1950 the defendant sold his home which was subsequently occupied by a Negro family. Thereupon the plaintiffs brought suit for damages. As has been reported in an earlier memorandum, the trial court dismissed the action on the ground that the United States Supreme Court decisions in Shelley v. Kraemer barred any court action to enforce such covenants including damage suits. The plaintiffs appealed this decision to the California District Court of Appeals, an intermediate appellate court.

The appellate court affirmed, holding that the covenant was not one which could be enforced by state courts in view of the ruling of the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Shelley v. Kraemer and Sipes v. McGhee. It stated that "the admonition of these cases is that a state may not by judicial process enforce private rights derived from consensual agreements of private individuals where to do so would result in the infringement of civil liberties guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States." Since the granting of damages for violation of a racial or restrictive covenant would be a type of judicial enforcement, and since judicial enforcement of racial or restrictive covenants was a violation of the Equal Protection requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment, the court ruled that the trial court had been right in dismissing the complaint.

It is noteworthy that the court received a great number of briefs amicus. A brief amicus in support of the appellants was filed in the name of the following associations: Neighborly Endeavor, Inc.; Harvard Neighbors Association; United Neighbors, Inc.; United Home Owners, Inc.; Vermont Square Neighbors, Inc.; Neighborhood Protective Association, Inc.; Steadfast Neighbors Committee; Angelus Mesa Neighbors Association; Loyal Neighbors Association; Citizens United, Inc.; Lafayette Square Improvement Association; Hancock Park Neighbors, Inc; The Park Community Association; and Associated Neighbors. On the side of the defendants, briefs amicus were filed by the Women's International Club, the Los Angeles Central Labor Council, the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, the Japanese-American Citizens' League, the Greater Los Angeles CIO Council, the NAACP, the California branch of the American Civil Liberties Union, and the following organizations which joined in a single brief amicus: The American Council on Human Rights, American Jewish Committee, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Eagle Rock Council for Civic Unity, Jewish Labor Committee, Jewish War Veterans, Los Angeles Urban League, Pasadena Young Women's Christian Association, Social Action Department of the Congregational Conference of Southern California and Southwest, Santa Monica Young Women's Christian Association, Southern California B'nai B'rith Women, Southern Division of the California Cooperative League, and the Christines.

Joint Memorandum

Housing

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices, ADL Regional Offices, AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Ted Leskes

DATE: November 6, 1952

SUBJECT: Discrimination in Housing - Decision of Superior Court in San Francisco in Banks v. San Francisco Housing Authority

Digest: The Superior Court holds that racial segregation in public housing projects constitutes denial of "equal protection of the laws."

In a decision dated October 1, 1952, the Superior Court of San Francisco ruled that the practice of segregating Negroes in one of several public housing projects while excluding them from others, violates the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment and is contrary to the laws and public policy of the State of California. The case arose on a complaint of several Negroes against the San Francisco Housing Authority. The complaint charged that applications by Negroes for admission to a newly erected public housing project were rejected solely because of their race and that the Housing Authority followed a policy of strict segregation by allotting one of its six housing projects to Negro applicants while excluding them from the other five.

The Housing Authority asked the Court to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. They claimed that under the Plessy v. Ferguson doctrine enunciated by the U. S. Supreme Court in 1896, enforced segregation did not violate the Constitution if the facilities set aside for the Negroes were substantially equal to those reserved for white persons.

The superior Court of San Francisco denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint and thereby paved the way for a trial of the case. In so doing, it pointed out that the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson has been greatly weakened by recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court referred specifically to the decision in Shelley v. Kramer declaring racial restrictive covenants unenforceable and to various decisions invalidating municipal ordinances designed to enforce racial segregation.

After pointing out that the "equal but separate" doctrine had never been accepted as the public policy of the State of California or the City of San Francisco, the opinion turned to a discussion of two decisions dealing with the same question as that raised in the present case. In one, a federal district court in Pennsylvania upheld racial segregation by a public housing authority, applying the "separate but equal" doctrine, while in the other, decided in 1949 by a state court in New Jersey, segregation of colored people in a housing project was declared unconstitutional as a violation of the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment. (The ADL and AJC filed a brief amicus curiae in the latter case, supporting the position of the Negro plaintiffs.) After reviewing these two conflicting precedents, the Court declared that it was more impressed with the reasoning of the New Jersey decision and that it would apply it "as enunciating a sounder, fairer, more enlightened, and advanced principle to guide us in the matter of public housing, in granting to the Negro all he is entitled to as a citizen -- genuine equality of treatment under the law."

In conclusion, the Court stated that if the trial established that the Housing Authority does follow a policy of segregation, an order would be issued requiring the admission of Negro applicants without segregation to all available units in any of its housing projects under the same rules, regulations and preferences applicable to other applicants and without regard to race or color.

Housing

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: January 12, 1953

SUBJECT: Second Decision of Superior Court of California in Banks v. San Francisco Housing Authority

Digest:

The Superior Court holds that racial segregation in public housing projects violates the U.S. Constitution and the laws and public policy of the State of California and of the City and County of San Francisco.

* * * * * * * *

On November 6, 1952, we advised you by Joint Memorandum that the Superior Court of California in San Francisco had refused to dismiss a complaint charging the Housing Authority with following a policy of strict racial segregation in public housing projects and thereby denying equal protection of the laws to Negro citizens.

Following that action by the Court, the Housing Authority filed an answer denying many of the allegations of the petition. The Court then considered the evidence and proof submitted by both sides and, on November 14, 1952, rendered a decision against the Housing Authority.

The Housing Authority, a state agency, owns and operates seven low-rent housing developments in San Francisco. The Court found that the Negro petitioners had applied for admission to one or more of those developments; that they had been excluded from all except the one jim crow development; that such exclusion was arbitrary and pursuant to a "neighborhood pattern" policy which sought to maintain the existing racial character of the neighborhoods where the developments were located; that despite the veterans' preference requirements of the law, the Housing Authority had been preferring white non-veterans over Negro veterans for available living accommodations; and that many of the statements made in the Housing Authority's answer were untrue.

As a matter of law, the Court therefore concluded that:

> The policy, practice, and usage of respondents (Housing Authority) in excluding petitioners and all other Negro applicants from all the permanent public low rent housing developments...is an unlawful and unconstitutional discrimination in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and of the laws and general public policy of the State of California and the City and County of San Francisco..."

The Court thereupon issued a mandamus decree ordering the Housing Authority to certify the petitioners for admission to the public housing developments on the same basis and under the same rules, regulations and preferences as other applicants and without regard to race or color. The Housing Authority was also ordered to abandon its "neighborhood pattern" polity and to classify and admit all applicants without racial discrimination or segregation.

Violation of the Court's decree would subject the individual members of the Housing Authority of the City and County of San Francisco to punishment for contempt of court.

tl-sr/bwl

(housing

VALUES IN TRANSITION AREAS: SOME NEW CONCEPTS

BELDEN MORGAN, South Pasadena, California

The author is an independent appraiser, and was formerly deputy chief appraiser of the FHA's Los Angeles office. A Senior member of the Society, he is a past president of both the Chicago and Los Angeles Chapters. This challenging article was developed from the subject matter of his recent talk before the Los Angeles Chapter.

A STUDY of the current impact of Negro population movements on property values reveals the truth of the statement that real estate economics are not only exceedingly complex, but are of an evolutionary character as well. It is well known that real estate appraising is a fluid art. Conclusions true one year are apt to be false in another year. Generalizations valid in one instance are invalid under different circumstances. Even our most widely accepted laws and theories are but statements of probabilities that are subject to change as the premises of the arguments shift with varying conditions. As Dr. Richard T. Ely so aptly stated years ago, "There is no system of economics applicable unchanged to all times."

Right now a change is taking place in appraisal thought with respect to the opinion held on the effect of the "infiltration" or "invasion" of minority groups on white neighborhoods. In discussing the implications of this change, no cause is to be espoused. This is an objective analysis. Nothing is to be advocated except a strong appeal to make every appraisal an honest report of the facts as they are found to exist without prejudice, bias or a preconceived notion that might be false.

To approach this problem without prejudice is difficult indeed. Over the years we have been brought up with deeply ingrained emotional feelings that we cannot shake off with ease simply by saying we will. Inevitably, some reservation of prejudice will be retained, and we probably will not be free of it for several generations.

Most appraisal texts treat the problem from the viewpoint of 20 years ago when it was commonly believed by nearly all that the presence of Negroes or other minorities in a neighborhood was a serious value-destroying influence. Appraisers were considered remiss in their duty if they failed to discover and report the presence of any minority member anywhere in the neighborhood of the subject property. Some appraisers kept maps outlining all the neighborhoods occupied by minorities for ready reference. This type of thinking is undergoing a change. There are many locations where such generalizations are no longer true.

ILLEGAL

On May 3, 1948, the United States Supreme Court rendered its historic decision that restrictive covenants were contrary to public policy and unenforceable by court action. This focused the attention of nearly everyone on a problem which had become increasingly acute for many years.

During World War II, when the population of Los Angeles increased by 30%, the non-white population increased by more than 100%. This was typical of the influx of the minorities into many of our large metropolitan centers where thousands crowded in to join the shipbuilding and aircraft trades and other war-born industries. The rapid increase of Negroes in American cities is a twentieth century phenomenon which was accelerated by war, but which will probably continue until the Negro population is more evenly dispersed.

The residential areas to which the Negro had been habitually confined literally bulged and broke at the seams. The housing conditions within those areas were unbelievably bad and a disgrace to the country. The problem of housing accommodations for Negroes was a complex one of low income, neighborhood restrictions which confined them to small areas plus a housing shortage within those areas. This resulted in over-crowding, congestion and blight; slums were created or accentuated. The advancing age of the structures, coupled with the lack of maintenance by indifferent and greedy absentee owners, who knew it was not necessary to maintain the properties to hold tenants when the shortage was so acute, was the primary cause of the slum condition—the dwellers were not.

Whites observing Negroes living under those conditions are prone to blame the Negro for that condition, whereas the Negro was the victim—not the cause. (Blaming Negroes for the slums is akin to blaming the prisoners for the existence of the concentration camps of Russia.)

PROJECTS FILLED

The FHA annually makes a survey of all the large scale rental housing projects financed with FHA mortgages which reveals the vacancies, rent levels, turnover, etc., in each of these rental properties. The reports from the Negro projects in the Los Angeles area disclosed that there were fewer vacancies, higher rents and smaller turnover in those units than in comparable units in white neighborhoods. A typical remark by the owner of a 12-unit apartment in a neighborhood on the southwest side of Los Angeles which is in transition from white to non-white was, "Our building has 100% Negro occupancy. Rent payments are prompt and we have a waiting list of prospective tenants." A look at the rents makes this statement even more startling. The one-bedroom units were rented at $85 and the two-bedroom apartments at $110 per month, which was considerably higher than the rents for comparable units in white neighborhoods.

During the war certain priority allotments were issued to builders for the sole purpose of providing housing for Negro war workers. Several thousand residential units in tract developments that were built in Los Angeles under this program have been most successful. Foreclosures have been very few—less percentagewise than for the area as a whole—and there have been no mortgage losses sustained in any of these tracts. The resale market has been excellent. This favorable loan experience has attracted the attention of many mortgage lenders, and more and more of them are becoming interested in this type of security.

VALUES UPHELD

It has been apparent that Negro families have responded readily to the standards of good neighborhood living. A report by the FHA on one neighborhood stated, "The infiltration of Negro owner-occupants has tended to appreciate property values and neighborhood stability in contrast to its depreciating use by white families as a rental area."

Appraising properties in neighborhoods which are in transition from one type of occupancy to another or in a neighborhood which is already predominantly occupied by minority races really tests the skill of the appraiser. His huge stock of sales data is probably based on an entirely different market for an entirely different user group. He is going to have to start at the very beginning and find out what Negroes are paying for housing comparable to the subject property. That is the only type of sales data that will support a conclusion on property in a Negro neighborhood.

PRACTICAL TEST

Most appraisers through many years of experience can look at a house and approximate the rental and probable sales price obtainable. But this is not so with housing for Negroes. It is necessary to investigate and find out what Negroes can and do pay for housing.

Not long ago an application was received for a mortgage on a proposed duplex to be built in the heart of a

BELDEN MORGAN gives reasons why recent comparable sales data are the only support for valuations in Negro or mixed neighborhoods—

1. Because of increasing movements of minorities into previously un-mixed neighborhoods, properties must be judged by their probable marketability to the potential user group, not according to what they were worth to former owners and renters.
2. The demand for housing by minority groups is so strong that rentals and sales prices may be much higher than warranted by the condition and type of property.
3. Improved employment conditions have raised the incomes of Negroes, so that they will be able to maintain higher values.

Negro neighborhood. The location was surrounded by 40-year old and older frame rooming houses, apartments and single-family residences. It was not a slum district. Twenty years ago it was a well regarded white neighborhood in the upper medium price range. From the point of view of a Negro it was a very desirable residential neighborhood. Negroes of a relatively high economic level predominated in the area. Most of the occupants were civil service employees, public utility workers and professional people. Inasmuch as this would be the only new house for miles around, the application ordinarily would have been rejected because the value found would be substantially below replacement cost. The opinion would have been formed that the adverse effect of the environment would greatly restrict the marketability and rentability of this new property. An investigation revealed, however, that the demand from Negroes for rentals in this neighborhood was so great that they would pay higher rents than the casual observer would think possible. It was also found that a real market existed for the purchase of properties of this type by proposed owner-occupants who would live in one unit and rent the other. The conclusion was ultimately reached that the risk on this property was less than the risk on many new duplexes which were being built in new neighborhoods. This one had virtually no competition. It would be in strong demand for a long time. It was capable of earning more rent than similar structures in white neighborhoods. As a result it was appraised at its full cost of replacement.

The point is that properties in minority neighborhoods must be appraised, rated and judged from the viewpoint of their desirability, marketability and rentability to the user group involved. The old test of marketability must be applied to these properties.

What is meant by marketability? Marketability means the ability of a property to be sold and resold again and again. It means a property possessing the characteristics to attract many purchasers to it. Appraisers don't care what the race, creed or color of those purchasers might be, just so there are enough of them with the ability to pay to create a really strong and sustaining demand. Marketability is linked to desirability. As it varies, so does marketability. But in weighing desirability it must be thought of from the viewpoint of the potential users of the property, uninfluenced and unbiased by personal prejudices.

No attempt is being made to build up a case for all minority housing, for all Negroes or all minorities. There are many sub-standard properties. There are many sub-standard incomes. Large masses of these groups of people lack the necessary financial ability to meet the obligations of home ownership; these present unacceptable mortgage risks by any standard. On the other hand there are many acceptable risks to be found in this field which shouldn't be overlooked because of blind prejudice.

RISK LESSENED

The continued financial ability to meet the obligation is the requirement that raises many doubts. It is apparent that a sizeable segment of the minority population have unstable incomes and are employed in low wage occupations. Percentagewise very few of these people earn over $40 per week. Obviously not many of this group can afford home ownership at today's high costs. But an increasing number of Negroes belong to another group. Today, the civil service employee, the public utility worker and the professional man earn as much as their white co-workers and enjoy equal economic stability. Conditions have changed. This was not true 20 years ago —20 years ago was a whole generation ago. Those of the current generation through compulsory education and the changed attitudes of government and large employers, sparked by the civil rights program, are infinitely better off than their fathers. Their span of available occupations covers the range formerly open only to whites. The Negro population will never again suffer the tremendous labor cutbacks of both wages and opportunities which occurred in the past. There is a large segment of the minority group which presents no additional risk because of its race. Consequently value changes in the future in the better Negro sections will be much the same as in predominantly white sections. (Editor's Note: See the report of the Greater Detroit Chapter's October meeting in THE REVIEW, December, 1951, for another view of the same subject.)

Now, what happens when Negroes enter a heretofore all white neighborhood? Sometimes, but not always, because whites are generally uninformed regarding the effect of Negro "invasions" on property values, the whites become panic stricken and desert the neighborhood "en masse" when Negro families first move into the neighborhood. The story of the "invasion" spreads, and occasionally the hysteria of the whites leaps beyond control. The insistent, desperate drive of the Negroes for self-betterment results in violence and bloodshed. Often the word spreads that property values will be wiped out when the neighborhood becomes predominantly Negro. Then everybody tries to sell in a hurry while they can still get a price, and offer their properties for a little less than their neighbors so as to sell first and get out first. This hysteria of course depresses prices, giving proof to the statement that prices fall with a Negro "invasion." But it is the mass exodus that temporarily gluts the market with offerings that depresses prices—not the influx. It is like a bank run engendered by fear. The fears produce an unwarranted condition that could be avoided if people would stay put.

STRONG MARKET

After the first hysterical selling phase passes prices become stabilized, then gradually increase under the pressure of Negro bidding. Whites who hold on to their property are often able to sell at prices substantially higher than prevailed prior to the "invasion." The old law of supply and demand asserts itself. The limited property available to Negroes coupled with the desperate need by the Negroes for adequate housing and their intense desire to better themselves exerts a pressure on the price structure that doesn't exist in older white neighborhoods.

People are learning this. Many districts today go through a transitional period in occupancy without any signs of hysteria and without any collapse in prices. The only effect from an economic viewpoint is a broadening and strengthening of the market by virtue of the increased demand. This is true in some areas, but not all. Whether prices rise or fall depends upon the ability of the newcomers to bid up prices.

RAPID TURNOVER

It usually will be found that sales activity is greater in racially mixed areas, especially in the low and moderate price ranges, and that the high effective demand among Negro buyers not only sustains price levels but often increases them.

Actually, whether prices rise or fall depends upon the extent of the demand and the ability of the market to bid up prices, and has nothing to do whatsoever with racial characteristics. Generally speaking the Negro home owner pays higher prices than his white prototype because his color restricts his field of operations.

More Negroes have more money than ever before. They enjoy greater stability of employment than ever before, but still there are relatively few who are able to buy in the higher price ranges. When a few of these Negroes in the upper income brackets move into a neighborhood of high priced homes, some depression in prices and a restriction in market activity is usually observed. Some white prospective purchasers lose interest in that neighborhood and there are not enough Negro purchasers in that price range to take their place.

EXCEPTION

This condition prevails in at least two neighborhoods in the Los Angeles area which were investigated by the writer. In one, a $20,000 to $30,000 neighborhood on the southwest side of Los Angeles, the first Negro family moved in about two years ago. Today there are only [illegible] Negro families among the seven hundred white families in this area. Prices are very dull and prices are down [illegible] to [illegible] former levels in contrast to a general price increase throughout the area.

In contrast to this, the adjoining neighborhood which is a little older and in the $10,000 to $15,000 price range has had an entirely different experience. Prior to 1948 this was a restricted white neighborhood. The first Negro family didn't move in until the spring of 1950. Now the neighborhood is about 20% nonwhite. Actual sales histories on a number of typical properties in this area were obtained through brokers and verified by present owners. But changes in sales prices in themselves are meaningless unless related to the trend of market prices generally. In the Los Angeles area for the past ten years the Los Angeles Residential Research Committee has maintained an accurate index of residential market prices. Each sale obtained in this neighborhood was related to the curve of fluctuating market prices for the whole area to obtain a true picture of the effect of the minority "invasion" on the price structure in this neighborhood.

CASE HISTORIES

Property A sold in 1948 at $12,500 when the market price index was at 265. In 1950 a Negro moved next door. There was a subsequent sale in 1950 to a white at $13,500 which was an 8% increase and represented 287 on the index scale. But the market price index for the whole metropolitan area moved down in those two years to 230, a decline of 13%. Now the same property is listed for sale at $16,500 which is 300 on the market price scale and 32% higher than the 1948 scale, whereas the levels generally as revealed by the RRC index are about the same as in 1948 with an index level of 262. Evidently this owner doesn't think property values are being destroyed by the change in occupancy which is taking place.

Property B sold in December, 1949 for $[illegible] when the index was at 232. It [illegible] to a Negro in August, 1951 for $23,000, an increase of 38% during the period when market prices on an average were advancing only 13% to an index level of 262.

Property C sold in October, [illegible] for $11,500 when the index [illegible] resold to another white in May, 1951, a year after the "invasion" started when there were several minorities in the same block, for $12,500. This 9% rise represents about the same increase as market prices generally, which had advanced 11% to a level of 257. Then the property sold again in October, 1951, this time to a Negro at $13,500 which was 17% higher than the "pre-invasion" sale and slightly higher than the market price index which advanced only 13% to 262 during the same period.

These cases are typical for this neighborhood. There are many others and they all tell the same story. Prices have advanced more here than in neighborhoods unaffected by population movements. Furthermore, this advance was evidenced during all three stages of the change—in the period of threatening "invasion," during the early stages of transition and in the later stages of mutation.

There is an old motto of the Society of Residential Appraisers which says "We have no moral right to decide on the basis of opinion that which may be determined as a matter of fact." For the purpose of this article that motto should be paraphrased into, "We have no moral right to decide on the basis of prejudice that which may be determined as a matter of fact."

The facts must be ascertained before rendering an appraisal report in a neighborhood affected by minority population movements. Things may not be what they seem. Prejudiced belief or hearsay information cannot be trusted. An honest report of the facts is the only solution.

CONSTRUCTION COSTS COMPOSITION

A glance at the distribution of various homebuilding costs, shown in the table below, discloses that prices for materials and equipment in homebuilding increase 337% from factory to home-buyer. In other words, a typical item listed for sale at $1 at the factory costs the consumer about $4.37.

Data in the table are based on a Dow Service application of a formula developed several years ago in cooperation with numerous builders. Estimated costs for 1951 are shown, based on a typical $11,250 house excluding land and financing expenses.

ESTIMATED DISTRIBUTION COSTS IN HOMEBUILDING

	FOB Factory*	Mfr. Whsl. Cost	Freight Chgs.	Whsl. or Jobber Costs	Labor	Retailing Costs	Contr. Supv. OH & Bldr. Prof.	Consumer Cost
Lumber	$ 517	$ 47	$213	$ 47	$ 716	$ 520	$ 332	$ 2,382
Millwork	439	99	66	342	400	518	342	2,205
Plumbing	337	22	22	79	340	157	168	1,125
Heating	259	46	19	69	215	185	143	925
Masonry	281	27	66	18	270	140	99	900
Electrical	56	10	5	10	104	41	36	259
Rfg.—Siding & Weatherstrip	259	47	29	58	369	235	176	1,170
Insulation	124	27	11	27	65	131	61	450
Paint	56	27	22	38	211	97	81	540
Glass	9	1	1	0	73	—	14	106
Hdwr. Fhg.	90	11	18	11	101	79	50	360
Hdwr. Misc.	146	33	16	33	340	132	116	828
TOTALS	$2,575	$397	$483	$738	$3,204	$2,235	$1,618	$11,250
% of Total	22.87	3.52	4.31	6.56	28.48	19.86	14.40	100.0

*Typical selling costs omitted.
Contractor's supervision and overhead plus builder's profit.

Housing — Restrictive Covenants

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
343 SOUTH DEARBORN STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: April 16, 1953

SUBJECT: Developments Since the Supreme Court Decisions on Restrictive Covenants in Shelley vs. Kraemer and Hurd vs. Hodge *

It is now five years since the United States Supreme Court ruled in the cases of Shelley v. Kraemer (334 U. S. 1) and Hurd v. Hodge (334 U. S. 24) that neither a state nor the federal court could compel compliance with a racial restrictive covenant. An informal survey conducted by the Associated Press revealed that as a result of these meetings, thousands of Negroes have been able to purchase homes in areas previously barred to them. It is of interest to review the impact of the Supreme Court's history-making rulings on real estate practices and on recent cases involving restrictive covenants which have reached the courts.

One week after the Supreme Court established the new rule of the Shelley case, it applied it in reversing decisions of the Supreme Courts of Ohio and California which had held racial restrictive covenants enforceable. (Trustees of Monroe Avenue Church of Christ v. Perkins, 334 U.S. 813; Amer v. Superior Court of State of California, and Yin Kim v. Superior Court of the State of California, 334 U S. 813)

Several restrictive covenant cases were pending in various state courts at the time of the Shelley v. Kraemer decision. On July 16, 1948, some two months after the Supreme Court ruling, the New York State Court of Appeals, by memorandum opinion which simply referred to the Shelley decision, reversed a lower court which had upheld a suit for an injunction against violation of a restrictive covenant. (Kemp v. Rubin, 298 N.Y. 590). In November of the same year, the Supreme Court of Illinois rendered a similar decision in the case of Tovey v. Levy (401 Ill. 393).

In December 1948, the Court of Appeals of Marylandhad before it two cases involving applications for injunctive enforcement of restrictive covenants (Goetz v. Smith, and Saunders v. Phillips,, 191 Md. 707, cert. denied 336 U. S. 967). The plaintiffs argued that the rule of the Shelley case did not apply to them because in that case, Negroes had occupied some of the property in question for periods of over twenty years despite the covenants. They also pointed out that in the Shelley situation, the Negro purchaser had had no actual knowledge of the restrictions at the time he made his purchase, while in the cases before the Maryland court, the Negro defendants knew of the restrictions at the time they bought the property.

* This is a revision bringing up to date our joint memorandum of August 15, 1951 on the same general subject.

The Court of Appeals of Maryland rejected all these contentions and stated that the United States Supreme Court decisions barred the court from granting the injunctions requested.

In the same month, a Texas appellate court in the case of Clifton v. Puente, 218 S.W. 2nd 272, followed a similar course of action. The covenant involved barred sale or lease to "persons of Mexican descent" and provided that the land should revert to the original owner in case the covenant was violated. In December 1947, the property had been sold to Puente, a person of Mexican descent. Thereupon the original owner, claiming that the land once more belonged to him because of the terms of the covenant, sold the same piece of land to the plaintiff, Clifton, who joined with the original owner in bringing an action against Puente for a declaration that Clifton was the rightful owner of the land. Puente countered by asking the court for an order granting him possession of the property. While the matter was under consideration in the trial court, the Shelley decision was handed down. Despite this decision, the plaintiffs pressed their demand that the court cancel the deed by which the property had been transferred to Puente.

The trial court, on the basis of the Shelley case, dismissed the plaintiffs' action and instead ordered possession of the land to be given to the defendant, Puente. The Texas Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the decision of the trial court. It rejected the claim of the plaintiff that there was a distinction between cases where the plaintiffs were seeking to enforce a racial restrictive covenant by means of an application for an injunction and the case before the Texas court in which the plaintiff was seeking merely to have the court declare that the covenant was valid and therefore by its provisions entitled him to possession. In rejecting this contention, the Texas Court of Civil Appeals said, "It is as much an enforcement of the covenant to deny a person his legal right to which he would be entitled except for the covenant as it would be to expressly command the judicial order that the terms of the covenant be recognized and carried out. No valid distinction can be predicated on the position of a party (alleged to be an ineligible grantee) as a plaintiff or as a defendant. Under the decision of the Supreme Court above referred to (Shelley v. Kraemer) judicial recognition or enforcement of the restrictive covenant involved here is precluded by the "equal protection of the law" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

When those interested in maintaining the effect of restrictive covenants found that state courts would refuse to issue injunction orders to enforce them, they were forced to search for other legal technicalities. One of the first such devices was a suit for damages for violation of a racial restrictive covenant. The case of Weiss v. Leaon (359 Mo. 1054) which arose in Kansas City, Mo., and was decided by the highest court of the State of Missouri on December 12, 1949, had originated as a suit for both an injunction and damages brought by a group of white signers of a restrictive covenant against other white signers, who were planning to sell to Negroes. The plaintiffs, seeking enforcement of the covenant, also made the prospective Negro buyers co-defendants. The trial court rejected the request for an injunction on the basis of Shelley v. Kraemer. It also rejected the plaintiff' request for damages . The Supreme Court of Missouri, on appeal, ruled that the trial court's refusal to enforce the covenant by injunction was proper, but that a suit for monetary damages brought against the white sellers for breach of a restrictive covenant was not barred by the Supreme Court ruling in the Shelley case.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, in so holding, said, "The fact that another remedy, specific performance, is ruled out because of constitutional reasons, need not necessarily affect the remedy by way of damages unless it, too, is unconstitutional under the circumstances." The case was sent back to the trial court for a determination of the damages, if any, suffered by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs, apparently satisfied with the Missouri Supreme Court's ruling that a damage suit could be brought, have not returned to the trial court for an assessment of these damages. It is possible, of course, that the plaintiffs fear that they may be unable to prove that they suffered any monetary damages, in which case much of the effect of the Missouri Supreme Court's decision allowing a suit for damages would disappear. (The unproved claim that the presence of Negroes depresses property values is effectively answered by Charles Abrams in an article called The New "Gresham's Law of Neighborhoods", Fact or Fiction, which appeared in the Appraisal Journal of July 1951. Reprints are available.)

A somewhat different device to evade the impact of Shelley v. Kraemer was used successfully in Oklahoma. An owner of land subject to an anti-Negro restrictive covenant sold the land to a white person who in turn sold it to Negroes. White owners of other lots covered by the covenant sued to have the sale set aside. They alleged a conspiracy to damage them by destroying the restrictions, charging the original white sellers and the white intermediary seller who was described as financially irresponsible and a catspaw and the Negro purchasers as co-conspirators. Plaintiff's claim for damages was thus based on conspiracy which under some state laws constitutes a tort giving rise to an action for damages. Plaintiffs claimed as damages the costs they had incurred in connection with the conclusion of the restrictive covenant and the alleged depreciation of their land due to the sale to a Negro.

The trial court dismissed the action in its entirety on the authority of Shelley v. Kraemer. The Oklahoma Supreme Court upheld the trial court's refusal to set aside the sale, but reversed the ruling that there could be no claim for damages based on conspiracy. The Supreme Court argued that Shelley v. Kraemer had ruled a restrictive covenant a valid contract and that, therefore, an agreement entered into by two or more people to bring about a violation of such contract could constitute the tort of conspiracy giving rise to an action for damages. Hence the Supreme Court of Oklahoma ordered the trial court to uphold that portion of the complaint claiming damages for conspiracy. (Correll V. Earley, 237 Pac 2nd 1017).

Despite the different basis of the damage claims in both cases (breach of contract in Missouri, tort for conspiracy in Oklahoma) the rationale of both decisions is very similar. Both courts ruled that a restrictive covenant was a valid contract - though not specifically enforceable - and that therefore the damage resulting from its breach or an agreement to breach it was recoverable. Both courts ignored the obvious fact that its award of damages to a person "aggrieved" by the breech of a restrictive covenant constituted a judicial action enforcing the covenant which Shelley v. Kraemer had declared a violation of the XIVth Amendment.

On the other hand, the United States District Court in the District of Columbia ruled, on October 5, 1950, (Roberts v. Curtis, 93 Fed. Supp. 604) that Shelley v. Kraemer and Hurd v. Hodge barred an action for damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant, even though the covenant itself, as in this case, specified that damages were assessable in the event of breach.

In dismissing the action, Judge Holtzoff stated that he construed "the holdings of the Supreme Court (in Shelley v. Kraemer and Hurd v. Hodge) as withholding any judicial assistance for enforcement of such restrictive covenants.".

On January 30, 1951, the Circuit Court of Wayne County, Michigan, granted a motion to dismiss a suit brought to collect $5,000 damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant (Phillips v. Naff, #260,031). The plaintiffs and defendants in this case were owners of adjoining lots subject to the covenant. The defendants had sold their property to Negroes in disregard of the covenant.

In dismissing the complaint, Circuit Judge Frank B. Ferguson referred to the Shelley v. Kraemer decision and ruled that, under it, racial restrictive covenants could not be enforced by state courts. The court also cited a number of Michigan cases holding that, where two persons enter into a contract based upon certain assumptions as to their legal rights, and are mistaken in those assumptions, the contract is void and will be set aside upon application to the courts. Pointing out that the restrictive covenant involved in this action was a contract based on the assumption that an injunction could be obtained against its violation, the court held that the racial restrictive covenant upon which the suit was based was unenforceable and that the suit must, therefore, be dismissed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Michigan, 332 Mich. 389 on the authority of Shelley V. Kraemer on the ground that suits for damages of restrictive covenant constitute an indirect method of enforcement. Said the court:

> If the sale of property subject to a reciprocal restrictive covenant cannot be made without rendering the grantor liable to suits for damages, such fact, it may be assumed, would operate to inhibit freedom of purchase by those against whom the discrimination is directed and also to place a burden on the right of an owner to sell to a purchaser of his own selection.

The next court to rule on this question was the Superior Court of the State of California on March 26, 1951 (Barrows v. Jackson), which held that Shelley v. Kraemer barred an action for damages for violation of a racial restrictive covenant.

The plaintiffs in this action contended that the rule laid down in the Shelley case should be limited to actions for injunctive relief and should not apply to suits for damages. The Court ruled that that decision was "broad enough to contemplate an action for damages for breach of the covenant as coming within the scope of 'judicial enforcement' as referred to in that opinion." It cited Roberts v. Curtis to support this conclusion and dismissed the precedent of Weiss v. Leaon on the ground that that case proceeded upon "an ill-founded premise that the agreements are legal." This, the court stated, "certainly was not the holding of the Supreme Court in Shelley v. Kraemer."

On appeal, the District Court of Appeals affirmed, holding that the covenant was not one which could be enforced by state courts in view of the ruling of the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Shelley v. Kraemer and Sipes v. McGhee. It stated that "the admonition of these cases is that a state may not by judicial process enforce private rights derived from consensual agreements of private individuals where to do so would result in the infringement of civil liberties guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States." Since the granting of damages for violation of a racial or restrictive covenant would be a type of judicial enforcement, and since judicial enforcement of racial or restrictive covenants was a violation of the "equal protection" requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment, the court ruled that the trial court had been right in dismissing the complaint. (112 Cal. App. 2nd 534, 247 Pac (2nd) 99). The Supreme Court of California denied a petition for a hearing. However, the United States Supreme Court recently granted certiorari thus opening the way for a final determination of the question whether or not a damage suit may be brought for violation of a racial or religious restrictive covenant.

The question of the validity of racially restrictive agreements had also been presented to the courts in other ways. In Roanoke, Va., a restrictive covenant barred sale or occupancy of certain property to persons who observed the Sabbath on a day other than Sunday and provided that in case of any breach, the land was to revert to the person who had originally burdened the land with the covenant. A Jewish purchaser, after taking title, brought an action in the Virginia courts for a declaratory judgment establishing his ownership of the land. The defendant in the action was the original corporate seller who had subdivided the area and sold it as home building lots. The plaintiff in this action won a default judgment.

On September 7, 1950, the Minnesota District Court of Hennepin County decided a case involving a suit for cancellation of a sale of a house to a Negro on the ground that the plaintiffs - the white owners of the house - had been induced to sell through fraud. They claimed that the real estate operator, their agent and one of the defendants, had not informed them that the purchasers - also defendants in the case - were Negroes. In ruling for the defendants, the Minnesota court held that the seller could have the sale cancelled only if he showed that he had suffered money damage because of the agent's alleged misrepresentation. Since the plaintiff could show no such monetary loss, the court dismissed the case and later granted judgment to the Negro purchasers compelling the sellers to transfer title to them in accordance with the signed contract of sale.

* * * * * *

Thus, the trend of decisions involving racial restrictive covenants has been to interpret the Supreme Court decisions so as to bar damage suits, suits based on fraud and similar actions which seek, directly or indirectly, to compel compliance with such covenants.

The State of Wisconsin is the only state which had a law specifically validating racial restrictive covenants. This provision is, of course, unconstitutional. Nevertheless,the law has remained on the books until the 1951 session of the Wisconsin Legislature. On June 6, 1951 , a bill was passed which provides that restrictions based upon character, race or nationality cannot be included in covenants on land.

Even outside of the courts, there has been an increased awareness of the costs of segregation and, to a certain extent, a more favorable attitude toward integrated living.

The action of the National Association of Real Estate Boards at its annual convention in November 1950 is, perhaps, a reflection of this. In the past, realtors had been expelled from local real estate boards for selling property to persons barred by a racial restrictive covenant. The NAREB convention, however, voted to eliminate from its Code of Ethics the provision making it an unethical practice to introduce into a neighborhood "members of any race or nationality ... whose presence will be detrimental to property values."

Mention should be made, however, of the fact that persons seeking to maintain the restricted character of certain neighborhoods have on occasion resorted to violence. In some cases, the police have done little to prevent the outrages and have made no effort to apprehend the wrongdoers.

An instance of this kind of violence occurred in Birmingham, when a Negro property owner purchased a home on a block which had formerly been exclusively white. The home was bombed on at least two different occasions and the police have shown an amazing inability to prevent such acts or to find the perpetrators. Ironically, the house was first blasted just thirty-six hours after a federal court had ruled that a racial zoning ordinance which had prevented the Negro family from occupying their home, was unconstitutional.

In South Dallas, a suburb of Dallas, a virtual reign of terror has existed for the past year due to attempts on the part of Negroes to build homes in this community.

This type of overt racism was not confined to the South. Cicero, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago, provided the most shameful recent example of violence used to exclude a minority racial group from a community. Residents of this all-white city gutted an entire apartment building, forcing nineteen white families to flee, in order to prevent a young Negro couple from moving into an apartment they had rented in the building. Laxity on the part of local police necessitated calling out the National Guard.

In one case where an effort at intimidation came to the attention of a court, it quickly enjoined such action. The Wayne County Court of Detroit Michigan, on January 11, 1951, granted an injunction to a plaintiff who had sold property to Negroes in defiance of a racial restrictive covenant. The injunction was directed against a group of persons who had picketed the plaintiff's home and office denouncing him for selling "white" property to Negroes. In granting the injunction the court ruled that the picketing was unlawful interference with the property rights of the plaintiffs (Brock v. Murphy, opinion by Circuit Judge Chester P. O'Hara).

These are merely examples of the lengths to which some persons will go in order to maintain the "purity" of their neighborhoods. There is a trend, however, toward a gradual breakdown of enforced racial segregation in housing.

Housing. gen'l

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: June 18, 1953

SUBJECT: Modification of Racial Integration Resolution of National Capital Housing Authority

Digest:
National Capital Housing Authority conditions its non-segregation, non-discrimination policy with respect to low-rent public housing projects upon the availability in the neighborhood of public and private facilities for racial minorities.

* * * * * * * *

By Joint Memorandum dated April 20, 1953, we advised you that the National Capital Housing Authority had adopted a resolution eliminating racial segregation from low-rent public housing projects "planned, built and opened for occupancy after September 1, 1951." On June 4, 1953, the Authority adopted a supplementary resolution which, in effect, conditions the non-segregation policy upon the availability of neighborhood facilities for both races. The "timing" of the application of the policy against segregation to specific properties and projects is made subject to "formal action by the Authority."

Staff surveys will be made of each neighborhood to determine whether communities "are lacking in public and private facilities for the use of tenant families without regard to race." If facilities are not available in the neighborhood for the use of Negroes and whites (recreational facilities, theatres, schools, etc.), the Authority could postpone putting its non-segregation policy into effect in its housing projects in these communities. This later resolution also opens the door to local community pressure groups to defeat the purposes of the original resolution.

The full text of the June 4, 1953, resolution follows:

Resolution. Public Housing. National Capital Housing Authority. Adopted June 4, 1953

As an agency of the government of the United States, the National Capital Housing Authority subscribes to the policy that all permanent low-rent housing now and hereafter provided by the Authority in the District of Columbia shall be available for occupancy by low-income families without regard to race, color, creed, or national origin. This statement of policy supersedes all previous actions by the Authority on this subject.

In adopting this policy the Authority recognizes that some neighborhoods in which public low-rent housing is operated, or is planned for future operation, are lacking in public and private facilities for the use of tenant families without regard to race. The Authority therefore has determined that the timing of the application of this policy with regard to specific properties and projects shall be subject to formal action by the Authority. Such action shall be based upon staff surveys of the neighborhoods in which such properties and projects are located, and upon such other pertinent information as may be available to the Authority. The establishment by the Authority of effective dates for application of the policy to specific properties and projects shall provide for a period of staff preparation of management personnel, tenants, and residents of the neighborhoods affected.

The Authority may authorize the deferment of the policy's application to specific properties and projects until such time as there is evidence of existence of basic public facilities to serve tenant families without regard to race.

Because war housing under the management of the Authority is in process of disposition, this policy shall not apply to any war housing properties. War housing transferred by the Public Housing Administration to the Authority for use as permanent low-rent housing shall become subject to the policy upon such transfer.

TL-SR/ZL
5

Housing - Restrictive Covenants

Joint Memorandum

RECEIVED
JUL 22
Southern Regional Council

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
343 SOUTH DEARBORN STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

any

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: July 16, 1953

SUBJECT: Decision of the United States Supreme Court in Barrows v. Jackson.

DIGEST: The United States Supreme Court rules that under the 14th Amendment, a state court may not award damages for breach of a racial restrictive covenant.

On June 15, 1953 the United States Supreme Court, in a 6 to 1 decision, ruled that a restrictive covenant cannot be enforced by a suit for damages against a signer of such a covenant who disregarded it.

The plaintiffs were a group of white owners of property subject to a racial restrictive covenant directed against persons not of the Caucasian race. The defendant was a white former owner of such property, a signer of the original covenant, who sold her land without making it subject to the covenant and who thereby permitted occupancy by non-Caucasians. The plaintiffs argued that since all the parties to the litigation were white, there was no non-Caucasian who would be injured because of his race if damages were assessed against the defendant for breaking the covenant which she voluntarily signed. They pointed out that the non-Caucasians would continue their undisturbed occupancy regardless of the outcome of the suit.

The majority opinion, written by Mr. Justice Minton, stated that allowing the state courts to assess damages for breach of such covenants would "encourage the use of restrictive covenants". He added, "If the state may thus punish respondent for her failure to carry out her covenant, she is coerced to continue to use her property in a discriminatory manner, which in essence is the purpose of the covenant. Thus, it becomes not respondent's voluntary choice but the state's choice that she observe her covenant or suffer damages". The court concluded that for a state court to assess damages for a breach of a restrictive covenant would constitute "state action" as surely as it was "state action" to enforce such covenants by injunctions. Since this was held unconstitutional by the court in the Shelley case, it followed that the court had to bar damage suits as violative of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment.

The court then considered whether the defendant could rely on the violation of the constitutional rights of others as a defense for her own breach of the restrictive covenant. The court decided that in the case before it, it was faced by a unique situation "in which it is the action of the state court which might result in a denial of constitutional rights and in which it would be difficult if not impossible for the persons whose rights are asserted to present their grievance before any court". The court therefore ruled that it would make an exception to the general rule which denies standing to a litigant to rely upon a violation of the constitutional rights of others. For these reasons it ruled for the defendant and affirmed the dismissal of the plaintiffs' action for damages.

Mr. Chief Justice Vinson, the sole dissenter, attacked the majority opinion because the court had allowed the defendant to raise the constitutional rights of persons not before the court as a defense. He pointed out that all the parties to the litigation were white Caucasians and that no damage could be shown to result to any non-Caucasians from the success of the plaintiffs' suit for damages. He argued that the fact that there is no other way to vindicate the constitutional rights of unidentified non-Caucasians is an admission that the litigation did not present the court with a "case or controversy" which involves the constitutional rights of the parties.

The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the American Jewish Committee participated in this case by filing a joint brief amicus curiae urging the Supreme Court to deny enforceability to claims for damages resulting from the breach of a restrictive covenant.

This decision removes the last vestige of any legal coercive effect which may have been left to racial or religious restrictive covenants by the Shelley case. In the future, the sole means by which racial or religious restrictive covenants can remain in force is by voluntary adherence by the signers of such covenants or by their successors or through extra legal community pressure to compel conformity with such covenants.

SR/TL:dk
11

Housing

NATIONAL CAPITAL HOUSING AUTHORITY

WASHINGTON 25, D. C.

PUBLIC HOUSING IN WASHINGTON
a. Origin and Development
b. Open Occupancy

Remarks by James Ring, Executive Director
National Capital Housing Authority
Workshop on Intergroup Education
Catholic University
July 23, 1953

I am glad to have this opportunity to meet with you and discuss the contribution which public housing is making in Washington. The invitation to address you indicated that many of your group are concerned with problems associated with the racial occupancy of housing in areas adjacent to the schools you represent. I was advised also that you are interested in techniques used by the Authority with regard to the activation of a policy providing for the occupancy of public housing in the District of Columbia by low-income families without regard to race.

It is obvious, of course, that any discussion of the Authority's policy of open occupancy should be presented within a frame of reference which will indicate to you the place which the Authority occupies in the government and in the community. It is also essential to develop the subject with an understanding of the basic policy adopted by the Authority and the conditions under which it was adopted.

First, let me say that the purpose of the National Capital Housing Authority is to provide good housing for low-income families at rents in accordance with their incomes, and to make this housing available within the confines of legal and financial means permitted by Federal law. I make this statement of purpose at the outset so that there shall be no confusion with respect to the basic work assigned to the Authority. If my insistence on this point raises question, I will say that I do so because proponents of various worthy causes have assumed that the Authority's work is designed primarily to further the particular cause in which they are interested, and that the provision of housing for low-income families is a secondary objective or, perhaps more accurately, a means to a greater end.

Of course, the Authority cannot truthfully say that the end it serves is merely the building of houses and the renting of those houses to low-income families. The great objective served by public housing is identical with that of public and private social agencies—the building of a greater America, the development of good citizens.

Let me begin by setting the stage--by providing the historical background of the housing movement in Washington. Slums and shacks were noted in Washington during the first half of the nineteenth century, but the city was then so thinly developed that insanitary houses produced only sporadic and short-lived expressions of concern. The need for housing regulation in the interests of public health and safety was not recognized until after the Civil War; during the war years, thousands of refugees from nearby states crowded into the Federal City. The end of the war found many of these refugees settled in patchwork shacks in the neighborhoods of army forts and encampments which surrounded the heart of the city; others found refuge in alley sheds and stables, and in abandoned outbuildings on farms which then occupied a considerable part of the District of Columbia.

Furthermore, it was evident to the Federal Government that the Capital was growing beyond the boundaries of the "old city" planned by Major L'Enfant, and its needs required a unified government for the entire District. The inner core of the District was then governed by a mayor and council, as was Georgetown, while the outlying portions of the District were under the jurisdiction of a unique institution known as the Levy Court. You can imagine the problems arising from conflicting sets of ordinances. In 1870, Congress abolished the various forms of local government within the District and established a territorial form of government for the entire District, with a governor, a legislative assembly, a Board of Public Works, and a Board of Health.

During the few years of the territorial government's existence, Washington saw the enactment and enforcement of strong housing regulations. Hundreds of shacks were condemned and removed by the Board of Health. In the meantime, the Board of Public Works had undertaken such an ambitious program with privately borrowed funds that it got into financial difficulty. Congress then abolished the territorial type of government and instituted the present form of local government with a Board of Commissioners, appointed by the President.

Between 1870 and 1890, citizens of Washington were asking with growing concern, "What can be done for poor families whose houses are destroyed because of insanitation?" A somewhat cynical answer to this question was given by the development during that period of the inhabited alleys, Washington's characteristic slums. These houses were built on the rear ends of deep street lots. Between 1870 and 1890, thousands of tiny houses in rows of brick or wood, were built within the alleys. The alley houses drew to them not only the low-income Negro families but white European immigrants. It became evident that the alleys were attracting a criminal element, which found these hidden communities excellent for its purposes. The development of the alley slums so rapidly blighted whole neighborhoods of the city that in 1892 Congress forbade any further construction of housing within the alleys.

Another pertinent development of the Seventies was the activity of a reconstruction agency, known as the Freedmen's Bureau, in connection with a famous old farm on the further side of the Anacostia River. This was the Barry farm, whose broad acres extended from the river shore up the green and fertile slopes which led to the Anacostia plateau. On this tract, which formerly had been entirely devoted to agriculture, the Freedmen's Bureau built hundreds of substantial frame houses, dug wells and divided the improved area into half-acre holdings for sale on easy terms to ex-slaves and their families. This opportunity for good housing with sufficient ground for table gardens was eagerly seized upon by families who were living under intolerable conditions in patchwork shacks within the city. Some few of the original houses still remain on the Barry Farm tract—most have been improved beyond recognition by succeeding generations of the families of the original purchasers. In other cases the old houses have been removed and new ones built on their sites.

The closing years of the nineteenth century brought recognition of the fact that the closing, removal or repair of unsafe and insanitary houses is but one avenue of approach to a city's increasingly complex housing problem.

It became evident that the destruction or rehabilitation of old houses did not benefit the low-income families who were made homeless by such operations. These families, it was found, were forced to find other substandard housing at rents within their financial reach, or to crowd into relatively good housing and hasten its deterioration by over-occupancy.

Studies of this problem by a group of socially-minded Washingtonians resulted in the formation of two private companies which, by limiting their dividends--one company to 5%, the other to 4%--hoped to produce housing which could be rented to families of low wage earners, and thus drain the slums. The two companies built hundreds of rows of two-family flats; they did not achieve their hope of meeting the needs of the lowest income families, but they provided a great service for small families in the lower strata of the middle-income group. Unfortunately, within recent years, the holdings of the larger and more active company were sold to a private speculator, who has been engaged since then in selling off the individual dwellings.

President Theodore Roosevelt was deeply interested in housing conditions in Washington, and appointed a Presidential commission to investigate and to make recommendations. One result of his interest was the enactment by Congress of tighter housing laws. Another result was a concentration of interest in the inhabited alleys. Although construction of alley houses had been stopped in 1892, thousands of the dwellings remained. So for many years the alleys remained the focus of attack by housing students and committees.

An Act signed by President Wilson required the alley houses to be vacated by 1918, but World War I's housing scarcity caused this deadline to go by the board. Aside from this act, the major form of assault on the slums was through regulation of existing housing, and the demolition of the worst.

Not until 1929 was a new approach suggested, and this came in the form of a bill introduced in Congress at the instance of the National Capital Planning Commission. It proposed the establishment of a public agency to acquire and clear slums in Washington blocks which contained alley dwellings. That bill was the subject of repeated committee hearings, but was not immediately enacted. It was re-introduced at successive sessions of Congress, and finally was enacted into law in 1934.

This bill brought into being an agency known as the Alley Dwelling Authority, which now has been renamed the National Capital Housing Authority. That agency was faced with the responsibility of acquiring and clearing slums in approximately 200 city blocks. When the agency began work it was recognized that the alley dwellings constituted only a fraction of the city's total number of substandard houses, but the alleys—as the city's characteristic slums—furnished a logical point of attack.

The Authority began with a capital of $500,000. During its first four years, this capital was increased by allocations of $365,000 in relief funds. With this money the Authority bought and cleared slum sites in 15 blocks, erected housing on five of these sites, non-residential developments on five others, and sold four sites for public or private development.

The work of the Authority attracted wide attention. During this initial stage of its operations, Congress was debating the legislation which in 1937 became the United States Housing Act. This national legislation provided a means by which local housing authorities organized under State laws could secure financial and technical assistance from a central Federal agency for the construction of housing for low-income families. In 1938, the local Authority's act was amended by Congress to enable it to engage in the building of large-scale permanent housing for the low-income part of the population.

From then until the advent of World War II, the work of the local Authority was greatly increased. It developed a program which enabled it to build on vacant sites housing which could be made available to families whom the Authority was to displace from 14 blocks of slums, containing approximately 900 substandard dwellings. As the slums were cleared, new housing was constructed on those sites also.

This program was interrupted by World War II. Emphasis was then shifted from further slum demolition to the construction of additional housing; preferences in the new housing were given to incoming war workers. Next, manpower and material shortages forbade further permanent construction; and the Authority was assigned the task of erecting and managing temporary housing for war workers, in addition to its previous responsibilities.

The war and its immediate aftermath put a quietus on the normal public housing program. Examination of cost limitations and other provisions of the United States Housing Act had disclosed that those provisions were not in accord with the post-war economy; so in 1949 Congress substantially amended the act to enable the attack upon the slums to be resumed.

There was also under consideration an additional approach—this was known as urban redevelopment, strikingly similar to the original program of our local Authority. Under the urban redevelopment provisions of the new law, redevelopment agencies were established under State laws in cities throughout the country, to buy up slum neighborhoods and blighted areas and sell the cleared sites to public and private purchasers, for uses in accordance with approved city plans.

The District of Columbia already had a Redevelopment Land Agency—established by law in 1946; but the Agency was without funds until the national legislation passed.

The Authority is now engaged in providing 4,000 additional dwelling units for low-income families, while the Redevelopment Land Agency is taking steps toward the acquisition and clearance of an extensive slum area in the Southwest section of this city. The Authority and the Land Agency are cooperating with respect to the rehousing of families that will be displaced by both agencies.

The Authority has under management 3,592 permanent low-rent dwellings and 3,900 war housing dwelling units; under construction are 835 low-rent dwellings on three sites, while approximately 3,200 more are in various pre-construction stages. That summary gives you an impression of the present size of the Authority's program.

Now we come to discuss the question of racial occupancy of the housing under the Authority's management. This question of policy has been under consideration by the Authority's Board since 1950. Prior to that time, at several instances in the Authority's history, the Authority was asked why it required that all tenants of a particular property should be members of the same race. To this question, representatives of the Authority usually answered that mono-racial occupancy of housing properties was not only in accordance with community mores, but that public schools and recreational facilities in the District were provided on the basis of separation of the races; and when I say "the races", I mean the white and Negro races, for this is the only distinction of any moment in this connection. Because of pre-existing racial distinctions in neighborhood facilities, the Authority had found—when it was selecting sites for housing construction—that the surrounding neighborhood of a possible site usually was equipped to serve members of one race only, and that the neighborhood was populated by members of that race.

The Authority also was obliged to consider the relative housing needs of the white and Negro populations. It found that, although the Negro population constituted about one-quarter of the city's population, the housing needs of that group were in inverse ratio; that is, Negro low-income families in need of housing outnumbered white families in that category by approximately four to one. So the Authority's low-rent housing programs in the past were geared to that relative need—four dwellings for Negro families to every one built for a white family.

In 1950, however, the Authority's Board announced that it was studying changing local customs in the field of race relations, and recognized that housing was affected by these changes as were other parts of community life. In a resolution adopted on August 10, 1950, the Authority stated that it proposed to continue its study of this matter, "with the hope in mind that the action finally taken will aid the Authority in its basic purpose of providing an adequate supply of proper dwellings for the low-income group in our population without regard to race, religion, or national origin status."

In July 1952, an extensive series of discussions as to future policy resulted in the Board's approval of opening three proposed housing properties to occupancy by low-income families without regard to race. This action was supported by adherents of a gradual approach to the problem; it was not favored by those who felt that the Board should adopt a broad, general statement on open occupancy and work within such a policy.

Of the three housing properties covered by the action taken by the Authority's Board in July 1952, one has been completed and occupied, while the other two are in the planning stage. The one completed property is the Stanton Dwellings, with 348 dwelling units. This housing was constructed in an area where public facilities for both races were available. However, it adjoins the Frederick Douglass Dwellings which the Authority constructed for occupancy by Negro families prior to World War II. The Stanton Dwellings came to completion in the latter months of 1952 and housing therein was offered to eligible applicants without regard to race. When the year ended, the entire property had been accepted from the contractor, and was occupied by 318 Negro families and 30 white families.

On March 26, 1953, the Authority's Board took a further step in policy making with respect to inter-racial occupancy. It then adopted a resolution stating that all properties to be provided by the Authority in its current 4,000-dwelling unit construction program, should be made available to low-income families without distinction as to race. This action produced problems which required further study by the Board. One of these problems was that the policy, as adopted, would result in the operation of several segregated and "open" properties in immediate proximity to one another and under the supervision of a single field management staff. The policy in this respect raised questions as to tenant participation in community activities and as to the availability of public facilities which were not under the Authority's control but which should be available to all families residing in any such area.

Another series of questions was presented through the application of the policy to projects under construction in neighborhoods occupied predominantly by members of one race and where community facilities had been planned and provided on a uni-racial basis. It was recognized also that, on the other hand, some neighborhoods containing segregated public housing, not affected by the resolution, were equipped to provide for families of both races.

The Board studied the effect of its action over a two-month period, and on June 4 adopted a resolution accepting the policy that all permanent low-rent housing now and hereafter provided by the Authority in the District of Columbia shall be available for occupancy without regard to race. The Board reserved to itself the right to determine the timing of the application of the policy with regard to specific properties and projects. At the same meeting the Board voted to open one previously segregated property to non-segregated occupancy without further delay; and to open four additional properties to non-segregated occupancy on September 1 next. Application of the policy was deferred in the instance of two properties then under construction--one located in a neighborhood serving white families only and the other in an area which was equipped only for use by Negroes.

On July 2, the Board instructed the staff to provide it on September 10 with reports and recommendations covering all present and proposed low-rent housing properties not previously affected.

I have now summarized for you, up to the present, the policy determinations by the Board of the Authority respecting open occupancy. These decisions were needed as a basis for staff action effectuating the policy.

Staff work in this regard was begun well in advance of the opening of the Stanton Dwellings, the first property in which the new policy was put into effect. The following were among the principal preparatory steps:

1. Assurance of a racially integrated personnel for the field management staff in charge of the new property. This was more than the mere appointment of technically qualified management representatives of both races; it meant the selection of qualified individuals who could work well with members of both races, for the field management work includes not only collection of rent and attention to repairs, but the adjustment of tenant problems, introduction of tenants to tenant programs and community facilities, and frank discussions with tenants of the Authority's requirements.

2. Training of personnel receiving and processing applications for housing. Such applications, while they may be filed at any of the Authority's field management offices, are processed at the Authority's central headquarters, where the interviews with prospective tenants take place. It is important that the interviewers engaged in assigning tenants to racially integrated properties be fully advised concerning the policy, and that they present to applicants the opportunity for living in such properties accurately and without bias, so that the applicants may arrive at an informed decision. As in the case of the field management staffs, it is equally important that interviewers assigned to this work be qualified temperamentally and intellectually to interpret the program adequately.

3. Preparation of tenants in existing segregated properties for living under open occupancy policy. This phase of the work lies principally in the province of the housing managers and their immediate staffs. Expressed in its simplest terms, the work consists of informing tenants who live in segregated properties as to how the open occupancy policy will function for them and their neighbors. Although some properties are in neighborhoods where nearby private housing is occupied by white and Negro families, the previous identity of the public housing properties as groups of dwellings occupied by families of one race only occasionally gives rise to fantastic rumors spread by the tenants. It is important that these false reports be dealt with firmly and authoritatively. Therefore, the housing managers must be fully informed and must be qualified to discuss the policy effectively with the tenants, both individually and in groups.

4. Preparation of neighborhood organizations and institutions. This is sometimes a difficult and delicate task. It requires effective verbal presentation of the policy to neighborhood organizations of private home owners, tenants and businessmen; to the staffs of settlement houses and of other private and public institutions serving the population of the areas in which the affected properties are located. A considerable part of this work can be done by the housing managers, but in some cases supervisory officials must take a direct part in such presentations. The purpose of this work, of course, is to secure first the understanding of the organizations, and then to win their cooperation in the effectuation of the policy.

In any such program, the information given to one person or to one group must be identical with the statements made to all other persons and groups. Differences inevitably will occur in informal verbal statements, and these differences will be magnified by the individual characteristics of the speakers. Therefore, it is important that there be available to all--and particularly to the tenants affected--official written information which will leave no room for doubt as to meaning.

The Authority acted toward this end in approving for issuance to all tenants of low-rent housing under the Authority's management the following letter, signed by the Executive Director:

"July 2, 1953

"Dear Tenant:

"On June 4 the National Capital Housing Authority decided that its permanent low-rent housing properties should be open to occupancy by low-income families without regard to race.

"This is a change from the Authority's earlier policy. In the past, when housing properties were planned and built, the Authority decided that some would be occupied by white families only and some by Negro families only. A principal reason for this was that public services, such as schools and playgrounds, were being provided by other agencies for one race or the other. So when the Authority planned to build housing in a particular neighborhood, it was comparatively easy to learn whether that neighborhood was equipped to provide for white or Negro tenants and their children.

"Since 1950, however, the Authority has been studying changes in our local customs and in the neighborhoods where our properties have been built. Many neighborhoods can now serve tenants of both races; furthermore, private housing in these neighborhoods is occupied by families of both races.

"The Authority already has put its new policy into effect at the Stanton Dwellings, which were opened last Fall at Alabama Avenue, S.E.; and at the Frederick Douglass Dwellings, which are near this new property.

"On September 1, the Authority will make additional properties available for occupancy by families of both races--some of these are now occupied only by white families, some only by Negro families. In other cases the Authority has decided to delay the operation of the policy while it studies neighborhoods in which schools and playgrounds are now serving one race only. This delay does not mean that the properties concerned are excluded from the effect of the policy. On the contrary, it is the firm intention of the Authority that the open occupancy policy will apply to each and every permanent low-rent housing property under its management.

"As a tenant, you are of course interested in knowing more about families of another race who will live in the same property. You should know that in selecting tenants, the Authority gives preference to the low-income families of deceased and disabled veterans. I am sure you will agree that we should show a special consideration to those who have done so much for all of us. Your housing manager will let you know when the new policy will go into effect in your neighborhood. I hope that you will let your manager know that you will cooperate in making the Authority's policy a real success. "

This letter has been followed by a supplement, in a somewhat less formal vein, addressed to tenants of previously segregated properties where the open occupancy policy is to be applied on September 1 next. This letter, also signed by the Executive Director, reads as follows:

"July 23, 1953

"Dear Tenant:

"You recently received a letter sent to all tenants of the Authority's permanent low-rent housing properties, giving first-hand information about the Authority's decision to open these properties to occupancy by low-income families without regard to race. This new policy soon will go into effect in the property of which you are a tenant, and the Authority wants your understanding and cooperation.

"Another purpose of this letter is to give you facts about the way in which the policy will operate. I think it is necessary that you should have these facts, because the "rumor factory" always works overtime and you already may have heard some strange stories about who your neighbors may be, for the rumor-spreaders never let the truth ruin their stories.

"The Authority is going on with its work of building and managing good housing for low-income families, to be occupied by them until their incomes rise enough to allow them to move to good private housing. The only difference is that, from now on, the Authority will rent housing and apartments in the same property to white and Negro families--instead of renting all of the dwellings in a property to white families only, or to Negro families only, as in the past. We are beginning in neighborhoods where families of both races already are living and where there are public services (schools, playgrounds, etc.) for both races. If you look around your neighborhood, you will see that this is true.

"In the letter you received earlier, you were told that putting the policy into effect would be delayed in some properties which are located in neighborhoods where public services have been provided for one race only, and where the neighborhoods are occupied almost entirely by persons of one race. But this is just a delay, and nothing more.

"The Authority will not allow tenants to transfer from the property where you live to another property in which the application of the policy has been delayed, except for very urgent reasons. In the first place, such transfers are costly to the tenant and the Authority; secondly, after going to the expense of moving, the tenant who transferred because of the new policy would find that the period of delay would soon be ended in the property to which he had moved. So that would be pretty foolish, all around.

"In your neighborhood, as you well know, some next-door neighbors do not speak to one another, regardless of race; others do. That is their business. No one will try to force anyone to have even a speaking acquaintance with his neighbors. However, it has been noted that people who are helpful and courteous neighbors usually seem to be happier than the others.

"You will find that the vacancies which occur in your property will be filled by respectable low-income families of both races. You will find that some of these new neighbors have war records or personal achievements of which they and the city can well be proud. Above all, you will find that living in the same neighborhood with families of another race is not the problem that some would have you believe. In our own city of Washington thousands of families have been living in such neighborhoods for generations, and they see no problem in it.

"I hope that this letter will give you a better understanding of the Authority's plans. Your cooperation will be needed to make these plans succeed."

As this paper is being presented on the day when the second letter is being distributed, it is too early to gauge tenant reactions. There are many phases of this operation which will require long and studious observation by members of our staff before any final determination can be made as to the adequacy of the methods employed. At some time in the future, no doubt, these procedures will be formalized and will become a regular part of the Authority's personnel training materials. At present, utilizing experiences of housing authorities in other cities, modified by our knowledge of the local community, we are moving forward, steadily and studiously, in a determined effort to demonstrate the efficacy of the Authority's policy of open occupancy.

-oOo-

Housing Genl

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: April 20, 1953

SUBJECT: Racial Integration in District of Columbia Public Housing

The following is the full text of a resolution adopted March 26, 1953, by the National Capital Housing Authority:

> The National Capital Housing Authority, operating as a local authority under the District of Columbia Alley Dwelling Act, as amended, and the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, has adhered to its policy of providing public housing for low-income families of all racial groups in accordance with their needs. Like many of the local housing authorities, however, who operate under State enabling legislation, it has elected to allocate dwelling units on the basis of race. As a Federal agency, the NCHA now accepts the responsibility of administering facilities provided by public funds without regard to the race, creed, color, or national origin of the eligible families.
>
> In addition, it is the belief of the NCHA that community mores in the Nation's Capital have developed a trend which means the end to racial segregation. That trend is obvious in the elimination of racial restrictions that are reported almost daily in some phase of our civic life. Nowhere has that trend been more pronounced than in the field of housing.
>
> In consonance with its responsibility as a Federal agency and the change in community mores, the Authority is convinced that its program must be operated on a racially inclusive basis.
>
> In accordance with this opinion, the Authority has today determined that all of its housing projects planned, built and opened for occupancy after September 1, 1951, shall be operated on a racially inclusive basis; i.e., that eligible applicants shall be offered dwellings in these properties without restriction as to race, creed, color, or national origin.

A careful reading of the resolution establishes that the new policy will apply only to low-income, public housing projects "planned, built and opened for occupancy after September 1, 1951". At present, all other projects will continue to be racially segregated.

tl-sr/bwl

Joint Memorandum

Housing. Gen'l

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: July 24, 1953

SUBJECT: Woodbridge, et al. v. The Housing Authority of the City of Evansville, Ind., et al., decided July 6, 1953

Digest:

Federal District Judge enjoins local Housing Authority from segregating Negro tenants in public housing project.

* * * * * * * *

On July 6, 1953, Federal District Judge William E. Steckler handed down his decision in a case in which a group of Negro applicants sought to enjoin the Evansville Housing Authority from continuing its practice of racial segregation in the projects under its jurisdiction. The facts established that the Housing Authority is operating a low-rent housing project, consisting of 191 units and known as Lincoln Gardens, set aside exclusively for occupancy by qualified Negro tenants. In addition, the Housing Authority is engaged in the construction of a federally-aided low-rent housing project, to consist of 172 units, known as Sweetzer Homes, intended exclusively for white occupancy. The plaintiffs, on their own behalf, and on behalf of others similarly situated, commenced this action for a declaratory judgment and injunction, to restrain the state officials from continuing to segregate tenants in its public housing projects on the basis of race.

On the foregoing facts, Judge Steckler found for the plaintiffs. He held that the plaintiffs had been denied consideration for admission to Sweetzer Homes solely because of their race and color, "in violation of rights secured to them by the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States" and in violation of the Federal Civil Rights Statutes. Judge Steckler said that the Housing Authority's refusal to admit Negroes to the Sweetzer Homes project "violates the public policy of the United States and of the State of Indiana and frustrates Congressional intent with respect to the elimination of substandard housing and the provision of a suitable living environment for American families."

190-5-53
261

He said that the Housing Authority is not entitled, under the law, to deny occupancy to eligible applicants, where vacancies exist, solely on the ground of race or color.

In overruling the Authority's argument that the two housing projects provide "separate but equal" facilities and thus come within the Plessy v. Ferguson doctrine, the Court said:

> It is the conclusion of this Court, that the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, decided in 1895, on which defendants heavily rely to sustain their "separate but equal" theory of defense has, by many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in recent years, lost most, if not all, its weight as a guide in cases concerning ownership or occupancy of real property as distinguished from those cases involving public service.

Judge Steckler, therefore, entered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs enjoining the Housing Authority from continuing its practice of segregating tenants on the basis of race in the low-rent public housing projects under its jurisdiction.

tl-sr/bwl
14

Joint Memorandum

Housing

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: July 28, 1953

SUBJECT: Vann, et al. v. Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority

Digest:

U. S. District Court holds that the right to lease property is a civil right protected by the Constitution and by law against discrimination on the basis of race or color and that, where vacancies exist in public housing facilities, a municipal housing authority may not legally deny occupancy to eligible tenants solely on the ground of race or color. The Court allows the housing authority a period not to exceed four months to put this non-discriminatory policy into actual operation.

* * * * * * * *

On January 8, 1953, the Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority adopted a resolution that vacancies in low-income projects operated by it would thenceforth be available to all eligible applicants, without regard to race or color. On January 23, a second resolution deferred implementation of the non-segregation policy pending receipt of a report to be made by a special study committee of the Board of Community Relations of Toledo.

On March 17, 1953, before the special committee completed its study and submitted its report, this suit was commenced by four Negro applicants, on their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated, charging that the Housing Authority had refused to consider their applications for available vacancies in one or more of the three low-rent housing projects occupied exclusively by whites. Thereafter, the special committee of the Board of Community Relations completed its study and submitted its report, endorsing the Housing Authority's non-segregation policy. The Housing Authority thereupon issued a third resolution which directed the implementation of the non-segregation policy "as soon after the adoption of this Resolution" as is deemed "proper and advisable to do so in the light of all the events and circumstances."

190-5-53
261

Judge Frank L. Kloeb, of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, granted the Negro plaintiffs' request for a mandatory injunction, thus placing the Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority under court order to abandon its prior practice of racially segregating its low-rent housing projects. The Judge said:

> You must bear in mind here that we have projects erected with public funds, erected by the Government of the United States, and the Government does not segregate its tax receipts...we are here dealing with property rights as distinguished from the mere right to a public service. The trend of all of the later cases involving property rights is to conform strictly with the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment and of the Civil Rights Statutes.

The Court cited Banks v. San Francisco Housing Authority (reported in our joint memorandum of January 12, 1953) and the New Jersey case, Seawell v. MacWithey (in which the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League filed an amici curiae brief) as authorities for this holding.

The Court allowed the Toledo Housing Authority a four-month period within which to put into actual operation its latest resolution abandoning the policy of racial segregation in its projects.

This case is similar to that of Woodbridge v. Housing Authority of the City of Evansville, Ind., reported in our joint memorandum dated July 24, 1953.

TL-SR:ZL
16

Joint Memorandum

AM

Housing-Gov't Cov

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
343 SOUTH DEARBORN STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: September 16, 1953

SUBJECT: Denver Ordinances Banning Restrictive Covenants

Digest: The Denver City Council has adopted an ordinance denying approval and recording of subdivision plats which contain restrictive covenants

On August 15, 1953, the Denver City Council adopted an ordinance introduced by Councilman Holland, Mapel, and Marranzino, which established a set of requirements for the approval and recording of plats or maps of proposed subdivisions of real property in the city. The ordinance provided, among other things, that the City Council must approve the plat or map of any proposed subdivision and that until such approval is obtained, the plat could not be recorded. In addition to a substantial number of technical requirements, the ordinance provides that no plat shall be approved if restrictive covenants appear on the face of the plat.

The effect of this provision is to bar the application of racial or religious restrictive covenants to any future housing developments in Denver.

The relevant section of the ordinance, Sec. 652.6, reads:

> 652.6 Restrictive Covenants
>
> No restrictive covenants shall appear on the face of the plat.

SR-TL
No. 21

IN THIS ISSUE

★ How to Stay Young—An Expert's Advice

Here's the latest scientific word on a matter that concerns everybody. You get advice on diet, smoking, overwork, things a person can do to stay young and live longer, in this exclusive interview with a leading authority on the process of aging. The findings of Government research disclosed may surprise you. Starts on page 78.

★ Behind the Political Upsets: A Spread in Prices?

This is a look behind the scenes at what bothers farmers and city dwellers most these days—a growing spread between farm and retail prices. Special report, starting on page 100.

★ Money, the Miracle Drug

This is the inside story of what the Government plans to do now to forestall an apparent setback in business. It revolves around injections of money and could affect you soon. Page 116.

CONTENTS

March of News 4
Tomorrow: A Look Ahead 9
Washington Whispers 12
People of the Week 14
If Attacked, U. S. Can Drop A-bombs on Russia in 2 Hours 19
Will Ike Talk to Malenkov? 24
What Wisconsin Election Means 27
Across the U. S.—Optimism 35
One More Hot Spot for U. S. 40
A U. S. Blonde vs. British Lion 45
'Restricted' Area: Does It Pay? 52
More Dry Years Ahead? 55
Budget-Balancing Blues: That Old Tune 67
Worldgram 71
We've Been Asked: About Air Mail for 3 Cents 74
News-Lines for Businessmen 77
Can You Stay Young Longer? Interview With Dr. Nathan W. Schock 78
On a Spot, Ezra Benson Keeps Principles 92
Trend of Business 97
Food: Prices Up, but Who Gains? 100
Labor Week: Jobs and Starting Pay—Off 105
Memo From Tokyo 109
News You Can Use 113
Finance Week: Ike Changes Signals on Money 116
Business Around the World 123
Plus and Minus: Indicators of Business Activity 126
David Lawrence Editorial 128

The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of the local telegraphic and cable news published herein, originated by U. S. News & World Report or obtained from The Associated Press.

Reprinted from

U.S. News & World Report

an independent weekly news magazine

24th & N Streets, N.W.
Washington 7, D.C.

(Further reproduction prohibited)

THE UNITED STATES NEWS

WORLD REPORT

U. S. WEEKLY
Three Titles Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Published weekly at Washington, D. C., Editorial and Executive offices, The United States News Building, 24th & N Streets, N.W., Washington 7, D. C. Subscription rates, delivered prepaid, to United States, its possessions, Canada, Mexico, Central and South America, Spain, Philippines, $5 for one year, $8 for two years, $10 for three years. Postage to other countries $1 a year additional. Entered as second-class matter at the post office Washington, D. C., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Entire contents of this publication copyrighted 1953 by United States News Publishing Corporation. Rights reserved under Pan American Copyright Convention and International Copyright Convention.

BOARD OF EDITORS

DAVID LAWRENCE, Editor
OWEN L. SCOTT, Executive Editor
BEN J. GRANT, L. NOBLE ROBINSON
Assistant Executive Editors
CARSON F. LYMAN
Managing Editor
WALTER HUSTED, General News Editor
DEREK FOX, Art Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

W. B. RAGSDALE, LEONARD WILLIAMS
RICHARD L. TURNER, CHARLES M. PLATT
M. L. RAMSAY, J. FRANK DIGGS
JOHN H. ADAMS, GEORGE W. BOLTON
FRED M. HARMON, GLENN WILLIAMS
ARCHIE ROBINSON, W. C. BRYANT
GEORGE E. JONES
A. S. McLEOD, Chief Economic Unit
PHILIP H. BOLLINGER, CHARLES H. DAVEY
JOHN B. BLEDSOE, THOMAS H. F. HUGHES

Business Editors: New York, GILMORE IDEN
San Francisco, EDWIN J. DRECHSEL

NEWS EDITORS

TURNER ROSE, WILLIAM H. RIEBOLD
THURBER W. CUSHING, FRED A. EMERY
F. W. GAPP, DONALD BECKER
N. KEY HART, JOHN SUTHERLAND
ALBERT J. MEYERS

Assistant News Editors: Barbara Blair, Iva Holland, Lucy Cobb Jones, Joanne Fenton.

Research: Catherine Adams, Barbara Eddy, Mabel S. Groettum, Thomas E. Russell, Donald Smith.

ART DEPARTMENT

H. KLEBANOFF, Director, J. Ernest Beavin, H. C. Richardson, Walter O. Gretschel, E. H. Castens, M. J. Shimp.
Staff Photographers: Thomas J. O'Halloran, Jr., and Mary Dean

LUTHER A DAWSON, Librarian

WORLD STAFF

HOWARD FLIEGER, Directing Editor
JOHN R. FLEMING, Associate Director

CHARLES H. KLINE, Associate Editor, London
CHARLES FOLTZ, JR., European News Editor
CLARK H. GALLOWAY, Inter-American News Editor
PERRY K. SELLON Editor, World Business

REGIONAL EDITORS ABROAD

ROBERT KLEIMAN ..... Western Europe
KURT LACHMANN ..... Central Europe
JOHN D. LAW ..... Southern Europe
JOSEPH FROMM ..... Middle East
ROBERT P. MARTIN ..... Japan and the Far East

BUREAUS: LONDON, PARIS, BONN, ROME, BEIRUT, TOKYO

BUSINESS DEPARTMENT

24th & N Sts., N.W. Washington 7, D. C.
JOHN H. SWEET, Publishing Director
ANTHONY R. GOULD, Business Manager
HAROLD M. WELLS, Executive Secretary
W. L. BRAUER, Treasurer

ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT

30 Rockefeller Plaza New York 20, N. Y.
Tel. Circle 6-3366
H. L. BEHLKE, Director of Advertising

NORMAN O. MICK, Associate Advertising Director
35 East Wacker Drive Chicago 1, Ill.
Tel. Dearborn 2-4042

CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT

435 Parker Avenue Dayton 1, Ohio
W. W. SPURGEON, Manager

PRODUCTION OFFICE

RALPH M. FRANCISCO, Manager
350 Denison Avenue Dayton 1, Ohio
Tel. Melrose 9231

All communications relating to news or editorial matters should be addressed to the Executive Offices, 24th & N Streets, N.W., Washington 7, D. C. Tel. District 7-2900. Communications relating to subscriptions should be addressed to Circulation Department, 435 Parker Avenue, Dayton 1, Ohio

Housing

'RESTRICTED' AREA: DOES IT PAY?

Values Usually Not Affected by Lifting Bars

The value of "restricted" neighborhoods is getting critical attention now that covenants no longer stand up in court.

Some appraisers are arguing that elimination of racial bars to owning property makes it more, not less, attractive.

They are asking for a new look at the old belief that, when minorities move into an "exclusive" area, values decline.

The idea that property values are protected by restricting residential neighborhoods to particular groups is being re-examined. Evidence recently come to light suggests nonsegregated residential areas often add to, rather than subtract from, market values.

These new appraisals are getting increased attention as a result of U. S. Supreme Court decisions that prevent so-called racial covenants from being enforced through lawsuits. The Court reaffirmed its stand on this issue at the year's first session when it refused to hear new arguments on a decision that held that property owners who violate covenants cannot be sued by neighbors.

Investment. Some professional appraisers, in fact, doubt that restrictions add much to property values. Charles Abrams, writing in The Appraisal Journal, says that mixed neighborhoods usually provide a better long-term investment and notes:

"There are hundreds of such sections in America that have gone on securely for generations, and thousands of others could be built if we could ease the housing shortage for minorities. Some have even had the unique quality of moving up from slum status: Greenwich Village and Yorkville in New York City, Georgetown in Washington, and parts of San Francisco are examples."

Mr. Abrams goes on to point out that, in a section of Queens in New York, a housing project was built several years ago and opened to all races and creeds. The project itself created no disturbance in near-by neighborhoods and, indeed, "the land around the project has more than trebled in value." He adds that mortgage lenders in the New York area are coming to regard nondiscriminatory housing developments as sound financial investments.

Similar findings are reported by Belden Morgan, an appraiser in the Los Angeles area. After examining the influx of Negro families into Los Angeles, and their "invasion" of white residential areas, he concludes that property values usually hold up, or advance. He notes in an article for the Society of Residential Appraisers that "panic selling" by white property owners sometimes follows early sales to Negroes, and that prices drop as a result. But "after the first hysterical selling phase passes, prices become stabilized, then gradually increase under pressure of Negro bidding."

Mr. Morgan adds: "People are learning this. Many districts today go through a transitional period in occupancy without any signs of hysteria and without any collapse in prices. The only effect from an economic viewpoint is a broadening and strengthening of the market by virtue of the increased demand."

Better markets. "It usually will be found," Mr. Morgan says, "that sales activity is greater in racially mixed areas, especially in low and moderate price ranges, and that the high effective demand among Negro buyers not only sustains price levels but often increases them." An exception is noted in a high-priced residential area in Los Angeles, where prices fell 10 to 15 per cent after nine Negro families moved in among several hundred white families. But in an adjoining area, where values run from $10,000 to $15,000, prices advanced after the neighborhood became 20 per cent nonwhite.

In view of these developments, real estate appraisers are being asked to revise their opinions of the effect that minority population movements have on property values. Mr. Morgan suggests that an examination of the facts is likely to overcome many prejudices. Actually, a number of real estate developers have discovered a thriving market for homes among minority groups who in recent years have increased their incomes and now can afford better homes.

—Devaney

WORTH MORE IN A 'MIXED' NEIGHBORHOOD?
Some think it would be

There is growing pressure to eliminate discrimination in housing just as there is pressure to end discrimination in employment and other fields. Public housing projects in New York have been nonsegregated for many years. There will be no segregation in future developments in Washington, D. C. In San Francisco a nonsegregation policy has been adopted for all urban redevelopment projects. The basic idea is to put into practice the edicts of the courts that racial covenants are inconsistent with the U. S. Constitution.

Joint Memorandum

Housing

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: October 29, 1953

SUBJECT: Aftermath of United States District Court decision in Vann v. Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority

Digest:

Federal District Court Judge Frank L. Kloeb convenes special session of his court to warn against community incitement with respect to occupancy by non-whites of space in Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority projects.

* * * * * * * *

By joint memoranda dated March 20, 1953, and July 28, 1953, we informed you of (1) the resolution of the Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority to discontinue the practice of assigning eligible families to vacant dwelling units on a racially segregated basis; and (2) the decision of the United States District Court that the right to lease property in a public housing facility is a civil right protected by the Constitution and by law against discrimination on the basis of race or color.

On Saturday October 3, 1953, United States District Judge Frank L. Kloeb, the Judge who rendered the decision in Vann v. Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority, convened a special session of his court. Following are excerpts from Judge Kloeb's remarks at that session:

> THE COURT: Gentlemen, I asked you to come in here this morning voluntarily because I feel that there has been a misunderstanding of the position of the Court with reference to the Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority, of the resolutions that have been passed by it, and of the decree of this Court.
>
> I feel that there has been a misunderstanding, and rather than allow this matter to reach some unfortunate climax, it is my duty to state, in no unmistakable terms, the position of the Court so that no one can say in the future that he did not fully understand.

I disregard rumors and matters that are brought to me by way of complaint, but I have a transcript of a meeting that was held the night before last...

* * * *

The Complaint in this case was filed on March 17, 1953. The complainants were American citizens. They had a right to be in this Court; they came here under every right that any American citizen enjoys. On April 6 an Answer was filed by the Defendant, the Toledo Metropolitan Housing Authority, and three weeks after the Complaint was filed the Court had a hearing in open court. Counsel for the Plaintiffs and counsel for the Defendants argued in this courtroom and the courtroom was open to the public. The public was here, and perhaps you gentlemen were here. I don't know. But everyone had an opportunity to listen in at that hearing who cared to.

* * * *

At any time after the Complaint was filed any interested party had a right to come into this Court by way of motion to be made a party, or had a right to come into this Court by way of motion as a friend of the Court. No such action was taken and the Court proceeded on the basis of Plaintiffs and a Defendant. Their counsel ably and well prepared and filed briefs in accordance with the order of the Court. The Court gave the matter exhaustive study and filed the Opinion on June 23.

* * * *

Now, I want no unfortunate happening here, but I want it distinctly understood that if anything should happen I expect to use every facility of this Court, not only to restrain, but to punish. Statements to the effect that "the program of integration has been promoted by a group of Communists and I have proof of that," that is a frightful statement. It presupposes or suspects or casts the suspicion that not only the action of the TMHA but that even the action of the Court here was promoted by a group of Communists, "and there is proof of that."

The statement that one Negro family had been moved into a public housing project in Chicago, -- I presume in Cicero -- and that "750 policemen have been tied down," -- that is an incendiary statement to make before an audience of citizens under existing conditions.

The statement that he, too, -- I am referring now to another speaker at the meeting, -- "laid responsibility for anything that happens in the laps of the TMHA program," that is a mis-statement of the fact.

The TMHA Board is helpless in this situation. If it rescinded its resolution today it would have no effect whatever on the order of the Court. It has had its day in this Court. After due deliberation the Court arrived at its conclusion. Whatever course TMHA might now take would have no effect on the situation.

Gentlemen, I am sorry that I have had to make this statement, but I feel it incumbent upon me to do so. There have been incendiary statements made, -- I think under a misconstruction, a misunderstanding of the fact and of the position of the Court. I feel it my duty to speak out and to let you folks and to let the public know what the position of the Court is. We are a nation of people who live under law. When we cease to be a nation of law-abiding people, then we have no reason to quarrel with Communist ideology or Communist practice. We are going to continue to live as a nation under law so long as we remain a republic, and any judge of any court who lacks the moral fortitude and stamina to state the position of the court fearlessly and to act fearlessly is not worthy of the robe that he wears.

I hope, gentlemen, that if there have been untoward effects of statements that have been made, that they will be promptly corrected.

The Court is watching this situation carefully and every arm of the Court will be utilized to see that the law is observed.

I want to thank you gentlemen for coming here.

****

On October 5, 1953, the first three Negro families moved into public housing projects in Toledo on a non-segregated basis and on October 13, 1953, a fourth family followed suit, all without incident.

This is a graphic example of a situation in which law enforcement authorities, including the courts, took clear, courageous and un-ambiguous action to uphold the legal and constitutional rights of American citizens and to impress the troublemakers in the community that violence and incidents would not be tolerated.

TL-SR:ZL
32

Joint Memorandum

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE · NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
212 FIFTH AVENUE · NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Housing - Rest Cov

TO: CRC Offices
ADL Regional Offices
AJC Area Offices

FROM: Sol Rabkin and Theodore Leskes

DATE: October 29, 1953

SUBJECT: Housing Authority of Denver v. Ford, et al., decided October 7, 1953.

Digest: District Court of Denver, Colorado voids Racial Restrictive Covenants in action by Housing Authority to quiet title to land of authority's project.

On October 7, 1953, a Denver District Court, consisting of Judges Joseph J. Walsh, Robert W. Steele, Edward C. Day and Robert H. McWilliams, ruled in favor of the Denver Housing Authority, the plaintiff, in a suit brought to quiet title to a group of lots in Denver. The lots involved in the action had been subject to restrictive covenants, providing that the property should not be sold to or occupied by persons of African descent, and other forms of racial, religious and ethnological restrictions.

The Denver Housing Authority brought the action because its Westwood Homes project was located on the property and some of the apartments in this project were either occupied or about to be occupied by Negroes. The complaint asked the court to quiet the plaintiff's title to the land, claiming that the thirty-year old racial restrictive covenants were "contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America".

After hearing testimony and argument in the matter, the four-judge court ruled that the Denver Housing Authority was the owner in fee simple of the property in question and enjoined all the defendants from claiming any right, title or interest in the property in question and enjoined all the defendants from claiming any right, title or interest in the property in the future and from disturbing the plaintiff or those claiming under it in the quiet and peaceful possession and enjoyment of the land. The effect of this ruling is to void all the racial, religious and ethnological restrictions incorporated in the old deeds to the property in question.

SR-TL
31

10-53

Housing

National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing
35 West 32 Street, Room 1216
New York 1, N. Y.

1953 or 1954 ?

SOME FACTS ON SEGREGATED HOUSING IN AMERICA

Discrimination and segregation in housing because of race, creed or national origin is basic to the race relations problem in America.

The cities of the United States are essentially communities of neighborhoods. Their populations are served by our social, educational and religious institutions on a neighborhood basis. Thus segregated neighborhoods compel most other forms of segregation--in employment, in education, in churches, in health and welfare services. Harlem's public schools are as segregated as Atlanta's. A church in Chicago's black belt can be interdenominational but never interracial.

Today the American ghetto is the chief cause of racial friction in our land. Most of the reported racial violence in 1952 was rooted in the efforts of minority Americans to escape from ghetto living.

Segregation builds walls that divide our citizens. Children on both sides of the wall develop fears and resentments that last a lifetime. Segregation corrupts the country's richest resource: people. It undermines the social and economic health of our cities. The overcrowding caused by segregated neighborhoods breed blight and slums, spawning crime, juvenile delinquency, poor health and high mortality. From the financial point of view, slums cost more in municipal health, welfare, police and fire services, and because of their dilapidation yield lower taxes to the cities.

City planning cannot be effective within the confines of segregated communities. In some cities needed improvements are not made for fear of disturbing the racial status quo. In others, where slum clearance becomes Negro clearance, for every acre cleared two are scarred by ghetto blight.

Housing discrimination is a major barrier to the development of a total housing program for the nation. As long as close to 25,000,000 minority Americans are limited in the right to buy or rent shelter in accordance with their means, a sound American housing program is impossible of achievement.

The American ghetto is the visible symbol of democracy's failure for all the peoples of the world. It provides fuel for enemy propaganda. It bewilders and frightens friends who look to us for leadership in democratic living. For self interest as well as conscience this contradiction between our country's democratic creed and its practices should be removed.

HOUSING CONDITIONS OF NONWHITES

Negroes and other minority Americans occupy housing that is substantially poorer in quality than housing of other Americans. The 1950 census indicates that the dilapidation of nonwhite housing outside rural areas was five times as high for Negroes as it was for whites, and the proportion of homes lacking piped running water, private flush toilet, bathtub or shower was more than twice as high.

Overcrowding was more than four times as high among nonwhite renting families as for whites. This represented an actual increase of overcrowding during the decade 1940-1950 from 20% to 23% for nonwhites while for whites there was a decrease. The nonwhite population increased at a faster rate than the number of occupied dwelling units (15% against 10%), whereas the reverse was true for whites (14% against 23%).

These figures, which are culled from "Housing of the Nonwhite Population 1940-1950" published by the Housing and Home Finance Agency, would undoubtedly be far more extreme if data for Mexican Americans and Puerto Ricans were available.

THE NONWHITE HOUSING DOLLAR

The housing dollar in the nonwhite hand does not command as much or as good housing as that same dollar in the white hand. This is an inevitable result of a local housing market differentiated on the basis of race. Thus, nonwhites have been excluded from better housing and newly developed neighborhoods and restricted to the poorer housing largely in crowded, blighted areas. They have received less housing value, less home financing and less favorable home financing terms. At the same time Negroes have more money to pay for decent housing than ever before. In the decade 1940-1950 their average incomes trebled. More than 300,000 Negro families can afford to pay monthly rents of $70.00 or more. Nevertheless, they are still largely confined to slum or near slum neighborhoods.

INMIGRATION AND SEGREGATION

Minority families are moving to the cities with increasing rapidity. In the period 1940-1950 the urban nonwhite population increased by 3,000,000 of which more than 1,700,000 migrated to cities outside the South. Following are the twelve largest cities of the country with the percentage increase of nonwhites between 1940 and 1950: New York City, 62.4; Chicago, 80.5; Philadelphia, 49.5; Los Angeles, 116.2; Detroit, 101.4; Baltimore, 35.9; Cleveland, 76.1; St. Louis, 41.4; Boston, 68.6; San Francisco, 155.9; Pittsburgh, 32.9; and Milwaukee, 144.7.

At the same time, living space in urban areas is being closed to minority families, both in the center and at the periphery of the cities. New construction is almost completely closed to nonwhites. Of the 9,000,000 new homes built between 1935 and 1950 less than 1% were open to Negroes. No more than 60,000 of the 2,900,000 homes benefitting from FHA insurance during the period 1935-1952 were available to nonwhites, and the majority of these units were built in segregated neighborhoods in the Southeast. Many newly built northern suburbs are as closed to Negroes as the curfew towns of the South. In Long Island William Levitt built a city of 25,000 homes for whites only. He is building another in Levittown, Pennsylvania. These closed cities are typical of communities which are springing up all over the country.

Deplorable slums are often concentrated in the center of American cities. Included among them are areas occupied predominantly by nonwhite families. These are frequently chosen for federally assisted slum clearance projects, although they are often not the only parts of the city ripe for clearance. By March 31, 1953, data concerning the characteristics of 92 project areas approved by the Division of Slum Clearance and Urban Redevelopment were available. 64.6% of all the families scheduled for displacement were nonwhite. While a little more than half of the displaced minority families appear to be eligible on an income basis for public housing, family composition, stability factors, and the recent drastic cuts in federal appropriations for public housing will prevent many of them from achieving public housing occupancy. Very few of the ineligible displaced minority families will have enough means to occupy the new privately constructed redevelopment housing even where nondiscrimination laws exist. Thus, most displaced minority families will find their only habitation in existing ghettoes or so-called "transition areas." 53% of these areas are being redeveloped for residential purposes. At least nine which have racially mixed occupancy at the present time will be redeveloped on a segregated basis. At least three--the Medical Center project in Birmingham; the St. Louis Memorial Plaza project and theWaverly Place project in Baltimore--constitute straight Negro clearance. Several others involve space swapping.

Finally, our new defense cities are developing on a segregated basis. Housing for critical defense areas is programmed separately for whites and nonwhites. Less than 6% of the 97,215 units programmed as of February, 1953 are for nonwhite occupancy and no more than 1.5% of those constructed have been made available to nonwhite families.

Failure to provide housing for minority families in this instance has grave impact on employment patterns since without housing facilities, nonwhite workers are frequently not available for employment. In other instances defense industries use the housing shortage as an excuse for discrimination.

THE CHALLENGE CAN BE MET

As bad as the picture is, there are growing signs that people all over the country are ready to work for elimination of the American ghetto. The press, magazines, radio andtelevision are giving the subject increasing attention. LIFE Magazine for October 27, 1952 featured a story of a mixed neighborhood calling it "the new kind of melting pot, where in addition to immigrant meeting American, Negro meets white." RED BOOK for September, 1952 calls segregation in housing the number one race relations problem for America. The April, 1953 issue of HOUSE AND HOME, a Luce publication, ran a feature story on the big untapped market for housing among nonwhites. Within the last two years there have been several national network programs on the subject and local radio and television stations have begun to devote increasing time to segregation in housing. Organizations are producing quantities of educational material on the subject. The National Committee alone has distributed more than 200,000 pieces of literature.

On the local level government agencies have increasingly passed laws, ordinances or resolutions relating to discrimination in public and publicly assisted housing. There are now more than thirty pieces of legislation on the books.

The most important single fact in this picture is that thousands of American families are living harmoniously in interracial neighborhoods all over the country. These communities exist in such unlikely places as Houston, Texas and Washington, D. C. Integrated public housing has gone way beyond the experimental stage. Twenty-seven thousand Negro families are living in completely integrated projects. It is significant also that whereas in 1942 there were only 21 integrated Federal public housing projects, in 1953 there were 268. Finally, pioneer builders have erected private housing developments which are successfully operating on a mixed basis. Queensview in Long Island, Flamingo Courts in Philadelphia and Stuyvesant Town in New York City are proving that middle class interracial communities are practical and profitable.

Researchers andreporters are using this evidence to prove that property values are not affected by the mixture of races;* that violence is not the inevitable result of attempts to democratize housing; that crime, low health rates and a host of other anti-social activities flow from slums rather than the people who live in them.

Even the banks and real estate boards are showing some signs of interest. In June, 1949, a National Association of Real Estate Boards news release urged that local boards "undertake to provide better housing for Negro families." In December, 1949, the Mortgage Banker announced, "It is the policy of the Mortgage Bankers Association to make loans available to all people without distinction as to race, color or creed within the limitation of sound lending practices." In January, 1951, NAREB released its revised Code of Ethics eliminating the reference to "race or nationality" from Article 34 which had formerly stated: "A realtor should not be instrumental in introducing into any neighborhood a character of property or occupancy, members of any race or nationality, or any individuals whose presence will clearly be detrimental to property values in the neighborhood." A prominent official of New York City's largest Savings Bank has expressed the feeling that on the basis of his bank's salutary experience with financing interracial housing developments, such developments may well be the answer to the complicated relocation problem for redevelopment projects.

These changes in attitude have been reflected in recent government activity. The Federal National Mortgage Association recently allocated 17,000,000 dollars for cooperative housing available to nonwhites. The Federal Housing Administration has doubled its racial relations staff, and is scheduling conferences with representatives of mortgage interests to see whether more credit can be made available to minority families. Although still vastly inadequate, this is a radical change from FHA's former opposition to insuring mortgages for Negro home buyers.

The country is ready for a change.

*The most recent publications are Values in Transition Areas: Some New Concepts, by Belden Morgan, in THE REVIEW of the Society of Residential Appraisers, March 1952; Effects of Nonwhite Purchases on Market Prices of Residences, by Luigi M. Laurenti, in THE APPRAISAL JOURNAL, July 1952; Non White Housing, in HOUSE AND HOME, April 1953.

October 5, 1953

Joint Memorandum

Housing

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
386 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE
OF B'NAI B'RITH
327 NORTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO, ILL.
212 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

TO: CRC Offices
AJC Area Offices
ADL Regional Offices

FROM: Theodore Leskes and Sol Rabkin

DATE: November 27, 1953

SUBJECT: California Supreme Court refuses to review Banks v. San Francisco Housing Authority

Digest:

Supreme Court of California refuses to review decisions of lower state courts that racial segregation in public housing projects violates United States Constitution and the laws and public policy of the State of California.

* * * * * * * *

On October 22, 1953, the Supreme Court of the State of California refused to review the decision of the Superior Court, announced on November 14, 1953, in Banks v. S. F. Housing Authority (see our joint memorandum dated January 12, 1952), that it was unconstitutional and unlawful for the San Francisco Housing Authority to exclude Negro applicants from low-rent housing developments. The Superior Court decision was upheld by the State District Court of Appeal on August 26, 1953, and the Housing Authority sought review by the State Supreme Court.

Following the refusal of the highest state court to hear the case, the Housing Authority voted 3 to 2 to appeal the case to the United States Supreme Court. The Housing Authority has already spent more than $5,000 in its legal fight to reverse Superior Court Judge Cronin's decision ordering the Housing Authority to admit Negroes to its public housing projects on the same basis and under the same rules, regulations and preferences as other applicants. During these appeals, the Housing Authority has maintained its policy of segregation because the court's injunction may not be enforced until the final decision in the case.

Before the United States Supreme Court will agree to consider the appeal, the Housing Authority will have to establish that a federal constitutional question is necessarily involved.

TL-SR:ZL
38

190-5-53
261

REFERENCES:

Clark, Tom and Philip Perlman, PREJUDICE AND PROPERTY. Washington, DC: Public Affairs Press, 1948. 104pp

Brief against racial covenants, traces history of the device, analysis in light of constitutional rights and nation's responsibilities.

Long, Herman H. and Charles S. Johnson, PEOPLE V. PROPERTY. Nashville: Fisk, 1947. 107pp. Study of racial restrictive covenants in Chicago and St. Louis

Abrams, Charles, "Race Bias in Housing." American Civil Liberties Union, 1947. Discusses discrimination in public and private housing, the restrictive covenant.

THE DELTA SIGMA THETA BOOKMOBILE travels from King Street Branch (West Georgia Regional Library) to serve Carroll, Douglas, Haralson, and Heard Counties.

SUPERFINE COLOR CARDS BY STEIN CRAFTSMEN, ATLANTA, GA.

PLACE
STAMP
HERE

POST CARD

ADDRESS

BRANCH LIBRARY
DELTA SIGMA THETA
BOOKMOBILE
KING STREET BRANCH
(WEST GEORGIA REGIONAL LIBRARY)
CARROLLTON, GEORGIA

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON RACE RELATIONS
32 WEST RANDOLPH ST. CHICAGO 1 ILLINOIS
RETURN POSTAGE GUARANTEED

HEMMED IN

ABC's of Race Restrictive Housing Covenants

HEMMED IN

CLEAR, SIMPLE STORY of the effect of the current housing shortage and restrictive covenants on race relations.

•

ATTRACTIVELY ILLUSTRATED. New ideas on "what to do" about housing.

•

REVIEWED in manuscript by mayors' and citizens' race relations committees, trade unions, housing agencies, minority organizations.

". . . a good job . . . idea of occupancy standards as a 'substitute' for racial restrictions . . . excellent . . ."

Catherine Bauer, author of Modern Housing

•

Free imprint of name of your organization on 1,000 or more copies. Mats of illustrations free for your own promotion.

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON RACE RELATIONS
32 WEST RANDOLPH STREET CHICAGO 1, ILLINOIS

(See back of folder for other Council publications)

ORDER YOUR COPIES NOW

10¢ each

50 copies, $3.50 — 100 copies, $5.00

(Express collect)

"The best statement . . . to date"—

George Schermer, director, City of Detroit Interracial Committee

•

". . . manuscript appeals to us very much"—

G. H. Reavis, assistant superintendent Cincinnati Public Schools

•

"Fills our need for elementary information on restrictive covenants . . . preliminary order . . . 1,000 copies"—

Gloster B. Current, executive secretary, Detroit NAACP

Publications of

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON RACE RELATIONS
32 WEST RANDOLPH STREET
CHICAGO 1, ILLINOIS

(Discounts on bulk orders)

RACE RIOTS AREN'T NECESSARY.....10c
By Alfred McClung Lee, co-author of "Race Riot". Published in cooperation with Public Affairs Committee.

NEGRO PLATFORM WORKERS.....25c
Story of Negro workers in transit systems of three large cities. Object lessons in "how" and "how not" to integrate minority workers.

THE POLICE AND MINORITY GROUPS.....50c
Frank answers to problems in law enforcement involving minorities. By Police Chief Theo E. Hall, Wilmette, Ill., and Joseph E. Weckler. Published by International City Managers' Association.

American Council Manual Series

COMMUNITY RELATIONS MANUAL.....25c
What to do about community problems in intergroup relations.

MANUAL FOR OFFICIAL COMMITTEES.....25c
What official race relations committees can do. Valuable both to committees and their constituents.

Published Reports

SENIORITY AND THE NEGRO WORKER.....10c
How seniority and reconversion affect minority groups in steel, auto, meat packing and other industries. By Robert C. Weaver.

STATE FEPC — WHAT THE PEOPLE SAY.....15c
Digest of the "for" and "against" testimony on New York's FEPC bill.

INSTITUTE ON RACE RELATIONS AND COMMUNITY ORGANIZATION 25c
Proceedings of Institute at University of Chicago attended by race relations field workers. Discussions of practical problems and solutions.

Hommy

OPEN OCCUPANCY HOUSING

Problems and potentials—
Some approaches by builders,
Government officials, and
Housing and race relations experts.

Hommy

OPEN OCCUPANCY HOUSING

Problems and potentials—
Some approaches by builders,
Government officials, and
Housing and race relations experts.

This article was first published in the April 1955 issue of house+home

The professional information contained in this reprint from HOUSE & HOME is not to be construed as the magazine's endorsement or recommendation of any product, service, company or individual.

Copyright Time Inc., 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N. Y.

New problem for housers:

Robert Dowling

OPEN OCCUPANCY

Negro groups say segregation's day is past, press for compulsory integration. Industry argues it reflects US beliefs, hopes to ease tensions by volume output

Roy Stevens

William J. Levitt

Thurgood Marshall

The three men pictured here have been protagonists in the early rounds of a still developing legal drama that could profoundly affect the future of homebuilding.

Their tricornered fight over segregation in FHA and VA-aided housing lines up like this:

Robert Dowling of New York, president of the Natl. Urban League (and himself a big-scale city and suburban developer and investor), has been putting the heat on President Eisenhower to promulgate stringent federal regulations outlawing FHA and VA backing for housing where there is racial discrimination.

Thurgood Marshall, attorney for the Natl. Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), who won the celebrated Supreme Court decision barring school segregation last year, has now gone to the legal mat with Big Builder William J. Levitt. The accusation: by refusing to sell homes to Negroes in his big Levittown, Pa. development, Levitt has been illegally "discriminating" against Negroes. District Judge William H. Kirkpatrick dismissed the suit last month for lack of jurisdiction, but NAACP announced it will appeal. The judge observed: "Neither FHA nor VA [whose chiefs were codefendants] has been charged by Congress with the duty of preventing discrimination in the sales of housing project properties. What the plaintiffs are saying in effect is that these agencies ought to be charged with that duty. That is something that can only be done by Congress."

If either the Urban League or the NAACP can make its point stick, open occupancy apparently will become the price of federal aid to private housing. That would mean simply that FHA and VA would either 1) fade out of the picture or 2) become a strong spur to total integration.

Unwelcome cloak of social reform

Neither prospect is pleasant for the building fraternity to contemplate. "We can't set up a homebuilding project as a social reform," former NAHB President Dick Hughes has explained. "Nearly complete integration [is something] for which our society is not ready."

The industry's ability to sell the million-plus new homes a year that means prosperity hinges on the low down payments made possible by FHA and VA. Abandoning them is so unthinkable it is not even discussed.

So industry's answer to the clamor for open occupancy has been: build more housing. Says NAHB's Hughes: "Pressure on the courts to decree and the Congress to legislate housing for the minority groups will be reduced in direct proportion to the number of houses that we make available for them under the same financial terms and conditions as we provide housing for whites."

Advocates of moderation have an important adherent in the person of HHFAdministrator Albert M. Cole. Last fall, he warned the Urban League that federal compulsion of open occupancy "would just make everything much tougher and increase the abrasive factors that slow down the real—the permanent—progress to integration." On another occasion, Cole gave a different Negro group metaphorical suggestion that moving too far too fast may do Negro chances for housing more harm than good. Said he: "It is our responsibility . . . that we do not allow the tree of racial freedom to be chopped down out of zeal and impatience to harvest its fruit. . . . The federal government has a responsibility for leadership; it cannot sit by and merely wait for things to be different. . . . But the government cannot act for the states or communities nor force them into action they are not persuaded they should take." On a third occasion, the government's top housing man declared: "This is not primarily a federal problem. . . . The real problem lies with the citizens—the businessmen, the builders, the lenders, the realtors and the civic leaders and officials. . . ." Cole coupled this observation with a plea he has been making repeatedly: "The blockade of custom and code, of unjustified economic fears, must be breached, and the Negro family must be given access to good homes and good neighborhoods. No citizen can afford to let this minority housing pressure continue to build up to the explosion point, as it already has in some instances."

Background of covenants

Attacks on FHA's role in segregation are more understandable in the light of history. At its outset in 1934, FHA adopted racial homogeneity as a requirement for top valuations. "If a neighborhood is to retain stability," said an early underwriting manual, "it is necessary that properties shall continue to be occupied by the same social and racial classes." Accordingly, FHA encouraged the spread of racial covenants. The policy persisted until about 1948, when the US Supreme Court held enforcement of racial covenants in court was illegal. By the time (Dec. 2, 1949) FHA agreed not to insure mortgages on properties subject to racial covenants, argue advocates of integration, a peculiarly permanent lot of damage had been done. "If any federal agency has con-

(continued on p. 6)

. . . And the occupancy that is open (to Negroes): transition neighborhoods

Side by side on the postwar subdivision street pictured, right, a friendly knot of white and Negro children could be found at play most any sunny day last month.

Neither the scene nor the trim little houses in it look particularly startling. For every Cicero and Trumbull Park where the spread of nonwhite population has led to ugly violence, there are scores of peaceful neighborhoods in transition. If the story of this one in San Antonio, Tex. is typical in outline, its details whisper times are changing in the South, too.

Bremer & Wilhelm's Eastlawn Addition started life in 1949 as an all-white development of $5,800 to $8,500 bungalows (from two-bedrooms in 626 sq. ft. to three-bedrooms in 832 sq. ft.). GI buyers snapped them up. Eastlawn, however, lay directly east of San Antonio's main Negro housing district. In those postwar years, little attention was being paid to the increasing ability of nonwhites to pay for better dwellings. In mid-1952, the first Negro buyer jumped the half mile of brush separating Eastlawn from the colored slums, bought a home in the project. Others followed. Today, about 3% of the 200 homes in the tract are still in white hands. Some of the white owners left are selling out, but others say they will stick to their homes. "I'm staying right where I am," one owner told HOUSE & HOME's correspondent. "The Negroes don't bother me and I don't bother them."

Realty Broker Pat Murphy, who has arranged 50 or more sales in the changing neighborhood, says some original buyers have told him they have better neighbors now. One of the first Negro occupants, Mrs. O. L. Hayes, a school cafeteria worker whose husband is a cook at a top San Antonio restaurant, agrees the transition has been devoid of bitterness or tensions. One reason, of course, may be that most white owners have been able to sell out at a profit. Mrs. Hayes paid $8,400 for her house. For a year, the going price ranged from $7,800 to $8,200 for the smaller houses; now it has dropped. Explains Murphy: "The Negroes I've dealt with . . . had no place to go. At the time they could pay more money than whites would for these homes."

The original white owners—civil service workers, policemen, railroad men, skilled labor—have now been largely supplanted by Negro civil service workers, ministers, railway postal clerks and skilled labor. Typically, most wives also work. Farm & Home Savings & Loan Assn., which made many of the original loans, still holds many of the loans. Farm & Home's L. A. Lawlor says the mortgage payment record of the new owners has been as good as in any similar white area. And nobody, driving down the street, can tell which homes are white-occupied and which are not. Except for one thing: for-sale signs.

The story of Eastlawn Addition is the story of the bulk of the Negro housing market. It will continue to be so. Existing homes are, of course, the bulk of the US housing market. Some 9 million US households move every year; only 1¼ million of them move into new units. The old house offers more space, closer in, cheaper than the new house. All these items suit the Negro market.

It is a phenomenon of segregated housing that you can add to the supply without building anything. Sometimes, as in Baltimore, this results in "great surges" providing huge (over 20,000 since 1945, statisticians figure) additions to the available supply of Negro units.

Photo: Elicson

. . . a friendly knot of white and Negro children . . .

These dynamics of blockbusting, sadly, tend to inhibit the market for new open occupancy housing. For the building industry three goals create a triple difficulty: expand Negro areas of existing housing, build new homes, create open-occupancy housing. Each works against the need for the others.

FORBIDDEN NEIGHBORS—a study of prejudice in housing.
By Charles Abrams. Harper & Bros., New York. $5

FORBIDDEN NEIGHBORS

Lawyer Charles Abrams' new book attacks bias in housing and proposes a controversial plan to move against it

Charles Abrams, the brilliant and irrepressible thinker and writer on housing matters, has flung another firecracker at the homebuilding industry.

He is in his best form—thorough, opinionated, argumentative and provocative—as he takes off after racial discrimination in housing, and blames the industry for fostering much of it.

Before he gets through the preface to his 404-page book, Lawyer Abrams is well on his controversial way. He notes that race bias, long a familiar ingredient of the South's culture, spread North in a major way exactly as the US Negro population migrated from the South during World War II and afterwards. Then:

"The most serious danger, however, lay in the political sphere. In the transition from a private to a welfare economy, private housing operations were now being implemented by public power, public credit and public subsidy. And there was the danger that the prejudices of the private market would not only be adapted and supported by the government but be backed by its coercive power. From 1935 to 1950, in fact, prejudice and public power were already well advanced toward an alliance which was challenging the fundamental values of the American system."

Abrams accuses FHA of adopting a racial policy "that could well have been culled from the Nuremberg laws"—relying, he implies, on realtor theories that property values thus were best protected. It was not until the Supreme Court struck down protective covenants in 1948 and again in 1950, he says, that FHA modified its attitude. FHA's policy, he says, had the support of thousands of realtors "bound to the antiracial code of ethics of NAREB and its thousands of allied builders." He calls the result evil of "a particularly enduring character"—thousands of new racially segregated neighborhoods.

In other exhaustively documented chapters, Abrams ticks over the gamut of segregation topics—the so-called philosophical "fallacies," the role of savings and loan associations, dynamitings and violence in Miami, Chicago, Detroit and elsewhere, the new Puerto Rican problem, discrimination in hotels and resorts. On p. 224, he even includes a rundown of segregation methods—some of which, he says, still work. Realist as well as reformer, Abrams also makes these observations:

▶ In the South, any pattern but segregation "is impractical for the time being. . . . Integration cannot be achieved overnight."

▶ Public housing has demonstrated (in the North) that integrated occupancy can work. In 1953, some 33,000 Negro families were living next door to or across the hall from white neighbors. They constituted a quarter of all the Negroes in public housing. Projects with 6 to 30% Negro occupancy, however, were "generally the successful ones." They provided security of numbers for the minority, no affront to the sense of white majority.

▶ "Outlawing discrimination [by federal action] in one- and two-family houses would probably be premature in most places and invite difficulties. But it might be ripe in large-scale private developments where the right of an owner to control the type of inhabitants is no longer considered coextensive with the right of a homeowner to regulate the conduct of his guests."

▶ "Segregation will continue when there is segregation in neighborhoods—in fact the latter may even become the new vehicle for achieving indirectly the school segregation which the courts have outlawed directly."

▶ Negro advancement groups can easily stir up so much antagonism by pressing for reform legislation too soon that battles are lost which might have been won later. Moreover, "tyranny is as unjust when practiced by the minority in the enactment of laws in which the majority does not yet believe as it is when the majority imposes laws by which the minority is to be oppressed. If protection of civil rights must depend on authoritative procedures or

(continued on p. 8)

Photos: Walter Daran

Poland-born Charles Abrams was on the Gold Coast of Africa when a cable caught up with him telling of his appointment as New York State rent control administrator. He was abroad at the behest of the United Nations to do a job he has not yet been called on to do for his adopted country: write a housing program.

Writing about housing programs is a longtime preoccupation of 54-year-old Lawyer Abrams. A former columnist for the New York Post, and a frequent contributor to national magazines, he is the author of The Future of Housing (1946) and Revolution in Land (1939). Critic Lewis Mumford called the latter "the first really important book on the subject since Henry George." Before his new state job took up all his time, Abrams also found time to lecture frequently at the New School for Social Research, the University of Pennsylvania, City College of New York and MIT. He has not had time lately for his hobby: chess.

Abrams' UN work began with a monumental study of the world's urban land problems, published in 1953. In the last 13 months, he has traveled 13,000 miles on two UN missions. The first one took him to Hongkong, Japan and India where he conducted a housing seminar for experts from 16 nations. The second took him not only to Africa, but also to England for a ten-day conference on African problems and then to Turkey where he was instrumental in persuading the government to set up a new school of architecture which the University of Pennsylvania will help run.

H&H Staff Photo

Photos below: Lawrence S. Williams

Bucks County, Pa. gets its first

INTERRACIAL SUBDIVISION

Quaker-sponsored project expects to become half Negro-, half-white occupied. Chief problem: finding enough white customers

Three-bedroom, one-bath house (1,400 sq. ft.) sells for $11,990, has $12,000 FHA valuation

"Our problem—we don't want to kid anybody—is finding white purchasers."

The speaker was Morris Milgram, executive vice president of Concord Park Homes, a handsome development of 140 ranch houses about a mile from the northern edge of Philadelphia. It is the first postwar interracial subdivision in suburban Bucks County, where, in common with most other metropolitan suburbs, the postwar housing boom has heretofore been all-white.

Milgram was talking to four couples—two Negro, two white—who are among Concord Park's first customers. They were having a get-acquainted tea last month, as new neighbors will, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Grier, first to move into what its sponsors as well as many a housing official hope may become a history-making project—a demonstration to the nation and the world that ethnic segregation is a dying shibboleth and that whites and Negroes can live together as well as anybody else.

If the friendly rapport so visible at the Grier's afternoon tea

(continued on p. 7)

LOCATION: Trevose, Pa.
CONCORD PARK HOMES, INC., builder
WILLIAM H. ROBERTS, architect
BEATRICE WEST, color stylist
A. C. LAMPEL, sales agent

Open-occupancy problem: hardest of all to finance tributed to segregation, it has been FHA," according to HHFA's Dr. Frank S. Horne.

Currently, open-occupancy advocates are complaining that campaigns for "more Negro housing" threaten to substitute the polished ghetto for the sordid one that is now the lamentable lot of most urban minorities. In mid-March, for example, the Natl. Committee Against Discrimination in Housing staged a one-day conference in Washington to raise an outcry along these lines. Said the conference invitations: "We believe that housing is increasingly becoming today's No. 1 civil rights problem. Since the Supreme Court decisions outlawing segregation in schools certain groups . . . have intensified their campaign for racially defined neighborhoods. If they are successful in establishing this 'shiny new ghetto' pattern throughout the country, American children will continue to go to segregated schools and the significance of the education decisions will have been nullified."

Yet even Dr. Robert Weaver, who is chairman of the Committee Against Discrimination in Housing and a passionate believer in open occupancy, has admitted "the cards are heavily stacked against you" when a builder tries to build some. Not only is it the hardest kind of minority housing to finance, but the vastly greater Negro pressure for new homes can easily lead an open-occupancy project to become almost entirely Negro-occupied. Thus it should surprise no one that the Urban League's able housing director, Reginald Johnson, recently told a conference of FHA race relations officers: "Segregated housing is growing at a faster rate than open-occupancy housing." At the same time, Johnson also reported "signs of growth in the open-occupancy field, too." Some of the evidence:

▶ In New York, which in 1950 adopted state legislation barring racial discrimination in publicly-aided housing, eight Negro families have moved into the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.'s hitherto all-white Stuyvesant Town apartment project on Manhattan's lower East side.

▶ When a Negro Air Force officer, Capt. Virgil A. Daniels, hesitated to move into an apartment he had rented in Waverly, Iowa because of "racial pressure," town residents held a meeting to present Daniels with the keys to the apartment, handed him a petition signed by all residents of the building urging him to become their neighbor. (He did.)

▶ Some 15% of the nation's public housing projects have become racially integrated, but there have been instances of white families moving out when Negroes were admitted. (Integration, as a rule, is harder to accomplish among lower-class families than in the higher income brackets, experts seem to agree, harder still between minority groups.)

▶ In Portland, Ore. a 16-unit FHA Sec. 213 "sale" cooperative recently opened on an interracial basis—ten nonwhite and six white families. FHA Commissioner Norman Mason, who has pledged aid from his agency for open-occupancy projects, has called the Willamette Heights co-op "unique in US home construction." Its two- and three-bedroom homes sold for $7,771 and $8,357, respectively. Down payments averaged $350 with 40-year amortization at $47 and $49 monthly. Mason said he hoped Willamette Heights would "point the way for other similar projects across the nation."

▶ In Milpitas, Calif. where the Ford Motor Co. has just moved its northern California auto and truck assembly plant, plans were announced for a 268-unit open-occupancy housing development. Builder Joe Kaufmann, former head of a meat packing firm in nearby San Jose, found at first that he faced an extra $500 in financing charges because occupancy would not be limited to whites. He persuaded the CIO United Auto Workers union to go to bat for him. (President Walter Reuther is a leading backer of racial integration in housing and some 225 Negro workers were involved in Ford's shift to Milpitas from Richmond, 50 mi. away.) The upshot was that Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. agreed to provide mortgage money at its prevailing San Francisco rate. At this point, a Los Angeles insurance firm offered to go 1½ points better. The houses will sell for $9,500 and $10,500.

One of the few

The Milpitas project apparently will become northern California's second interracial development. Corona Park at Stockton, which started 4½ years ago with a majority of white families, is now a mixed community including Mexican-Americans, Negroes, Filipinos and Orientals. At Sacramento, Sun-River Homes Inc. is planning an interracial project of about 200 homes, but the state real estate commission has limited it to accepting reservations, rather than making sales, because it still has unsolved water problems. About a quarter of the 53 families who have signed up for its $9,995 contemporary homes are white.

Despite such symptoms of social change, what skimpy evidence there is suggests that integration in housing is still too controversial for wide acceptance. In a recent survey, for instance, the social research laboratory of New York City College's sociology department found that 75% of suburban Westchester County residents felt better housing should be made available to nonwhites, but 55% were reluctant to have a nonwhite family next door.

It is perhaps with this in mind that FHA's race relations advisers—themselves Negroes—were given this program last fall by their boss, Dr. George Snowden: 1) concentrate on getting Negro families admitted into existing areas before trying to promote construction of new open-occupancy homes, 2) strive for the maximum amount of building of equal facilities needed by Negroes, 3) work with builders in groups and individually to push new developments free from restrictions.

Spreading transition areas

In the realm of Dr. Snowden's first priority—getting minorities into existing houses in more areas—there are ample signs of progress. In recent years, more and more experts have put forth studies debunking the once widely held notion that property values slide in transition neighborhoods. Now, evidence is accumulating that some city neighborhoods—at least in the North—are ready to accept inmigrant Negroes without fuss.

Herman C. Plummer, Portland, Ore.'s biggest Negro realty broker, told a recent conference there: "Individual nonwhite families are moving with more frequency into established integrated neighborhoods. We are getting an increased number of listings from individual white sellers in established neighborhoods. Some come to us because of an honest effort to aid integration, but some come because they want to get a premium price from Negroes."

Davis McEntire, professor of social welfare at the University of California, interviewed white residents of 16 representative neighborhoods in the San Francisco area where a few minority families had recently moved in. He found the newcomers were generally accepted without fuss or ceremony. "There is no particular antagonism," he commented, "nor is there any particular sympathy for them. They tend to be treated in the same anonymous or impersonal way as any other newcomers in a big city neighborhood." Of the 549 people McEntire and his students questioned, "more than 70% described their initial attitudes toward the newcomers as either favorable or neutral," he reported. "Of the 30% who were unhappy with the new arrivals, the majority said that, nevertheless, they did not consider moving away." Some 150 of the 549 had moved into their present homes after at least one of the nonwhite families.

McEntire did not try to measure changes in property values. But he asked home owners what they thought had happened. Their opinions:

Values increased	19.0%
No change	55.0%
Declined	12.5%
Did not know	13.5%

"Nearly three-quarters of the people," says McEntire, "did not spontaneously mention in the course of a 20-min. discussion about their neighborhoods that nonwhites had moved in." When the interviewers raised the subject, they were startled to learn that one-quarter of the people did not even know there were Negroes or other minority families nearby.

A similar survey was conducted in Denver under the direction of Charles Gray, a real estate man. It showed that 45% of the 101 home owners who listed their houses for sale "by owner only" in a recent Sunday paper were willing to sell to anyone with the money regardless of race. Five years ago, only 15% had expressed the same willingness.

(continued on p. 8)

Interracial board of directors—six white, three Negro—directs Concord Park project. In a huddle outside a Quaker meeting house (l to r): Dr. Nathaniel Duff, Philadelphia physician who is vice president; George E. Otto, president; Morris Milgram, executive vice president.

". . . open occupancy requires the best house in the area . . ."

was a good indication, the prospects for Concord Park's success seem bright. Getting it that way, however, had been no easy job.

Milgram, 38, a second generation member of the Philadelphia building firm of Smelo-Milgram, Inc., had long been concerned over the trend toward leaving city housing to minorities while the suburbs become the exclusive domain of whites. (Up to the end of 1953, he figures, only 347 new homes in the nine-county metropolitan Philadelphia area had been open to nonwhite buyers.) In 1952, Milgram began organizing a pool of risk capital to back open occupancy. He was joined by George E. Otto, 51, of Newtown, a leader in the Society of Friends and head of a construction company with 20 years' experience in community development. They formed a corporation of more than 65 persons, mostly Quakers, who oversubscribed the $100,000 capital stock issue. Recalls Otto: "I had a wonderful time giving Friends and friends the opportunity of putting their money where beliefs were."

Late in 1953, the corporation bought 50 acres of truck farm land. The site, as sites for minority housing should be, was picked to avoid community antagonism. Otto calls it "an enclave to itself." It is bounded chiefly by the Pennsylvania Turnpike, the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, open land, a cemetery, and a small group of homes that has been Negro-occupied for two decades. "We've had some mild kicks from people in Trevose," Otto says, "but they've been much milder than if the development was across the street from them." Adds Milgram: "It was the only site I could find in Bucks County on a bus line"—which means commuting should be easy.

Even with a site so carefully chosen to minimize community resistance, Concord Park spent 17 months and $17,000 finding mortgage money. Some lending institutions which had promised financing backed out or were downright cold to the idea. Finally, Eastern Mortgage Service Co. agreed to warehouse a dozen loans, says Milgram. Bowery Savings Bank took 29. And People's Natl. Bank & Trust Co. of Langhorne (Pa.) provided funds "so we could go ahead." Some of the financing, says Milgram, was at par, some for a "modest" discount of 1½ points. Best of all, he has 100% VA loans (but with $600 closing costs).

Where would the buyers come from? The market pressure of home-seeking Negroes is so great that the usual fate of so-called "open occupancy" projects is to wind up nearly 100% Negro. Otto and Milgram were determined this should not happen to Concord Park. Milgram arranged for a study by students at Haverford College. Some 12,000 questionnaires were mailed. The 1,000 returns have not yet been fully analyzed, but Milgram reports some fascinating correlations between general social-political beliefs and acceptability of integrated housing:

- Among names on so-called "liberal" lists, 66% said they believe in open occupancy and would move into such a tract if convenient.
- Among members of "peace organizations" (i.e. pacifists), over 90% endorsed open occupancy.
- Among people picked from suburban telephone books, only 15% believed in open occupancy. Only 10% of phone book names inside Philadelphia endorse it. A third of Levittowners were for it.
- White-collar people are perhaps twice as ready as blue-collar people to accept open occupancy.

One upshot was that 25,000 pieces of direct mail advertising were sent to members of church and civic groups on record in favor of democracy in housing. But the result, so far, has been only one sale to a white family.

George Grier, the first to move in, says some potential buyers have been "inhibited by fear." One prospect, he recalls, was a former coworker at Franklin Institute (where Grier is a research psychologist). "He was afraid he would cut himself off from pay raises and promotions if he moved into Concord Park—because his superiors were pretty conservative people." Another prospect, says Grier, was willing to move in, but his Spanish wife was timid about it and so the deal fell through. Milgram recalls a lawyer who declined to move in "because he would lose face with his clients."

The problem, philosophizes Milgram, is that "nobody [among whites] wants to be first" in open occupancy. Fortunately, there are a few exceptions. As first-buyer Grier told a group at the project's dedication last November, he and his wife, Eunice, moved in "to put our beliefs into action." Another white buyer, Francis Saxton, a 28-year-old arc welder who recently completed a hitch as a Navy patrol bomber crewman, tells why he picked Concord Park in these terms: "I like the section. It's a beautiful home. I like the neighbors." His wife, Emma, who is a receptionist for a Negro physician who is on the project's board of directors, explains her views on integration this way: "It doesn't make any difference at all."

Most of Concord Park's white buyers have been attracted by personal contact and word of mouth. There are enough of them so Otto and Milgram think they have won their battle to produce an interracial tract. In the first section of 29 homes, currently nearing completion, occupancy will be about 55% white. In all, some 73 buyers have put down deposits. There would be more, but adverse credit reports have taken a "very heavy" toll of would-be Negro purchasers.

If hard work and determination can put open occupancy over, Concord Park will click. But its problems have been formidable enough to suggest that few builders elsewhere are likely to tackle open occupancy subdivisions now. The extra headaches mean less profit, though to dedicated men like George Otto and Morris Milgram this consideration is obviously not paramount.

As William Stansbury, FHA race relations adviser in Philadelphia, observed recently: "Open occupancy requires the best house in the area, almost." And as Milgram said at the Griers' tea: "The average builder is a pretty harassed person. It's hard enough without having to fight for a mixed development. You can't build open occupancy if you're purely interested in making money. But it will get easier as more of it is built."

Floor plan offers big living area, small bedrooms

Early customers at Griers' tea: Francis Saxton, Charles Henry, hostess Eunice Grier. Henry, 47, is a machine operator. He moved from a Philadelphia block which has lately ended a transition from white to Negro occupied.

President Otto (second from right) told customers that to be ready for integration, you must "have the internal fortitude to accept slights without losing your head, without retaliating in kind."

H & H staff photos

 (continued from p. 4)

Charles Abrams offers plan to promote racial integration laws passed by a few to gain their ends, it simply violates one important right to achieve another. It is a weak prop on which to rest the fight for minority rights."

Where the industry will quarrel most with Abrams' ideas is his 12-point "program for action." Yet it is a program which housers ought not to dismiss lightly. Abrams, who is currently New York State rent control boss, has sometimes been called one of the brains behind public housing. His seven most important proposals:

1. A long-range housing program including 500,000 public housing units a year—some for sale and some for rent.

2. Adequate protection by law of the opportunity to secure shelter. Tread lightly here, Abrams advises.

3. An executive policy prohibiting discrimination by FHA, VA and other housing agencies and their beneficiaries. FHA, argues Abrams, "has a 'duty' to ban discrimination by lenders."

4. Reduction of slum clearance because there is a shortage of housing in the big cities with the slums. Redevelopment projects should not be approved where builders fail to offer adequate relocation housing to displaced minorities, he contends.

5. Adequate land for housing open to minorities. Abrams advocates laws forbidding home buyers to qualify for membership in neighborhood clubs — one of the still workable methods of racial exclusion. US cities, like many in Europe, should buy up reserve land and make it available for minorities. HHFA and its subordinate agencies, he argues, should ban urban renewal aid to areas where obsolete political boundaries bar intelligent land planning that includes more space for minorities.

6. Since private lenders "cannot be relied on to meet any portion of the need" for financing, the government should step in with a big direct lending program at interest rates from zero to the "going government rate." FNMA should make more direct loans to open-occupancy co-ops.

7. Improved rehabilitation programs and local laws preventing overcrowding. Abrams sees rehabilitation as a "limited tool," but concedes it is important because "the current supply will be the main source of shelter for minorities for a long time."

MINORITY GROUPS MAY GET HOUSING

Home Builders Are Pressing Plans to Promote Activity in Neglected Field

Minority headline of the year from the New York Times.

(continued from p. 6)

Integration v. segregation: thoughts from theorists

One question that usually pops up when opening up more existing housing to minorities is under discussion is this: "What about the landlord who says he is afraid to take in Negroes or Puerto Ricans for fear they'll bring in all their relatives to live with them and throw garbage into the street?" Executive Director Lester Granger of the Urban League thinks such an alibi reflects "lamentable ignorance." He explains: "The landlord who says, 'Now I'll take in Puerto Ricans' frequently drops all his standards and turns to exploitation." The real answer, says Granger, is to stick to high standards of tenant selection.

This line of argument, indeed, leads to the reasoning that one reason why racial discrimination exists is, paradoxically, that the nation's white populace has not learned to discriminate.

In its mission of preaching against racial discrimination and for individual discrimination, the Urban League sometimes likens itself to the "State Dept.," whereas the NAACP is the "War Dept." A philosophical comment embedded in a recent research report for the Urban League of Westchester (N.Y.) County reflects some of this peaceful approach. Segregation, wrote Harold Goldblatt, "is no wall of Jericho to be tumbled by a single, decisive and heroic event. It is, instead, a system of opinions and attitudes and activities [which will] require continuous effort to dissolve."

The comment of a Negro housewife who recently moved into an open-occupancy project near Philadelphia reveals much of the same thinking. "The law cannot play a decisive part in it," she mused. "Integration will come when people want it."

For Additional Copies Write To

NATIONAL COMMITTEE AGAINST DISCRIMINATION IN HOUSING
35 WEST 32nd STREET
NEW YORK 1, N. Y.

Human Rel Ed

Human Relations in World Crisis

THE 9th ANNUAL

Institute of Race Relations

JUNE 30--JULY 12, 1952

Held under the Auspices of the

RACE RELATIONS DEPARTMENT

of the

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION

Board of Home Missions, Congregational Christian Churches

FISK UNIVERSITY

Nashville, Tennessee

HUMAN RELATIONS IN WORLD CRISIS

The terrible acceleration of change in America has produced a new conceptual focus for human relations. We find ourselves concerned only incidentally with the relations between racial and cultural groups, and basically with the realistic process of democracy. Race, in short, has become far more than a domestic issue. It has become the scale on which democracy is being weighed in a world that is being forced relentlessly to choose between ideologies. If democracy is to prove its case on the world scene, there is need for more than words. Some genuine acts of democratic conviction at home, resolving the long-delayed issues of civil rights and equal opportunity, would do more to strengthen our cause than the threat of superior weapons. The time of proof has come, and race is the touchstone.

Thus, it is upon HUMAN RELATIONS IN WORLD CRISIS that the NINTH ANNUAL RACE RELATIONS INSTITUTE directs its concern. It is within this focus that the Institute continues its efforts to train community leaders to meet the ever-demanding problems of intergroup relations at home, to develop new orientations and understandings, and learn techniques for effecting constructive change. We invite your attention to this challenge and opportunity which the Institute affords. The fellowship of men of good will and congeniality; the experience of working with thoughtful citizens representing varying segments of community leadership from 33 states, north and south; and the advice of top authorities in the field will be yours to share and enjoy.

With 30 of the nation's most notable authorities serving as lecturers and consultants, the Institute gives direction to an understanding of race relations in the inclusive context of: 1) the psychological and sociological backgrounds of group antagonism, 2) the phenomena of race and culture in world prespective, and 3) civil rights, as they concern employment, education, public accommodations, health, and housing. In an atmosphere conducive to freedom of inquiry, the intensive two weeks' Institute provides the basic information, through seminar presentations, and gives opportunity for analysis and discussion in probing clinic sessions. With workable data for interpreting and directing the course of human relations, Institute members prepare themselves to intelligently understand and affect vital issues of intergroup relations.

EDWIN A. LAHEY (Chicago Daily News)—"Quietly . . . with no tub thumping and no demagogery, the ripples of influence from this annual meeting lap steadily against the rocks of prejudice and discrimination in America."

SAVILLE R. DAVIS (The Christian Science Monitor)—"This is a quiet scene, and yet it is the center of the world for a moment. The question of whether the free world deserves to remain free is being measured here."

Course of Study

LECTURE AND SEMINAR PRESENTATIONS

First Week: June 30 - July 5

BASIC ORIENTATION TO HUMAN RELATIONS IN WORLD CRISIS

Race, Politics, and World Democracy

American Racial and Religious Minorities

Sociological and Psychological Bases of Human Relations

Civil Rights and American Public Policy

Religion as a Force in Human Relations

Second Week: July 6-12

PROBLEM AREAS IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS

Racial Segregation in American Institutions

The Community and Human Relations

New Areas in Racial Integration

Labor, Industry, and Full Utilization

Housing and Racial Integration

Equalization of Educational Opportunity

The Role of the Church in Racial Integration

National Defense and Racial Integration

LECTURES, CONSULTANTS, AND CLINIC LEADERS*

ADAMS, INEZ, Visiting Lecturer in Sociology and Anthropology, Fisk University

BOLLINGER, HIEL D., Secretary, Department of College and University Religious Life, Board of Education of The Methodist Church

CAMPBELL, DONALD T., Professor of Psychology, University of Chicago

COMMAGER, HENRY STEELE, Professor of History, Columbia University

EVANS, JAMES C., Civilian Assistant, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense

GINSBURGH, A. ROBERT, Brigadier General, U. S. Air Force

HOPE, JOHN II, Industrial Relations Specialist, Race Relations Department, American Missionary Association

IVEY, JOHN E., JR., Director, Southern Regional Education Board

JOHNSON, CHARLES S., President, Fisk University; Director, Race Relations Institute, American Missionary Association

JOHNSON, ROBERT, Cornell Field Research Staff, Elmira, New York

KINCHELOE, SAMUEL C., Professor of Religion, the Chicago Theological Seminary

LANE, FRAYSER T., Director, Community Service Program, the Chicago Urban League, Chicago, Illinois

LAWSON, EDWARD, Division of Human Rights, United Nations

LONG, HERMAN H., Director, Race Relations Department, American Missionary Association

MADISON, JAMES A., National Recreation Association

MARSHALL, THURGOOD, Special Council, N. A. A. C. P., Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc.

MCCULLOCH, MARGARET C., Community Organization Advisor, Memphis, Tennessee

MCCUTCHEON, ROGER P., Dean, The Graduate School, Tulane University

MILLER, ALEXANDER, Southern Director, Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'Rith

MILLER, LOREN, Attorney-at-Law, Los Angeles, California

MURAVCHIK, EMANUEL, National Field Director, Jewish Labor Committee

MURRAY, PAULI, Attorney at Law, New York, New York

NELSON, D. D., Public Relations Officer, Department of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

ROSEN, A. ABBOT, Director, Chicago Executive Offices, Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'Rith

ROSEN, ALEX, Cornell Field Research Staff, Elmira, New York

SIEGEL, MORRIS, Africa Unit, Division of Economic Stability and Development, Department of Economic Affairs, United Nations

SILVERMAN, WILLIAM B., Rabbi, Vine Street Temple, Nashville, Tennessee

THOMAS, JULIUS A., Director, Department of Industrial Relations, National Urban League

THOMPSON, CHARLES H., Dean, Graduate School, Howard University

WEAVER, GALEN, Religion and Race, Race Relations Department, American Missionary Association

WEAVER, GEORGE L-P., Assistant to the Administrator, Reconstruction Finance Corporation

---

*Partial list.

CLINICS

The clinics are the workshops of the Institute. Specialists in the field serve as resource persons, giving guidance for constructive social action. Members of the Institute submit their community ailments for clinical analysis—to have them broken down into manageable parts. Systematic investigation weighs the technical instruments and institutional assets against the problems presented. Tackling specific stumbling blocks, the clinics compare notes on various methods and strategies, examine the latest researches and evaluate action programs in terms of positive results. Recommendations and findings come out of direct experience and scientific study. What are the most promising procedures for implementing human rights is the clinics' immediate concern.

The following clinics are scheduled for this summer's Institute:

1. Industry and Labor Management
2. Community Organization
3. Church and Race

OTHER RESOURCES AVAILABLE TO MEMBERS OF THE INSTITUTE

The University Library for purposes of study and research.

A special Institute library of current published and unpublished materials.

Special exhibits, audio-visual aids and planned social activities in cooperation with the University Summer School.

ACADEMIC CREDIT

Full participation in the Institute carries three-semester hours of credit. Arrangement for credit should be made with the Registrar of the University.

FEES

Tuition	$25.00
Room and Board	50.00
Institute Packet and Summary	5.00
	$80.00*

*Non-resident fee, $30.00.

CHARLES S. JOHNSON

Director of the Annual Institute

HERMAN H. LONG

Director of the Race Relations Department

For Further Information

Address

ROBERT C. SWEET

Education and Promotion

RACE RELATIONS DEPARTMENT

AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION

FISK UNIVERSITY

NASHVILLE 8, TENNESSEE

RACE RELATIONS DEPARTMENT
American Missionary Association
Congregational Christian Churches
Fisk University
Nashville, Tennessee

For Immediate Release

9TH ANNUAL RACE RELATIONS INSTITUTE AT FISK UNIVERSITY

JUNE 30-JULY 12; FOCUS UPON HUMAN RELATIONS IN WORLD CRISIS

Nashville, Tennessee (June 11)... Announcement of the 9th Annual Race Relations Institute, conducted by the Race Relations Department of the American Missionary Association at Fisk University, indicates that the dates for these important sessions will be June 30 through July 12. The concern for these two-week seminar and workshop discussions will be "Human Relations in World Crisis," in which 100 community leaders from 33 states and 37 lecture-consultants will participate.

In citing the keynote challenge, the announcement states: "If democracy is to prove its case on the world scene, there is need for more than words. Some genuine acts of democratic conviction at home, resolving the long-delayed issues of civil rights and equal opportunity, would do more to strengthen our cause than the threat of superior weapons. The time of proof has come, and race is the touchstone."

For the discussions on the world situation involving minority problems, Brigadier General Robert A. Ginsburg, United States Air Force; Professor Henry Steele Commager, Professor of History, Columbia University; Edward Lawson and Morris Siegel, both of the United States Department of State, will serve as resource personnel. And for matters concerning racial integration in the armed forces and services, James C. Evans, Civilian Assistant in the Office of Defense; Lt. Dennis Nelson, Public Relations Officer for the Navy; and James A. Madison of the National Recreations Association will be the primary discussants.

On domestic issues and problems of race relations, the partial list of consultants includes: Thurgood Marshall, Special Counsel for the NAACP; Julius Thomas, Director of Industrial Relations for the National Urban League; Dr. John Ivey, Director of the Southern Regional Educational Board; Attorney Loren Miller, Los Angeles civil rights lawyer; Emanuel Muravchik, National Field Director of the Jewish Labor Committee; A. Abbot Rosen, Chicago Director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith; Dr. Charles H. Thompson, Dean of the Graduate School, Howard University; Dr. Roger P. McCutcheon, Dean, Tulane University Graduate School; and George L-P Weaver, Assistant to the Administrator of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The Institute was organized nine years ago to meet national leadership needs in World War II, arising from the increase in local racial tensions and threats of community disorder. Over this period more than 1200 leaders in business, labor, church, school and social welfare fields have shared ideas and techniques for handling local problems. As changes occur domestically, and as the world ideological conflict heightens, the Institute continues in its purpose "to train community leaders to meet the ever-demanding problems of intergroup relations at home, to develop new orientations and understandings, and learn techniques for effecting constructive change."

.....

AGENCIES WORKING IN THE FIELD OF INTERGROUP EDUCATION

American Council on Education
1785 Mass. Ave NW
Washington 6, D C

American Jewish Committee
386 4th Ave.
New York 16, N Y

Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith
212 Fifth Ave.
New York 10, N Y

Commission on Community Interrelations
American Jewish Congress
15 E. 84th St.
New York, N Y

Committee on Education, Training and Research in Race Relations
1126 E. Fifty-Ninth Street
Chicago 37, Ill.

Community Relations Service
386 4th Ave.
New York, N Y

Governor's Commission on Human Rights
State Capitol (Particularly, "Helping Children Learn to Respect Madison, Wis. Human Rights. Illustrations of Good Practice from the Madison Public Schools")

Mass. Dept. of Education
Office of Fair Educational Practices Act
18 Tremont St.
Boston, Mass.

National Conference of Christiansand Jews
381 4th Ave. (Particularly, series of Intergroup Education Pamphlets)
New York 16, N Y

SUMMER WORKSHOP

OF THE CENTER FOR HUMAN RELATIONS STUDIES

JUNE 30 TO AUGUST 8, 1952
THE NEW LINCOLN SCHOOL
NEW YORK, N. Y.

1952 HUMAN RELATIONS WORKSHOP

The National Defense Program has brought about an increase of tension throughout the United States as communities have become engulfed in the insecurities attendant on moving populations and a revised plan for living. Dealing with these tensions and the underlying intergroup prejudices, which thrive in periods of stress, is the central theme of the 1952 program of the Center for Human Relations Studies.

The Workshop in Intergroup Understanding is conducted at The New Lincoln School, where, in a most permissive atmosphere, teachers, administrators, and research majors have the opportunity to participate in an experience of their own planning for six weeks of intensive professional training. This adventure in learning in human relations provides seven core emphases under the guidance of outstanding leaders from the field of human relations.

These emphases include the arts, child development, group dynamics, sociological foundations, clinical examination of materials and research direction. In addition, an array of outstanding consultants provide assistance when specialized needs and interests have developed.

This variety of offerings coupled with the backgrounds and interests of the membership plus the rich resources of the metropolitan area combine to make the experience rich and broad.

SMALL-GROUP AND INDIVIDUAL ACTIVITIES

Although a regular schedule of all-workshop and section meetings is provided, the workshop is planned, with student help, to encourage small-group and individual work. It is assumed students are mature and professional in their outlook and in their ability to make wise decisions with such help as they may seek from the staff. A typical morning's activities might include: assembly with a guest speaker or a program by small workshop groups, regularly scheduled section meetings, and lunch with a period of relaxation.

The afternoon session is unscheduled, allowing freedom for a variety of individual pursuits: creative art activity, independent reading or research, trips that supplement the workshop training, review of audio-visual materials, interviews with resource persons, conferences with staff members or with other students, skill clinics. No student should enroll for the workshop whose afternoons are not free for him to participate in these activities.

THE WORKSHOP LUNCHEON

Luncheon, an opportunity to relax together, is another important part of the workshop experience. All students who become members of the workshop are expected to lunch with the group. The cost is approximately $15.00 for the six-week period. Lunch tickets will be available for purchase at the workshop, 9:30 A.M. on July 1.

ENROLLMENT AND CREDITS

For 1952 enrollment will be limited to approximately 130 students. Seven sections – little workshops – are offered to provide special emphasis on aspects of human relations. The Center is offering as two of the sections of the workshop a Clinical Seminar in Human Relations Education, equivalent to the seminar offered during the regular academic year (399.13,14), and the Thesis Seminar in Human Relations (399.3,4) for doctoral candidates. These sections are planned primarily for majors in human relations. Registration is limited and permission to register must be obtained from Professor Giles or Professor Dodson.

The workshop sections provide credit either in human relations or in the department whose number is in parentheses. Each section carries eight points, and students must take a course for the full six weeks and the full allowance of credits.

WORKSHOP SECTIONS

Dan W. Dodson, Co-ordinator

Edward Williams, Assistant to the Co-ordinator

199.21 (125.249). CHILD DEVELOPMENT AND HUMAN RELATIONS EDUCATION. Visiting Associate Professor Partridge.

299.26. SOCIOLOGICAL BASES AND TECHNIQUES IN HUMAN RELATIONS EDUCATION. Visiting Assistant Professor Clark.

299.35. ART IN THE SCHOOL COMMUNITY. Mr. Montgomery.

299.37. GROUP DYNAMICS IN HUMAN RELATIONS. Dr. Beauchamp.

299.43. HUMAN RELATIONS CURRICULUM CONSTRUCTION FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS. Mrs. Hayden.

399.13, 14. CLINICAL SEMINAR IN HUMAN RELATIONS EDUCATION. Professor Giles.

399.3, 4. THESIS SEMINAR IN HUMAN RELATIONS. Professor Dodson.

The sections do not meet Group A requirements. If such credit is desired, the student should obtain a substitution blank with the signature of chairman of the department concerned before registering. Sections meet Group B requirements only if signatures are obtained from general and special advisers.

LEADERS AND CONSULTANTS

Dan W. Dodson, A.B., A.M., Ph.D.
Co-ordinator of Summer Workshop; Professor of Education, New York University; Director of Curriculum and Research, Center for Human Relations Studies; Managing Editor of The Journal of Educational Sociology; Executive Director of the Mayor's Committee on Unity, New York City, 1944-1948.

Mary Beauchamp, Ph.D.
Assistant Director of the Center for Field Services, Department of Administration and Supervision, School of Education, New York University; formerly curriculum consultant, Pasadena and Minneapolis.

Kenneth M. Clark, A.B., M.S., Ph.D.
Visiting Assistant Professor of Education, New York University; Assistant Professor of Social Psychology, College of the City of New York; Associate Director, North Side Center for Child Development.

Harry H. Giles, A.B., A.M., Ph.D.
Director of the Center for Human Relations Studies, New York Universiey; Professor of Education, New York University; formerly Director of the Bureau for Intercultural Education; specialist in curriculum and methods.

Miriam A. Hayden, A.B., A.M.
Lecturer on Education, New York University; Curriculum consultant, staff member, Center for Human Relations Studies; Co-ordinator, Somerville, New Jersey, Workshop in Human Relations; formerly staff member, workshops in Kansas City and Pasadena; developing curriculum for undergraduate course in human relations, Pratt Institute.

Chandler Montgomery, A.B., A.M.
Instructor in Education, New York University; formerly Adviser in Creative Activities, Public Schools of Winnetka, Illinois.

Deborah Cannon Partridge, B.S., A.M., Ed.D.
Visiting Associate Professor of Education, New York University; Assistant Professor of Education, Queens College, Flushing, New York; Secretary, Advisory Committee, Mid-Century White House Conference on Children and Youth.

Edward Williams, A.M.
Assistant to the Co-ordinator of the Summer Workshop; Director of Physical Education, The New Lincoln School; formerly Director of Activities, 110th Street Community Center.

LOCATION: The New Lincoln School, Fifth Avenue at 110th Street, overlooking Central Park, provides excellent classroom and conference-room space, art workshops, and recreational facilities.

FEES: Tuition: $15.50 per point, plus $3.00 University fee and $5.00 laboratory fee for each section of the Workshop, payable to New York University.

For Further Information Write:

CENTER FOR HUMAN RELATIONS STUDIES
Attention: Viola M. Falmetta
157 West 13th Street, New York 11, N. Y.

INTERSESSION 1952

299.50. ADMINISTRATIVE LEADERSHIP IN HUMAN RELATIONS. Admission only by permission of the instructor. Enrollment limited to 25 students. Professor Giles. 30 hours: 3 points.

9.30-12.30 (June 16-27)

An intensive workshop in human relations administration; primarily for administrators. Meets at the Center for Human Relations Studies, 157 West 13th Street, New York 11, N. Y.

199.1,2. INTRODUCTION TO HUMAN RELATIONS. Professor Dodson and Mrs. Hayden. 60 hours: 4 points.

9.30-12.30 (June 2-27)

An attempt is made to bring the latest findings of such fields as child development, anthropology, sociology, economics, and psychology to bear on human relations problems. Those problems of a more serious nature in our society, particularly those representing intergroup conflict, receive major emphasis. Techniques for dealing with intergroup tension are also surveyed. Meets in the School of Education, Washington Square, New York 3, N. Y.

Human Rel Ed

TULANE UNIVERSITY

Announces

A series of lectures on

Human Relations In the United States

Fall and Winter, 1951 - 1952

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE

Evening Division

A course in the

ADULT LECTURE-DISCUSSION SERIES

"Our nation today is confronted with enemies who would destroy us and those democratic values which are a source of inspiration and hope for mankind.

"To meet this challenge we must use all our human and natural resources. To do so requires that we be skilled in the art of human relations. Our enemies would divide and weaken us. They cannot be permitted to succeed.

"With the knowledge that sound human and inter-group relations are vital to democracy we shall devote ourselves to promote and to develop the kind of community where people can live and work in peace and harmony."

De Lesseps S. Morrison
Mayor of New Orleans

HUMAN RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

A course in the ADULT LECTURE-DISCUSSION SERIES OF UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, evening division of TULANE UNIVERSITY. Eleven lectures, one and a half hour each week. Tuition, $9.00. Directed by Professor William L. Kolb with the assistance of Mr. Brant Coopersmith.

A Statement of Purpose

Most of us are interested in human and inter-group relations because of our attachment to the Judeo-Christian ethic of Brotherhood and to traditional American values. However, as leaders in our congregations, as teachers and as leaders in commerce and organizational life we often find a need for more facts concerning this vital and complex subject.

This course is designed to provide pertinent facts from an ever growing body of knowledge in the field of human relations to those who share the conviction that good human relations are essential to a good society.

Below are some of the items to be discussed in the course:

Peoples of the United States, cultural, religious and biological differences.

Legal, economic and cultural disabilities and discrimination.

Psychology of prejudice; prejudice as a cultural matter.

Pressures for prejudice; personality and prejudice; frustration and prejudice; the authoritarian personality.

Struggle for power and public policy; the political arena; law as a weapon; American Japanese and World War II; the hate groups and their leaders; prejudice and power.

The South, a regional case.

Social action groups and human relations; how New Orleans' organizations meet their problems.

Professor Kolb

PROFESSOR WILLIAM L. KOLB, professor and head of the Department of Sociology, Newcomb College. Professor Kolb received his educational training at Wisconsin University and the University of Miami. He was formerly a member of the faculty at Wisconsin University and Oklahoma A. and M.

MR. BRANT COOPERSMITH, local regional director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'rith, one of the principle human relations agencies in the United States. He has had wide practical experience in the field and has lectured frequently on the subject of human relations.

Registration for the course HUMAN RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES will be conducted October 8 and 9, from 7:00 p. m. to 9:00 p. m. at Alcee Fortier Hall. The first lecture of the series will be presented on the evening of October 10, beginning at 7 o'clock.

"University College, in offering this course, has had the full support and cooperation of the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Harry M. Wilson
Regional Director, NCCJ

"No greater need exists today than the need for good human relations in our complex society and I am delighted at this step aimed at that need."

Jacqueline T. Leonhard
President, Orleans Parish School Board

"In offering the course HUMAN RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES, University College is recognizing one of the major problems of our day and is contributing to tthe welfare of our community."

E. S. Lotspeich
Secretary, New Orleans Council of Churches

"The struggle against bigotry and prejudice must be supported by sound knowledge. The course HUMAN RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES should be of great help to us in improving human and intergroup relations in New Orleans."

William J. Guste, Sr.
Chairman, Department of Public Welfare

"University College is to be congratulated in offering a course which will place 'know how' in human relations on the sound basis of scientific knowledge."

Rabbi Emil Leipziger
President, New Orleans Rabbinical Council

"It is to be hoped that a course like this will contribute to the practical solution of our human relations problems by pointing to the moral and religious foundations of such a solution, i. e., to the equality and interdependence of all mankind who have one and the same creator."

Msgr. Charles J. Plauche
Chancellor, Archdiocese of New Orleans

For a Better Life

Invest Your

SPARE HOURS

in a

HAPPIER FUTURE

Hum Rel Ed

UNIVERSITY of VIRGINIA Extension

ANNOUNCEMENT

Human Relations for Community Leaders

1953

FALL SEMESTER

Richmond Center

Vol. XXX March 1, 1953 No. 10

HUMAN RELATIONS FOR COMMUNITY LEADERS

Purpose

The intent of this workshop is to provide community leaders, school teachers, social workers, church personnel, and Sunday school staffs with the opportunity to study and analyze realistic, everyday problems concerning human relations. A general survey of inter-group problems and conflicts will be presented by the workshop leader. Major emphasis will be placed on determining methods and activities that community leaders may utilize in dealing with local or organizational frictions and tensions.

Program

Small group meetings will be a regular part of the program in order that participants may discuss problems and techniques of their particular professional concern. Various leaders from agencies that deal with aspects of human relations will visit the class, and groups working on specific problems may confer with them.

Audio-visual materials that are useful in the teaching of good human relations will be demonstrated and discussed. A special collection of reading materials on human relations will be an important part of the workshop.

The principal topics that will be considered in this series are:

1. Inter-group relations as they apply to race, nationality, religion, community status, and racio-economic groups.
2. Democratic values and human rights.
3. Facts about race.
4. The three major religious faiths in America: Judaism, Protestantism, Roman Catholicism.
5. Facts about social learning.
6. Psychology of prejudice.

7. Discrimination: Its history and the peoples it has touched; where it appears.

8. Discrimination: Techniques, practices, covenants, quotas and many others.

9-10. Planning for the future: an evaluation in terms of original goals and purposes; a summary of personal and group action.

Workshop Leader

Dr. John H. Marion, A. B., B. D., D. D., has been engaged in private research and writing which has dealt with the whole problems-area of human relations for almost a decade. His busy life has included pastorates in several churches; studies and travels abroad in Europe and Palestine; service as field correspondent to the Christian Century Magazine; active work in human relations as Director, Department of Christian Social Relations, Presbyterian Church, U. S.; contributor to the Yale Review, Rotarian, Negro Digest, and several religious publications; member, Board of Trustees, Mary Baldwin College; member, Board of Directors, Presbyterian Outlook; Pastor, Bon Air Presbyterian Church, Bon Air, Virginia.

Workshop Consultants

Several community leaders will visit the class to aid the workshop leader and the group. These include:

Theodore Freedman, Director, Anti-Defamation League of B'Nai B'Rith. Chairman, Workshop Planning Committee.

The Reverend C. Emerson Smith, Director, Department of Christian Social Relations, Virginia Council of Churches.

Father J. L. Flaherty, Chairman, Catholic Committee of the South.

The Reverend Robert S. Seiler, Director, Department of Christian Social Relations, Episcopal Diocese.

Joseph P. Murphy, Director, National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Wiley Hall, Executive Secretary, Richmond Urban League.

Scholarships

A limited number of scholarships, covering the tuition costs of the workshop, are available to qualified persons. For information write directly to the UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA EXTENSION DIVISION, RICHMOND CENTER, ONE WEST MAIN STREET, RICHMOND 20, or phone 7-1179.

General Information

As it may be necessary to limit the workshop enrollment, interested persons are urged to phone 7-1179 and have their names placed on a reservation list.

Persons may register for the workshop September 21-22-23-24, 7:00-9:00 P.M., Thomas Jefferson High School, 4100 West Grace Street.

The workshop begins September 29, and meets each Tuesday evening, 7:30 to 9:30 P.M., for a period of ten weeks, at Thomas Jefferson High School.

Tuition fee: $10.00. Checks should be made payable to: BURSAR, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

University of Virginia Extension

Published monthly in October, November, December, January, February and March, and semi-monthly in August and September at Charlottesville, Va.

Entered as second-class matter October 16, 1923, at the Post Office at Charlottesville, Virginia, under Act of August 24, 1912.

Both for $2.50

This 2-volume report of a four-year experimental project carried on by 24 teacher-training institutions goes to the heart of conflicts and problems of minority groups. More than 200 concrete projects described.

PUBLISHED BY

American Council on Education

What Are Colleges and Schools Doing in Intergroup Relations?

THIS IS the question that 24 colleges, selected as a national sample, plus their cooperating schools and community agencies sought to answer in a four-year (1945-49) experimental study.

The colleges in this national Study developed their "study-action" and teacher-training programs around three interrelated purposes.

1) To determine the role of race, creed, national origins and social class in child and adult life

2) To assess the effects of these factors and influences on child personality, group life and school progress

3) To plan in school and outside preventive and remedial educational programs

Volume I, College Programs in Intergroup Relations, describes concrete college, school and community studies and programs. Each college group has written its own chapter; editor contributes introductory and concluding sections. Chapters are factual, lively, and suggestive, providing study aims, procedures and teaching plans that other colleges can follow.

Volume II, Intergroup Relations in Teacher Education, is analytical, treating the 4-year Study as an experience to be appraised. Content is cast in the framework of intergroup relations in the nation today, fusing College Study and other data into a general picture of education's present efforts in this field of human relations.

The concrete cases used as illustrations of basic educational approaches to the reduction of prejudice and discrimination should prove useful to teachers and guidance workers in handling their practical change-problems in human relations. Both books should be read as one over-all report.

AUSPICES AND SUPPORT

The College Study in Intergroup Relations was a project of the Council on Cooperation in Teacher Education of the American Council on Education. It was financed by a grant from the National Conference of Christians and Jews. The Study was directed by Lloyd Allen Cook of Wayne University, editor and author of the two-volume report.

Volume I

COLLEGE PROGRAMS IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS

PART I: INTRODUCTION

1. Organizing the College Study

PART II: CONCRETE COLLEGE PROGRAMS

2. Albany's Intergroup Projects
3. The Group Relations Program at Trenton
4. West Virginia Educates for Community Participation
5. Intergroup Processes at City College
6. Marshall College, University of Pittsburgh, and Springfield College
7. Intergroup Education at Central Michigan College
8. Analysis and Change of Attitudes at Moorhead
9. Roosevelt, a College Dedicated to Equality
10. Human Relations at Wayne University
11. Eau Claire, Milwaukee, and Ohio State
12. Florida's Concern for Human Relations
13. Group Study and Action Projects at Atlanta
14. Intergroup Relations at Lynchburg College
15. Talladega Stresses Direct Action
16. College, School, and Community at Greeley
17. San Francisco Makes a Basic Self-Survey
18. Warrensburg, San Marcos, Tempe, and Denver

PART III: CONCLUSIONS

19. Some Learnings and Implications

xviii + 365 pages, Cloth $1.50

Volume II

INTERGROUP RELATIONS IN TEACHER EDUCATION

PART I: GENERAL ORIENTATION

1. Nature of Intergroup Education

PART II: PREJUDICE AND ITS REDUCTION

2. Prejudice: Nature and Development
3. Pre- and In-Service Teacher Views and Values
4. Changing Learners by Means of Academic Instruction
5. Group-Process Teaching: Cases and Theory
6. Community Education and Coordination

PART III: IMPROVING TEACHER-LEADER TRAINING

7. The College Study as In-Service Training
8. Leader Training in Centers and Workshops
9. Strategy and Tactics in Community Planning

PART IV: IN POINT OF EMPHASIS

10. A Viewpoint toward Intergroup Education

xv + 271 pages, Cloth $1.50

SPECIAL ORDER FORM

American Council on Education
1785 Massachusetts Avenue, N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Please send me

College Programs in Intergroup Relations.....$1.50
Intergroup Relations in Teacher Education... 1.50

Both volumes at reduced price of..... 2.50

☐ Cash enclosed ☐ Bill me

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Human Rights

April 7, 1953

THE WHITE HOUSE

THE PRESIDENT TODAY SENT THE FOLLOWING MESSAGE TO THE MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS AT THE OPENING OF ITS SESSION APRIL 7, 1953, IN GENEVA

I am asking Mrs. Oswald B. Lord, the new Representative of the United States on the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, to express to the Commission my deep personal interest in its work. In these days of international tension and strain, it is encouraging to know that the members of the Commission on Human Rights are working to develop effective programs to promote human rights and fundamental freedoms for all people and all nations throughout the world.

The United Nations Charter states the human rights goals which the United States and the other Members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to achieve in cooperation with the United Nations--the promotion of universal respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

For the people of the United States as well as for people everywhere, the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a significant beacon in the steady march toward achieving human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

People everywhere are seeking freedom -- freedom to live, freedom from arbitrary restraint, freedom to think and speak as they wish, freedom to seek and find the truth. We must press ahead to broaden the areas of freedom. The United States is convinced that freedom is an indispensable condition to the achievement of a stable peace.

Unfortunately, in too many areas of the world today there is subjugation of peoples by totalitarian governments which have no respect for the dignity of the human person. This denial of the freedom of peoples, the continued disregard of human rights, is a basic cause of instability and discontent in the world today.

For these reasons, the work of the Commission on Human Rights assumes greater importance and meaning. For these reasons also, there is need for a new approach to the development of a human rights conscience in all areas of the world. I have accordingly asked Mrs. Lord to present positive UN action programs to the Commission which we feel will contribute to that recognition of human rights and fundamental freedoms which people are seeking throughout the world.

#######

STATEMENT BY MRS. LORD BEFORE THE HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION
IN GENEVA, APRIL 8, 1953

As this is the first occasion in which I have had the privilege of serving in the Commission on Human Rights, I hope you will permit me to make a few general remarks about the agenda. I am happy to be a member of this Commission and to join with you in the vital task of helping to advance the cause of freedom. I accepted this appointment from the President of the United States because I personally am convinced of the importance of promoting respect for human rights through international cooperation.

At the very outset of our work, I wish to assure you that the United States Government continues to support wholeheartedly the promotion of respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Both President Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles have spoken to me personally about their deep concern that the United Nations move steadily forward toward the goals laid down in the Charter.

In order to assure steady progress toward those goals, the Government of the United States is suggesting a new and urgent approach to the promotion of human rights, to take account of changed conditions in the world. Today, disregard of the basic principles of human rights is widespread and fundamental freedoms are denied peoples in many areas.

Under these circumstances, the world does not yet appear ready for a treaty of such comprehensive scope as the proposed covenants on human rights. We need to work together immediately to develop a higher moral sense of human rights values in all areas of the world. For that reason, the United States is urging that this Commission give immediate consideration to the development of human rights action programs.

The Commission on Human Rights already has made an outstanding contribution to the constructive achievements of the United Nations. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights stands as a major landmark of progress in this difficult field. It is with understandable pride that I participate in this Commission, where our two past chairmen, Mrs. Roosevelt and Mr. Malik, and their colleagues have brought intelligence and skill to bear upon some of the most challenging problems of our times.

The agenda of the Commission clearly falls into two distinct parts: the completion of the draft covenants and the consideration of a wide range of other matters.

The General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council have asked that the Commission complete the drafting of the covenants. This task will necessarily occupy a considerable portion of our time; but perhaps, if we could set May 1 as a target date for completing the remaining portions of the two covenants, we need not devote more than half of our session to this task.

Since the completion of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, the Commission has been entirely engrossed in the drafting of the proposed covenants on human rights. As discussions have proceeded on the covenants, it begins to appear that they are not receiving the acceptance which had been initially anticipated and that they will not be ratified as widely as had been hoped. The climate of world opinion does not yet seem favorable to the conclusion of the covenants in the United Nations. The covenants will not have the expected effectiveness in the field of human rights. For these reasons, my Government has concluded that in the present stage of international relations it would not ratify the covenants.

Inasmuch as the United States is a loyal member of the United Nations, its delegation will continue to collaborate in the drafting of these covenants and to make suggestions for improving them. The Covenants will be looked upon as a more precise and definitive statement of the principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, irrespective of their ratification or non-ratification. My Government hopes that there will be a time when human rights will be sufficiently respected in fact and when a human rights conscience will be sufficiently developed throughout the world so that a codification of the then prevailing principles will be worthwhile. When and if such a time comes the United States may give consideration to the ratification of a covenant on human rights, and for that reason we are concerned with the drafting of the covenants now so that they will be in the most acceptable form and will require the least possible change if they are used as a model for future treaties.

It seems increasingly important, therefore, that alternative and more effective and acceptable ways be devised by the Commission to achieve the goals of the Charter for the promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The remaining part of our agenda contains a large number of items not related to the draft covenants. The United States delegation endorses the listing on the provisional agenda and the order of that listing. At the appropriate time, however, I shall suggest that some of these items be given priority. A number of these items are of the utmost significance and deserve our most earnest consideration. It is for this reason that I hope that perhaps the last half of our session might be devoted to programs of practical action.

It is the view of the United States Government that the guiding principle for the work of the Commission should be to find the surest and speediest methods of raising the level of practice around the world in the observance of human rights. This would require that we initiate a number of action programs. I shall be prepared to make detailed proposals about such action programs in connection with specific agenda items. For the present I should like merely to outline the three principal proposals which my Government wishes me to submit to the Commission.

First, we will propose that the Commission institute a study of various aspects of human rights throughout the world. The Commission could undertake this with the assistance of a rapporteur. The rapporteur would consult with non-governmental organizations as well as governments and the specialized agencies for relevant data to submit to the Commission. The report of the rapporteur would be considered in the Commission, which might then make general recommendations concerning the subject under discussion. Two subjects that might well be considered first are freedom of religion and the right to a fair trial.

Second, we will propose that annual reports on developments in the field of human rights be prepared by each member Government with the assistance of a national advisory committee. These reports would be considered in the Commission at the same time as the study of the proposed rapporteur would be submitted.

Third, we will propose that the United Nations establish advisory services on specific aspects of human rights along the lines of the advisory services now being provided in the economic, social, and public administration fields. These services would be in the form of experts going to countries requesting the services, scholarships and fellowships being provided for training abroad, and arrangements for seminars.

These are action programs that the Commission can undertake now. There is no need for the Commission to limit itself to the drafting of covenants on human rights, which in any event will have limited applicability. The Commission should give more of its attention to constructive programs which can be initiated without delay in the United Nations for the promotion of the human rights principles of the Charter. Indeed, it will be greatly to the advantage of the Commission itself if it can at this session begin work on some of these affirmative tasks even before the covenants are considered by the General Assembly. In this way the Commission could mark out the basic lines of its future action programs and establish firmly its position in this field.

MORE

With all these potential programs for immediate action at this session of the Commission, I think that you can appreciate my view that we should reserve adequate time for the consideration of these later items.

It is my earnest hope that the work of this session will be successful, especially in the launching of new programs that will contribute effectively to the safeguarding of human liberty.

* * * * * *

LETTER FROM SECRETARY DULLES TO MRS. LORD

April 3, 1953

My dear Mrs. Lord:

As you leave for Geneva to represent the United States at the Ninth Session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the best wishes of our Government and of the American people go with you. The President and I are anxious that you carry a personal message to the Commission.

We believe that the American people are determined to do all within their power to make the United Nations an increasingly vigorous instrument of international order and justice. It is our earnest wish that the United Nations become an ever more effective agency for promoting, in the words of the Charter, "respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

The United States stands for full and complete enjoyment of these fundamental rights. The whole American philosophy of government is based on the conviction that man was endowed with these rights by his Creator and that they are inalienable. This conviction is expressed at many points in the legal structure of our national and state governments and is most clearly set forth in the Declaration of Independence and in the Bill of Rights in the Constitution of the United States.

Our history demonstrates that nationwide observance of fundamental human rights did not spring into being upon the enactment of statutes. In the years that have intervened between the ratification of the Bill of Rights and the present, we in the United States have made important advances. Through education and publicity, we have developed a human rights conscience which is perhaps the strongest factor in the progress we have made. In its most recent report to the United Nations for publication in the agency's Yearbook on Human Rights, the Government of this country has submitted detailed evidence of the progress recorded in a single year. We intend that these advances shall continue.

Moreover, our Government has noted with satisfaction the improvements in the observance of human rights which have taken place in other countries; but it has noted as well that much remains to be done. We recognize that injustices occur to a greater or lesser degree in all countries, including our own. They cannot be overcome in a day. We must work to eliminate them.

In the light of our national, and recently, international experience in the matter of human rights, the opening of a new session of the Commission on Human Rights appears an appropriate occasion for a fresh appraisal of the methods through which we may realize the human rights goals of the United Nations. These goals have a high place in the Charter as drafted at San Francisco and were articulated in greater detail in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as adopted by the United Nations General Assembly at Paris in 1948.

Since the establishment of these goals, much time and effort has been expended on the drafting of treaties, that is, Covenants on Human Rights, in which it was sought to frame, in mutually acceptable legal form, the obligations to be assumed by national states in regard to human rights. We have found that such drafts of Covenants as had a reasonable chance of acceptance in some respects established standards lower than those now observed in a number of countries.

Mrs. Oswald B. Lord,
United States Representative to the Commission on Human Rights.

While

While the adoption of the Covenants would not compromise higher standards already in force, it seems wiser to press ahead in the United Nations for the achievement of the standards set forth in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights through ways other than the proposed Covenants on Human Rights. This is particularly important in view of the likelihood that the Covenants will not be as widely accepted by United Nations members as initially anticipated. Nor can we overlook the fact that the areas where human rights are being persistently and flagrantly violated are those where the Covenants would most likely be ignored.

In these circumstances, there is a grave question whether the completion, signing and ratification of the Covenants at this time is the most desirable method of contributing to human betterment particularly in areas of greatest need. Furthermore, experience to date strongly suggests that even if it be assumed that this is a proper area for treaty action, a wider general acceptance of human rights goals must be attained before it seems useful to codify standards of human rights as binding international legal obligations in the Covenants.

With all these considerations in mind, the United States Government asks you to present to the Commission on Human Rights at its forthcoming session a statement of American goals and policies in this field; to point out the need for reexamining the approach of the Human Rights Covenants as the method for furthering at this time the objectives of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; and to put forward other suggestions of method, based on American experience, for developing throughout the world a human rights conscience which will bring nearer the goals stated in the Charter. In making such suggestions, I am sure you will want to give special weight to the value of bringing the facts to the light of day, to the value of common discussion of problems in the international forum of the Commission on Human Rights, and to the value of each country drawing on the experience of other countries for inspiration and practical guidance in solving its own problems.

We recognize that in presenting to the Commission a change in approach, extended discussion will be required in the Commission and later in the Economic and Social Council and General Assembly as well. By reason of the considerations referred to above, the United States Government has reached the conclusion that we should not at this time become a party to any multilateral treaty such as those contemplated in the draft Covenants on Human Rights, and that we should now work toward the objectives of the Declaration by other means. While the Commission continues, under the General Assembly's instructions, with the drafting of the Covenants, you are, of course, expected to participate. This would be incumbent on the United States as a loyal Member of the United Nations.

Through the agency of the United Nations and its powerful moral influence, much has been and can be accomplished. Example and education can exert powerful influence. The United Nations can also play an important part, through health, welfare, and other technical assistance programs, in raising standards of living throughout the world and bringing a full life to millions of persons who struggle merely to exist. The removal of restraints on the rights of expression and association can release the creative energies of the human spirit.

Firm in our belief that the United Nations is the most hopeful and effective means of bringing about world peace and of promoting the welfare of mankind throughout the earth, the United States Government will support your every effort to these ends.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

* * *

Human Relations Education

5 BOOKS FOR TEACHERS

For Better Intergroup Understanding

ELEMENTARY CURRICULUM IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS

Case Studies in Instruction

By the Staff of the Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools

HILDA TABA, Director

The case studies give concrete examples of the ways American history, community studies, home and family relations, and the ways in which life in school—student government, small-group activities, classroom atmosphere—help children to acquire habits and skills necessary for good human relations. Teachers in ten elementary schools cooperated in developing the examples showing how the basic principles of intergroup relations and curriculum planning can be applied to the elementary school. A guide for teachers and curriculum-makers to help them plan curriculum around concepts and objectives useful for improving intergroup relations.

Published 1950. xii + 246 pp., 6 x 9. Cloth, $2.50

Revised Edition 1949

READING LADDERS FOR HUMAN RELATIONS

By the Staff of the Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools

HILDA TABA, Director

A revised and enlarged edition of this widely used teacher's guide to books suitable for children, selected to appeal to their interests and at the same time help them grow in knowledge, understanding, and emotional maturity. Contains over 500 titles, of which 125 are annotated. The books are arranged around eight themes—common human experiences and problems: Patterns of Family Life, Community Contrasts, Economic Differences, Differences Between Generations, Adjustment to New Places and New Situations, How It Feels to Grow Up, Belonging to Groups, Experience of Acceptance and Rejection.

From reviews of the first edition:

"The tips on discussion technique alone would make this pamphlet valuable; as a teacher guide to meaningful reading experiences for adolescents, it is priceless"—THE CLEARING HOUSE. "It is a must for schools interested in problems of human relations."—EDUCATIONAL LEADERSHIP.

Published 1947. Revised edition 1949. x + 115 pp., 6 x 9. Paper, $1.25

CURRICULUM IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS

Case Studies in Instruction for Secondary Schools

By the Staff of Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools

HILDA TABA, Director

A collection of case studies of how teachers replanned programs in secondary school literature, social studies, and other subjects to achieve more effective teaching of group relations attitudes and concepts. These descriptions illustrate how to assess students' needs, how to select and organize content, and how to plan learning experiences. Three chapters are devoted to special aspects of classroom teaching, such as how to pattern discussions, or how to train in skills for managing group-relations situations. The book concludes with detailed descriptions of the experiences of teacher-planning groups in two programs, with particular emphasis on ways of working together and kinds of difficulties encountered in group curriculum planning. This is not only a handbook on instruction in intergroup relations, but also a useful guide to curriculum making.

Published 1949. 2nd printing 1950. Reprinted from February 1949 issue of THE BULLETIN OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SECONDARY-SCHOOL PRINCIPALS. viii + 168 pp., 6 x 9. Paper, $1.25

SOCIOMETRY IN GROUP RELATIONS

A Work Guide for Teachers

By HELEN HALL JENNINGS

The importance of interpersonal relations to group life has long been realized. What has been missing is a method for diagnosing relationships in school groups. This book aims to supply such a method. It has been written out of the experience of a number of teachers in various schools, and test situations are presented in anecdote form full of human interest. Here are step-by-step techniques, with discussion of the psychological principles involved, analysis procedures, and suggested remedial action. Simple test forms which can be duplicated by any teacher are illustrated.

"A particular virtue of this pamphlet is its clarity and usability by teachers in a practical situation."—ELEMENTARY SCHOOL JOURNAL.

Published 1948. 2nd printing 1949. ix + 85 pp. 11 figures. 6 x 9. Paper, $1.25

LITERATURE FOR HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

By the Staff of the Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools

HILDA TABA, Director

A stimulating discussion of how to use literature to bring insight to common problems of life; to answer questions arising from conflicts over racial, religious, and economic differences; to dissipate false impressions about "other" kinds of people; to enable children and young people to put themselves in another person's shoes. Accounts of classroom teaching procedures from first grade through twelfth show different ways of organizing reading programs so that the focus is on human relations, "preachy" and moralizing approaches are avoided, and situations for objective analysis of problems are set up. Bibliography of 77 titles discussed in the volume.

". . . extensive guidance in using books as a basis for inculcating the right ideas and stimulating correct behavior towards one's fellow-man."—ELEMENTARY SCHOOL JOURNAL.

Published 1948. 2nd printing 1948. x + 61 pp., 6 x 9. Paper, $1.00

FORTHCOMING PUBLICATIONS

GROUP LIFE IN SCHOOL
EVALUATION IN INTERGROUP EDUCATION

and the final report of the staff to the Committee, a full-size book, cloth bound, scheduled for publication in 1950.

ORDER FORM

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION
744 JACKSON PLACE, N. W., WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

Please send the books checked below:

.....cop..... ELEMENTARY CURRICULUM IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS ($2.50 per copy)
.....cop..... READING LADDERS FOR HUMAN RELATIONS ($1.25 per copy)
.....cop..... CURRICULUM IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS ($1.25 per copy)
.....cop..... SOCIOMETRY IN GROUP RELATIONS ($1.25 per copy)
.....cop..... LITERATURE FOR HUMAN UNDERSTANDING ($1.00 per copy)

..... payment enclosed ..... charge to my account

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

.....

20M—2-50

O R D E R B L A N K

TO: ADL REGIONAL OFFICE SUITE 305
11 PRYOR ST., S. W.
ATLANTA 3, GEORGIA

Please send me the following items mentioned in the latest issue of "PROGRAM SERVICE"

	No. of Copies	Price

My check ☐ , money order ☐, in the amount of $____ is enclosed.

Name _____
Please Print

Address _____

_____
City Zone State

12-47

16 - Human Rights

DRAFT ARTICLES

FOR AN

INTERNATIONAL DECLARATION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

AND AN

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

As Approved by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights

at its Second Session in Geneva

December, 1947

(U. N. doc. E/600, Dec. 17, 1947)

- - - - -

Compiled by the Office of Public Affairs
Department of State

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL DECLARATION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Article 1

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.

Article 2

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

Article 3

1. Every one is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

2. All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination, or against any incitement to such discrimination, in violation of this Declaration.

Article 4

Every one has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.

Article 5

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Every one placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.

Article 6

Every one shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals in the determination of any criminal charge against him, and of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and to have the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice, and if he appears in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it and to use a language which he can speak.

Article 7

Article 7

1. Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence. No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

3. No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

Article 8

Slavery, in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man, shall be prohibited by law.

Article 9

Every one shall be entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, his privacy and his family. His home and correspondence shall be inviolable.

Article 10

1. Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the border of each State.

2. Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it.

Article 11

Every one shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right will not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

Article 12

Article 12

Every one has the right everywhere in the world to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

Article 13

1. The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental unit of society. Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law.

2. Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and Society.

Article 14

1. Every one has the right to own property in conformity with the laws of the State in which such property is located.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 15

Every one has the right to a nationality.

All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations. This protection shall not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

Article 16

1. Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs is an absolute and sacred right.

2. Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his beliefs in worship, observance, teaching and practice.

(Concerning the following two Article, 17 and 18, the Commission decided not to elaborate a final text until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information.)*

(Article 17

---

*The Subcommission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at its second session (held in January, 1948, subsequent to the publication of the report of the second session of the Commission on Human Rights)

Continued in footnote on following page -

(Article 17)

(1. Every one is free to express and impart opinions, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.)

(2. No person may be interfered with on account of his opinions.)

(Article 18)

(There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditive or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.)

Article 19

Every one has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character, not inconsistent with this Declaration.

Article 20

Every one has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.

Article 21

Every one without discrimination has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.

Article 22

1. Every one shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.

2. Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

Article 23

(Continued from page 3)
recommended the following article in substitution for Articles 17 and 18 of the Declaration:

> Every one shall have the right to freedom of thought and expression: this shall include freedom to hold opinions without interference; and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas by any means and regardless of frontiers. (U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/80, Feb. 6, 1948, p. 4.)

Article 23

1. Every one has the right to work.

2. The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.

3. The State is bound to take all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.

Article 24

1. Every one has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.

2. Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

Article 25

Every one without distinction as to economic and social conditions has the right to the preservation of his health through the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the State or community can provide. The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.

Article 26

1. Every one has the right to social security. The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequence of unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control.

2. Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance.

Article 27

Every one has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means, or political affiliation.

Article 28

Article 28

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

Article 29

1. Every one has the right to rest and leisure.

2. Rest and leisure should be ensured to every one by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Article 30

Every one has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

(Article 31)

(The Commission did not take a decision on the two texts below. They are reproduced here for further consideration.)

(Text proposed by the Drafting Committee:)

(In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, as far as compatible with public order, to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.)

(Text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities:)

(In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.)

Article 32

Article 32

All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter, insofar as they deal with human rights.

Article 33

Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed to the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

PART I

Article 1

The States parties hereto declare that they recognize the principles set forth in Part II hereof as being among the human rights and fundamental freedoms founded on the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

Article 2

Every State, party hereto, undertakes to ensure:

(a) that its laws secure to all persons under its jurisdiction, whether citizens, persons of foreign nationality or stateless persons, the enjoyment of these human rights and fundamental freedoms;

(b) that such laws, respecting these human rights and fundamental freedoms, conform with the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;

(c) that any person whose rights or freedoms are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity;

(d) that such remedies shall be enforceable by a judiciary whose independence is secured; and

(e) that its police and executive officers shall act in support of the enjoyment of these rights and freedoms.

Article 3

On receipt of a request to this effect from the Secretary-General of the United Nations made under the authority of a resolution of the General Assembly, the Government of any party to this Covenant shall supply an explanation as to the manner in which the law of that State gives effect to any of the provisions of this Covenant.

Article 4

1. In time of war or other public emergency, a State may take measures derogating from its obligations under Article 2 above to the extent strictly limited by the exigencies of the situation.

2. Any

2. Any State party hereto availing itself of this right of derogation shall inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations fully of the measures which it has thus enacted and the reasons therefor. It shall also inform him as and when the measures cease to operate and the provisions of Article 2 are being fully executed.

PART II

Article 5

It shall be unlawful to deprive any person of his life save in the execution of the sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

Article 6

It shall be unlawful to subject any person to any form of physical mutilation or medical or scientific experimentation against his will.

Article 7

No person shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or to cruel or inhuman indignity.

Article 8

1. No person shall be held in slavery or servitude.

2. No person shall be required to perform forced or compulsorylabour in any form other than labour exacted as a punishment for crime of which the person concerned has been convicted by due process of law.

3. For the purposes of this Article, the term "forced or compulsory labour" shall not include:

(a) any service of a purely military character, or service of a non-military character in the case of conscientious objectors, exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws;

(b) any service exacted in cases of emergency created by fire, flood, famine, earthquake, violent epidemic or epizootic disease, invasion by animals, insect or vegetable pests, or similar calamities or other emergencies threatening the life or well-being of the community;

(c) any minor communal services considered as normal civic obligations incumbent upon the members of the community, provided that these obligations have been accepted by the members of the community concerned directly or through their directly elected representatives.

Article 9

Article 9

1. No person shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

2. No person shall be deprived of his liberty save in the case of:

(a) the arrest of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before a court on a reasonable suspicion of having committed a crime or which is reasonably considered to be immediately necessary to prevent his committing a crime;

(b) the lawful arrest and detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order or decree of a court;

(c) the lawful detention of a person sentenced after conviction to deprivation of liberty;

(d) the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind;

(e) the parental or quasi-parental custody of minors;

(f) the lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country;

(g) the lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation proceedings are pending.

3. Any person who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the charges against him. Any person who is arrested under the provisions of sub-paragraphs (a) of (b) of paragraph 2 of this Article shall be brought promptly before a judge, and shall be tried within a reasonable time or released.

4. Every person who is deprived of his liberty shall have an effective remedy in the nature of "habeas corpus" by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.

5. Every person shall have an enforceable right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.

Article 10

No person shall be imprisoned or held in servitude in consequence of the mere breach of a contractual obligation.

Article 11

Article 11

1. Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each state.

2. Any person who is not subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard to national service shall be free to leave any country including his own.

Article 12

No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State shall be arbitrarily expelled therefrom.

Article 13

1. In the determination of any criminal charge against him or of any of his civil rights or obligations, every person is entitled to a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal and to the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice.

2. No person shall be convicted or punished for crime except after public trial.

Article 14

No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

Article 15

No person shall be deprived of his juridical personality.

Article 16

1. Every person shall have the right to freedom of religion, conscience and belief, including the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind, to hold and manifest any religious or other belief, to change his belief, and to practice any form of religious worship and observance, and he shall not be required to do any act which is contrary to such worship and observance.

2. Every

2. Every person of full age and sound mind shall be free, either alone or in a community with other persons of like mind, to give and receive any form of religious teaching, and in the case of a minor the parent or guardian shall be free to determine what religious teaching he shall receive.

3. The above rights and freedoms shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public order and welfare, morals and the rights and freedoms of others.

(Article 17)

(The Commission decided not to elaborate a final text on this Article until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on the Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information. The texts reproduced below have been proposed by the Drafting Committee and by the Representative of the United States respectively.)*

(Text

---

*The Subcommission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at its second session (held in January, 1948, subsequent to the publication of the report of the second session of the Commission on Human Rights) recommended the following article in substitution for Article 17:

1. Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and expression without interference by governmental action: this right shall include freedom to hold opinions, to seek, receive and impart information and ideas, regardless of frontiers, either orally, by written or printed matter, in the form of art, or by legally operated visual or auditory devices.

2. The right to freedom of expression carries with it duties and responsibilities. Penalties, liabilities or restrictions limiting this right may therefore be imposed for causes which have been clearly defined by law, but only with regard to:

(a) matters which must remain secret in the vital interests of the State;

(b) expressions which incite persons to alter by violence the system of government;

(c) expressions which directly incite persons to commit criminal acts;

(d) expressions which are obscene;

Continued in footnote on page 6

(Text proposed by the Drafting Committee:)

(1. Every person shall be free to express and publish his ideas orally, in writing, in the form of art or otherwise.)

(2. Every person shall be free to receive and disseminate information of all kinds, including facts, critical comment and ideas, by the medium of books, newspapers, oral instructions or any other lawfully operated device.)

(3. The freedoms of speech and information referred to in the preceding paragraphs of this Article may be subject only to necessary restrictions, penalties or liabilities with regard to: matters which must remain secret in the interests of national safety; publications intended or likely to incite persons to alter by violence the system of Government, or to promote disorder or crime; obscene publications; (publications aimed at the suppression of human rights and fundamental freedoms); publications injurious to the independence of the judiciary or the fair conduct of legal proceedings; and expressions or publications which libel or slander the reputations of other persons.)

(Text proposed by the Representative of the United States:)

(Every one shall have the right to freedom of information, speech and expression. Every one shall be free to hold his opinion without molestation, to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated, and to disseminate opinions and information, either by work, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditive or other means.)

Article 18

(Continued from footnote on page 5)

(e) expressions injurious to the fair conduct of legal proceedings;

(f) expressions which infringe rights of literary and artistic property;

(g) expressions about other persons which defame their reputations or are otherwise injurious to them without benefiting the public.

Nothing in this paragraph shall prevent a State from establishing on reasonable terms a right of reply or a similar corrective remedy.

3. Previous censorship of written and printed matter, the radio and newsreels shall not exist.

4. Measures shall be taken to promote the freedom of information through the elimination of political, economic, technical and other obstacles which are likely to hinder the free flow of information. (U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/80. Feb. 6, 1948, p. 4)

Article 18

All persons shall have the right to assemble peaceably for any lawful purpose including the discussion of any matter on which under Article 17 any person has the right to express and publish his ideas. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of this right other than those necessary for:

(a) the protection of life or property;

(b) the prevention of disorders; or

(c) the prevention of the obstruction of traffic or the free movement of others.

Article 19

All persons shall be free to constitute associations, in whatever form may be appropriate under the law of the State, for the promotion and protection of their legitimate interests and of any other lawful object, including the dissemination of all information of which under Article 17 the dissemination is unrestricted. The rights and freedoms set forth in Articles 16 and 17 shall be enjoyed by such associations.

Article 20

Every person shall be entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in this Covenant, without distinction as to race, (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin. Every person, regardless of office or status, shall be entitled to equal protection under the law against any arbitrary discrimination or against any incitement to such discrimination in violation of this Covenant.

Article 21

Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hostility that constitutes an incitement to violence shall be prohibited by the law of the State.

Article 22

Nothing in this Covenant shall be considered to give any person or State the right to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein:

PART III

Article 23

1. This Covenant shall be open for accession to every State Member of the United Nations or party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice and to every other State which the General Assembly of the United Nations shall, by resolution, declare to be eligible.

2. Accession shall be effected by the deposit of an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and as soon as two-thirds of the States Members of the United Nations have deposited such instruments the Covenant shall come into force between them. As regards any State which accedes thereafter, the Covenant shall come into force on the date of the deposit of its instrument of accession.

3. The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall inform all members of the United Nations and the other States referred to in paragraph 1 above of the deposit of each instrument of accession.

Article 24

In the case of a Federal State, the following provisions shall apply:

(a) With respect to any Articles of this Covenant which the federal government regards as wholly or in part appropriate for federal action, the obligations of the federal governments shall, to this extent, be the same as those of parties which are not federal states;

(b) In respect of Articles which the federal government regards as appropriate under its constitutional system, in whole or in part, for action by the constituent States, Provinces or Cantons, the federal government shall bring such provisions, with a favourable recommendation, to the notice of the appropriate authorities of the States, Provinces or Cantons.

Article 25

1. This Covenant shall apply in respect of any colony or overseas territory of a State party hereto, or any territory subject to the suzerainty or protection of such State, or any territory in respect of which such State exercises a mandate or trusteeship, when that State has acceded on behalf and in respect of such colony or territory.

2. The State concerned shall, if necessary, seek the consent at the earliest possible moment of the governments of all such colonies and territories to this Covenant and accede on behalf and in respect of each such colony and territory immediately its consent has been obtained.

Article 26

Article 26

1. Amendments to this Covenant shall come into force when they have been adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the General Assembly of the United Nations and ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the parties to this Covenant.

2. When such amendments come into force they shall be binding on those parties which have ratified them, leaving other parties still bound by the provisions of the Covenant which they have accepted by accession, including earlier amendments which they have ratified.

Article 27

In construing the Articles of this Covenant, the several Articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other.

16 - Human Rights

To Organization Leaders:

Attached is a copy of the International Declaration of Human Rights as approved by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights at its Third Session at Lake Success in May and June of 1948. Chairman of the Commission is the United States Representative, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

This Declaration is on the agenda of the UN Economic and Social Council for consideration at its Seventh Session in Geneva opening July 19, 1948. The Economic and Social Council will consider the Declaration and determine whether it will be forwarded to the General Assembly of the UN in Paris this fall.

The Declaration is not a legally binding document but a "common standard of achievement" as pointed out in its Preamble. The Commission on Human Rights is expected to meet again early in 1949 to proceed with the drafting of a Covenant on Human Rights which will include the basic civil rights set forth in the Declaration. The Covenant will be in the form of a treaty or international convention which will be legally binding on the countries which adhere to it.

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

(as approved by the UN Commission on Human Rights at its Third Session at Lake Success on June 18, 1948)

PREAMBLE

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world, and

WHEREAS disregard and contempt for human rights resulted, before and during the second world war, in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were one of the supreme issues of the conflict, and

WHEREAS it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled as a last resort to rebel against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by a regime of law, and

WHEREAS the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to re-affirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

WHEREAS Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

WHEREAS a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore the General Assembly

PROCLAIMS this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the population of Member States themselves and among the population of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4

1. No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude.

2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 5

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 6

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement of such discrimination.

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

Article 8

In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Article 9

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

Article 10

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home correspondence or reputation.

Article 11

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.

2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Article 12

1. Everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.

2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

Article 13

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 14

1. Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.

2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the full consent of both intending spouses.

3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

Article 15

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 16

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 17

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association.

Article 19

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through his freely chosen representatives.

2. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.

3. Everyone has the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people.

Article 20

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to the realisation, through national effort and international cooperation, and in accordance with the organisation and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.

Article 21

1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.

2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.

3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 22

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and to social services, adequate for the health and well-being of himself and his family and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to education. Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

2. Education shall be directed to the full development of human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

Article 24

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Article 25

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement.

Article 26

Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 27

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

Article 28

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

16 - Human Rights (New File)

ADDRESS OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE
WASHINGTON 25, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
WASHINGTON

RECEIVED
AUG 23
Southern Regional Council

In reply refer to
PL

August 20, 1948

To Organizations Interested in the International Covenant on Human Rights:

Enclosed is a copy of the draft International Covenant on Human Rights which was prepared by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights at its Second Session at Lake Success in May 1948. There are also enclosed documents relating to the implementation of the Covenant.

You will observe that the draft Covenant is in rough form, since it was prepared by the Drafting Committee of the Commission as a working paper only, with the expectation that the Commission would review it at its Third Session (May 24 to June 18, 1948). Since the entire time of the Commission at its four-weeks' Third Session was required for the completion of the draft International Declaration of Human Rights, unfortunately no time remained for the consideration of the Covenant.

The Commission at its Third Session recommended to the Economic and Social Council that the next session of the Commission be held early in 1949 for the completion of the Covenant and measures for its implementation.

In preparation for the next session of the Commission on Human Rights, the Department of State would appreciate receiving any views which your Organization may wish to submit with regard to the draft International Covenant on Human Rights and measures for its implementation.

At the next session of the Commission, one of the most pressing questions to be resolved concerning the Covenant is whether detailed limitations should be set forth in each article of the Covenant or whether detailed limitations should be omitted and instead a general overall limitation article should be included in the Covenant along the lines of the proposal submitted by the Representative of the United States under Article 4. This proposal reads: "The obligations imposed by Articles 1 and 2 shall not affect the right of States parties to this Covenant to take action reasonably necessary for the promotion of the general welfare. Such action may be taken only by or pursuant to law, in conformity with Article 20 hereof."

The United States expressed the view at the meetings of the Drafting Committee that detailed limitations should not be set forth in the Covenant but that instead there should be only one overall limitation article applicable to articles in the Covenant requiring limitations. It will be observed that specific limitations are not enumerated in the articles of the draft International Declarations of Human Rights but that instead Article 27 serves as an overall limitation on all the rights in the Declaration. A copy of the Declaration is also enclosed. As you know, after the Declaration was approved by the Commission on June 18, 1948, it was forwarded to the United Nations Economic and Social Council, where it is currently being discussed.

In a brief discussion concerning the implementation of the Covenant on the last day of the Third Session of the Commission, representatives of Chile, Egypt, Panama, the United Kingdom and Uruguay supported in general the principles of the proposal of China and the United States. Enclosed is a copy of this proposal (UN document E/CN.4/145) together with copies of other proposals on implementation submitted to the Third Session and extracts from the Summary Record of the 81st meeting of the Commission when implementation was discussed.

If your organization wishes to present its views to the Department concerning the draft Covenant and measures for its implementation, it is suggested that they be submitted prior to November 1, 1948.

Sincerely yours,

Francis H. Russell

Francis H. Russell
Director
Office of Public Affairs

Enclosures:

1. Draft International Covenant on Human Rights
2. Draft International Declaration of Human Rights
3. Extracts from Summary Record of the 81st meeting of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. (UN document E/CN.4/SR81)
4. Proposal of China and United States on Implementation (UN document E/CN.4/145)
5. Amendment Proposed by India on Implementation (UN document E/CN.4/151)
6. Statement by India on Implementation (UN document E/CN.4/153)
7. Statement by Professor Cassin, Representative of France on Implementation (UN document E/CN.4/147)
8. French Proposal on Implementation (UN document E/CN.4/82/Add.10)
9. Australian Proposal for International Court of Human Rights
10. Statement by U.S.S.R. Delegation on Implementation (UN document E/CN.4/154)

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS*

(prepared by the Drafting Committee on An International Bill of Human Rights, being Annex "B" of document E/CN.4/95 and Annex "B" of UN document E/800.)

PART I

PREAMBLE

The States parties hereto, bearing in mind the general principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter and in the Declaration of Human Rights, agree to give effect in this Covenant to certain of the principles specified in the Declaration, as follows:

Article 1

The States parties hereto declare that they recognize the rights and freedoms set forth in Part II hereof as being among the human rights and fundamental freedoms founded on the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

Article 2

Every State party hereto undertakes to ensure:

---

* The Drafting Committee agreed to point out in its Report its view that the Covenant is not self-operative.

 It was agreed by the Drafting Committee that the ideas contained in this text should be included in a Preamble when one is written. It was also agreed to draw attention to the following text submitted by the representative of France: "The States parties hereto, being resolved to give effect to the general principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter and specified in the International Declaration on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on _____, have agreed to conclude a preliminary convention, defining the practical scope of certain of these principles".

(a) through

(a) through adequate laws and procedures to all individuals within its jurisdiction, whether citizens, nationals, persons of foreign nationality or stateless persons, the rights and freedoms set forth in Part II of this Covenant, and further undertakes that such rights and freedoms where not now provided under existing laws and procedures be given effect in its domestic law through the adoption of appropriate laws and procedures;
(b) that any persons whose rights or freedoms as herein defined are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity;
(c) that such remedy shall be enforceable by a judiciary whose independence is secured; and
(d) that the police and executive authorities shall act in support of the enjoyment of these rights and freedoms;

Article 3

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided not to consider the following Geneva text until articles on implementation had been drafted)*:

On receipt of a request to this effect from the Secretary-General of the United Nations made under the authority of a resolution of the General Assembly, the Governement of any party to this Covenant shall supply an explanation as to the manner in which the law of that State gives effect to any of the provisions of this Covenant.

Article 4

(No decision was made as to which of the following alternative texts was preferred.)

I. Text originally submitted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. In time of war or other public emergency, a State may take measures derogating from its obligations under Article 2 above to the extent strictly limited by the exigencies of the situation.
2. (Left over until implementation articles have been drafted.)

II. Text submitted by the Representative of the United States

The obligations imposed by Articles 1 and 2 shall not effect the right of State parties to this Covenant to take action reasonably necessary for the preservation of peace, order or security or the promotion of the general welfare. Such action may be taken only by or pursuant to law, in conformity with Article 20 hereof:

---

* The limitations suggested by the representative of the United States were submitted in each case as illustrative of the problems arising in the absence of a general limitation clause, which the United States prefers.

(Note: The delegation of the United States pointed out:
(1) that the limitations set forth in the Covenant without the additions suggested by other Governments are not all-inclusive;
(2) that certain Governments which have suggested further limitations have stated that their lists are not all-inclusive; and
(3) that the matter of restricting the rights and freedoms of the Covenant arises from many sources of law and that the Commission on Human Rights must find the solution for dealing with the problem caused by the omission of further probable limitations not yet enumerated.)*

---

* The limitations suggested by the representative of the United States were submitted in each case as illustrative of the problems arising in the absence of a general limitation clause, which the United States prefers.

PART II

Article 5

No one shall be deprived of his life save in the execution of the sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible additional limitations. The list is as follow:

1. Suppression of rebellion or riots (Union of South Africa)
Deprivation of life by the military or state officers in a national emergency (United States of America).
2. Self-defense and defense of another (Union of South Africa) (United States of America)
3. Killing in attempting to affect arrests for certain offences. (Union of South Africa)
4. Killing by accident (United States of America)
5. Killing for violation of honour (United States of America)
6. Killing of persons caught in the commission of a felony (United States of America)
7. Killing to prevent an escape (United States of America)
8. Killing by medical operation in absence of gross negligence or malpractice. (United States of America)
9. Killing through a voluntary medical experiment (United States of America)
10. Killing by officers of the law to prevent the commission of a crime (see also supra 6) (United States of America)
11. Killing by officers of the law in a local emergency (United States of America)
12. Killing by a military in time of war (United States of America)

Article 6

No one shall be subjected to any form or physical mutilation or medical or scientific experimentation against his will.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible additional limitations. This list is as follows:

1. Compulsory vaccination. (United States of America)
2. Legitiamte medical and scientific experimentation in hospitals for the insane, with the consent of a parent or guardian of the patient (United States of America)

3. Emergency operations

3. Emergency operations undertaken to save the life of a patient, where the pateint is unable to give his consent or where a person empowered to give consent on behalf of the patient gives such consent. (United States of America)
4. Other limitations may be developed later. (United States of America)

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or to cruel or inhuman indignity.

Article 8*

1. No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
2. No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labor, except as a consequence of a conviction of crime by a competent court.
3. For the purposes of this Article, the term "forced or compulsory labor" shall not include:
   (a) Any service of a purely military character, or service in the case of conscientious objectors, exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws, provided that the service of conscientious objectors be compensated with maintenance and pay not inferior to what a soldier of the lowest rank receives;
   (b) Anvservice exacted in cases of emergencies or calamities threatening the life or well-being of the community;
   (c) Any minor communal services considered as normal civic obligations incumbent upon the members of the community, provided that these obligations have been accepted by the members of the community concerned directly or through their directly elected representatives.

(Note: (1) The following text, which follows the wording of a relevant article of the International Labour Organization's Forced Labour Convention of 1930 was suggested by the representative of the International Labour Organization, and the Committee decided to forward it to the Commission as an alternative text for paragraph 3 (c):

"Minor communal services of a kind, which, being performed by the members of the community in the direct interest of the said community, can therefore be considered as normal civic obligations incumbent upon the members of the community, provided that the members of the community or their direct representatives shall have the right ot be consulted in regard to the need for such services."

---

* The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed that the following text be added after the first sentence of this Article: "The slave trade is forbidden in all its forms."

(2) The Commi ee also decided to forward to the Commission, as possible additions to paragraph 3, two further possible limitations submitted by the delegation of the United States;

(d) Service exacted from deserting seamen returned to their ships, having entered into voluntary contracts for a period of service;

(e) Services performed by minors, either in the course of normal family life or pursuant to contracts made in their behalf either by parents or guardians.)

Article 9

(The Drafting Committee voted in favour of the first of the following texts).

I. Text originally forwarded by the Commission on Human Rights, as Amended:

1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

2. In consequence, no person shall be deprived of his liberty save in the case of:

(a) the arrest of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before a court on a reasonable suspicion of having committed a crime or which is reasonably considered to be immediately necessary to prevent his committing a crime;

(b) the lawful arrest and detention of a person for non-compliance with lawful order or decree of a court;

(c) the lawful detention of a person sentenced after conviction to deprivation of liberty;

(d) the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind;

(e) the parental or quasi-parental custody of minors;

(f) the lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country;

(g) the lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation proceedings are pending.

3. Any person who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the charges against him. Any person who is arrested under the provisions of sub-paragraph (a) or (b) of paragraph 2 of this Article shall shall be brought promptly before a judge, and shall be tried within a reasonable time or released.

4. Every one who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall have an ef ective remedy in the nature of "habeas Corpus" by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.

5. Every person shall have an enforceable right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.

(Note:

(Note: A list of all the possible limitation suggested by various governments, together with an analysis of this list, follows the text of this Article proposed by the United States, below).

II. Text Proposed by the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

The inviolability of the human person shall be guaranteed by law. No person shall be subjected to arrest except by order of a court or a prosecuting authority.

Any person who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the charges against him. Every person who is deprived of his liberty shall be brought promptly before a court for an order for the trial of his case within a reasonable time or for his release.

Every person shall have an enforceable right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.

III. Text Proposed by the United States

No one salll be deprived of liberty without due process of law.

No one shall be arrested or detained without being promptly informed of the reasons for the arrest or detention and without being entitled to a fair hearing within a reasonable time or to release.

LIST AND ANALYSIS OF SUGGESTED LIMITATIONS TO ARTICLE 9 OF THE COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

I. In document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 of 7 May 1948 a list of items suggested by Governments for addition to the enumeration contained in Article 9 (2) of the Draft Covenant (document E/600) was circulated, embodying the items suggested in written comments by Governments and, orally, by representatives in the twenty-third meeting of the Committee on 6 May 1948. These limitations are as follows:

1. Arrest and detention of persons suffering from serious contagious disease. (Netherlands, United Kingdom, Norway.)
2. Arrest and detention of alcoholics (Norway).
3. Arrest "flagrante delicto" (Brazil); probably covered by item (a) of Article 9 (2).
4. Arrest for the purpose of removal from one province to another (Union of South Africa).
5. Arrest for the purpose of removal of persons other than aliens (Union of South Africa).
6. Arrest of witnesses in order to bring them before a court (Union of South Africa) or for their protection (United States)
7. Detention of children in need of care (Union of South Africa).
8. Arrests for breach of military discipline (Chile; oral observation in the twenty-third meeting meeting of the Committee on 5 May 1948).
9. Arrest in civil cases usually involving wrong-doing (fraud etc.),in the commencement of an action (United States, oral observations, 5 May 1948).
10. Arrest as a means of satisfaction of a judgement in such actions or by way of punishment in such cases (United States; oral observations, 5 May 1948).
11. Detention of persons listed under Article 8, paragraph 3 of the Geneva draft of the Covenant (this relates to the class of persons who may be subjected to forced or conpulsory labour in connection with military or emergency service, etc.) (United States; oral observations, 5 May 1948).
12. Detention of enemy aliens (United States; oral observations, 5 May 1948).

Subsequently the French Draft Covenant was presented to the Committee (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8) and in the meeting of the Drafting Committee, held on 12 May 1948, the Chairman in her capacity of United States Representative suggested some additional specific limitations of the rights safeguarded in Article 9 of the Draft Covenant.

II. The list

II. The list of restrictions contained in Article VIII of the French Draft is as follows:

(a) the arrest and detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before a court on suspicion of having committed a crime or of preventing the imminent commission of a crime or offence;
(b) the arrest and detention of a person; as provided by law, for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court;
(c) lawful detention in pursuance of a sentence of imprisonment;
(d) the lawful detention of persons of unsound minds;
(e) the lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into a country;
(f) the lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation or extradition proceedings are pending;
(g) the educational supervision of minors.

III. The list of additional specific limitations prepared by the United States Representative and presented on 12 May 1948 is as follows:

(h) the arrest and detention of a person suffering from a serious contagious disease;
(i) the arrest and detention of an alcoholic;
(j) the arrest of witnesses in order to bring them before a court or for their protection;
(k) arrest and detention for breach of military discipline;
(l) arrest and detention in civil cases (tort, or contract cases involving wrong-doing such as fraud, etc.) by way of commencing an action or as a means of satisfaction of a judgment in such cases or by way of punishment in such cases;
(m) the detention of enemy aliens;
(n) the detention of persons under the authority of Article 8, paragraph 3 of the Covenant (relating to the classes of persons who may be subjected to compulsory labour in connection with military or emergency service);
(o) other situations to be enumerated.

IV. The Chinese delegation suggested the following list of possible limitations (E/CN.4/AC.1/23/Add.2):

1. Arrest of persons who violate the provisions of the Covenant;
2. Arrest of persons suspected as spies;
3. Arrest of persosn who trespass prohibited property or areas;
4. Arrest of persons who attempt to or destroy public property;
5. Arrest of persons for disturbing public order such as shouting "Fire" in a theatre when there is no fire;
6. Arrest of persons for speeding while driving through a crowded street in the city;
7. Arrest of persons who attempt to commit suicide.

V. This

V. This analysis is based on the following enumeration of limitations:

1. the limitation already contained in Article 9, sub-paragraph 2 (a) to (g) of the Draft Covenant as adopted at the second session of the Commission in Geneva;
2. the items suggested by Governments and enumerated in document E/CN.4/AC.1/23;
3. the additional specific limitations suggested by the United States of America on 12 May 1948;
4. the limititions suggested by France;
5. the limitations suggested by China.

According to these different lists the Covenant would contain the following limitations of the right to liberty:

(a) Arrest for the purpose of criminal proceedings or prevention of a crime

This item covers item (a) of the Geneva Draft, item (a) of the French Draft and the Brazilian suggestion concerning arrest "flagrante delicto", item 3 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23. In formulating the final text the Commission may wish to have regard to items 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Chinese limitations.

(b) Arrest and detention for non-compliance with a court order

This item covers item (b) of the Geneva Draft and item (b) of the French Draft. In formulating its text regard should be had of item 10 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/2 3, "arrest as a means of satisfaction of a judgement in actions or by way of punishment in civil cases" (United States) and the analogous item (1) of the United States list and further of item (9) of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23, "arrest in civil cases."

(c) The detention of a person sentenced after conviction to deprivation of liberty.

This item covers item (c) of the Geneva Draft and item (c) of the French Draft. In drafting the text, the Committee may wish to have regard to the Chilean proposal listed under item 8 of document E/cn.4/AC.1/23 and the United States proposal listed under (k) which are to the effect that arrests and detentions for breach of military discipline should also be covered.

(d) Detention of persons of unsound mind.

This item covers item (d) of the Geneva Draft and item (d) of the French proposal. With regard to this item note should be taken of the Norwegian proposal, document E/CN.4/AC.1/2; item (2) and the United States proposal, item (i) above, suggested that the Covenant should also cover the case of the arrest and detention of alcoholics.

(e) The parental or quasi-parental custody of minors

This item corresponds to item (e) of the Geneva Draft and to item (g) of the French proposal. It is submitted that, in its formulation, regard should be had to item 7 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23, the South African proposal concerning the detention of children in need of care.

Restrictions on

Restrictions on aliens

(f) The lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country;

(g) The lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation proceedings are pending.

In formulating these two items the Committee may wish to have regard to items (e) and (f) of the French proposal and to item (m) of the United States list. Closely connected with these two items are also the suggestions made by South Africa, items 4 and 5 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23, suggesting an extension of these provisions to cover also arrests for the purpose of removal from one province to another and the removal of persons other than aliens.

VI. Remaining Items

The following three additional items remain:

1. Arrest and detention of persons suffering from serious contagious disease (Netherlands, United Kingdom and United States).

It covers item 1 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 and item (h) of the United States list.

2. Arrest of witnesses (Union of South Africa and United States)

Item 6 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 and item (g) of the United States list.

3. Arrest and detention in connection with services exacted under Article 8 (3).

The United States proposal, item 11 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 and item (n) of the United States list, concerns the detention of persons liable to military service, service in cases of emergency and minor communal services.

Here the Committee may wish to consider to what extent this limitation is covered by the provision to be made for detentions for the breach of military discipline and further, whether services in an emergency, or "Minor communal services" could be considered exceptions from a rule prohibiting arbitrary arrest or detention.

The United States list further contains the item:

4. Other situations to be enumerated;

Article 10

No one shall be imprisoned merely on the grounds of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation.

Article 11

(No decision was made as to which of these texts was preferred.)

(Geneva text)

1. Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State.

2. Any person who is not subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard to national service shall be free to leave any country including his own.

Alternative text

1. No one shall be denied freedom of movement or residence within the borders of a Contracting State.

2. Any one shall be free to leave any country including his own.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible limitations. The list is as follows:

1. Restrictions imposed for the well being of helpless or dependent persons. (United States)
2. Restrictions imposed with respect to land or water constituting a public highway. (United States)
3. Restrictions imposed in the interest of public order, morals, health (e.g. quarantine) or safety. (United States)
4. Restrictions imposed by reason of lawful detentions. (France)
5. Restrictions imposed in accordance with articles 8 and 9. (United States)
6. Restrictions imposed because criminal proceedings are pending against him. (France)
7. Restric ions imposed because his departure must be prohibited in order to prevent the imminent commission of a crime or offence. (France)
8. Restrictions imposed on individuals who are "subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard tonational service tax liabilities or voluntarily contracted obligations binding the individual to the Government". (Netherlands.)
9. Restrictions imposed on an individual because of National Service, or of a judicial order restraining his departure without giving security on account of other alleged outstanding obligations. (United Kingdom)
10. Restrictions imposed on emigration to assist a neighbor country to control ille l immigration. (United Kingdom)
11. Restrictions imposed on emigration in the interest of protecting primitive or unsophisticated communities from exploitation abroad. (United Kingdom)
12. Restrictions imposed where labour has to be controlled and individuals required to work in specified industries and even in specific localities. (Union of South Africa)
13. Restrictions imposed where it is necessary in the interests of peace and good government to proclaim reserved areas in favour of the different sections of the population, and to restrict and control the free movement and free choice of residence on the part of individuals belonging to different sections of the population. (Union of South Africa)

14. Restrictions imposed in the interests of the general welfare and good government ot restrict the influx of large numbers of unskilled labourers into urban areas in circumstances where an adequate supply of labour already exists, and housing accommodation is inadequate. (Union of South Africa))

(Note 2: The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics suggested that the words "subject to the laws of his own country" be added to the second paragraph of this Article)

Article 12

No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State shall be expelled therefrom except in accordance with procedure prescribed by law.

Article 13

(The Drafting Co mittee voted in favour of the first of the following texts.)

A. 1. In the determination of any criminal charge against him or of any of his civil rights or obligations, every one is entitled to a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal.

2. In the determination of any criminal charge against him every one is entitled to:

a) A public trial, though the press and public may be excluded from all or some of the portions thereof, other than the judgment, where considerations of security or morals are involved or the preservation of order in the court requires. Exceptions may be made in the interest of juveniles;

(b) Legal assistance of his own choosing; and

(c) The services of an interpreter to assist the accused if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.

B. Text submitted by the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

1. All persons shall be equal before the court or tribunals. Judges shall be independent and subject only to the law. Legal procedure in every State shall be based on democratic principles. The trial of cases in all courts shall be public, subject to exceptions prescribed by law for the protection of public morals and national security, and the accused person shall be assured the right of defense.

2. When any person who does not know the National language is prosecuted, he shall be assured full knowledge of all the material in the cases through an interpreter and shall also have the right to address the court in his native tongue.

Article 14

1. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

Article 15

No one shall be deprived of his juridical personality.

Article 16

1. No one shall be denied freedom of thought, belief, conscience and religion, including freedom to hold any religious or other belief, and to change his belief.
2. No one shall be denied freedom, either alone or in association, to give and receive any form of religious teaching, and to endeavour to persuade other persons of the truth of his beliefs.
3. No one shall be denied freedom, either alone or in association, to manifest his belief in practice, and in worship and observance, and no one shall be required to do any act which is contrary to such worship and observance.
4. The above rights and freedoms shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public order and health, morals and the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.

(Note: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed to replace Article 16 by the following text (unofficial translation):

"Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and freedom to practice religious observances in accordance with the laws of the country and the dictates of public morality.")

Article 17

(The Drafting Committee did not decide which of the following texts it preferred.)

A. Text submitted by the Representative of France

1. Speech is free. Every person shall be free to express and publish his ideas in any way he chooses.
2. Every person shall be free to receive and disseminate information of all kinds, including facts, critical comment and ideas, by the medium of books, newspapers, oral instructions or in any other manner.
3. The freedoms referred to in the preceding paragraphs may be subject only to the restrictions, penalties or liabilities provided by law for the protection of public order, national security, good morals, respect for law and the reputation or rights of other persons.

B. Text submitted

19. Other statements, expressions or publications which constitute offences or parts of offences under the common law or in terms of statuets, such as blasphemy, trasonable statements, uttering a forged instrument, perjury, contempt of court (covered in the drafts only to the extent to which it may be injurious to the independence of the judiciary or the fair conduct of legal proceedings), the use of indecent, abusive or threatening language in public places, fraudulent statments, statements amounting to crimen injurice, false statements in a prospectus, the offer of any inducement to enter into a hire purchase agreement. (Union of South Africa)

20. The restrictions imposed upon the publications of preparatory examination and trial proceedings, where the offence charged involves any indecent act or an act in the nature of extortion, or upon the publication of information which is likely to reveal the identify of an accused person under nineteen years of age or of a child concerned in proceedings before a children court. (Union of South Africa).

21. The prohibition of the disclosure of information obtained in an official or semi-official capacity, whether or not the disclosure will affect the national safety or the "vital" interests of the State. (Union of South Africa).

22. Restrictions upon the publication of a picture or a public entertainment, where the picture or entertainment is calculated to give offence to the religious convictions or feelings of any section of the public, or where it is calculated to bring any section of the public into ridicule or contempt, or is contrary to the public interest or good morals. (Union of South Africa).

23. Restrictions upon the publication of certain electoral matters. (Union of South Africa)

24. The restrictions imposed by the laws relating to copyright. (Union of South Africa).

25. Restrictions which it may be considered necessary to impose in order to eliminate or control subversive ideological propganada. (Union of South Africa).

Article 18

All persons shall have the right to assemble peaceable for any lawful purpose including the discussion of any matter on which, under Article 17, any person has the right to express and publish his ideas. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of this right other than those prescribed by law and necessary to assure:

(a) national security;
(b) the protection of persons or property;
(c) the prevention of the obstruction of traffic or the free movement of others; or
(d) the protection of health or morals.

(Note: 1. An additional restriction was suggested as follows:

The prevention of foreign political interference. (Netherlands)

Note: 2. The Government of the Netherlands suggested:

(a) That a clause be added making public meetings subject to official authorization; and

B. Text submitted by the Representative of the Soviet Union

1. In accordance with the principles of democracy and in the interests of strengthening international co-operation and world peace, every person shall be guaranteed by the law the right to the free expression of his opinions and, in particular, to freedom of artistic representation. The use of freedom of speech and of the press for the purposes of propagating Fascism and aggression or of inciting war between nations shall not be tolerated.

2. In order to ensure the right of the free expression of opinion for large sections of the peoples and for their organizations, State assistance and co-operation shall be given in providing the material resources (premises, printing presses, paper and the like) necessary for the publication of democratic organs of the press.

C. Text submitted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information.

1. Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and the right to freedom of expression without interference by governmental action; these rights shall include freedom to hold opinions, to seek, receive and impart information and ideas, regardless of frontiers, either orally, by written or printed matter, in the form of art, or by legally operated visual or auditory devices.

2. The right to freedom of expression carries with it duties and responsibilities and may, therefore, be subject to penalities liabilities or restrictions clearly defined by law, but only with regard to:

(a) matters which must remain secret in the interests of national safety.
(b) expressions which incite persons to alter by violence the system of Government;
(c) expressions which directly incite persons to commit criminal acts;
(d) expressions which are obscene;
(e) expressions injurious to the fair conduct of legal proceedings;
(f) infringements of literary or artisitic rights
(g) expressions about other persons natural or legal which defame their reputations or are otherwise injurious to them without benefiting the public;
(h) the systematic diffusion of deliberately false or distorted reports which undermine friendly relations between peoples and states.

A State may establish on reasonable terms a right to reply or a similar corrective remedy.

3. Measures shall be taken to promote the freedom of information through the elimination of political, economic, technical and other obstacles which are likely to hinder the free flow of information.

4. Nothing in this Article shall be deemed to affect the right of any State to control the entry of persons into its territory or the period of their residence therein.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible additional limitations.

The list is as follows:

1. The disclousres of professional secrets contrary to law.
2. Disclosures arising out of marital and personal relationships.
3. Expressions which are fraudlent or part of a fraudulent scheme.
4. Expressions detrimental to public decency or morals (for example, detailed crime stories, reports on executions and suicides, sensational court reports.)
5. Matters of contract.
6. Control of advertising or economic matters
7. Proper conduct of political elections or campaigns.
8. Matters affecting the civil service.
9. Disclosures of governmental information (other than in cases involving national safety, for example, in economic and social matters, such as crop reports, income tax reports, recipients of unemployment relief, and pending judicial decisions).
10. Communications with foreign governments.
11. Profanity in public places.
12. Operation of radio broadcasting and similar media without a license.
13. Statements by corporations, partnerships or individuals, in the issue of bonds and shares ot stock.
14 Unforseeable future matters relating to development of new media of information or new social practices.)
(These fourteen possible limitations arose out of discussions at the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information).
15. Expressions about governmental or public authorities, or groups or persons who are all or in part nationals of High Contracting Party or who belong all or in part to a certain race. (Netherlands)
16. The prohibition of the dissemination of information calculated to engender feelings of hostility among inhabitants of various races (Union of South Africa)
17. The prohibition of probibited meetings. (Union of South Africa)
18. The prohibition of opprobrious epithets, jeers or jibes in connection with the fact that any person has continued or returned to work or has refused to work for any employer, or the sending of information as to any such fact to any person in order to prevent any other person from obtaining or retaining employment, etc., etc. (Union of South Africa.)

PART III

Article 23

1. This Covenant shall be open for accession to every State Member of the United Nations or party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice and to every other State which the General Assembly of the United Nations shall, by resolution, declare to be eligible.

2. Accession shall be effected by the deposit of an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and as soon as _____ of the States Members of the United Nations have deposited such instruments the Covenant shall come into force between them. As regards any State which accedes thereafter, the Covenant shall come into froce on the date of the deposit of its instrument of accession.

3. The Secretary General of the United Nations shall inform all members of the United Nations and the other States referred to in paragraph 1 above of the deposit of each instrument of accession.

Article 24

In the case of a Federal State, the following provisions shall apply:

(a) With respect to any Articles of this Covenant which the Federal Government regards as wholly or in part appropriate for federal action, the obligations of the Federal Governments shall, to this extent, be the same as those of parties which are not Federal States;

(b) In respect of Articles which the Federal Government regards as appropriate under its constitutional system, in whole or in part, for action by the constituent States, Provinces, or Cantons, the Federal Government shall bring such provisions, with favourable recommendation, to the notice of the appropriate authorities of the States, Provinces or Cantons at the earliest possible moment.

Article 25

(The Drafting Committee voted in favour of the first of the following texts).

A State party to this Covenant may be at the same time of its accession thereto or at any time thereafter by notification addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations declare that this Covenant shall extend to any of the territories for the international relations of which it is responsible, and the Covenant shall extend to the teritories named in the notification as from the thirtieth day after the date of receipt by the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the notification. The Contracting States undertake, with respect to those territories on behalf of which they do not accede to this Covenant at the time of their accession, to see the consent at the earliest possible moment of the Governments of such territories and to accede forthwith on behalf of and in respect of each such territory, if and when its consent has been obtained.

Text Proposed by the Representative of the Soviet Union

The conditions of the present Covenant shall extend or be applicable both to the metropolitan territory which is signatory to the present Covenant, as well as to all the other territories (non-self-governing, trust, and colonial territories) which are being administered or governed by the metropolitan power in question.

Article 26

(The Drafting Committee decided not to discuss the following Geneva text until the question of implementation has been considered).

1. Amendments to this Covenant shall come into force when they have been adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the General Assembly of the United Nations and ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the parties to this Covenant.

2. When such amendments come into force they shall be binding on those parties which have ratified them, leaving other parties still bound by the provisions of the Covenant which they have accepted by accession, including earlier amendments which they have ratified.

Article 27 (deleted)

(In construing the Articles of this Covenant the several Articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other).

Proposed Additional Article

(The Drafting Committee took no action on the following text, proposed as an additional article by the representative of the United States).

The rights and freedoms set forth in Part II of this Covenant are in addition to and not in derogation of such rights and freedoms as may be guaranteed to all under the laws of any Contracting State. In agreeing to this Covenant, the Contracting Parties recognize that there are other rights and freedoms which may be made the subject of future covenants or conventions.

(b) That it should be understood that the right to assemble does not include the right to hold pageants or processions in the streets.

Note: 3. The Government of the Union of South Africa pointed out that the exceptions did not cover prohibition of a public gathering where the Minister of Justice had reason to apprehend that the gathering would endanger feelings of hostility between different sections of the population of the Union of South Africa).

Article 19

The right of association is recognized provided that right is exercised in whatever form may be appropriate under the law of the State and is directed to lawful aims including the defense and protection of the legitimate interests of the members of the association or the dissemination of information under Article 17. Associations shall enjoy the rights and freedoms set forth in Articles 16 and 17.

Article 20

Equal protection of the law with respect to the enjoyment of any of the rights and freedoms set forth in Part II of this Covenant shall not be denied to any one on account of race (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

Article 21 (deleted)

(Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hostility that constitutes an incitement to violence shall be prohibited by the law of the State).

Article 22

Nothing in this Covenant shall be considered to give any person or State the right to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

(as approved by the UN Commission on Human Rights at its Third Session at Lake Success on June 18, 1948)

PREAMBLE

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world, and

WHEREAS disregard and contempt for human rights resulted, before and during the second world war, in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were one of the supreme issues of the conflict, and

WHEREAS it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled as a last resort to rebel against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by a regime of law, and

WHEREAS the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to re-affirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

WHEREAS Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

WHEREAS a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore the General Assembly

PROCLAIMS this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the population of Member States themselves and among the population of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4

1. No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude.

2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 5

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 6

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement of such discrimination.

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

Article 8

In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Article 9

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

Article 10

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home correspondence or reputation.

Article 11

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.

2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Article 12

1. Everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.

2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

Article 13

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 14

1. Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.

2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the full consent of both intending spouses.

3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

Article 15

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 16

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 17

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association.

Article 19

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through his freely chosen representatives.

2. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.

3. Everyone has the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people.

Article 20

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to the realisation, through national effort and international cooperation, and in accordance with the organisation and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.

Article 21

1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.

2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.

3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 22

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and to social services, adequate for the health and well-being of himself and his family and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to education. Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

2. Education shall be directed to the full development of human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

Article 24

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Article 25

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement.

Article 26

Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 27

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

Article 28

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

UNRESTRICTED
UN Doc. E/CN.4/SR.81
1 July 1948

EXTRACT FROM
SUMMARY RECORD OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST MEETING

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Third Session

Lake Success, New York
Friday 18 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman:	Mrs. Franklin D. ROOSEVELT	United States of America
Rapporteur:	Mr. MALIK	Lebanon
Members:	Mr. HOOD	Australia
	Mr. LEBEAU	Belgium
	Mr. STEPANENKO	Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic
	Mr. LARRAIN	Chile
	Mr. CHANG	China
	Mr. LOUTFI	Egypt
	Mr. ORDONNEAU	France
	Mrs. MEHTA	India
	Mr. QUIJANO	Panama
	Mr. CARPIO	Philippine Republic
	Mr. KLEKOVKIN	Ukrainian Soviet Socialist
	Mr. PAVLOV	Union of Soviet/Republic Socialist Republic
	Mr. WILSON	United Kingdom
	Mr. FONTAINA	Uruguay
	Mr. VILFAN	Yugoslavia

Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations:

Miss SENDER	American Federation of Labor
Mr. VANISTENDAEL	International Federation of Christian Trade Unions
Mr. ROBINOW	World Federation of United Nations Associations

Miss DRENNAN

	Miss DRENNAN	Catholic International Union for Social Service
	Mr. NOLDE	Commission of the Churches on International Affairs
	Mr. MOSKOWITZ	Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations
	Mrs. Van den BERG	International Women's Alliance
	Mrs. PARSONS	International Council of Women
	Miss SCHAEFER	International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues
	Miss ROBB	Liaison Committee of Women's International Associations
	Mr. BIENENFELD	World Jewish Congress
Secretariat:	Mr. HUMPHREY	Director of the Division of Human Rights
	Mr. LAWSON	Secretary of the Commission

* * * *

...the CHAIRMAN asked members of the Commission to express briefly their views on the question of implementation.

Speaking as representative of the United States, she read out document E/CN.4/145 containing the joint proposals of the United States and Chinese delegations on the implementation of the Covenant. She emphasized that those recommendations had been put forward in the form of general principles. As regards implementation proper, the Chinese and United States delegations had tried to confine themselves to as simple a programme as possible, for they felt that, in that particular field, it was necessary to act with caution and only in the light of experience. To make the Covenant acceptable to all -- and the United States hoped that it would be -- the measures proposed for its implementation had, above all, to be realistic.

Mr. HOOD (Australia) was surprised that a proposal concerning implementation, which was in no way related to the work done in Geneva by the Working Group, should be referred to the Commission at a time when it was completing its work.

The Australian delegation felt that the ground had already been prepared and that the Commission had sufficient material at its its disposal to begin drafting the articles concerning implementation. The report drawn up by the Working Group in Geneva should serve as a starting point for the drafting of those texts. That was the meaning of the resolution adopted by the last session of the Economic and Social Council.

Pointing out that several Governments had already announced their approval of the Working Group's recommendation, he reminded the Commission of the plan put forward by Professor Cassin and of the useful memorandum prepared by the Secretariat on the question of petitions.

On the whole, the Australian delegation regarded Professor Cassin's document as extremely constructive, particularly as regards the difficult question of the setting up of a standing Committee.

The Australian Government favoured the creation of an International Court of Human Rights. Plans for such a Court had been approved by a majority at Geneva and its functioning would be directly linked with the system of petitions. The Australian delegation had drawn up proposals for the statute of that Court, corresponding as far as possible to the statue of the International Court of Justice. The document was included among those that would be referred to the Economic and Social Council. If document E/CN.4/145 was a new proposal concerning implementation, it could also be referred to the Council, but he did not see why it had been referred to the Commission at that stage.

Mrs. MEHTA (India) said that her delegation had always laid great stress on the question of implementation. The question could be divided into two stages: after drafting the Covenant, which provided for the measures to be taken by the States to ensure implementation within their territories, the Commission would have to turn to the setting up of international machinery to deal with cases of non-implementation and violation of the Covenant, questions which were all the more difficult as they involved the question of national sovereignty.

The League of Nations used to receive individual petitions. The peoples of the world expected that the United Nations would undertake the same function. The United Nations had already received a large number of representations, and there was a demand, therefore, for an organization to deal with those petitions, not necessarily judicially but in a spirit of conciliation.

The Working Group at Geneva had suggested the creation of a tribunal and of a Standing Committee. The setting up of an ad hoc tribunal had not been viewed with favour by most Governments,

 while

while that of a Standing Committee had, on the contrary, been supported by the majority. The new proposal submitted by the Chinese and United States delegations and relating mostly to the disputes over the violation of Human Rights, did not, however, view the question from the wider angle of the implementation of the Covenant at the request of an individual or a group of individuals; it envisaged the establishment of a committee which would not, however, be authorized to receive individual petitions.

To fill in that gap the Indian delegation proposed that document E/CN.4/145 should be amended as suggested in document E/CN.4/151.

The Indian delegation realized the difficulties raised by dealing with representations from individuals, which were not always from reliable sources. In spite of those apparent difficulties, however, the right to petition the United Nations in connection with the defence of human rights and of fundamental freedoms should not be denied to anyone.

Mr. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) objected on a point of procedure. He felt that, if the Commission were to discuss the question of implementation in general, its debate should be based on the Working Group's report; if the discussion dealt only with new United States and Chinese proposal, then it was not in order, for, in that case, the Commission should also examine the proposals put forward by other delegations.

The CHAIRMAN recalled that, in conformity with the decision taken the previous day, she had asked members of the Commission to state their views on the question of implementation for the Economic and Social Council's information. Document E/CN.4/145 would be forwarded to the Council on the same basis as other plans referred to the Commission, namely proposals of the French delegation, of the Australian delegation and the amendment just proposed by the Indian delegation.

Mr. MALIK (Lebanon) surveyed the history of the question of implementation since the Commission's initial group began work. Recalling the considerable work already accomplished, he suggested that the Commission should decide then and there to draft the articles relating to implementation at its next session. The position of the Working Group dealing with the question of implementation was comparable to that of the Drafting Committee which was drawing up the articles of the Declaration and of the Covenant: The Commission had based its decisions concerning the Declaration on the work of the Drafting Committee, and there was no reason why it should not take any decision on implementation on the

on the basis of the Geneva Working Group's report.

Mr. MALIK reserved the right to submit a draft resolution to that effect.

Mr. LEBEAU (Belgium) remarked that there was no need to stress the importance which his delegation attached to the question of implementation. It would suffice if he recalled that the Rapporteur of the Working Group had been Mr. Dehousse, the Belgian member of that Group.

The stand taken by the Belgian delegation was the one that Mr. Dehousse had always defended, namely that the Declaration on Human Rights might remain a dead letter unless positive measures were initiated to ensure its application by means of the ratification of the Covenant and the adoption of definite articles relating to its implementation.

Mr. Lebeau entirely agreed with the opinion expressed by Mr. Malik, which corresponded closely to the view of his delegation.

Mr. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to know who was responsible for the decision to transmit to the Economic and Social Council the assortment of documents representing the point arrived at in a question on which the Commission was not in a position to take a decision or make recommendations.

Mr. Pavlov stated that it appeared from a perusal of those documents that the idea of implementation did not have the same meaning for all members of the Commission. He noted moreover that it was proposed to set up a whole series of international organs; but there had not yet been any study of the question, and a discussion by the Commission on that subject could only be premature. The Commission should first reach agreement on the Covenant, which it had not yet begun to examine. It would be illogical to begin the examination of the question of implementation before that of the Covenant.

Apart from that point, Mr. Pavlov had two objections of principle to the various proposals submitted during the meeting. The first was that all those proposals infringed upon national sovereignty. They opened the way to inadmissible interference in the domestic affairs of any State by granting to a committee the right to make recommendations to member Governments, a right which belonged to the General Assembly alone. The second objection was that, according to those proposals, international investigations could be conducted on the basis of individual cases, which was likely to increase the causes of friction among the nations.

The

The USSR delegation would, however, put forward only its objection on the question of procedure. It thought that it would be a mistake to discuss implementation at the present stage of the Commission's work. The USSR delegation therefore made a formal proposal to adjourn the examination of the question of implementation, to postpone the transmission of that question to the Economic and Social Council until the Commission itself had studied the questions which had been referred to it, and to append no annexes to the report.

Mr. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that his delegation agreed on the whole with the joint China-United States proposal, and reserved the right to make a more detailed statement in that connection at a later time.

The United Kingdom delegation appreciated the work accomplished by the various delegations, although it did not in all cases agree with the substance of their proposals.

The application and observance of human rights depended, in the final analysis, on world public opinion and on the way in which the Covenant was received. The implementation measures under discussion concerned only one phase of the application of the Covenant; they might be compared to the penal code in international law, namely penalties laid down for individual cases of violation. Mr. Wilson agreed with the USSR representative that implementation measures would restrict the national sovereignty of each State; but that was an unavoidable concomitant of the Covenant which each State could accept or not. The Covenant would be binding upon States in so far as they agreed to be bound by it; it was for the Commission to decide whether it wished to take a further step by providing for the possibility of action against a State in cases of violation. The Commission should, however, exercise great discernment if it decided to take that step, because the various Governments should not be made to feel that any loss of their authority was involved and because it was primarily those Governments which had to ensure the Covenant's application.

Lastly, Mr. Wilson observed that it was impossible at present to foresee which States would sign the Covenant, or what would be their number. In view of that fact, the United Kingdom delegation expressed particular satisfaction with paragraph 3 of the joint China-United States proposal providing for a gradual formulation of implementa tion measures but leaving the actual development of those measures to the States which undertook to apply them, in other words to the signatories to the Covenant.

Mr. BIENENFELD

Mr. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress), while recognizing the excellence of the report submitted by the Geneva Working Group, drew the Commission's attention to the fact that any measures taken to ensure the implementation of the Declaration and the Covenant on Human Rights should apply equally to the implementation of the United Nations Charter, inasmuch as the Charter proclaimed the sanctity of fundamental human rights and in particular the observance of those rights regardless of race, sex, language and religion. There was in fact no reason why the procedure which would be adopted in respect of violations of the Covenant should not apply likewise to violations of the Charter. Mr. Bienenfeld thought, from the discussions which he had had with Mr. Dehousse and Professor Cassin, that they would both have raised that point.

On behalf of his organization, Mr. Bienenfeld expressed the wish that a delegation would sponsor the memorandum published by the World Jewish Congress on that subject on 28 April 1948, and submit it to the next session of the Economic and Social Council.

Mr. CHANG (China) stated that, generally speaking, the Declaration on Human Rights could be said to represent the application of the Charter, while the Covenant was the application of the Declaration. The creation of committees of conciliation or of tribunals to deal with cases of violation was a further degree of implementation. Though the Commission had agreed on the importance of the problem, it had not yet had time to study it in detail. The various proposals which had been submitted in that connection, and in particular the one submitted by Professor Cassin, deserved the Economic and Social Council's attention. In view of those facts, Mr. Chang supported the Rapporteur's proposal that the various proposals received should be transmitted to the Council with the explanation that the Commission had not had time to study them.

Mr. LOUTFI (Egypt) thought that it would be regrettable if the documents transmitted to the Economic and Social Council contained reference to provisions relating to implementation.

For its part, the Egyptian delegation would be in favour of the creation of a permanent committee for the examination of any petitions that might be submitted. Such a committee would fulfil the functions of a conciliator rather than that of judge or umpire. While the Egyptian delegation would have no objection if that committee examined individual petitions, it thought that the committee's work would be facilitated if, in the beginning at least, only petitions sent in by States were accepted, as had been suggested by the Chinese and United States delegations.

 It

It would be a lengthy process to draw up in detail the rules for the presentation and examination of petitions.

As regards the creation of an international court which would pronounce judgment in disputes on human rights, the Egyptian delegation thought that the plan was premature for several reasons, particularly because it would give individuals direct access to international jurisdiction, a principle which few States were as yet prepared to accept.

Mr. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the views of the representatives of China and the United States. The delegation of Uruguay agreed with the suggestion that the joint China-United States proposal should be transmitted to the Economic and Social Council at the same time as the other documents relating to the question of implementation; but it wished it to be clearly understood, as the USSR representative had pointed out, that those documents did not in any way represent the views of the Commission as a whole.

Mr. LARRAIN (Chile) announced his delegation's support of the joint China-United States proposal. The fact that the Commission had not examined the Draft Covenant should not prevent it from transmitting to the Economic and Social Council any documents that were available on the question of implementation. The work which had already been accomplished could prove to be of great use in the Council's debates, and the objections which had been raised were, in the opinion of the Chilean delegation, only of a secondary character. The more comprehensive the documentation submitted to the Economic and Social Council was, the more useful it would be. The Chilean delegation was all the more willing to support the inclusion of document E/CN.4/145 as it thought that the document contained some highly acceptable ideas corresponding to its own views.

Mr. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) understood that the report was to refer to all questions referred by the Economic and Social Council to the Commission for consideration. He wondered, however, whether it would not be exaggerating the importance of the documents, which the Commission had not even had time to study, to reproduce them in extenso in the annex. He suggested as a compromise that the report should contain a short summary of the work accomplished so far on the question of implementation, and should merely indicate the various proposals received by giving their symbol numbers.

Mr. MALIK (Lebanon) stated that he had understood that such a procedure should be applied to Annex C which dealt with the subject of implementation. Annex B, however, being devoted to the Draft Covenant, should contain the whole of the Drafting Committee's report.

Mr. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that, if reference was going to be made to proposals submitted in writing, there was

was no reason why arguments presented orally by other representatives, such as those of the Soviet Union and Egypt, should not also be noted.

As regards the joint China-United States proposal, Mr. Stepanenko felt that it contained questions of principle which should at least be subjected to a thorough examination by the Commission. In his delegation's opinion, some of the provisions contained in that proposal were not acceptable, such as the creation of a committee vested with the right to make recommendations, which belonged to the General Assembly alone.

The delegation of the Byelorussian SSR thought therefore that the Commission should confine itself to informing the Council that, owing to lack of time, it had been unable to examine the various documents which it had received in connection with the Draft Covenant and its implementation.

Mr. CARPIO (Philippines) thought, together with the representatives of the USSR and the Ukrainian SSR, that any discussion on implementation would merely be a waste of time at the present stage of the Commission's work. The Covenant was the only part of the Charter on Human Rights which required implementation measures, and as long as the Draft Covenant had not been dealt with, discussion on its implementation could only be regarded as premature. Mr. Carpio proposed that a vote should be taken on the Rapporteur's report without consideration of the annexes, which were unnecessary in the present circumstances.

Mr. QUIJANO (Panama) stated that his delegation supported the joint China-United States proposal. It thought, however, that, in view of the large number of proposals of which the Commission on Human Rights was seized, the Commission was not in a position to make any recommendation on the subject of implementation. It should therefore inform the Economic and Social Council that it had not had time to study the question and that it thought that its examination should be postponed until the Covenant itself was examined.

The CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR representative's proposal that no annexes should be appended to the report.

The USSR proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

The CHAIRMAN next put to the vote the first suggestion made by the Rapporteur to the effect that Annex B of the Drafting Committee's report should be appended to the report with a statement to the effect that the Commission had had no time to examine the part of the report concerning the Draft Covenant.

The Rapporteur's

The Rapporteur's proposal was adopted by 12 votes to 4.

The CHAIRMAN next put to the vote the second proposal made by the Rapporteur to the effect that paragraph 12 of the report should include a reference to the third part of the Commission's last report to the Economic and Social Council (Geneva session) stating that the Commission had had no time to examine the question of implementation, but that it was appending in Annex C the statement made by Professor Cassin on the question as well as the proposals submitted by the representatives of the United States, of China and of Australia.

Mr. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that statements on implementation made by certain delegations at the present meeting should also be appended to the report.

Mr. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that the annex dealing with the question of implementation should include only references to the appropriate documents specifying their symbol numbers. Delegations which wished their statements to be mentioned could have them distributed as Commission documents.

The Commission decided by 14 votes, with 2 abstentions, that delegations which wished that the report should include mention of their statements on the question of implementation should have those statements distributed as Commission documents.

The Commission decided by 12 votes to 3, with 1 abstention, that the annex to the report dealing with the question of implementation should include only references to documents concerning implementation indicating their symbol numbers.

Mr. MALIK (Lebanon) asked the Commission to state its views on the following draft resolution, on the basis of which it could, at its next session, start drafting articles concerning implementation.

> "The Commission decides that further work on implementation is of the utmost importance and that therefore it should embark on this work at its fourth session on the basis of the Report of the Working Group on implementation at the second session of the Commission, taking into account the other documentation [listed] in Annexes B and C."

In reply to a question by Mr. WILSON (United Kingdom), Mr. Malik made it clear that his resolution by no means excluded any other documents which might be submitted at a later stage.

Mr. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that his delegation had always held that the question of implementation should be studied studied on parallel lines with the Covenant. For that reason he suggested that the words: "together with work on the Covenant" should be inserted after the words: "it should embark on this work".

The USSR representative's proposal was adopted unanimously. The resolution submitted by the representative of Lebanon was adopted by 13 votes, with 4 abstentions.

UNRESTRICTED

UN DOC. E/CN.4/145
16 June 1948

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Third Session

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES: PROPOSAL ON IMPLEMENTATION

FOR THE COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

1. Procedures for dealing with violations of the Covenant should be developed gradually in the light of experience.

2. To start with, provision may be made on the following lines for dealing with complaints by Covenanting States of violations of the Covenant:

(a) Covenanting States shall settle complaints arising under the Covenant so far as possible by direct negotiation;
(b) Provision for the appointment of a Committee by Covenanting States shall be made in the Covenant, to which a matter not settled by negotiation or otherwise within a reasonable time should be referred by a Covenanting State or States concerned. The Committee shall consider a complaint referred to it and, in view of all the circumstances, make a recommendation addressed to the State or States concerned, looking to an amicable solution;

(c) States may in any event have such recourse to the International Court of Justice as is provided in the Charter of the United Nations and the Statute of the Court;
(d) Any State charged with a violation of the Covenant or the Committee referred to in paragraph (b) may request the Economic and Social Council to secure an Advisory Opinion from the International Court of Justice, as provided in the Charter of the United Nations and the Statute of the Court, on any legal question involved.

3. A reasonable time after the coming into force of the Covenant, Covenanting States should consider whether further measures of implementation are desirable, including measures concerning petitions from individuals, organizations and groups.

4. It is not necessary to create an International Court of Human Rights or a special chamber of the International Court of Justice at least until some experience has been gained of the operation of the Covenant and of the implementation machinery described above.

UNRESTRICTED

UNRESTRICTED

UN Doc. E/CN.4/151
17 June 1948

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Third Session

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

INDIA: AMENDMENT TO CHINA-UNITED STATES OF AMERICA PROPOSAL ON IMPLEMENTATION FOR THE COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS (E/CN.4/145)

Add after the words "Covenanting State or States concerned" in Item (b) the following:

(b1) Provision shall also be made in the Covenant whereby the Committee shall have like power in regard to complaints referred to it by individuals, organizations, or groups concerning a community or body of persons generally.

(b2) The Committee shall consider a complaint referred to it and, in view of all the circumstances, make a recommendation addressed to the State or States concerned, looking to an amicable solution.*

---

* As in the original text.

UNRESTRICTED
UN Doc. E/CN.4/153
21 June 1948

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Third Session

INDIA: PROPOSAL ON IMPLEMENTATION

The Indian delegation has always laid great stress on implementation of human rights. These rights have to be implemented in the first instance by the States themselves, and provision for the state machinery for implementation has been made in the draft covenant. We are here concerned with an international machinery which it is felt is necessary when the States fail to do so. This is a difficult question as it involves the question of national sovereignty.

Among the schemes so far received, the Australian scheme was the most comprehensive. This scheme was examined by the working group appointed at the second session of the Commission at Geneva. It is unfortunate that the report of the working group has not been considered by the Commission due to lack of time.

We have now the United States-China proposals before us. They deal with disputes between two States over the violation of human rights or fundamental freedoms. The machinery for liquidation of such disputes is already there in the Charter. Further, a covenant between States is in the nature of things enforceable between the States inter se under International Law. The scheme, therefore, merely deals with a matter of detail concerning the covenant. It leaves aside the more momentous question of implementing human rights and fundamental freedoms at the instance of aggrieved humanity.

The League of Nations used to receive representations from individuals or groups in a certain description of cases. The peoples of the world expect that this function of the League of Nations should be undertaken by the United Nations. The result has been that the United Nations has received a large number of representations from individuals and organizations regarding the violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms. There is a demand, therefore, for an organization to deal with these petitions not necessarily judicially but in a spirit of conciliation.

It was this consideration which moved the working group at Geneva to put forward a scheme for dealing with these representations judicially by a tribunal, and extra-judicially through a Standing Committee. The scheme was sent for comments to various Governments. The comments received up to now demonstrate that though the setting up of a tribunal is not

is not viewed with favour, the setting up of a Standing Committee is considered a not unsatisfactory solution for dealing with the representations.

The United States-China scheme has also accepted the principle of setting up a committee, but it is not empowered to receive representations from individuals, groups of individuals or organizations to begin with. This is a lecuna which I have tried to remove by my amendment.

I realize the difficulties in the way of dealing with representations from individuals. Such representations will not always be reliable. They may be malicious and even frivolous. But it will not be difficult to weed out such petitions. The committee will not be a judicial committee but a conciliation committee. In spite of these apparent difficulties, therefore, the right to petition the United Nations should not be denied to the individuals, and the committee proposed to be set up should in my opinion be empowered to receive such petitions.

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

Third Session

Meeting held on 15 June 1948

STATEMENT BY MR. RENE CASSIN, REPRESENTATIVE OF FRANCE

ON THE IMPLEMENTATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Madam Chairman,

I want first to thank you and all my colleagues on the Commission for granting me this opportunity - before my quite unavoidable premature departure - of broaching the question of the "implementation" of human rights which appeared under Item 2 of our agenda, and allowing me to hold up for a few moments the approaching completion of our laborious discussions on the International Declaration, the Preamble, Articles 2 and 20, and the last but extremely important articles designed to link the Declaration to the Conventions between States, the first of which has been studied by the Drafting Committee.

1. As has been well said, we must not only proclaim the essential human rights and briefly specify on whom the obligations rest, but also delimit these rights and specify how respect for them can be ensured.

This last part of our work is by no means irrelevant to the Declaration, for the human rights which existed before the Charter of the United Nations, a fortiori exist long before we formulate them in the Declaration. Nor must it be forgotten that a Declaration, basic instrument of the General Assembly, implies certain aspects which are binding per se, for example, the decision of the United Nations to offer its assistance to States Members and the specialized agencies in drawing up future Conventions, or the decision to set up an auxiliary body. In other respects, however, the Declaration will have the character of a recommendation. Such will be the case when it calls on States Members gradually to bring their legislation into conformity with the principles formulated in it, and to set up, within the sphere of their jurisdiction, systems of appeal to judicial and administrative bodies, in order to prevent and, if necessary, correct or suppress such violations of human rights as may have been committed within their territory.

2. The French Government attaches major importance to the active cooperation with the United Nations to which the States Members pledged themselves jointly and severally under Article 56 of the Charter.

Nor does

Nor does my Government fail to appreciate what a significant innovation it will be if the United Nations establishes a body of positive measures designed to ensure some degree of international supervision over the respect actually accorded to human rights in each State.

However, in the Constitution adopted in France in October 1946, my country declared herself ready, "on condition of reciprocity, to accept the limitations of sovereignty necessary to the organization and defense of peace."

The events preceding the Second World War, in which millions of men lost their lives, have proved that the organization of peace may require some limitation, on the basis of reciprocity, of the traditional sovereignty of States in this respect. I was personally present at the dramatic debates which took place at Geneva between March and October 1933. At that time the only way in which the criminal actions of Hitler Germany towards her own nationals could be brought to the notice of the Council of the League of Nations was to resort to the indirect procedure of invoking the Polish-German treaty on the protection of minorities concluded in 1922. On the day on which the Assembly dared to refer to the general principles authorizing the legally organized international community to protect human rights, even in a sphere not covered by some special minority treaty, Hitler took advantage of the Third Reich's absolute sovereignty over its citizens and denied the League of Nations any right of inspection; and on 14 October 1933, Germany left the League. It is well known what attacks against the national independence and what massacres sprang from the impunity with which Hitler's first great crimes were committed.

The United Nations has a new Charter, deliberately more comphrensive than the former Covenant of the League of Nations, precisely in order that this right of the international community to keep an eye on national affairs may no longer be contested and in order that it should be much more difficult for the errors which jeopardized peace between 1933 and 1939 to recur.

The legal competence of the United Nations is therefore, in principle, incontestable under the Charter. Precedent in General Assembly and even in the Economic and Social Council has already affirmed this in connection with certain important matters brought to the Assembly's notice by States as early as 1946. There is even less doubt of the Security Council's competence as soon as the Council has established that peace is endangered; for when that happens the application of the measures provided for in Chapter VII wholly neutralizes the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter.

3. Yet, when international law takes cognizance of the individual with a view to protecting him (just as the Statute of the Military Tribunal of Nuremberg took direct cognizance of the major war criminals as individuals with a view to punishing them) any programme for the international implementation of human rights must, at the present stage of the law of nations, be in a form acceptable to States.

The French Government which is responsible for security and peace in territories inhabited by more than 100 million human beings belonging to civilizations of the most varied types and which has decided to apply, as scrupulously as possible in its own territories, the principles of human rights of which France has been so long the champion, has for this reason decided to submit to the Commission, as a continuation of the work of our Working Group in Geneva and as a pendant to its draft of a first Covenant on Human Rights, a number of proposals (Articles 27 to 37) relating to implementation (document E/CN/4/82,Add.10 17 May 1948).

4. I shall not make long comments on these articles. Their main purpose is to establish a Commission of 11 members, directly elected for a period of three years by the General Assembly of the United Nations, on the basis of their personal competence and standing, responsible for ensuring that the human rights and fundamental freedoms defined in the previous articles of the Draft Covenant are respected.

The Commission will be assisted by a permanent Secretary-General, who is also elected and will have a threefold task:

(a) In the first place it will consider the provisions of the laws and regulations in force in the various States, and of the agreements bet een them, and administrative, executory and final decisions, with a view to verifying that they are consistent with the provisions of the Covenant.

In this respect the work of the new Commission (which will meet at least three times a year) will be even more important that that carried out within the International Labour Organization, with a view to checking the application by members of ratified conventions and, more specifically, examining the annual reports referred to in the new Article 22 of the ILO Constitution and making recommendations to States which have not yet ratified particular conventions. This precedent might be used as a model for a system of periodical reports.

(b) The Commission spoken of in the French Government's proposal has another andeven more delicate task, that of examining applications submitted not only by States, parties to the Covenant but by non-governmental organizations or by private persons, even when such applications deal with particular cases.

To carry out this task, the Commission is to be empowered to conduct investigations. It may draw on any sources of information it deems necessary. It may, if authorized to do so by so by the Assembly of the United Nations '(Article 96, paragraph 2 of the Charter) request the International Court of Justice to give advisory ooinions on legal questions arising within the scope of its activities.

Finally it may make recommendations, based upon its investigations and after discussions with the party or parties concerned, to the Contracting Parties to other organs of the United Nations or to other international organs.

(c) The Commission may propose to the General Assembly of the United Nations any draft recommendations, relating to the Covenant under which it is established.

The Secretary-General will be responsible for the preparation and execution of the work of the Commission, will draw up an annual report on its activities and have the right to submit proposals to the Commission for action.

5. Members of the Commission on Human Rights will see at once that, under Article 36 of the French proposal, the Covenant will not affect the operation of organization established by the Economic and Social Council within the sphere of its jurisdiction and, hence, will not effect the Commission's own activity.

The reason for this provision is that in practice the Economic and Social Council has so far given no organ - not even the Commission on Human Rights - the power to make a full investigation of communications or petitions, which it was requested to grant in May 1946 pending the establishment of an ad hoc organization. Moreover, during the last two years the Economic and Social Council has shown no desire itself to examine all these communications or petitions many of which border on the political in character. The present system for examining communications and petitions affecting human rights cannot be described as satisfactory.

The establishment of the Commission proposed by France would therefore not only meet the desires of eminent jurists and publicists and the suggestions made by the Working Group of our Commission at Geneva in December 1947, but would meet the wishes expressed in the written comments of some governments, such as the Netherlands Government, and satisfy the Economic and Social Council itself, which, as early as June 1946, recognized the necessity of securing a practical implementation of human rights. On many occasions, and again in February 1948, the Council instructed our Commission to submit detailed recommendation on this subject. Nor should we, on the difficult question of petitions, omit to mention the Secretariat studies issued on 19 May (E/CN/.4/92 and 93). The second of these documents is, it may be said, an anticipated set of regulations; it is much more detailed than the French draft which is intentionally expressed in summary form.

6. The institution

6. The institution contemplated in the French draft has the further characteristic that it is open not only to the States parties to the Covenant but also to non-governmental organizations and even to private individuals, on condition, however, that the application or petition concerns respect for human rights The connection between this provision and Article 20 of the Draft International Declaration has already been noticed; this connection is clarified and limited in the French Government's own draft.

We know that in the drafts, as they now stand, of the Governments of several great nations, States alone are given rights of submitting to an ad hoc Committee of Conciliation between the parties concerned complaints respecting manifest and serious violations of human rights in another State (E/CN.4/AC.1/19).

The system advocated also differs from that laid down in the Consititution of the International Labour Organization (Articles 24, 26, 27 and 1 of the Constitution), under which questions are submitted to the Governing Body either by a State or by representatives at the Labour Conference.

The dominant idea is that in questions concerning huma rights it is morally impossible to declare petitions a priori inadmissible unless they are sponsored by a State. The situation differs from that arising when labour conventions are violated, because there collective interests are affected whenever an individual worker is injured.

7. Moreover, the system advocated in the French draft is the beginning of a system of common law applicable to all cases except those for which private proceedings are prescribed by convention in such matters as the regulation of labour (Article 35), the protection of the right to life (draft convention on genocide) or any other similar case.

Its chosen field is that of the rights and freedoms defined in this first Covenant. It may be extended to other rights but only if, owning to the special nature of such rights, as for example the right to nationality, to sanctuary, etc., private proceedings cannot be resorted to.

As thus contemplated, the French draft may seem bold to some. Yet the very short experience of the investigating powers given to the Trusteeship Council under the Charter (Article 87) is quite encouraging. While not wishing to identify the organization and the powers of the future commission with those of the Trusteeship Council, its incomparable value as precedent cannot be rejected out of hand. At the present time there are no human rights better guaranteed internationally that those of the inhabitants of territories entrusted to the administration of a Power under a régime of international trusteeship.

The French

The French Government is moreover conscious of the enormous burden which might weigh on the new commission if it had, indiscriminately, to deal with thousands of petitions of very minor importance or futile. Hence my Government would welcome any reasonable suggestions which, in conformity with the views of the Working Group, would favour the establishment of one or more agencies to screen the petitions either according to their origin (cases of groups or individuals, resident in countries not parties to the Covenant, and who voice grievances about matters originating on the teritory of a contracting party, for example), or to the registration and degr-e of priority to be given to any one complaint either automatically (complaints supported by a contracting State) or Cognita causa (complaints supported by a non-governmental organization enjoying consultative status A or B), etc.

8. The French draft plan for implementation does not for the time being go beyond the stage of enquiry, conciliation and recommendation at any rate in so far as the future examining commission is concerned. The functions of the Security Council will not, of course, be infringed.

We are not, however, ruling out the possibility of considering the establishment of international judicial guarantees of human rights as a human being's last remedy. Not only the great civic organizations (like the Ligue francaise des droits de l'homme* but out own Working Group at Geneva have declared themselves in favour of a court to try such matters. The French Government highly esteems the idea behind the Australian Government's draft proposal for the creation of an International Court of Human Rights. It also knows that at Bogata the American Republics decided that the draft proposal for an Inter-American Regional Court of Human Rights should be studied. The European Congress held at the Hague early in May this year expressed a similar wish.

The French Government realizes, however, that progress should be gradual along a path in which justice must be supported not only by possible emotion but by experience and courage on the part of the nations: hence it does not believe that the time has yet come for it to make positive proposals in this direction. There are too many federal States in the world in which the central authority cannot review judicially the actions and decisions of States or provinces.

Moreover, it is very important not to dissipate our efforts. If, as we hope, the Draft Convention on Genocide soon becomes a reality, the first task will be to organize the criminalchamber of the International Court or the Crminal Court which will be responsible for the punishment of the worst cases.

As things

* French League for Human Rights (Unofficial translation)

As things are, legal questions concerning the breach of the proposed Covenant may in any case be submitted to the Hague Court, even without any special clauses, by the mere application of Article 36 of its Statute. The procedure of obtaining advisory opinions, moreover, may be set in motion by the new examining commission, if the United Nations General Assembly follows the French suggestions.

What I am in a position to say is that as soon as our Government finds it possible to advocate the establishment of special international judicial proceedings in matters of human rights, without prejudice to the universal or regional, general or special character of the tribunal declared competent or to the possible exclusion of the Court of Justice at The Hague, to which our country is very attached - the only way in which we can visualize the organization of such a mode of redress is that there will have to be a United Nations Attorney-General.

There are three reasons for this: the first is the very great importance of the precedent of the international Prosecution at Nuremberg, a fortunate precendent which cannot be limited to penal matters;

The second is the need for precations lest the delicate and often very serious disputes liable to arise on the subject of human rights be laid open to the charge of being fomented by one State politically interested in bringing another State into disrepute with its own nationals. It is essential that the authority which has the formidable responsibility of bringing before the Court of International Justice a case of violation of human rights not settled by a recommendation of the investigating commission, should be a true incarnation of the international juridical community and not a personally 'interested' party;

The third reason is that in the present state of international law the Court of International Justice only decides cases between States. Whilst it is proposed to enable the individual to appear in an international court in proceedings against his own State, there are objections to carrying out an ill-prepared revolution in the law, an upheaval which would be all the more dangerous, if ill-prepared, on account of the great interests involved. The 'cover' of the United Nations Attorney-General would be a necessary transition for an unforeseeable period but it would be the sine qua non of the institution of any appellate proceedings in these matters.

9. I have finished, although the subject is one which should receive much fuller development, both as regards the French proposal and the outline which I have given of it.

I should

I should like to stress the following conclusions: first, the States Members of the United Nations, in signing the Charter, have given a positive pledge to work for the effective respect of human rights in co-operation with the United Nations; that is the unshakeable foundation of any measure to be applied internationally.

Secondly, it is our duty to submit positive proposals to the Economic and Social Council and through it to the United Nations General Assembly. The hour has come to give some practical effect to the mandate enstrusted to us. At a time when many illusions are falling to the ground, the Human Rights Commission cannot be a cause of disillusionment.

Thirdly, the terrible prcedent of 1933 must always be present in our minds. In order to get States into the habit of bringing their legislation and their administrative measures into line with the General Declaration on Human Rights and this or that Covenant designed to facilitate respect for human rights, the first step must be to rely on their good faith and good will and to help them to achieve the necessary evolution. At the internationa level, the carefully organized machinery for both voluntary contact and conciliation is a powerful agent in transforming ideas and customs.

Fourthly, the organization of a complete international society in which international law takes cognizance of the individual, postulates the establishment of appellate proceedings for his benefit. We must begin here and now to study the matter, follow up the progress made in some spheres, and contemplate the creation of institutions of general interest like the United Nations Attorney-General, as a part of any such structure.

The French Government wishes at this juncture to offer a positive contribution capable of being put into effect within a short time. It would be happy if, thanks to the support of other governments, its amended plan could provide one of the bases for the future Charter of human rights, which would itself always be perfectible.

There are so many abuses, so much injustice and suffering that we cannot delay any longer in proceeding with our task.

UNRESTRICTED

UN DOC. E/CN.4/AC.1/27
10 May 1948

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

DRAFTING COMMITTEE

SECOND SESSION

AUSTRALIA: DRAFT PROPOSALS FOR AN INTERNATIONAL COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The following proposals are intended to give effect to the decisions of the Commission's working group on implementation.

It is proposed that the following draft articles relating to the Court of Human Rights be inserted in the Covenant:

"Draft Articles for Inclusion in Covenant
International Court of Human Rights

1. There is established an International Court of Human Rights. The Court shall be constituted and shall function in accordance with the Statute of the Court, which forms an integral part of this Covenant.

2. All parties to this Covenant are ipso facto parties to the Statute of the Court.

3. (1) Each party to this Covenant undertakes to comply with the decision of the Court in any case to which it is a party.
(2) If any party fails to perform the obligations incumbent upon it under a judgment rendered by the Court, the other party or the Commission on Human Rights may have recourse to the General Assembly of the United Nations, which may, if it deems necessary, make recommendations as to measures to be taken to give effect to the judgment.

4. The Commission on Human Rights may request the Court to give an advisory opinion on any question relating to human rights or fundamental freedoms.

5. The Court shall make an annual report to the Economic and Social Council on the working of the Court in relation to the rights and freedoms within its jurisdiction. The Court may also make other reports to the Economic and Social Council if and when it thinks proper to do so."

The

The following is a draft Statute of the Court. It is based to a large extent on the Statute of the International Court of Justice although it has not been thought necessary to make detailed provisions as to its procedure. It appears to us that the Court of Human Rights is a new concept and the procedure adopted by it should be as flexible as is necessary to ensure its adequate functioning in the field which is assigned to it.

Article 1

The International Court of Human Rights established by the Covenant on Human Rights shall be constituted and shall function in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

Organization of the Court

Article 2

The Court shall be composed of a body of independent judges, elected regardless of their nationality from among persons of high moral character who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices.

Article 3

1. The Court shall consist of six members, no two of whom may be nationals of the same State.
2. A person who for the purposes of membership in the Court could be regarded as a national of more than one State shall be deemed to be a national of the one in which he ordinarily exercises civil and political rights.

Article 4

1. The members of the Court shall be elected by the General Assembly of the United Nations on the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council.

2. The members of the Court shall be recommended and elected from a list of candidates nominated by States Members of the United Nations, each of whom shall be entitled to nominate one candidate.

Article 5

1. The members of the Court shall be elected for nine years and may be re-elected; provided however that of the judges elected at the first election, the terms of two judges shall expire at the end of three years; and the terms of two more judges shall expire at the end of six years.
2. The judges whose terms are to expire at the end of the above-mentioned periods of three and six years shall be chosen by lot to be drawn by the Secretary-General immediately after the first election has been completed.
3. The members of the Court shall continue to discharge their duties until their places are filled. Though replaced, they shall finish any cases which they may have begun.
4. In the case of resignation of a member of the Court, the resignation shall shall be addressed to the President of the Court for transmission to the Secretary-General. This last notification makes the place vacant.

Article 6

1. Vacancies shall be filled by the same method as that laid down for the first election.

2. A member of the Court elected to replace a member whose term of office has not expired shall hold office for the remainder of his predecessor's term.

Article 7

1. No member of the Court may exercise any political or administrative function, or engage in any other occupation of a professional nature.

2. No member of the Court may act as agent, counsel or advocate in any case.

3. Any doubt on these matters shall be settled by decision of the Court.

Article 8

1. No member of the Court can be dismissed unless, in the unanimous opinion of the other members, he has ceased to fulfil the required conditions.

2. Formal notification thereof shall be made to the Secretary-General by the Registrar.

3. This notification makes the place vacant.

Article 9

The members of the Court, when engaged on the business of the Court, shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immuhities.

Article 10

Every member of the Court shall, before taking up his duties, make a solemn declaration in open Court that he will exercise his powers impartially and conscientiously.

Article 11

1. The Court shall elect its President and Vice-President for three years; they may be re-elected.

2. The Court shall appoint its Registrar and may provide for the appointment of such other officers as may be necessary.

Article 12

Article 12

The seat of the Court shall be established at The Hague. This, however, shall not prevent the Court from sitting and exercising its functions elsewhere whenever the Court considers it desirable.

Article 13

1. The Court shall remain permanently in Session, except during the judicial vacations, the dates and duration of which shall be fixed by the Court.

2. Members of the Court are entitled to periodic leave, the dates and duration of which shall be fixed by the Court.

3. Members of the Court shall be bound, unless they are on leave or prevented from attending by illness or other serious reasons duly explained to the President, to hold themselves permanently at the disposal of the Court.

Article 14

A quorum of three judges shall suffice to constitute the Court.

Article 15

1. Each member of the Court shall receive an annual salary.

2. The President shall receive a special annual allowance.

3. The Vice-President shall receive an allowance for every day on which he acts as President.

4. These salaries and allowances shall be fixed by the General Assembly. They shall not be decreased during the term of office.

5. The salary of the Registrar shall be fixed by the General Assembly on the proposal of the Court.

6. Regulations made by the General Assembly shall fix the conditions under which retirement pensions may be given to members of the Court and to the Registrar, and the conditions under which members of the Court and the Registrar shall have their travelling expenses paid.

7. The above salaries and allowances shall be free of all taxation.

Article 16

Article 16

The expenses of the Court shall be borne by the United Nations in such a manner as shall be decided by the General Assembly.

Competence of the Court

Article 17

1. The following may be parties in cases before the Court:

(a) States
(b) individuals
(c) groups of individuals
(d) associations, whether national or international.

2. The Court, subject to and in conformity with its rules, may request of public international organizations information relevant to cases before it, and shall receive such information presented by such organizations on their own initiative.

Article 18

1. The Court shall be open to the States or nationals of States parties to the present Statute.

2. The conditions under which the Court shall be open to other States or their nationals, shall, subject to the special provisions contained in treaties in force, be laid down by the Economic and Social Council, but in no case shall conditions place the parties in a position of inequality before the Court.

3. Where a State which is not a member of the United Nations or a national of such a State, is a party to a case, the Court shall fix the amount which that party is to contribute towards the expenses of the Court.

Article 19

1. The jurisdiction of the Court shall comprise the following:

(i) All disputes arising out of the interpretation and application of the Covenant on Human Rights referred to it by any party to such Covenant;
(ii) All disputes arising out of the interpretation and application of Articles concerning human rights in any treaty or convention between States referred to it by any party to such treaty or convention;
(iii) All matters concerning the observance of human rights by the parties to such Covenant or to any such treaty or Convention referred referred to it by the Commission on Human Rights.

2. In the event of a dispute as to whether the Court has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

Article 20

1. The Court may refer the whole or part of a dispute which is before it, or any matter arising out of the dispute, to the Commission on Human Rights for investigation and report, and may delegate to that Commission such of the powers of the Court as the Court may deem desirable to enable the Commission to reach a settlement of the dispute by amicable agreement, and may at any time revoke such reference.

2. The Court may also, in relation to any matter referred to it by the Commission on Human Rights, request that Commission to investigate and report to it on the matter in such respects as may be specified by the Court, and for that purpose may delegate to the Commission such of the powers of the Court as the Court may deem desirable, and may at any time revoke such request.

Article 21

The Court in reaching its decision shall apply:

(a) international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting or interested states;
(b) international customs, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;
(c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;
(d) subject to Article 26, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law;
(e) general principles of equity and justice.

Procedure

Article 22

1. The official languages of the Court shall be French and English.

2. The Court shall, at the request of any party, authorize a language other than French or English to be used by that party.

Article 23

1. The Court shall frame rules for carrying out its functions. In particular particular, it shall lay down its own rules of procedure, including the method of presentation of matters to the Court, the procedure to be followed in the conduct of the proceedings and the delivery and promulgation of the judgment. So far as they may be applicable, the procedures adopted by the International Court of Justice shall be followed.

2. The Court may amend such rules from time to time as occasion may require, and may, if it considers it desirable in the interest of a speedy and just determination, suspend any such rule.

Article 24

1. All questions shall be decided by a majority of the judges present.

2. In the event of an equality of votes, the President or the judge who is authorized by him to act in his place, shall have a casting vote.

Article 25

1. The judgment shall state the reasons on which it is based.

2. It shall contain the names of the judges who have taken part in the decision.

3. If the judgment does not represent in whole or in part the unanimous opinion of the judges, any judge shall be entitled to deliver a separate opinion.

Article 26

The decision of the Court has no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case.

Article 27

The judgment is final and without appeal. In the event of dispute as to the meaning or scope of the judgment, the Court shall construe it upon the request of any party.

Article 28

Unless otherwise decided by the Court, each party shall bear its own costs.

Advisory Opinions

Article 29

1. The Court may give an advisory opinion on any question relating to human human rights at the request of the Commission on Human Rights.

2. Questions upon which the advisory opinion of the Court is asked shall be laid before the Court by means of a written request containing an exact statement of the question upon which an opinion is required, and accompanied by all documents likely to throw light upon the question.

Article 30

The court shall adopt rules of procedure for the purpose of carrying out its functions with respect to advisory opinions, and, in so doing, shall be guided by the provisions of the present Statute which apply in contentious cases to the extent to which it recognizes them to be applicable.

Amendment

Article 31

Amendments to the present Statute shall be effected by decision of the General Assembly made by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting.

Article 32

The Court shall have power to propose such amendments to the present Statute as it may deem necessary, through written communications to the Secretary-General, for consideration in conformity with the provisions of Article 31.

UN.DOC. E/CN.4/Add.10
17 May 1948

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

THIRD SESSION

COMMENTS BY GOVERNMENTS ON THE DRAFT INTERNATIONAL DECLARATION ON HUMAN RIGHTS, THE DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS, AND IMPLEMENTATION

COMMUNICATION RECEIVED FROM THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT

Please add the following articles to the Draft Covenant communicated by the French Government and reproduced as document E/CN.4/ 82/Add.8.

Article XXl

A Special Commission consisting of eleven members and established by the General Assembly of the United Nations shall be responsible for ensuring that the human rights and fundamental freedoms as defined in the foregoing articles are respected.

Article XXll

The members of the said commission shall be appointed by a two-thirds majority of the Assembly for their competence and standing, subject to equitable geographical distribution. They shall be elected from a panel of candidates submitted by the Members of the United Nations on the basis of one candidate for each Member. They shall be elected for three years and be re-eligible.

Article XXlll

By the same majority the Assembly shall appoint a permanent Secretary-General to the Commission who shall serve for a period of five years and be re-eligible.

Article XXlV

The Commission shall consider the provisions of the laws and regulations in force in the various States, and of the agreements between them, and administrative, executory and final judicial decisions, with a view to verifying that they are consistent with the provisions of the present Covenant.

Article XXV

The Commission shall be moved by application submitted by a Contracting Party, a non-governmental organization or a private person.

Article XXVl

Article XXVI

The Commission, in cosidering applications, may draw upon any sources of information which it may deem necessary.

Article XXVII

The Commission shall make recommendations to the contracting parties based upon its investigations and after holding discussions with the party or parties concerned.

Such recommendations may be accompanied by all or part of the documents on which they are based.

The Commission may also make recommendations to the other organs of the United Nations and to other international organizations.

Article XXVIII

The Commission may propose draft recommendations to the General Assembly for amendments to the present Covenant.

Article XXIX

The Commission shall establish its own rules of procedure. It shall meet three times a year. Should circumstances so require, it may hold special sessions. Such special sessions shall be called by the Secretary-General at the request of a majority of the members of the Commission.

Article XXX

The Secretary-General shall attend all the meetings of the Commission.

He shall submit an annual report to the Commission on its activities.

He shall classify the applications addressed to the Commission.

He shall be generally responsible for the preparation and execution of the work of the Commission.

He may submit proposals to the Commission for action.

Article XXXI

The Secretary-General shall appoint the staff of the Secretariat in conformity with the staff regulations to be submitted to the Commission for its approval.

Article XXXII

Article XXXII

The Commission, after being duly authorized to do so by the General Assembly of the United Nations in accordance with Article 96, paragraph 2, of the Charter, may request advisory opinions of the International Court of Justice on legal questions arising within the scope of its activities.

Article XXXIII

Article XXIV

The headquarters of the Commission and its Secretariat shall be at Geneva.

The Commission may meet elsewhere if it should desire.

Article XXXV (new)

The Provisions of Articles 21 to 33 shall not be construed as excluding private proceedings which may be prescribed by convention in such matters as the protection of the right to life or the regulation of labour.

Article XXXVI (New)

The present Covenant shall not affect the operation of Organizations established by the Economic and Social Council within the sphere of its jurisdiction.

Article XXXVII

Subject to the provisions of Chapters XII and XIII of the Charter of the United Nations, the present Covenant shall apply to any territory not enjoying full independence in international relations when the State on which it is dependent has acceded to the Convention in its name. If necessary the responsible State shall endeavour to obtain the consent of the competent authorities of such territories for this purpose.

Article XXXVIII

In the case of federal States the provisions of the Present Covenant shall be binding upon the federal State as well as upon the individual States, provinces or cantons.

Article XXXIX

1. Amendments to this Covenant shall come into force when they have been adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the General Assembly of the United Nations and ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the parties to this Covenant.

When

When such amendments come into force they shall be binding on those parties which have ratified them, leaving other parties still bound by the provisions of the Covenant which they have accepted by accession, including earlier amendments which they have ratified.

Article XL

1. (a) This Covenant shall be opened for accession to every Member of the United Nations or State party to the Statue of the International Court of Justice and to any other State which the General Assembly of the United Nations shall, by resolution, have invited to accede.

(b) Accession to the present Covenant shall be effected by the deposit of an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

(c) The Secretary-General of the United Nations shall notify the Members of the United Nations and the other States mentioned in paragraph 1 above of the deposit of each instrument of accession.

2. As regards the States which have acceded, this Covenant shall come into force as soon as two-thirds of the Members of the United Nations have deposited their instruments of accession. As regards any State acceding subsequently, the Covenant shall come into force at the date of the deposit of its instrument of accession.

****

UNRESTRICTED

UN DOC. E/CN.4/154
24 June 1948

COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

THIRD SESSION

STATEMENT

MADE BY THE USSR DELEGATION IN THE COMMISSION ON HUMAN RIGHTS ON

18 MAY 1948 WITH REGARD TO THE DRAFTS AND PROPOSALS ON IMPLEMENTATION

The Soviet delegation has studied the drafts and implementation proposals presented to the Commission on Human Rights, in particular, those submitted by the United States, China, France, Australia and the Working Committee set up by the Commission at its second session. It notes that all these drafts and proposals interpret implementation to mean not a system of measures for ensuring that human rights are implemented and guaranteed in every country by the State and society, but rather, a system of international methods of pressure to be exercised through special organs established for this purpose (e.g. an international court, international committee or a United Nations public prosecutor, etc.), and intended to force individual States to take particular steps connected with execution of the Convention on Human Rights.

It is clear, therefore, that such "implementation" may become a means of interfering in the internal affairs of a State party to the Convention, and of undermining the sovereignty and independence of particular States.

The implementation plan entails the establishment of various international instances in which communications and complaints with regard to the violation of human rights, from both States and Governments and private individuals or associations of such individuals, would be considered. It thus conflicts with the whole system of international public law regulating the relations between States. In addition the plan, if it is adopted, will have the effect of transforming a dispute between a private individual or group of individuals and their State or Government into an international dispute, thereby substantially enlarging the area of international differences, frictions and incidents, unnecessarily burdening and aggravating international relations and undermining the foundations of peace.

Furthermore, the transference to a special committee, special international court or even, as contemplated in some implementation plans to the Commission on Human Rights of the prerogative conferred upon the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council of making recommendations

recommendations to States on questions of human rights would upset the powers as established by the Charter and the distribution of those powers as between the main and auxiliary organs of the United Nations, and would, further encourage interference in the internal affairs of Members of the United Nations which is contrary to the Charter.

Since what is required is an international document calculated to serve the purpose of maintaining and strengthening international peace and developing good neighborly relations between nations, the Soviet delegation disapproves of all the drafts and proposals on implementation presented to the Commission and considers them unsatisfactory.

---

16 - Human Rights

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
Office of Public Affairs
Division of Public Liaison
Washington, D. C.

RECEIVED
SEP 29 1948
Southern Regional Council

ANNOUNCEMENT

September 22, 1948

To Organizations Interested in the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights:

Under cover of Mr. Francis B. Russell's letter of August 20, 1948 you were forwarded as enclosure No. 1 the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights. Mechanical errors which affected the continuity of the text from page 14 to page 20 were made in the pagination and assembling of this document.

In the attached document the pages are numbered and assembled in correct order. This copy should be substituted for enclosure No. 1 of Mr. Russell's letter of August 20, 1948.

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS*

(prepared by the Drafting Committee on An International Bill of Human Rights, being Annex "B" of document E/CN.4/95 and Annex "B" of UN document E/800.)

PART I

PREAMBLE

The States parties hereto, bearing in mind the general principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter and in the Declaration of Human Rights, agree to give effect in this Covenant to certain of the principles specified in the Declaration, as follows:

Article 1

The States parties hereto declare that they recognize the rights and freedoms set forth in Part II hereof as being among the human rights and fundamental freedoms founded on the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

Article 2

Every State party hereto undertakes to ensure:

---

* The Drafting Committee agreed to point out in its Report its view that the Covenant is not self-operative.

 It was agreed by the Drafting Committee that the ideas contained in this text should be included in a Preamble when one is written. It was also agreed to draw attention to the following text submitted by the representative of France: "The States parties hereto, being resolved to give effect to the general principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter and specified in the International Declaration on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on _____, have agreed to conclude a preliminary convention, defining the practical scope of certain of these principles".

(a) through

(a) through adequate laws and procedures to all individuals within its jurisdiction, whether citizens, nationals, persons of foreign nationality or stateless persons, the rights and freedoms set forth in Part II of this Covenant, and further undertakes that such rights and freedoms where not now provided under existing laws and procedures be given effect in its domestic law through the adoption of appropriate laws and procedures;
(b) that any persons whose rights or freedoms as herein defined are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity;
(c) that such remedy shall be enforceable by a judiciary whose independence is secured; and
(d) that the police and executive authorities shall act in support of the enjoyment of these rights and freedoms.

Article 3

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided not to consider the following Geneva text until articles on implementation had been drafted)*:

On receipt of a request to this effect from the Secretary-General of the United Nations made under the authority of a resolution of the General Assembly, the Governement of any party to this Covenant shall supply an explanation as to the manner in which the law of that State gives effect to any of the provisions of this Covenant.

Article 4

(No decision was made as to which of the following alternative texts was preferred.)

I. Text originally submitted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. In time of war or other public emergency, a State may take measures derogating from its obligations under Article 2 above to the extent strictly limited by the exigencies of the situation.
2. (Left over until implementation articles have been drafted.)

II. Text submitted by the Representative of the United States

The obligations imposed by Articles 1 and 2 shall not effect the right of State parties to this Covenant to take action reasonably necessary for the preservation of peace, order or security or the promotion of the general welfare. Such action may be taken only by or pursuant to law, in conformity with Article 20 hereof:

---

* The limitations suggested by the representative of the United States were submitted in each case as illustrative of the problems arising in the absence of a general limitation clause, which the United States prefers.

(Note: The delegation of the United States pointed out:
(1) that the limitations set forth in the Covenant without the additions suggested by other Governments are not all-inclusive;
(2) that certain Governments which have suggested further limitations have stated that their lists are not all-inclusive; and
(3) that the matter of restricting the rights and freedoms of the Covenant arises from many sources of law and that the Commission on Human Rights must find the solution for dealing with the problem caused by the omission of further probable limitations not yet enumerated.)*

---

* The limitations suggested by the representative of the United States were submitted in each case as illustrative of the problems arising in the absence of a general limitation clause, which the United States prefers.

PART II

Article 5

No one shall be deprived of his life save in the execution of the sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible additional limitations. The list is as follow:

1. Suppression of rebellion or riots (Union of South Africa)
Deprivation of life by the military or state officers in a national emergency (United States of America).
2. Self-defense and defense of another (Union of South Africa) (United States of America)
3. Killing in attempting to affect arrests for certain offences. (Union of South Africa)
4. Killing by accident (United States of America)
5. Killing for violation of honour (United States of America)
6. Killing of persons caught in the commission of a felony (United States of America)
7. Killing to prevent an escape (United States of America)
8. Killing by medical operation in absence of gross negligence or malpractice. (United States of America)
9. Killing through a voluntary medical experiment (United States of America)
10. Killing by officers of the law to prevent the commission of a crime (see also supra 6) (United States of America)
11. Killing by officers of the law in a local emergency (United States of America)
12. Killing by a military in time of war (United States of America)

Article 6

No one shall be subjected to any form or physical mutilation or medical or scientific experimentation against his will.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible additional limitations. This list is as follows:

1. Compulsory vaccination. (United States of America)
2. Legitiamte medical and scientific experimentation in hospitals for the insane, with the consent of a parent or guardian of the patient (United States of America)

3. Emergency operations

3. Emergency operations undertaken to save the life of a patient, where the pateint is unable to give his consent or where a person empowered to give consent on behalf of the patient gives such consent. (United States of America)
4. Other limitations may be developed later. (United States of America)

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or to cruel or inhuman indignity.

Article 8*

1. No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
2. No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labor, except as a consequence of a conviction of crime by a competent court.
3. For the purposes of this Article, the term "forced or compulsory labor" shall not include:
   (a) Any service of a purely military character, or service in the case of conscientious objectors, exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws, provided that the service of conscientious objectors be compensated with maintenance and pay not inferior to what a soldier of the lowest rank receives;
   (b) Anvservice exacted in cases of emergencies or calamities threatening the life or well-being of the community;
   (c) Any minor communal services considered as normal civic obligations incumbent upon the members of the community, provided that these obligations have been accepted by the members of the community concerned directly or through their directly elected representatives.

(Note: (1) The following text, which follows the wording of a relevant article of the International Labour Organization's Forced Labour Convention of 1930 was suggested by the representative of the International Labour Organization, and the Committee decided to forward it to the Commission as an alternative text for paragraph 3 (c):

"Minor communal services of a kind, which, being performed by the members of the community in the direct interest of the said community, can therefore be considered as normal civic obligations incumbent upon the members of the community, provided that the members of the community or their direct representatives shall have the right ot be consulted in regard to the need for such services."

---

* The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics proposed that the following text be added after the first sentence of this Article: "The slave trade is forbidden in all its forms."

(2) The Commi ee also decided to forward to the Commission, as possible additions to paragraph 3, two further possible limitations submitted by the delegation of the United States;

(d) Service exacted from deserting seamen returned to their ships, having entered into voluntary contracts for a period of service;

(e) Services performed by minors, either in the course of normal family life or pursuant to contracts made in their behalf either by parents or guardians.)

Article 9

(The Drafting Committee voted in favour of the first of the following texts).

I. Text originally forwarded by the Commission on Human Rights, as Amended:

1. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

2. In consequence, no person shall be deprived of his liberty save in the case of:

(a) the arrest of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before a court on a reasonable suspicion of having committed a crime or which is reasonably considered to be immediately necessary to prevent his committing a crime;

(b) the lawful arrest and detention of a person for non-compliance with lawful order or decree of a court;

(c) the lawful detention of a person sentenced after conviction to deprivation of liberty;

(d) the lawful detention of persons of unsound mind;

(e) the parental or quasi-parental custody of minors;

(f) the lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country;

(g) the lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation proceedings are pending.

3. Any person who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the charges against him. Any person who is arrested under the provisions of sub-paragraph (a) or (b) of paragraph 2 of this Article shall shall be brought promptly before a judge, and shall be tried within a reasonable time or released.

4. Every one who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall have an effective remedy in the nature of "habeas Corpus" by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.

5. Every person shall have an enforceable right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.

(Note:

(Note: A list of all the possible limitation suggested by various governments, together with an analysis of this list, follows the text of this Article proposed by the United Sta es, below).

II. Text Proposed by the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

The inviolability of the human person shall be guaranteed by law. No person shall be subjected to arrest except by order of a court or a prosecuting authority.

Any person who is arrested shall be informed promptly of the charges against him. Every person who is deprived of his liberty shall be brought promptly before a court for an order for the trial of his case within a reasonable time or for his release.

Every person shall have an enforceable right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.

III. Text Proposed by the United States

No one salll be deprived of liberty without due process of law.

No one shall be arrested or detained without being promptly informed of the reasons for the arrest or detention and without being entitled to a fair hearing within a reasonable time or to release.

LIST AND ANALYSIS OF SUGGESTED LIMITATIONS TO ARTICLE 9 OF THE COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

I. In document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 of 7 May 1948 a list of items suggested by Governments for addition to the enumeration contained in Article 9 (2) of the Draft Covenant (document E/600) was circulated, embodying the items suggested in written comments by Governments and, orally, by representatives in the twenty-third meeting of the Committee on 6 May 1948. These limitations are as follows:

1. Arrest and detention of persons suffering from serious contagious disease. (Netherlands, United Kingdom, Norway.)
2. Arrest and detention of alcoholics (Norway).
3. Arrest "flagrante delicto" (Brazil); probably covered by item (a) of Article 9 (2).
4. Arrest for the purpose of removal from one province to another (Union of South Africa).
5. Arrest for the purpose of removal of persons other than aliens (Union of South Africa).
6. Arrest of witnesses in order to bring them before a court (Union of South Africa) or for their protection (United States)
7. Detention of children in need of care (Union of South Africa).
8. Arrests for breach of military discipline (Chile; oral observation in the twenty-third meeting meeting of the Committee on 5 May 1948).
9. Arrest in civil cases usually involving wrong-doing (fraud etc.),in the commencement of an action (United States, oral observations, 5 May 1948).
10. Arrest as a means of satisfaction of a judgement in such actions or by way of punishment in such cases (United States; oral observations, 5 May 1948).
11. Detention of persons listed under Article 8, paragraph 3 of the Geneva draft of the Covenant (this relates to the class of persons who may be subjected to forced or conpulsory labour in connection with military or emergency service, etc.) (United States; oral observations, 5 May 1948).
12. Detention of enemy aliens (United States; oral observations, 5 May 1948).

Subsequently the French Draft Covenant was presented to the Committee (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8) and in the meeting of the Drafting Committee, held on 12 May 1948, the Chairman in her capacity of United States Representative suggested some additional specific limitations of the rights safeguarded in Article 9 of the Draft Covenant.

II. The list

II. The list of restrictions contained in Article VIII of the French Draft is as follows:

(a) the arrest and detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before a court on suspicion of having committed a crime or of preventing the imminent commission of a crime or offence;
(b) the arrest and detention of a person; as provided by law, for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court;
(c) lawful detention in pursuance of a sentence of imprisonment;
(d) the lawful detention of persons of unsound minds;
(e) the lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into a country;
(f) the lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation or extradition proceedings are pending;
(g) the educational supervision of minors.

III. The list of additional specific limitations prepared by the United States Representative and presented on 12 May 1948 is as follows:

(h) the arrest and detention of a person suffering from a serious contagious disease;
(i) the arrest and detention of an alcoholic;
(j) the arrest of witnesses in order to bring them before a court or for their protection;
(k) arrest and detention for breach of military discipline;
(l) arrest and detention in civil cases (tort, or contract cases involving wrong-doing such as fraud, etc.) by way of commencing an action or as a means of satisfaction of a judgment in such cases or by way of punishment in such cases;
(m) the detention of enemy aliens;
(n) the detention of persons under the authority of Article 8, paragraph 3 of the Covenant (relating to the classes of persons who may be subjected to compulsory labour in connection with military or emergency service);
(o) other situations to be enumerated.

IV. The Chinese delegation suggested the following list of possible limitations (E/CN.4/AC.1/23/Add.2):

1. Arrest of persons who violate the provisions of the Covenant;
2. Arrest of persons suspected as spies;
3. Arrest of persosn who trespass prohibited property or areas;
4. Arrest of persons who attempt to or destroy public property;
5. Arrest of persons for disturbing public order such as shouting "Fire" in a theatre when there is no fire;
6. Arrest of persons for speeding while driving through a crowded street in the city;
7. Arrest of persons who attempt to commit suicide.

V. This

V. This analysis is based on the following enumeration of limitations:

1. the limitation already contained in Article 9, sub-paragraph 2 (a) to (g) of the Draft Covenant as adopted at the second session of the Commission in Geneva;
2. the items suggested by Governments and enumerated in document E/CN.4/AC.1/23;
3. the additional specific limitations suggested by the United States of America on 12 May 1948;
4. the limititions suggested by France;
5. the limitations suggested by China.

According to these different lists the Covenant would contain the following limitations of the right to liberty:

(a) Arrest for the purpose of criminal proceedings or prevention of a crime

This item covers item (a) of the Geneva Draft, item (a) of the French Draft and the Brazilian suggestion concerning arrest "flagrante delicto", item 3 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23. In formulating the final text the Commission may wish to have regard to items 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Chinese limitations.

(b) Arrest and detention for non-compliance with a court order

This item covers item (b) of the Geneva Draft and item (b) of the French Draft. In formulating its text regard should be had of item 10 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/2 3, "arrest as a means of satisfaction of a judgement in actions or by way of punishment in civil cases" (United States) and the analogous item (1) of the United States list and further of item (9) of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23, "arrest in civil cases."

(c) The detention of a person sentenced after conviction to deprivation of liberty.

This item covers item (c) of the Geneva Draft and item (c) of the French Draft. In drafting the text, the Committee may wish to have regard to the Chilean proposal listed under item 8 of document E/cn.4/AC.1/23 and the United States proposal listed under (k) which are to the effect that arrests and detentions for breach of military discipline should also be covered.

(d) Detention of persons of unsound mind.

This item covers item (d) of the Geneva Draft and item (d) of the French proposal. With regard to this item note should be taken of the Norwegian proposal, document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 item (2) and the United States proposal, item (i) above, suggested that the Covenant should also cover the case of the arrest and detention of alcoholics.

(e) The parental or quasi-parental custody of minors

This item corresponds to item (e) of the Geneva Draft and to item (g) of the French proposal. It is submitted that, in its formulation, regard should be had to item 7 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23, the South African proposal concerning the detention of children in need of care.

Restrictions on

Restrictions on aliens

(f) The lawful arrest and detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorized entry into the country;

(g) The lawful arrest and detention of aliens against whom deportation proceedings are pending.

In formulating these two items the Committee may wish to have regard to items (e) and (f) of the French proposal and to item (m) of the United States list. Closely connected with these two items are also the suggestions made by South Africa, items 4 and 5 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23, suggesting an extension of these provisions to cover also arrests for the purpose of removal from one province to another and the removal of persons other than aliens.

VI. Remaining Items

The following three additional items remain:

1. Arrest and detention of persons suffering from serious contagious disease (Netherlands, United Kingdom and United States).

It covers item 1 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 and item (h) of the United States list.

2. Arrest of witnesses (Union of South Africa and United States)

Item 6 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 and item (g) of the United States list.

3. Arrest and detention in connection with services exacted under Article 8 (3).

The United States proposal, item 11 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/23 and item (n) of the United States list, concerns the detention of persons liable to military service, service in cases of emergency and minor communal services.

Here the Committee may wish to consider to what extent this limitation is covered by the provision to be made for detentions for the breach of military discipline and further, whether services in an emergency, or "Minor communal services" could be considered exceptions from a rule prohibiting arbitrary arrest or detention.

The United States list further contains the item:

4. Other situations to be enumerated;

Article 10

No one shall be imprisoned merely on the grounds of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation.

Article 11

(No decision was made as to which of these texts was preferred.)
(Geneva text)

1. Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State.

2. Any person who is not subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard to national service shall be free to leave any country including his own.

Alternative text

1. No one shall be denied freedom of movement or residence within the borders of a Contracting State.

2. Any one shall be free to leave any country including his own.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible limitations. The list is as follows:

1. Restrictions imposed for the well being of helpless or dependent persons. (United States)
2. Restrictions imposed with respect to land or water constituting a public highway. (United States)
3. Restrictions imposed in the interest of public order, morals, health (e.g. quarantine) or safety. (United States)
4. Restrictions imposed by reason of lawful detentions. (France)
5. Restrictions imposed in accordance with articles 8 and 9. (United States)
6. Restrictions imposed because criminal proceedings are pending against him. (France)
7. Restrictions imposed because his departure must be prohibited in order to prevent the imminent commission of a crime or offence. (France)
8. Restrictions imposed on individuals who are "subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard tonational service tax liabilities or voluntarily contracted obligations binding the individual to the Government". (Netherlands.)
9. Restrictions imposed on an individual because of National Service, or of a judicial order restraining his departure without giving security on account of other alleged outstanding obligations. (United Kingdom)
10. Restrictions imposed on emigration to assist a neighbor country to control illegal immigration. (United Kingdom)
11. Restrictions imposed on emigration in the interest of protecting primitive or unsophisticated communities from exploitation abroad. (United Kingdom)
12. Restrictions imposed where labour has to be controlled and individuals required to work in specified industries and even in specific localities. (Union of South Africa)
13. Restrictions imposed where it is necessary in the interests of peace and good government to proclaim reserved areas in favour of the different sections of the population, and to restrict and control the free movement and free choice of residence on the part of individuals belonging to different sections of the population. (Union of South Africa)

14. Restrictions imposed in the interests of the general welfare and good government ot restrict the influx of large numbers of unskilled labourers into urban areas in circumstances where an adequate supply of labour already exists, and housing accommodation is inadequate. (Union of South Africa))

(Note 2: The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics suggested that the words "subject to the laws of his own country" be added to the second paragraph of this Article)

Article 12

No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State shall be expelled therefrom except in accordance with procedure prescribed by law.

Article 13

(The Drafting Co mittee voted in favour of the first of the following texts.)

A. 1. In the determination of any criminal charge against him or of any of his civil rights or obligations, every one is entitled to a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal.

2. In the determination of any criminal charge against him every one is entitled to:

a) A public trial, though the press and public may be excluded from all or some of the portions thereof, other than the judgment, where considerations of security or morals are involved or the preservation of order in the court requires. Exceptions may be made in the interest of juveniles;

(b) Legal assitance of his own choosing; and

(c) The services of an interpreter to assist the accused if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.

B. Text submitted by the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

1. All persons shall be equal before the court or tribunals. Judges shall be independent and subject only to the law. Legal procedure in every State shall be based on democratic principles. The trial of cases in all courts shall be public, subject to exceptions prescribed by law for the protection of public morals and national security, and the accused person shall be assured the right of defense.

2. When any person who does not know the National language is prosecuted, he shall be assured full knowledge of all the naterial in the cases through an interpreter and shall also have the right to address the court in his native tongue.

Article 14

1. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence

at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.
2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

Article 15

No one shall be deprived of his juridical personality.

Article 16

1. No one shall be denied freedom of thought, belief, conscience and religion, including freedom to hold any religious or other belief, and to change his belief.
2. No one shall be denied freedom, either alone or in association, to give and receive any form of religious teaching, and to endeavour to persuade other persons of the truth of his beliefs.
3. No one shall be denied freedom, either alone or in association, to manifest his belief in practice, and in worship and observance, and no one shall be required to do any act which is contrary to such worship and observance.
4. The above rights and freedoms shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public order and health, morals and the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.

(Note: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed to replace Article 16 by the following text (unofficial translation):

"Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and freedom to practice religious observances in accordance with the laws of the country and the dictates of public morality.")

Article 17

(The Drafting Committee did not decide which of the following texts it preferred.)

A. Text submitted by the Representative of France

1. Speech is free. Every person shall be free to express and publish his ideas in any way he chooses.
2. Every person shall be free to receive and disseminate information of all kinds, including facts, critical comment and ideas, by the medium of books, newspapers, oral instructions or in any other manner.
3. The freedoms referred to in the preceding paragraphs may be subject only to the restrictions, penalties or liabilities provided by law for the protection of public order, national security, good morals, respect for law and the reputation or rights of other persons.

B. Text submitted

B. Text submitted by the Representative of the Soviet Union

1. In accordance with the principles of democracy and in the interests of strengthening international cooperation and world peace, every person shall be guaranteed by law the right to free expression of his opinions, and, in particular, to freedom of speech and of the press, freedom of assembly and freedom of artistic representation. The use of freedom of speech and of the press for the purposes of propagating Fascism and aggression or of inciting war between nations shall not be tolerated.

2. In order to insure the right of the free expression of opinion for large sections of the peoples and for their organizations, State assistance and cooperation shall be given in providing the material resources (premises, printing press, paper, and the like) necessary for the publication of democratic organs of the press.

C. Text submitted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information

1. Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and the right to freedom of expression without interference of governmental action; these rights shall include freedom to hold opinions, to seek, receive and impart information and ideas, regardless of frontiers, either orally, by written or printed matter, in the form of art, or by legally operated visual or auditory devices.

2. The right to freedom of expression carries with it duties and responsibilities and may, therefore, be subject to penalties, liabilities, or restrictions clearly defined by law, but only with regard to:

(a) matters which must remain secret in the interests of safety;
(b) expressions which incite persons to alter by violence the system of government;
(c) expressions which directly incite persons to commit criminal acts;
(d) expressions which are obscence;
(e) expressions injurious to the fair conduct of legal proceedings.
(f) infringements of literary or artistic rights;
(g) expressions about other persons natural or legal which defame their reputations or are otherwise injurious to them without benefiting the public;
(h) the systematic diffusion of the deliberately false or distorted reports which undermine friendly relations between peoples and states.

A state may establish on reasonable terms a right to reply or a similar corrective remedy.

3. Measures shall be taken to promote the freedom of information through the elimination of political, economic, techinical and other obstacles which are likely to hinder the free flow of information.

4. Nothing in this Article shall be deemed to affect the right of any State to control the entry of persons into its territory or the period of their residence therein.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to forward this text to the Commission together with a list of possible additional limitations.

The list is as follows:

1. The disclosures of professional secrets contrary to law.
2. Disclosures arising out of martial and personal relationships.
3. Expressions which are fraudlent or part of a fraudulent scheme.
4. Expressions detrimental to public decency or morals (for example, detailed crime stories, reports on executions and suicides, sensational court reports.)
5. Matters of contract.
6. Control of advertising or economic matters.
7. Proper conduct of political elections or campaigns.
8. Matters affecting the civil service.
9. Disclosures of governmental information (other than in cases involving national safety, for example, in economic and social matters, such as crop reports, income tax reports, recipients of unemployment relief, and pending judicial decisions.
10. Communications with foreign governments.
11. Profanity in public places.
12. Operation of radio broadcasting and similar media without a license.
13. Statements by corporations, partnerships or individuals, in the issue of bonds and shares of stock.
14. Unforseeable future matters relating to development of new media of information or new social practices.

These fourteen possible limitations arose out of discussions at the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information).

15. Expressions about governmental or public authorities or groups or persons who are all or in part nationals of High Contracting Party or who belong all or in part to a certain race. (Netherlands).
16. The prohibition of the dissemination of information calculated to engender feelings of hostility among inhabitants of various races (Union of South Africa).
17. The prohibition of/notices of prohibited meetings. (Union of S.A.)
18. The prohibition of opprobrious epithets, jeers, or jibes in connection with the fact that any person has continued or returned to work or has refused to work for any employer, or the sending of information as to any such fact to any person in order to prevent any other person from ontaining or retaining employment, etc., etc (Union of South Africa.)

19. Other statements, expressions or publications which constitute offences or parts of offences under the common law or in terms of statuets, such as blasphemy, treasonable statements, uttering a forged instrument, perjury, contempt of court (covered in the drafts only to the extent to which it may be injurious to the independence of the judiciary or the fair conduct of legal proceedings), the use of indecent abusive or threatening language in public places, fraudulent statements, statements amounting to crimen injuriae, false statements in a prospectus, the offer of any inducement to enter into a hire purchase agreement. (Union of South Africa).
20. The restrictions imposed upon the publications of preparatory examination and trial proceedings, where the offence charged involves any indecent act or an act in the nature of extortion, or upon the publication of information which is likely to reveal the identity of an accused person under nineteen years of age or of a child concerned in proceedings before a children court. (Union of South Africa)
21. The prohibition of the disclosure of information obtained in an official or semi-official capacity, whether or not the disclousre will affect the national safety or the "vital" interests of the State (Union of South Africa)
22. Restrictions upon the publication of a picture or a public entertainment, where the picture or entertainment is calculated to give offence to the religious convictions or feelings of any section of the public, or where it is calculated to bring any section of the public into ridicule or contempt, or is contrary to the public interest or good morals. (Union of South Afric).
23. Restrictions upon the public tion of certain electoral matters. (Union of South Africa)
24. The restrictions imposed by the laws relating to copyright. (Union of South Africa).
25. Restrictions which it may xxx be considered necessary to impose in order to eliminate or control subversive ideological propaganda. (Union of South Africa).

Article 18

All persons shall have the right to assemble peacably for any lawful purpose including the discussion of any matter on which, under Article 17, any person has the right to express and publish his ideas. No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of this right other than those prescribed by law and necessary to assure:

(a) national security;
(b) the protection of persons or property;
(c) the prevention of the obstruction of traffic or the free movement of others; or
(d) the protection of health or morals.

(Note: 1. An additional restriction was suggested as follows:

The prevention of foreign political interference. (Netherlands).

(Note: 2. The Government of the Netherlands suggested:

(a) That a clause be added making public meetings subject to official authorization; and

(b) That it should be understood that the right to assemble does not include the right to hold pageants or processions in the streets.

Note 3: The Government of the Union of South Africa pointed out that the exceptions did not cover prohibition of a public gathering where the Minister of Justice had reason to apprehend that the gathering would engender feelings of hostility between different sections of the population of the Union of South Africa).

Article 19

The right of association is recognized provided that right is exercised in whatever form may be appropriate under the law of the State and is directed to lawful aims including the defense and protection of the legitimate interests of the members of the association or the dissemination of information under Article 17. Associations shall enjoy the rights and freedoms set forth in Artifles 16 and 17.

Article 20

Equal protection of the law with respect to the enjoyment of any of the rights and freedoms set forth in Part II of this Covenant shall not be denied to any one on account of race (which includes color) sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

Article 21 (deleted)

(Any advocacy of national, racial, or religious hostility that constitutes an incitement to violence shall be prohibited by the law of the State).

Article 22

Nothing in this Covenant shall be considered to give any person or State the right to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

PART III

Article 23

1. This Covenant shall be open for accession to every State Member of the United Nations or party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice and to every other State which the General Assembly of the United Nations shall, by resolution, declare to be elligible.

2. Accession shall be effected by the deposit of an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and as soon as _____ of the States Members of the United Nations have deposited such instruments the Covenant shall come into force between them. As regards any State which accedes thereafter, the Covenant shall come into force on the date of the deposit of its instrument of accession.

3. The Secretary General of the United Nations shall inform all members of the United Nations and the other States referred to in paragraph 1 above of the deposit of each instrument of accession.

Article 24

In the case of a Federal State, the following provisions shall apply:

(a) With respect to any Articles of this Covenant which the Federal Government regards as wholly or in part appropriate for federal action, the obligations of the Federal Governments shall, to this extent, be the same as those of parties which are not Federal States;

(b) In repsect of Articles which the Federal Government regards as appropriate under its constitutional systems, in whole or in part, for action by the consituent States, Provinces, or Cantons, the Federal Government shall bring such provisions, with favourable recommendation, to the notice of the appropriate authorities of the States, Provinces or Cantons at the earliest possible moment.

Article 25

(the Drafting Committee voted in favour of the first of the following texts).

A state party to this Covenant may at the same time of its accession thereto or at any time thereafter by notification addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations declare that this Covenant shall extend to any of the territories for the international relations of which it is responsible, and the Covenant shall extend to the territories named in the notification as from the thirtieth day after the date of receipt by the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the notification. The Contracting States undertake, with respect to those territories on behalf of which they do not accede to this Covenant at the time of their accession, to seek the consent at the earliest possible moment of the Governments of such teritories and to accede forthwith on behalf of and in respect of each such territory, if and when its consent has been obtained.

Text Proposed by the Reoresentative of the Soviet Union

The conditions of the present Covenant shall extend or be applicable both to the metropolitan territory which is signatory to the present Covenant, as well as to all the other territories (non-self-governing, trust, and colonial territories) which are being administered or goverened by the metropolitan power in question.

Article 26

(The Drafting Committee decided not to discuss the following Geneva text until the question of implementation has been considered).

1. Amendments to this Covenant shall come into force when they have been adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the Members of the General Assembly of the United Nations and ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the parties to this Covenant.

2. When such amendments come into force they shall be binding on those parties which have ratified them, leaving other parties still bound by the provisions of the Covenant which they have accepted by accession, including earlier amendments which they have ratified.

Article 27 (deleted)

(In construing the Articles of this Covenant the several Articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other).

Proposed Additional Article

(The Drafting Committee took no action on the following text, proposed as an additional article by the representative of the United States).

The rights and freedoms set forth in Part II of this Covenant are in addition to and not in derogation of such rights and freedoms as may be guaranteed to all under the laws of any Contracting State. In agreeing to this Covenant, the Contracting Parties recognize that there are other rights and freedoms which may be made the subject of future covenant s or conventions.

16 - Human Rights

RECEIVED
Southern Regional Council

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

ADDRESS BY MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT AT THE SORBONNE, PARIS, FRANCE, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1948.

The Struggle for Human Rights

I have come this evening to talk with you on one of the greatest issues of our time -- that is the preservation of human freedom. I have chosen to discuss it here in France, at the Sorbonne, because here in this soil the roots of human freedom have long ago struck deep and here they have been richly nourished. It was here the Declaration of the Rights of Man was proclaimed, and the great slogans of the French Revolution -- Liberty, Equality, Fraternity -- fired the imagination of men. I have chosen to discuss this issue in Europe because this has been the scene of the greatest historic battles between freedom and tyranny. I have chosen to discuss it in the early days of the General Assembly because the issue of human liberty is decisive for the settlement of outstanding political differences and for the future of the United Nations.

The decisive importance of this issue was fully recognized by the founders of the United Nations at San Francisco. Concern for the preservation and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms stands at the heart of the United Nations. Its Charter is distinguished by its preoccupation with the rights and welfare of individual men and women. The United Nations has made it clear that it intends to uphold human rights and to protect the dignity of the human personality. In the Preamble to the Charter the keynote is set when it declared: "We the people of the United Nations determined ... to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small, and ... to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom." This reflects the basic premise of the Charter that the peace and security of mankind are dependent on mutual respect for the rights and freedoms of all.

One of the purposes of the United Nations is declared in Article 1 to be: "to achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

This thought is repeated at several points and notably in Articles 55 and 56 the Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the United Nations for the promotion of "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

The

The Human Rights Commission was given as its first and most important task the preparation of an International Bill of Rights. The General Assembly which opened its third session here in Paris a few days ago, will have before it the first fruit of the Commission's labors in this task, that is the International Declaration of Human Rights.

This Declaration was finally completed after much work during the last session of the Human Rights Commission in New York in the spring of 1948. The Economic and Social Council has sent it without recommendation to the General Assembly, together with other documents transmitted by the Human Rights Commission.

It was decided in our Commission that a Bill of Rights should contain two parts:

1. A Declaration which could be approved through action of the Member States of the United Nations in the General Assembly. This Declaration would have great moral force, and would say to the peoples of the world "this is what we hope human rights may mean to all people in the years to come." We have put down here the rights that we consider basic for individual human beings the world over to have. Without them, we feel that the full development of individual personality is impossible.

2. The second part of the Bill, which the Human Rights Commission has not yet completed because of the lack of time, is a Covenant which would be in the form of a treaty to be presented to the nations of the world. Each nation, as it is prepared to do so, would ratify this Covenant and the Covenant would then become binding on the nations which adhere to it. Each nation ratifying would then be obligated to change its laws wherever they did not conform to the points contained in the Covenant.

This Covenant, of course, would have to be a simpler document. It could not state aspirations, which we feel to be permissible in the Declaration. It could only state rights which could be assured by law and it must contain methods of implementation, and no state ratifying the Covenant, could be allowed to disregard it. The methods of implementation have not yet been agreed upon, nor have they been given adequate consideration by the Commission at any of its meetings. There certainly should be discussion on the entire question of this world Bill of Human Rights and there may be acceptance by this Assembly of the Declaration if they come to agreement on it. The acceptance of the Declaration I think, should encourage every nation in the coming months to discuss its meaning with its people so that they will be better prepared to accept the Covenant with a deeper understanding of the problems involved when that is presented, we hope, a year from now and, we hope, accepted.

The

The Declaration has come from the Human Rights Commission with unanimous acceptance except for four abstentions -- the USSR, Yugoslavia, Ukraine and Byelorussia. The reason for this is a fundamental difference in the conception of human rights as they exist in these states and in certain other Member States in the United Nations.

In the discussion before the Assembly, I think it should be made crystal clear what these differences are and tonight I want to spend a little time making them clear to you. It seems to me there is a valid reason for taking the time today to think carefully and clearly on the subject of human rights, because in the acceptance and observance of these rights lies the root, I believe, of our chance for peace in the future, and for the strengthening of the United Nations organization to the point where it can maintain peace in the future.

We must not be confused about what freedom is; basic human rights are simple and easily understood: freedom of speech and a free press; freedom of religion and worship; freedom of assembly and the right of petition; the right of men to be secure in their homes and free from unreasonable search and seizure and from arbitrary arrest and punishment.

We must not be deluded by the efforts of the forces of reaction to prostitute the great words of our free tradition and thereby to confuse the struggle. Democracy, freedom, human rights have come to have a definite meaning to the people of the world which we must not allow any nation to so change that they are made synonymous with suppression and dictatorship.

There are basic differences that show up even in the use of words between a democratic and a totalitarian country. For instance "democracy" means one thing to the USSR and another to the USA and, I know, in France. I have served since the first meeting of the Nuclear Commission on the Human Rights Commission, and I think this point stands out clearly.

The USSR representatives assert that they already have achieved many things which we, in what they call the "Bourgeois democracies" cannot achieve because their government controls the accomplishment of these things. Our government seems powerless to them because, in the last analysis, it is controlled by the people. They would not put it that way -- they would say that the people in the USSR control their government by allowing their government to have certain absolute rights. We, on the other hand, feel that certain rights can never be granted to the government, but must be kept in the hands of the people.

For instance, the USSR will assert that their press is free because the state makes it free by providing the machinery, the paper, and even the money for salaries for the people who work on the paper. They state that there is no control over what

what is printed in the various papers that they subsidize in this manner, such for instance, as a trade union paper. But what would happen if a paper were to print ideas which were critical of the basic policies and beliefs of the Communist government? I am sure some good reason would be found for abolishing the paper.

It is true that there have been many cases where newspapers in the USSR have criticised officials and their actions and have been responsible for the removal of those officials, but in doing so they did not criticize anything which was fundamental to communist beliefs. They simply criticised methods of doing things, so one must differentiate between things which are permissible, such as criticism of any individual or of the manner of doing things, and the criticism of a belief which would be considered vital to the acceptance of communism.

What are the differences, for instance, between trade unions in the totalitarian states and in the democracies? In the totalitarian state a trade union is an instrument used by the government to enforce duties, not to assert rights. Propaganda material which the government desires the workers to have is furnished to the trade unions to be circulated to their members.

Our trade unions, on the other hand, are solely the instrument of the workers themselves. They represent the workers in their relations with the government and with management and they are free to develop their own opinions without government help or interference. The concepts of our trade unions and those in totalitarian countries are drastically different. There is little mutual understanding.

I think the best example one can give of this basic difference of the use of terms is "the right to work". The Soviet Union insists that this is a basic right which it alone can guarantee because it alone provides full employment by the government. But the right to work in the Soviet Union means the assignment of workers to do whatever task is given to them by the government without an opportunity for the people to participate in the decision that the government should do this. A society in which everyone works is not necessarily a free society and may indeed be a slave society; on the other hand, a society in which there is widespread economic insecurity can turn freedom into a barren and vapid right for millions of people. We in the United States have come to realize it means freedom to choose one's job, to work or not to work as one desires. We, in the United States, have come to realize, however, that people have a right to demand that their government will not allow them to starve because as individuals they cannot find work of the kind they are accustomed to doing and this is a decision brought about by public opinions which came as a result of the great depression in which many people were out of work, but we would not consider in the United States that we had gained any freedom if we were compelled to follow a dictatorial assignment to work where and when we were told. The right of choice would seem to us an important, fundamental freedom.

I have great sympathy with the Russian people. They love their country and have always defended it valiantly against invaders. They have been through a period of revolution, as a result of which they were for a time cut off from outside contact. They have not lost their resulting suspicion of other countries and the great difficulty is today that their government encourages this suspicion and seems to believe that force alone will bring them respect.

We, in the democracies, believe in a kind of international respect and action which is reciprocal. We do not think others should treat us differently from the way they wish to be treated. It is interference in other countries that especially stirs up antagonism against the Soviet Government. If it wishes to feel secure in developing its economic and political theories within its territory, then it should grant to others that same security. We believe in the freedom of people to make their own mistakes. We do not interfere with them and they should not interfere with others.

The basic problem confronting the world today, as I said in the beginning, is the preservation of human freedom for the individual and consequently for the society of which he is a part. We are fighting this battle again today as it was fought at the time of the French Revolution and at the time of the American Revolution. The issue of human liberty is as decisive now as it was then. I want to give you my conception of what is meant in my country by freedom of the individual.

Long ago in London during a discussion with Mr. Vishinsky, he told me there was no such thing as freedom for the individual in the world. All freedom of the individual was conditioned by the rights of other individuals. That, of course, I granted. I said: "We approach the question from a different point of view; we here in the United Nations are trying to develop ideals which will be broader in outlook, which will consider first the rights of man, which will consider what makes man more free: not governments, but man."

The totalitarian state typically places the will of the people second to decrees promulgated by a few men at the top.

Naturally there must always be consideration of the rights of others; but in a democracy this is not a restriction. Indeed, in our democracies we make our freedoms secure because each of us is expected to respect the rights of others and we are free to make our own laws.

Freedom for our peoples is not only a right, but also a tool. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of information, freedom of assembly--these are not just abstract ideals to us; they are tools with which we create a way of life, a way of life in which we can enjoy freedom.

Sometimes

Sometimes the processes of democracy are slow, and I have known some of our leaders to say that a benevolent dictatorship would accomplish the ends desired in a much shorter time than it takes to go through the democratic processes of discussion and the slow formation of public opinion. But there is no way of insuring that a dictatorship will remain benevolent or that power once in the hands of a few will be returned to the people without struggle or revolution. This we have learned by experience and we accept the slow processes of democracy because we know that short-cuts compromise principles on which no compromise is possible.

The final expression of the opinion of the people with us is through free and honest elections, with valid choices on basic issues and candidates. The secret ballot is an essential to free elections but you must have a choice before you. I have heard my husband say many times that a people need never lose their freedom if they kept their right to a secret ballot and if they used that secret ballot to the full.

Basic decisions of our society are made through the expressed will of the people. That is why when we see these liberties threatened, instead of falling apart, our nation becomes unified and our democracies come together as a unified group in spite of our varied backgrounds and many racial strains.

In the United States we have a capitalistic economy. That is because public opinion favors that type of economy under the conditions in which we live. But we have imposed certain restraints; for instance, we have anti-trust laws. These are the legal evidence of the determination of the American people to maintain an economy of free competition and not to allow monopolies to take away the people's freedom.

Our trade unions grow stronger because the people come to believe that this is the proper way to guarantee the rights of the workers and that the right to organize and to bargain collectively keeps the balance between the actual producer and the investor of money and the manager in industry who watches over the man who works with his hands and who produces the materials which are our tangible wealth.

In the United States we are old enough not to claim perfection. We recognize that we have some problems of discrimination but we find steady progress being made in the solution of these problems. Through normal democratic processes we are coming to understand our needs and how we can attain full equality for all our people. Free discussion on the subject is permitted. Our Supreme Court has recently rendered decisions to clarify a number of our laws to guarantee the rights of all.

The USSR claims it has reached a point where all races within her borders are officially considered equal and have equal rights and they insist they have no discrimination where minorities are concerned.

This

This is a laudable objective but there are other aspects of the development of freedom for the individual which are essential before the mere absence of discrimination is worth much, and these are lacking in the Soviet Union. Unless they are being denied freedoms which they want and which they see other people have, people do not usually complain of discrimination. It is these other freedoms--the basic freedoms of speech, of the press, of religion and conscience, of assembly, of fair trial and freedom from arbitrary arrest and punishment, which a totalitarian government cannot safely give its people and which give meaning to freedom from discrimination.

It is my belief, and I am sure it is also yours, that the struggle for democracy and freedom is a critical struggle, for their preservation is essential to the great objective of the United Nations to maintain international peace and security.

Among free men the end cannot justify the means. We know the patterns of totalitarianism -- the single political party, the control of schools, press, radio, the arts, the sciences, and the church to support autocratic authority; these are the age-old patterns against which men have struggled for three thousand years. These are the signs of reaction, retreat and retrogression.

The United Nations must hold fast to the heritage of freedom won by the struggle of its peoples; it must help us to pass it on to generations to come.

The development of the ideal of freedom and its translation into the everyday life of the people in great areas of the earth is the product of the efforts of many peoples. It is the fruit of a long tradition of vigorous thinking and courageous action. No one race and no one people can claim to have done all the work to achieve greater dignity for human beings and greater freedom to develop human personality. In each generation and in each country there must be a continuation of the struggle and new steps forward must be taken since this is preeminently a field in which to stand still is to retreat.

The field of human rights is not one in which compromise on fundamental principles are possible. The work of the Commission on Human Rights is illustrative. The Declaration of Human Rights provides: "Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own." The Soviet representative said he would agree to this right if a single phrase was added to it--"in accordance with the procedure laid down in the laws of that country." It is obvious that to accept this would be not only to compromise but to nullify the right stated. This case forcefully illustrates the importance of the proposition that we must ever be alert not to compromise fundamental human rights merely for the sake of reaching unanimity and thus lose them.

As

As I see it, it is not going to be easy to attain unanimity with respect to our different concepts of government and human rights. The struggle is bound to be difficult and one in which we must be firm but patient. If we adhere faithfully to our principles I think it is possible for us to maintain freedom and to do so peacefully and without recourse to force.

The future must see the broadening of human rights throughout the world. People who have glimpsed freedom will never be content until they have secured it for themselves. In a true sense, human rights are a fundamental object of law and government in a just society. Human rights exist to the degree that they are respected by people in relations with each other and by governments in relations with their citizens.

The world at large is aware of the tragic consequences for human beings ruled by totalitarian systems. If we examine Hitler's rise to power, we see how the chains are forged which keep the individual a slave and we can see many similarities in the way things are accomplished in other countries. Politically men must be free to discuss and to arrive at as many facts as possible and there must be at least a two party system in a country because when there is only one political party, too many things can be subordinated to the interests of that one party and it becomes a tyrant and not an instrument of democratic government.

The propaganda we have witnessed in the recent past, like that we perceive in these days, seeks to impugn, to undermine and to destroy the liberty and independence of peoples. Such propaganda poses to all peoples the issue whether to doubt their heritage of rights and therefore to compromise the principles by which they live, or try to accept the challenge, redouble their vigilance and stand steadfast in the struggle to maintain and enlarge human freedoms.

People who continue to be denied the respect to which they are entitled as human beings will not acquiesce forever in such denial.

The Charter of the United Nations is a guiding beacon along the way to the achievement of human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world. The immediate test is not only the extent to which human rights and freedoms have already been achieved, but the direction in which the world is moving. Is there a faithful compliance with the objectives of the Charter if some countries continue to curtail human rights and freedoms instead of to promote the universal respect for an observance of human rights and freedoms for all as called for by the Charter?

The place to discuss the issue of human rights is in the forum of the United Nations. The United Nations has been set up as the common meeting ground for nations, where we can consider together our mutual problems and take advantage of our differences in experience. It is inherent in our firm

firm attachment to democracy and freedom that we stand always ready to use the fundamental democratic procedures of honest discussion and negotiation. It is now as always our hope that despite the wide differences in approach we face in the world today, we can with mutual good faith in the principles of the United Nations Charter, arrive at a common basis of understanding.

We are here to join the meetings of this great international Assembly which meets in your beautiful capitol City of Paris. Freedom for the individual is an inseparable part of the cherished traditions of France. As one of the delegates from the United States I pray Almighty God that we may win another victory here for the rights and freedoms of all men.

* * * * *

16 - Human Rights

RECEIVED
NOV 4 1948
Southern Regional Council

UNITED NATIONS ACTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS

A Fact Sheet

Office of Public Affairs
Department of State

October 11, 1948

Five proposals concerning the definition and guarantee of human rights are now before the United Nations General Assembly in Paris. They are: (1) an International Declaration of Human Rights; (2) a Draft International Covenant on Human Rights; (3) a Draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of News; (4) a Draft Convention on the Right of Official Correction of False or Distorted Reporting; and (5) a Draft Convention on Freedom of Information. Under Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter the Members of the United Nations pledged themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the United Nations for the promotion of "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion."

The International Declaration of Human Rights now before the General Assembly is a completed statement of general principles prepared during the past two years by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. It is the product of the work of many governments. Consequently it does not reflect completely the point of view of any one of them, but consists rather of generally recognized principles. Acceptance of this document as a guide to a common standard of conduct for all nations is urged by the United States. Expressed approval of the principles of the Declaration is considered important at this time for several reasons: (1) It would be the first step under the Charter to promote human rights; (2) It would clarify and make objective the contrasting views on human freedom which underlie the disagreements between the USSR and the democratic nations; and (3) It would reaffirm the aims of the UN Charter. All the Members of the Human Rights Commission approved the Declaration of Human Rights in June 1948 except the Soviet bloc -- the USSR, the Ukraine, Byelorussia and Yugoslavia -- which abstained.

The importance assigned to the Declaration of Human Rights by the United States Delegation was indicated by Secretary Marshall in his speech at the opening session of the General Assembly, September 23, 1948. The Secretary began his address by urging the nations to approve "a new declaration of human rights for free men in a free world." He continued:

"Systematic and deliberate denials of basic human rights lie at the root of most of our troubles and threaten the work of the United Nations. It is not only fundamentally wrong that millions of men and women live in daily terror of secret police, subject to seizure, imprisonment, or forced labor without just cause and without fair trial, but these wrongs have repercussions in the community of nations. Governments which systematically disregard the rights of their own people are not likely to respect the rights of other nations and other people, and are likely to seek their objectives by coercion and force in the international field.....

"Let this third regular session of the General Assembly approve by an overwhelming majority the Declaration of Human Rights as a standard of conduct for all; and let us, as members of the United Nations, conscious of our own shortcomings and imperfections, join our effort in good faith to live up to this high standard."

Mrs. Roosevelt, Member of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly, in a speech before the Sorbonne in Paris September 28, said:

"Freedom for our peoples is not only a right, but also a tool. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of information, freedom of assembly--these are not just abstract ideals to us; they are tools with which we create a way of life, a way of life in which we can enjoy freedom."

The Declaration of Human Rights contains articles covering civil, political, social and economic rights as follows:

Civil and Political Rights:

Right to life, liberty, and security of person - Article 3
Freedom from slavery, torture, inhuman treatment or punishment - Article 4
Recognition as a person before the law - Article 5
Right to equality before the law - Article 6
Freedom from arbitrary arrest - Article 7
Right to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal - Article 8
Presumption of innocence and right to public trial, with all guarantees necessary for defense, in criminal cases - Article 9 (1)
Freedom from ex post facto laws - Article 9 (2)
Freedom from interference with privacy - Article 10
Freedom of movement and residence within a state - Article 11 (1)
Right to leave any country - Article 11 (2)
Right of asylum from persecution - Article 12
Rights concerning nationality - Article 13
Right to marriage and protection of the family - Article 14
Right to own property - Article 15
Freedom of religion - Article 16
Freedom of opinion, expression and information - Article 17
Freedom of assembly and association - Article 18
Right to participate in government - Article 19

Social and Economic Rights

Right to social security - Article 20
Right to work - Article 21
Right to health and security - Article 22
Right to education - Article 23
Right to rest and leisure - Article 24
Right to participate in cultural life - Article 25

John Foster Dulles, Member of the United States Delegation to the General Assembly in a speech in Paris on September 29, 1948 said:

"I should not leave this discussion of the potentialities of the United Nations in the economic and social field without referring particularly to one of the issues before this session of the Assembly. That issue is the approval of the proposed International Declaration of Human Rights. I hope and believe this Assembly will endorse this Declaration. But we must not stop there. We must go on with the drafting of a Covenant which will seek to translate human rights into law. It does not minimize the importance of our own Declaration of Independence to recognize that the Constitution and its Bill of Rights were required to establish the body of law necessary to achieve practical results. So with the Declaration before the Assembly. It is an important proclamation of principles and should be approved. But that approval is only a step toward fulfilling the faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and the pledge to practice tolerance that is contained in the Preamble of the United Nations Charter."

The Covenant on Human Rights, still in draft form, differs from the Declaration in that it is a proposed treaty which will be legally binding on the countries which ratify it, whereas the Declaration is primarily a statement of objectives proposed as "a common standard of achievement" and does not impose legal obligations on the nations which approve it. When a final draft of the Covenant incorporating the necessary changes is completed by the Human Rights Commission, the Covenant will be reviewed by appropriate United Nations bodies, including the General Assembly, and then sent to each member of the United Nations for approval. This means that the Covenant will not be binding on the United States until it has been submitted in due course to the United States Senate and approved and ratified in accordance with our own constitutional procedures. By contrast, the Declaration needs only the approval of the General Assembly to attain its full stature as a statement of guiding principles in the field of human rights.

The Covenant will probably include only the basic civil rights such as freedom of speech, press, assembly, religion, freedom of information and opinion, freedom from slavery and torture, guarantee of fair trial and freedom from arbitrary arrest. A parallel to this procedure of giving immediate special legal status to selected human rights may be found in the original ten amendments to the United States Constitution which make up the so-called United States Bill of Rights.

It is not intended that the Covenant will be the only treaty on human rights to be presented for ratification to the Members of the United Nations. Additional treaties and conventions to guarantee specific rights are already being composed.

Three draft conventions on freedom of information are before the General Assembly this year. They concern freedom of news and were originally developed at the Conference on Freedom of Information held in Geneva in March 1948. With the exception of the Soviet bloc, which vigorously opposed all three conventions, there was general agreement in the Conference on their value, and if they are approved by the General Assembly, they will be submitted to individual nations for ratification. This will mean that the United States will not be a party to these conventions until the Senate has approved them, just as in the case of the Covenant on Human Rights.

The first of the three conventions is on the International Gathering and Transmission of News. Originally sponsored by the United States, it is intended to promote the free flow of information between countries by facilitating the work of foreign correspondents. It encourages the freest possible movement of foreign correspondents, protects them from expulsion for any lawful exercise of their rights, and insures equitable treatment of their outgoing dispatches.

The second draft convention, originally sponsored by the French Delegation to the Geneva Conference, proposes an international right of official correction to provide protection against false or distorted reporting likely to injure friendly relations between nations. A complaining government would send its own version of the facts to the State in which an objectionable report has been published, and the latter would then be obliged to make this version available to the information agencies which supply news to its public.

The third convention, the Draft Convention on Freedom of Information, was originally sponsored by the United Kingdom Delegation to the Geneva Conference. This Convention is more general in nature than the other two. It applies to all nationals of all Contracting States, not alone to foreign correspondents and information agencies. It seeks to establish the broad principles of freedom of information and the extension of those principles to regions where they are not now fully recognized in practice.

The United States is working to achieve strong and effective provisions in each of these conventions. The report of the Freedom of Information Conference was considered in August by the Economic and Social Council, but due to lack of time, only the United States Convention was reviewed, and suggestions were made which weaken its provisions. Changes in the conventions may be expected as the discussions progress in the General Assembly in Paris. In the Economic and Social Council in August, 1948, Assistant Secretary of State Thorpe stated the United States position as follows:

"My country, and I know that this is shared by the large majority of countries throughout the world, believes in freedom of information. We are convinced that without access to unfettered news, the people in any country cannot carry out their democratic functions as an informed body of citizens. We are convinced that without a free flow of information between countries, the development of stable international relations is impossible. We are not afraid of so-called false and slanderous information which may at times find its way into the columns of a free press. We are not afraid of it because we believe in the dignity, capacity and worth of man. We believe in his judgment and innate intelligence, and we are certain that we can trust in his judgment based upon information and opinion of all kinds freely presented and freely received."

For additional information see: An International Bill of Human Rights, Department of State Publication 3055; "Progress Report on Human Rights," Department of State Bulletin, August 1948; and United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, Geneva, Switzerland, March 23-April 21, 1948: Report of the United States Delegates with Related Documents, Department of State Publication 3150.

16 — Human Rights

RECEIVED
APR 20 1949
Southern Regional Council

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE UNITED NATIONS

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Washington, D.C. January 14, 1949

ADDRESS AT GENERAL SESSION OF CONFERENCE

DEVELOPMENTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS AT THE PARIS MEETING OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Representative on the United States Delegation to the General Assembly

I think I need hardly go back and tell you anything about the International Bill of Human Rights. You know that it was set up to be in two parts, first a declaration and then a covenant, and that the covenant has had only a very small amount of work and consideration in the Human Rights Commission. It has had only brief consideration, and measures of implementation which must be included in the covenant have had an even less amount of consideration thus far, but the declaration had had a great deal of work done on it in the Human Rights Commission and it was accordingly presented to the General Assembly in the fall of 1949 for approval. Accordingly what I am going to talk to you about today is what happened to the Declaration when it was presented to the General Assembly.

You are familiar with the fact that for two and a half years the Human Rights Commission had been working on the Declaration, and it was referred to all the member Governments of the United Nations for comment and then to the Economic and Social Council for its consideration.

The Declaration was placed on the agenda of the Third Committee of the General Assembly, the committees of the General Assembly, as you know, are composed of one member from each of the fifty-eight governments represented in the United Nations. We were fortunate in having as chairman of Committee Three Dr. Malik of Lebanon who had been the rapporteur of the Human Rights Commission. We had also a number of people in the Third Committee who had also served in the Human Rights Commission and a number who had served not only in the Human Rights Commission but in the Economic and Social Council. But they were a very small number, and the others took the Declaration exactly as though it was all an entirely new idea and that nobody had ever looked at it before. On the first three articles we spent four weeks and we changed only three words. That was because everybody had to make a speech. It was absolutely unnecessary; apparently there was very little knowledge among a number of the delegates that their governments had ever had an opportunity to look at this document before.

Nevertheless, the interesting thing was that the document was good enough so that with all that argument it only got four words changed in the first three articles. For your amusement I will tell you that Dr. Chang, who had also served on both the Economic and Social Council and the Human Rights Commission, and who is a great stickler for the English language, made a lot of arguments on the subject of what he thought was really good English. But one day he came up to me towards the end of the month and he said "I wonder if anyone has calculated how much those four words have cost the United Nations in dollars and cents?" They were perhaps very expensive four words.

On the other hand, I'm not sure that it was not a good thing. M. Laugier, who is head of the Social Division of the United Nations Secretariat, said to me "This is an education and these people here have been educated and it is of great value to gather together people from all these nations and really go through this sort of a session." The mere fact that they have argued so much and so passionately for their own point of view very often does show that they consider this document of value.

Some people write to me now and say "Of what value are just words? You know this does not force us to change our laws or any country to change its laws. What was the use of having a declaration?" I remember what M. Laugier said, that this was an education and that this document perhaps was paving the way and without it perhaps we never would be able to write a covemant and to ask nations to ratify a covenant which would oblige them, if they did not already have laws, to enact laws to cover their commitments.

I have had all sorts of things said to me about this declaration. In spite of the fact that the USSR finally abstained, as its satellites abstained, in voting for it, I have been told that is is a Communist document. That is extremely interesting, to call it a Communist document. Why didn't the USSR and its satellites vote for it? They said they didn't vote for it because their amendments had not been accepted. Their amendments were very interesting because they kept insisting that this document, which is a declaration and not a covenant, must have implementation. The rest of us said "You can't have implementation in a declaration," but they said "Yes" for the reason that to them implementation is not international implementation, it is national implementation. Therefore, they want to add to article after article either the phrase "these rights shall be guaranteed by the state" or "according to the laws of the country". In spots that would obviously nullify the articles.

For instance, in the article on free movement, that you can move around your own country and settle where you like and leave your own country and return to it, there are very long arguments on that because all countries have some regulations relating to this. I must pay my income tax, I must have a doctor's certificate that I was vaccinated within three years or I can't come back. The USSR wanted to add to that, "You may have the right to leave and return according to the laws of your country".

After they had been voted down and the session was over--I had not argued with them in the session because it just delayed our work. I went up to Mr. Pavlov, the Soviet delegate, afterwards and I said "Mr Pavlov"--and they always, everybody, gathers around when you go up to talk to one of them, everyone in the circle must hear what you have to say--I don't mean others, but their own particular circle, and I said "Mr. Pavlov, it seems to me that you must understand that what you wanted would have been actually impossible because you would have made it impossible to exercise the great right of freedom of movement. Surely we all recognize small restrictions and regulations, but I can eventually leave my country and I can come back to it after I have complied with certain things, but let us take an example in your country. Before you passed the law forbidding your nationals to marry any foreigners, there were some of your nationals who married American and British GI's. I have sent dozens of letters from American GI's to your representative in the United States to forward to the proper headquarters representative. I have never had an answer of any kind except a brief one from Mr. Gromyko saying "I have received your communication of the 10th, 11th, 13th, 15th, and 17th. It has been forwarded." And that is all that ever comes back to me."

"Now" I said, "when you do that, when you make it impossible for your nationals, no matter what small restrictions they might fulfill to leave at all under any circumstances, then you prevent the important right of freedom of movement and decision of an individual as to what he wants to do in the world." He looked at me and said "Not at all. It is just a regulation like any other regulation." And that ended right there. That was the end of that conversation.

I had on another occasion an interesting little side conversation with Mr. Pavlov. He speaks French very well. He is the Soviet Ambassador in Belgium, and he is a cultivated, educated man. He made a speech on the marvelous system of medical care in the USSR, took care of you free from the cradle to the grave, and it was just "perfect." Everything is always free in the USSR! Some day I am going to rise up and protest because it is no more free, of course, than it is anywhere else, for it is simply a different way of paying for it, and it all comes from the work of people. People have to do the work or there would not be anything for the government to use to make these things free. But at the present moment we were discussing this free medical care.

In the course of his speech he had said that when the war came they had been able to increase their medical facilities 50 percent; 50 percent more doctors, 50 percent more hospital beds, 50 percent more nurses. You know that is quite extraordinary achievement, so I went out to him and I said "Sir, I was much interested in your statement. I didn't speak of it in the full committee but I would be very interested to know how you increased your doctors 50 percent over night practically". He said "Oh, it is the system." I said "What system? We would like to know about this." "Why" he said "we just plan." And I said "You plan? Well, then, you must have known when the war was coming in order to plan." "Oh, no, we did not know when the war was coming." I asked "Well, then, did you take doctors that had had one year of training and suddenly graduate them over night?" He replied, "No, it takes five years to make a doctor." I said "That is very interesting and I still don't understand how you produced 50 percent more doctors and 50 percent more nurses and 50 percent more hospital facilities over night." And he looked at me and said "I'm sorry, I do not understand." That was the end of that conversation, and his French is perfectly good too.

Now, to go back, you were quite conscious of the fact from the very beginning that the USSR was going to use all possible tactics so that we would never come to a vote if possible. It was very awkward to vote against a declaration of human rights. Even before their own people that was going to be hard for the USSR to explain, and so it would be much simpler for the USSR it if turned out that agreement was not achieved on the Declaration in the General Assembly.

It was marvelous how they took every opportunity to delay us--every little word was brought up and discussed by all the nations, of course, because if somebody brought it up everybody else had to made a speech on it-- and very often others didn't see this game and they would fall into the trap and then we would have every South American country making a speech on something which had only been injected by the Soviet group for the sake of getting speeches, which would take time. This went on for days and days, and sometimes we despaired that we would ever be able to get through.

It was complicated by one other thing because when you can't get sufficient delay by just injecting questions on words and phrases, and so forth and so on, then you can make attacks on people. So something would come up and they would attack the United Kingdom or me. I learned a long while ago that you have to answer an attack. You have to say it is true or it is not true and why. I never tried to say that something is not true when I know it is true. I try to say that it is regrettable, if it is regrettable, that it is a failure in democracy but that in any case in the United States we know about our failures and we make an attempt, those of us who care, to correct them. I have yet to hear of anyone of the Soviet group say that anything can be improved in the USSR, not that it is wrong but that it could be improved.

We would go through this fairly often but I did not very often attack because I really wanted to get through the declaration. I do not say you should not attack; I think there are times when you have to, when you really have to go back and say "this is ridiculous" and you have certain vulnerable points, but if you have a job to do--and we had a job to do on the declaration--the real point was we had to get it through. It takes a great deal of self-restraint to sit quiet under attack and not retaliate. The reason I answer is because if you do not, the next day one of them is sure to say "Mrs. Roosevelt did not deny it so, of course, it is true;" so you are obliged to make the statement answering but you do not, of course, have to attack if you are able to take it.

We had one United Kingdom gentleman, called Mr. Mayhew, a member of Parliament, in the third committee, and one day it just got beyond him because the Soviet Delegates always chose to attack the clause which says they are obliged to ask, because they have agreements with some of their territories that have their own legislatures that they will not make any commitments for them in international affairs before they consult with them first.

Well, that is a good agreement because it really requires the United Kingdom to consult with any one of its territories that has a legislature of its own; it is a self-governing principle that is good. The USSR always says that it is because the United Kingdom or any other people that controls other peoples does not wish to have the others brought under whatever the thing may be. In one case, it concerned the narcotic convention.

It happened that all United Kingdom territories had already joined the narcotics convention, but they were obliged in this clause, because they always do and we always defend them on it, to consult the territories, but we both get attacked and that happens to be the one thing--they might choose something else and be right about it very often, they might choose a very vulnerable thing, but that is the one they actually attack and we get it every time.

Mr. Mayhew got very angry, and the next day he not only denied many things, but he made a blistering attack on everything he could think of that was wrong in the Soviet Union. Well, that started a whole new round of speeches. You always have to weigh what is the good of what one does and where you get and what is you ultimate objectives. That is what you really have to keep before you all of the time; what am I ultimately trying to do; if I really want this declaration, then I have to think primarily about how I am going to get it through

And you had these two difficulties. As I look back I think the main difficulties were: Number 1, the USSR desired to have nothing because it was simpler for them, and then the desire among the South American countries to have political prestige by having as much of their Bogota Declaration in actual wording in the universal declaration. Those, I think, were really our two main stumbling blocks because the declaration had already really been worked over pretty carefully. It was a pretty good document before it got to the General Assembly. It had two and a half years work on it already and comparatively few changes were made in the document that was presented to the General Assembly. There were changes. Some of them may be for the better, some of them I think are distinctly not as good, but one thing I have come out of this last meeting with is this: we did make some very real efforts when we thought the USSR wanted something that really was sincere, we made some real efforts to find agreement.

We discussed proposed amendments for a long time on a number of articles, and as I look back on it now, I do not think a single thing we accepted as a compromise was an improvement, and it did not bring us agreement in the end because they abstained. They did not vote against the declaration, but they did abstain.

So I hope that I will always have enough objectivity to be willing to discuss and, if I thought a thing was really better, to accept it; but I do not think I ever again will accept what I do not think is as good, either in wording or in principle, just in the hope that it will be an opening wedge for bringing the USSR into an agreement on the whole subject. It just doesn't work. And I think they look upon us as weak when we do it, instead of looking upon it as a gesture of good will. I think they look upon it as a gesture of weakness. I have come to the conclusion I will watch myself carefully, because one does get irritated and one does not always keep a balance, but I do not think I will compromise even on words, when I really do not think they are better words, in the future.

My time is running out and I want to tell you about the abstentions, because I think you should know about them. There were two absences and eight abstentions, the six Soviet bloc votes, and they gave as their reason that it was not a progressive enough document, that it was not precise enough, and that it carried no implementation; in short, we had not accepted their amendments. Then there were two others besides this one.

One was Saudi Arabia. The Saudi Arabian Delegate told me that he could not vote for the declaration because he was the representative of a Mohammedan country, and that the provision in the declaration relating to the right to change one's belief was contrary to the religion of his country.

It happened that the Delegate from Pakistan had voted against the inclusion of the right to change your religion in the Declaration in the Third Committee; but when it came to the final Assembly meeting in the final vote, the head of the Delegation, Zafrullah Khan, who is the Foreign Affairs Minister, got up and said, "Our Delegate voted against the declaration. She voted through a misapprehension. The Koran says, 'He who will believe shall believe and he who will not shall not believe; the only unforgiveable sin is to be a hypocrite', and therefore I will vote for the declaration and we will accept it." I thought that was very courageous and I was very much interested, particularly in the part about being a hypocrite. I thought that was rather a good thing for all of us.

Then there was only one other abstention. That was South Africa. Now, South Africa had a stormy time in this meeting, particularly in Committee Three. The Delegate in Committee Three said he had never been treated so in any meeting he had ever attended. He started out badly. He started on the very first article and he made a speech in which he said that certain peoples under their jurisdiction could not now or ever enjoy the rights and freedoms laid down in the declaration. Well, you could have heard a pin drop when he made that speech and there was a dead silence afterwards.

Finally one of the delegates said "Mr. Chairman, may we have that speech printed? I cannot believe what I heard." The next day I went and sat down behind the South African delegate and said "May I speak to you for a few minutes, Sir?" and he said "Yes". And I said "Perhaps you did not sense that your speech did not have exactly a sympathetic reception in the committee yesterday". He said "Yes, I did sense it but I am sure they did not understand what I meant." I said, "It is rather difficult to misunderstand what you said. You really condemned people who did not happen to be like yourself to perpetually not being able to enjoy certain rights and freedoms, and that, I think, when we look around this table you will see, is not a tenable position for anyone in this meeting." And he said, "well, but we are a minority of white people fighting for our lives and these people are just children." "Well, that is all right, they may be children today" I said "but you have taken away from them all hope of ever growing up."

It is a curious and interesting thing that when you start with restrictions, they never stay in one circle or group. I went over to ask an English friend of mine about this South African situation. It is apparently a rather strange situation. A woman had been there whom I knew quite well, married to a man in business which took them to South Africa a good deal. She said "The situation there is a little difficult. You know, don't you, how women are treated there?" And I said "No, I do not know anything about it. I would like to understand it." She said "Well, no woman, no matter if the money is her own, can open a bank account in South Africa. She has to have her husband's signature and mostly he must cash the checks." And so the restrictions go right on to the women apparently.

To drive a car alone for a woman is a very un-heard-of thing in South Africa, I am told. It is very bad. If you do it, you never mention it, because what you are supposed to do is to have one of these very Kaffirs--against whom you are to be defended--dressed up as a policeman and sitting beside you while you are driving the car. I have never been to South Africa and I did not know anything about it and I had to take what I was told, but it seems to me certainly that they did not keep restrictions in one circle. It seems to widen out, and it is not a very good way to be moving into the world of today.

But we finally got the declaration through and with two abstentions. It does not have to be translated into any law in any country. But we did agree to a resolution which asked us to acquaint you with what was in that declaration and to strive to live up to the standards and the aspirations that are expressed therein, and it is the foundation from which we proceed to write the covenant.

Now there will be more than one covenant, of course, and the first covenant I hope will be a very simple one and perhaps we will think that it is nothing new, because it will express probably the original civil liberties and political rights that we have enjoyed for a very long time in this country and probably give the legal guarantees that we do. There is only one hitch to it. It does apply to everyone, everyone.

We had some rather amusing discussions. Miss Bernadino of Santo Domingo insisted we should not say "every man" but we should say "everyone"or "every human being", "no one", and that is the reason for the inclusion of these phrases in the declaration.

One gentleman has written me to ask how I, as the United States Delegate, could possibly accept the first article which says that every human being is born free and equal, or why, when in our declaration we say that all men are created equal. Well, there was a very long argument over that word "created", because it implies a divine origin. We can accept that. We would have been glad to accept it, and there was a great effort to have it, and to have the name of the Creator, of God, included somewhere, but there were an enormous number of people there who could not agree, who felt differently about it. When you write a universal document it can't be a document written by the United States.

I was quite surprised to have the Delegate from Chile, who had been in almost all of the meetings, come up to me and say "You must realize this is an Anglo-Saxon document and much of it shocked us Latin Americans at first very much. We have grown accustomed to it but it is an Anglo-Saxon document." Well, I had never thought of that, and it had never occurred to me before. I began to think, well, look, you had better think a little bit more, you had better realize that you just are not the only country in the world or the only person to be considered.

I hope we will broadcast the declaration, and I hope that it will be so well known that we will hear people quote it all of the time, because that is the way it gets into the spirit of a people, that this is something that they should live by. But I hope if we do it we will also make people realize that this is not a United States document or an Anglo-Saxon document, that it is a universal declaration for the first time in history and actually for the first time so many nations have agreed to such a document; and a good many of them, I think, are going to find it a pretty difficult thing to look at from the same point of view that we do, but nevertheless the actual education resulting from the arguments in the General Assembly did a great deal for a great many people who won't get to put it into practice for quite a long while; still it will be a background for them.

It ought to be ringing words that go out over the world; it ought to help give us something--what we are talking about this morning is just one of the little links in the chain, but I think it is an important one because the recognition that human beings as individuals have rights and freedoms that must not be trampled on may help us a great deal in keeping peace.

1949 · Materials · ~~United Nations~~

Human Rights

Universal Declaration of Human Rights

THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS was approved by the United Nations General Assembly in Paris December 10, 1948, by a vote of 48 to 0. Eight countries abstained—the U. S. S. R., the Ukraine, Byelorussia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Saudi Arabia, and the Union of South Africa.

The Declaration is a statement of principles approved as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations. It is not a treaty and therefore imposes no legal obligations. It is, however, a challenge to all mankind to promote world-wide respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

An International Covenant on Human Rights is now being developed in the United Nations. This will be a treaty and will deal with certain of the basic civil and political rights embodied in the Declaration. The United Nations Commission on Human Rights expects to complete the drafting of this Covenant at its next session early in 1949. It will then be considered by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations and later by the General Assembly. After it has been approved by the General Assembly, the Covenant will be submitted to individual countries for ratification and will become legally binding on the countries which ratify it.

The United States actively supported the approval of the Declaration of Human Rights in the General Assembly in Paris. Secretary of State Marshall called for its approval at the opening of the session. He began his address by urging the nations to approve "a new declaration of human rights for free men in a free world", and continued:

"Systematic and deliberate denials of basic human rights lie at the root of most of our troubles and threaten the work of the United Nations. It is not only fundamentally wrong that millions of men and women live in daily terror of secret police, subject to seizure, imprisonment, or forced labor without just cause and without fair trial, but these wrongs have repercussions in the community of nations. Governments which systematically disregard the rights of their own people are not likely to respect the rights of other nations and other people and are likely to seek their objectives by coercion and force in the international field."

Department of State publication 3381
International Organization and Conference Series III, 20
Released January 1949

For sale by the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office
Washington 25, D. C. - Price 5 cents

UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Approved by the General Assembly at its Plenary Meeting on 10 December 1948

Preamble

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law,

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations,

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore

The General Assembly,

Proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and the security of person.

Article 4

No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.

Article 5

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 6

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 7

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 8

Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 9

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 10

Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 11

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

Article 12

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Article 13

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.

2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

Article 14

1. Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.

2. This right may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 15

1. Everyone has the right to a nationality.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 16

1. Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses.

3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.

Article 17

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 19

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 20

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

2. No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

Article 21

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the Government of his country, directly or through freely chosen representatives.

2. Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.

3. The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret vote or by equivalent free voting procedures.

Article 22

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to realization, through national effort and international co-operation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality.

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.

2. Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.

3. Everyone who works has the right to just and favourable remuneration insuring for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity, and supplemented, if necessary, by other means of social protection.

4. Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 24

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure, including reasonable limitation of working hours and periodic holidays with pay.

Article 25

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

2. Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance. All children, whether born in or out of wedlock, shall enjoy the same social protection.

Article 26

1. Everyone has the right to education. Education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit.

2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations, racial or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace.

3. Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.

Article 27

1. Everyone has the right freely to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement and its benefits.

2. Everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic production of which he is the author.

Article 28

Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 29

1. Everyone has duties to the community in which alone the free and full development of his personality is possible.

2. In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.

3. These rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 30

Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein.

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1949

- How are the minority groups treated in the textbooks used in American schools?
- Do these textbooks teach understanding —or prejudice?
- Are they fair?

RECEIVED
11 1949
Southern Regional Council

INTERGROUP Relations in TEACHING MATERIALS

Report of the Committee on the Study of Teaching Materials in Intergroup Relations

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

Intergroup Relations in Teaching Materials

Of the 131,699,273 Americans reported in the 1940 census, approximately 11,500,000 were born outside of the United States; 118,000,000 were white; 13,000,000 were Negro; 5,000,000 were Jews; 22,000,000 were Roman Catholics; 30,000,000 were Protestants; one-third of a million were American Indians; one-third of a million were Asiatics—and so on. Many Americans speak another language (their native tongue) in their homes and their communities.

The American population is a congeries of "groups." On the whole, through most of American history, the groups have got along together reasonably well—but not as well as they should. We are not without group conflict; indeed, we may as well admit that with the increased urbanization of our society—the crowding of diverse peoples together—conflicts have increased, or at least we are more aware of them.

Children develop attitudes from what they see, hear, and read, in the home, the church, and the school. This book can treat only the situation within the school, the job the school has to do, and only one of the implements it has to work with—teaching materials. There are other approaches equally important—student organizations, methods of teaching, techniques of guidance, numerous day-by-day practices in group living; but what is taught to pupils, directly or by implication, by the textbooks they study has a great deal to do with the attitudes they develop, their prejudices, and their sympathies.

Because education is our most powerful public and social force, because it is the primary job of schools to educate for citizenship, educators (and publishers who disseminate education) cannot avoid a high degree of responsibility for the relations among groups of American citizens.

This study is not a partisan plan for "better treatment" of Negroes or Jews or Catholics or Orientals or Mexicans or other racial or ethnic or religious groups, but it does analyze issues and materials in which these groups sometimes feel themselves affronted or unjustly ignored. No "black list" or "white list" of books is offered; individual examples remain anonymous. But the importance and the possible effect of words was never brought out more forcefully. The committee hopes that its survey and appraisal of teaching materials may be of practical help to all those—or at least some of those—who speak, write, and publish for the guidance of youth.

vii + 231 pp., 6 x 9, Cloth $3.00

ORDER FORM

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION
744 JACKSON PLACE, N. W., WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

Please send the books checked below:

.... cop.. Intergroup Relations in Teaching Materials $3.00

..... payment enclosed ..... charge to my account

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

.....

20M—3-48

4 valuable books for teachers who want to foster intergroup understanding

PUBLISHED MARCH, 1949

CURRICULUM IN INTERGROUP RELATIONS

Case Studies in Instruction for Secondary Schools

The fourth in the Work in Progress Series is reprinted from The Bulletin of the National Association of Secondary School Principals, February, 1949. It is a collection of case studies of how teachers replanned programs in secondary school literature, social studies, and other subjects to achieve more effective teaching of group relations attitudes and concepts.

These descriptions illustrate how to assess students' needs, how to select and organize content, and how to plan learning experiences. Three chapters are devoted to special aspects of classroom teaching, such as how to pattern discussions, or how to train in skills for managing group relations situations. The book concludes with detailed descriptions of the experiences of teacher planning groups in two programs, with particular emphasis on ways of working together and kinds of difficulties encountered in group curriculum planning. This is not only a handbook on instruction in intergroup relations, but also a useful guide to curriculum making in any field. $1.25

EARLIER TITLES

SOCIOMETRY IN GROUP RELATIONS

A WORK GUIDE FOR TEACHERS

By Helen Hall Jennings

The importance of interpersonal relations to group life has long been realized. What has been missing is a method for diagnosing relationships in school groups. This book aims to supply such a method. It has been written out of the experience of a number of teachers in various schools, and test situations are presented in anecdote form full of human interest. Here are step-by-step techniques, with discussion of the psychological principles involved, analysis procedures, and suggested remedial action. Simple test forms which can be duplicated by any teacher are illustrated. $1.25

READING LADDERS FOR HUMAN RELATIONS

A most helpful teacher's guide to books suitable for children, selected to appeal to their interests and at the same time help them to grow in knowledge, understanding, and emotional maturity. Contains 396 titles, of which 99 are annotated, arranged around eight common human problems: Patterns of Family Life, Rural-Urban Contrasts, Economic Differences, Differences between Generations, Adjustment to New Places and New Situations, How It Feels to Grow Up, Belonging to Groups, Experience of Acceptance and Rejection.

"The tips on discussion technique alone would make this pamphlet valuable; as a teacher guide to meaningful reading experiences for adolescents, it is priceless."—The Clearing House. Published 1947; now in its 3rd printing. $1.00

(continued on back)

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

LITERATURE FOR HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

A stimulating discussion of how to use literature to bring insight to common problems of life; to answer questions arising from conflicts over racial, religious, and economic differences; to dissipate false impressions about "other" kinds of people. Accounts of classroom teaching procedures from first grade through twelfth show different ways of organizing reading programs so that the focus is on human relations, "preachy" and moralizing approaches are avoided, and situations for objective analysis of problems are set up. Bibliography of 77 titles discussed in the volume. Published 1948; now in its 2nd printing. $1.00

INTERGROUP EDUCATION IN COOPERATING SCHOOLS

Work in Progress Series

HILDA TABA, Director

The four booklets described in this circular are the first publications in the Work in Progress Series, issued by the staff of the Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools. This was a three-year experimental project sponsored by a committee of the American Council on Education, and financed by a grant from the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

School Systems Participating in Intergroup Education in Cooperating Schools

CLEVELAND, OHIO
DENVER, COLORADO
HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT
HINSDALE, ILLINOIS
LOS ANGELES COUNTY, CALIFORNIA
MILWAUKEE, WISCONSIN
MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA
NEWARK, NEW JERSEY
OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA
PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA
PORTLAND, OREGON
PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND
RIVERSIDE COUNTY, CALIFORNIA
ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA
SHOREWOOD, WISCONSIN
SOUTH BEND, INDIANA UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO LABORATORY SCHOOLS
WILMINGTON, DELAWARE

FORTHCOMING PUBLICATIONS

Reading Ladders for Human Relations—Revised
Group Life in Schools
Evaluation in Intergroup Education
and the final report of the staff to the Committee, a full-size book, cloth bound, scheduled for publication in 1950.

ORDER FORM

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION
744 JACKSON PLACE, N. W., WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

Please send the books checked below:

....cop.. Curriculum in Intergroup Relations ($1.25 per copy)
....cop.. Sociometry in Group Relations ($1.25 per copy)
....cop.. Literature for Human Understanding ($1.00 per copy)
....cop.. Reading Ladders for Human Relations ($1.00 per copy)
..... payment enclosed ..... charge to my account

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
.....

15M—3-49

16 - Human Rights

Your HUMAN RIGHTS

PROCESSED
MAY 8 1950
Southern Regional Council

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights
Proclaimed by the United Nations

Introduction by ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

Including Full Text of the Declaration 25¢

Progress of Covenant On Human Rights

A Review of the Work of the Seventh Session of the Commission on Human Rights

By

Dr. Charles Malik

Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights and Minister of Lebanon in the United States

Published by

UNITED NATIONS

Department of Public Information

June 1951

Progress of Covenant on Human Rights

By Dr. Charles Malik

Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights and Minister of Lebanon in the United States

SINCE the adoption and proclamation by the General Assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the main task of the Commission on Human Rights has been the elaboration of a Covenant on Human Rights.

Whatever may be the legal value of the Universal Declaration, solemnly adopted and proclaimed without any opposing vote by representatives of 48 nations, (and I can argue at some length that it has greater legal value than an ordinary recommendation or resolution of the General Assembly,) the Covenant is to go further than the Declaration: (a) it will define, with a greater degree of legal precision, at least some of the rights proclaimed in the Declaration; (b) it will include certain international measures of implementation aiming either at the promotion of these rights, or at the supervision of their implementation within the contracting states; and (c) it will be open for signature and ratification by Member states, so that those who adhere to it will be legally bound by its terms.

The Commission on Human Rights at its sixth session held at Lake Success, New York, from March 27 to May 19, 1950, prepared a draft Covenant on Human Rights. However, the Commission itself considered this draft as not final when submitting it to the Economic and Social Council. The Council, after having examined the draft during its eleventh session held in Geneva from July 3 to August 16, 1950, submitted it to the General Assembly with a request to give guidance to the Commission on Human Rights on four major points in order that the Commission could complete its work on the Covenant. The General Assembly, in its Resolution 422 (V), acceded to this request of the Economic and Social Council, and the Commission, which met on April 16, 1951, in its seventh session, began the essential task of revision and completion of the Covenant in the light of the decisions of the General Assembly.

The Commission held a general discussion on the question of including provisions concerning economic, social and cultural rights. The following main points were raised and discussed:

whether the instructions of the General Assembly were binding on the Commission; whether provisions on economic, social and cultural rights should be embodied in a separate instrument, in separate protocols, or in a separate part of the draft Covenant; and the difficulty of defining such rights in precise legal terms; whether all the rights proclaimed in Articles 22-27 of the Universal Declaration should be included; the differences between civil liberties and economic and social rights on the one hand, and their close relationship on the other;

the advisability of including a general undertaking modelled on Article 22 of the Universal Declaration, a broad general provision to promote conditions of economic, social, and cultural progress and development, to be supplemented by special undertakings;

the special measures of implementation which may be required as far as economic, social and cultural rights are concerned; and the question whether the articles on implementation elaborated last year were appropriate with regard to those rights; that the inclusion of provisions on economic, social and cultural rights and on their implementation should accord with the obligations undertaken under the Charter of the United Nations, the constitutions of the specialized agencies, and the agreements between the United Nations and the specialized agencies delimiting their respective responsibilities;

the need for avoiding overlapping with and duplication of the work of the specialized agencies, and for close co-operation with and between them in both the formulation and the implementation of these rights;

the part to be played by the State both in the national and international sphere;

the nature of the rights to be defined and the necessity to have regard to the resources of the State;

the need to avoid dividing Members of the United Nations into two groups — those who could, and those who, owing to insufficient economic and social development, could not, ensure certain economic and social rights;

the necessity of aiming at obtaining the maximum number of adherences to the Covenant;

the desirability of finding a common ground between more developed and less developed countries providing for the attainment of better conditions by stages;

the question of the obligations of states to implement effectively the economic, social and cultural rights enunciated in the Covenant;

the question of concrete ways and means of implementing the rights to work, to social security, to education and other rights proclaimed in the Declaration and the Covenant;

the principle that the implementation of the provisions of the Covenant in respect of their own citizens was an obligation laid on the governments of the signatory states, in which connection there was a discussion as to whether each of the articles relating to economic, social and cultural rights had to mention the definite measures to be adopted for the implementation of these rights.

We have in this session achieved two things: we have elaborated, for the first time so far as the Covenant is concerned, articles on economic, social and cultural rights, and we have revised the measures of implementation of last year and drafted new measures of implementation.

The General Assembly in the above-mentioned Resolution, 422 (V), gave the following guidance to the Commission on Human Rights:

"(THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY,) . . . .

7. (a) DECIDES to include in the Covenant on Human Rights economic, social and cultural rights and an explicit recognition of equality of men and women in related rights, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations;

(b) CALLS UPON the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights, in accordance with the spirit of the Universal Declaration, to include in the draft Covenant a clear expression of economic, social and cultural rights in a manner which relates them to the civic and political freedoms proclaimed by the draft Covenant;

(c) CALLS UPON the Economic and Social Council to request the Commission on Human Rights to take steps as are necessary to obtain the co-operation of other organs of the United Nations and of the specialized agencies in the consideration of such rights;

(d) REQUESTS the Economic and Social Council to consider, at its twelfth session, the methods by which the specialized agencies might co-operate with the Commission on Human Rights with regard to economic, social and cultural rights."

Despite the decision of the General Assembly, certain delegations, and in particular the delegations of the United Kingdom and of India, were not in favor of the inclusion of articles on economic, social and cultural rights in the present Covenant, but preferred to see them treated in a separate instrument.

Other delegations had a different attitude at the start of the work of the Commission. Certain of them thought that it would be sufficient, in order to comply with the wishes expressed by the General Assembly, to include in the Covenant a general clause prescribing to the Covenanting States simply that they promote economic, social and cultural rights. The delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics took the other extreme view and presented a detailed set of draft articles dealing with these matters. In every one of these articles the state is explicitly stated as being obligated to guarantee these rights. Another somewhat similar set of articles was presented by the delegation of Yugoslavia. But the majority of delegations held a view which could be defined as intermediate between these two extremes. They thought that, in accordance with the wishes handed down to us by the General Assembly, a clear expression of economic, social and cultural rights should find its place in the Covenant.

Specialized Agencies

The specialized agencies, particuarly the International Labor Organization (ILO), the World Health Organization (WHO), and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), sent strong delegations to this important session of the Commission. At one time they were represented by their three distinguished Directors-General. These three specialized agencies have left their unmistakable impress upon our work. The finished product bears many of the formulations suggested by them. This is, indeed, as it should be, as these on-going instruments of international co-operation in the economic, social and cultural domains know, on the technical side, more about these matters than many a member of the Commission does, and have been, each in its own field, trying to promote human rights for years, and in the case of the International Labor Organization, for decades. It is doubtful whether there has ever been a more fruitful association between the specialized agencies and any organ of the United Nations than the co-operation which the Commission was privileged to receive this time from these agencies.

The non-governmental organizations in consultative relationship with the Economic and Social Council were also strongly represented. They never failed to speak frankly and firmly on the issues which interested them. If a Covenant on human rights is going to emerge from our labors, it will be the interested and wise agitation of these non-governmental bodies which is going to move the governments to sign it.

As to the general scope of the adopted provisions, it will be apparent that there is a certain lack of balance between their diverse formulations. In particular, the article dealing with social security simply states "The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone to social security." Similar texts were adopted for the rights to adequate housing, to adequate standard of living, and to the continuous improvement of one's living conditions. On the other hand, the articles dealing with the right to health and the right to education and culture have been drawn up in greater detail. The article recognizing the right of everyone to just and favorable conditions of work lies somewhere in between these two extremes, and the article dealing with the right to work has apparently a purely declaratory character.

Trade Union Rights

One category of rights which was considered essential by certain delegations, namely, trade union rights and the right to strike, gave rise to considerable debate. Certain delegations were of the opinion that there was no necessity for including a special provision on trade union rights as they were already covered by Article 16 dealing with the right of association, which was adopted last year. Here again the text finally agreed upon was a compromise solution which does not give satisfaction to either of the extreme views expressed. The article now reads: "The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone, in conformity with Article 16, to form and join local, national and international trade unions of his choice for the protection of his economic and social interests."

Another controversial matter was the question of including a special article on the equality of men and women, mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph 7 of the General Assembly's Resolution. Of course the principle itself of equality of men and women was recognized by all delegations. However, some thought that the general provision on non-discrimination embodied in Article 1 of the draft Covenant was sufficient, and that to single out for special repetition the question of equality between men and women would not only lead to weakening the general principle but could also throw a certain amount of doubt on the equal importance of preventing discrimination on other grounds (race, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, etc.) Other delegations insisted not only on the inclusion of a special article dealing with the equality of men and women in the field of economic, social and cultural rights, but also wanted to have a repetition of the principle of equality in a number of articles dealing with substantive rights. The final decision of the Commission was to include an article which reads as follows: "The States parties to the Covenant recognize the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all economic, social and cultural rights, and particularly of those set forth in this Covenant."

"Umbrella Clause"

Another controversial issue was the question whether the part of the Covenant dealing with economic, social and cultural rights should be preceded by a general "umbrella clause" which would contain a kind of preamble to this part in addition to the undertaking of contracting states to take steps individually and through international co-operation in order to achieve progressively the full realization of the rights concerned. The objection against the adoption of such a clause was that it would amount to forming a kind of separate Covenant on economic, social and cultural rights (a sort of Covenant within a Covenant), contrary to the desire expressed by the General Assembly that a single Covenant embracing all rights should be prepared. The Commission, however, decided to include such an article in the Covenant. Nevertheless, when it proceeded to examine the various drafts presented to it, it rejected them all successivey one by one. A new proposal was then presented by the French delegation and finally adopted by 10 votes to 8. The adopted formula has been further criticized by some delegations on the grounds that the undertaking which it includes in its last paragraph allows of possible evasion.

A similar debate took place on the question of whether a general limitation clause should be included in relation to economic, social and cultural rights, and if so, how it should be worded. By a substantial majority of 11 votes to 6, with one abstention, the Commission adopted a clause according to which a State Party could submit the enjoyment of these rights only to such limitations as are determined by law and only so far as this may be compatible with the nature of these rights, and solely for the purpose of promoting the general welfare in a democratic society.

Problem of Implementation

The problem of implementation of economic, social and cultural rights presents special characteristics of its own. For here it is not enough to make sure that states comply with their commitments under the Covenant, but certain special positive assistance must be rendered them to enable them to achieve progressively their objectives. This problem raised two issues of capital importance: on the one hand, the relationship between the machinery to be set up for implementation with the specialized agencies; on the other hand, the relationship of this machinery with the United Nations organization itself.

It was obvious from the start that the implementation of economic, social and cultural rights would require some system of reporting by Governments on the progress made by them under the Covenant. In addition, the problem of technical assistance as a means of enabling Governments to implement the Covenant was also raised.

The various specialized agencies, working each in its particular field, have set up for a number of years both a system of reporting and organs examining the reports and making recommendations to States members of these organizations. These agencies also play an essential role in the overall program of technical assistance.

It is for this reason that the members of the Commission were fully aware that while setting up new machinery for implementing economic, social and cultural rights, it would be indispensable to keep in mind the existing machinery of the specialized agencies in order to avoid duplication, leading not only to unnecessary expense, both for Governments and for the international organizations, but also to confusion, frustration and general weakening of international machinery. The representatives of the specialized agencies, especially of the International Labor Organization, were very emphatic in drawing the attention of the Commission to this point. However, not all members of the Commission held the same views on the coordination of the new machinery to be set up with the already existing machineries of the specialized agencies. Some believed that it would be contrary to the Charter to divest the United Nations of primary responsibility in the field of human rights in favor of the specialized agencies. Others did not feel that it would be contrary to the Charter to rely primarily on already existing machinery and to retain for the United Nations competence only in such cases where there is no competent specialized agency to deal with the matter, or where the State concerned is not a member of a specialized agency.

Proposal for Committee

The second cardinal issue was the relationship between the implementation machinery and the United Nations. The first proposal submitted by the delegation of Lebanon provided for a special Committee composed of independent persons elected in their personal capacity by the Economic and Social Council amongst nationals of States Parties to the Covenant. This Committee would consider reports from Covenanting States and would make recommendations to them on the promotion and observance of economic, social and cultural rights without further appeal to other organs. Later, this proposal was revised in such a manner that the Committee would come under the authority of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly.

The delegations of Pakistan and Sweden presented a joint proposal differing from that of Lebanon in the relatively greater emphasis placed upon the specialized agencies than upon the United Nations.

A third proposal by the French delegation maintained that the Council should consider the reports but insisted that the Commission on Human Rights, the only Commission mentioned in the Charter, should retain, under new terms of reference, competence to assist the Council in its task. The representative of France maintained that the States Parties to the Covenant should undertake to report according to recommendations made by the General Assembly to all members of the United Nations, as every such member is already under an obligation to promote human rights in accordance with the Charter.

A working group was set up to try to reconcile these diverse points of view. The text adopted by the working group, which was afterwards confirmed with very minor amendments by the Commission, embodied the following principles: (a) a reaffirmation of the primary responsibility of the United Nations with respect to implementation, although States members of specialized agencies will continue their reporting to these agencies in the regular manner; (b) the central implementation organs within the United Nations would be the Economic and Social Council together with the Commission on Human Rights; (c) the Economic and Social Council to establish a program of reporting by stages in consultation with the specialized agencies, and to make special arrangements with these agencies in respect of their reporting to it on the progressive implementation by their member States of the Covenant; (d) the use of technical assistance as a means of promoting the implementation of these rights.

The draft Covenant as prepared last year during the sixth session of the Commission contained a set of articles dealing with implementation. When the Commission took up again this problem during the present session, the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics submitted a draft resolution inviting the Commission on Human Rights to omit from the draft Covenant the provisions on implementation, on the ground that they amounted to an attempt at intervening in the internal affairs of States, and thus would violate their sovereignty. However, the Soviet draft resolution has been rejected by the Commission.

Significant Changes

The Commission went over the provisions of implementation it developed last year. The following were the significant changes introduced this year: (a) the Human Rights Committee is to be composed of nine rather than seven members; (b) this Committee is to be elected by the International Court of Justice from a list of persons nominated by the States Parties to the Covenant; (c) the Secretary of this Committee is also to be elected by the International Court of Justice from a list of three names submitted by the Committee; (d) the Committee, in serious cases where human life is endangered, is entitled to act forthwith at the request of a Contracting State and after notifying the State or States directly concerned; (e) the Committee is authorized to request the Economic and Social Council to submit legal questions arising in connection with its work to the International Court of Justice for advisory opinion.

Various unsuccessful attempts were made to include the right of petition by individuals, groups or organizations in the present system of implementation. This whole question of petitions will come up again for consideration next year when the Commission will have to consider, among other documents, proposals by the United States and by Uruguay. The latter is urging the setting up of an Office of United Nations Attorney General.

At the end of the session, the delegation of India moved a draft resolution according to which the Commission was to request the Economic and Social Council to recommend in its turn to the General Assembly to reconsider its decision of last fall to include economic, social and cultural rights in the same Covenant with political, civil and personal rights. The Commission rejected this proposal by 12 against 5 with 1 abstention. The feeling of the Assembly that one and the same Covenant must contain all these types of rights is thereby strongly reflected in the Commission.

The seventh session of the Commission on human rights has been a good session. Delegates worked incessantly and seriously for five full weeks. A positive spirit of understanding and forbearance was evident throughout. Everybody did his best to accommodate himself as much as possible to the points of view of others. Differences, no matter how radical, were never allowed either to impede the progress of the work or to impair the friendly relations between the members of the Commission. The debates often reached a very high level of quality, and there is hardly a basic international problem that was not explicitly or implicitly touched upon. And thus the Commission carries on its mandate under the Charter to promote human rights and fundamental freedoms throughout the world, always mindful that this is the heart of the world situation today, and that insofar as man's inherent dignity suffers anywhere, peace, real peace, is an illusion.

Who will inherit the earth? Only the people and the country which, overcoming its own internal difficulties, steps forth with courage and humor and responsibility to lead the rest of the world in the effective affirmation of that which essentially belongs to man.

Reprinted from United Nations Bulletin, Vol. X, No. 12

Human Rights

82D CONGRESS
2D SESSION

H. R. 6587

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FEBRUARY 14, 1952

Mr. HELLER introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

A BILL

To amend title 18 of the United States Code to provide protection against vandalism committed on account of racial or religious prejudice.

1 Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representa-
2 tives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,
3 That the Congress finds as fact that the succeeding provi-
4 sions of this Act are necessary to promote universal respect
5 for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental free-
6 doms for all without distinction as to race or religion, in 7 accordance with the undertaking of the United States under 8 the United Nations Charter, and to further the national policy
9 in that regard by securing to all persons under the jurisdic-
10 tion of the United States effective recognition of certain of

1 the rights and freedoms proclaimed by the General Assembly
2 of the United Nations in the Universal Declaration of Human
3 Rights.

4 SEC. 2. Chapter 13 of title 18 of the United States Code
5 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new
6 section:

7 "§ 245. Vandalism on account of race or religion.

8 "Whoever damages any place of worship, dwelling, or 9 other property, real or personal, out of malice toward any 10 race or religion, or with intent to ridicule, intimidate, or 11 otherwise injure any person on account of his race or religion,
12 shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more
13 than one year, or both, except that whoever in violating this 14 section causes property damage in excess of $1,000 shall be 15 fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 16 twenty years, or both, and whoever in violating this section
17 causes the death or bodily injury of any person shall be 18 punished by death."

19 SEC. 2. The table of contents of chapter 13 of title 18
20 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end
21 thereof

"245. Vandalism on account of race or religion."

82D CONGRESS
2D SESSION

H. R. 6587

A BILL

To amend title 18 of the United States Code to provide protection against vandalism committed on account of racial or religious prejudice.

By Mr. HELLER

FEBRUARY 14, 1952

Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary

HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE UNITED NATIONS

By DR. CHARLES MALIK

Minister of the Republic of Lebanon in the United States and Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations

I

THE eighth session of the Commission on Human Rights, lasting for nine weeks (April 14-June 13), was the longest the Commission ever held and one of the longest held by any organ of the United Nations. And yet all that the Commission managed to complete of its agenda was three or four out of a total of some twenty items. Those of us who have followed closely this enterprise ever since San Francisco now realize that we have all along underestimated the complexity and difficulty of this issue. We began with the somewhat naive, albeit sincere, determination to work out an International Bill of Rights and, in the initial impulse of our inexperience, we saw the completion of this task just around the corner. There were three steps to the undertaking: a declaration whereby the rights and freedoms appertaining to man are theoretically defined; a series of covenants whereby adhering states explicitly bind themselves to the strict observance of the rights and freedoms elaborated in them; and measures of implementation whereby the international community can make sure that human rights and fundamental freedoms, whether on the level of the Charter or of the Declaration or of the covenants, are in fact being promoted and observed. We completed the first step in 1948, and many of us thought the other two steps would be forthcoming in speedy succession. We have been grappling with them now for four years, and while much indeed has been accomplished during this time, the end is not yet in sight. We have all been sobered by the realization of the truly formidable task assigned to us.

NATURE OF TASK Now this task was none other than the determination of the proper structure of human dignity, the working out of all those enjoyments which are inherent to man and without which he would be less than himself, less than his Author intends him to be, less at any rate than he is capable of becoming and being. And we were not only to bring about agreement (or register whatever agreement there was) among the nations of the world as to what these natural rights and freedoms were, but also to suggest ways and means whereby human dignity, thus determined and thus agreed upon, can be promoted and achieved by international co-operation.

All that one has to do to appreciate what all this really involves is (a) to remember that man by himself is at best very difficult to determine, even if it were one philosopher proceeding from one coherent set of presuppositions who attempted this determination; (b) to reflect that the nations, in the consideration of this question in its present all-embracing scope, have really come together seriously for the first time in history, and that, so far as international action by responsible representatives of governments is concerned, the Commission's work is creative and pioneering in every respect; (c) to keep in mind the radical differences that obtain in the interpretation of man among the effective cultures of the world, some stressing this, some stressing that side of his nature; and (d) to brood upon the sad phenomenon of power politics entering into and vitiating everything, including man himself. We know now that the nobility and importance of our task is matched only by its inherent difficulty and by the long time we must in all fairness allow for its unfolding.

II

Among the general circumstances that conditioned the eighth session of the Commission, three are particularly worthy of consideration. There was first the oppressive weight of the general world situation which affected our progress at every turn. People's minds were on the whole elsewhere than on the problems of human rights, and some found it difficult to concentrate upon our immediate endeavors. The debate seemed to them utterly academic. Thus it is not clear how much the Foreign Offices of the Member governments, or the respective departments dealing with the United Nations, took active notice of our deliberations; nor whether we were just those eighteen "experts" blissfully left by our governments to hammer out all by ourselves whatever texts we could, as best we could. Now, the troubled world situation has been with us for a number of years, but the more we are removed in time from the original moral indignation evoked by the Second World War in favor of man and his freedoms, the more the questions of war and peace cast their pall upon the reality of our work.

WORLD SITUATION This is one of man's tormenting paradoxes: that such fundamental work, for man and in his name, cannot go on in a vacuum, but must take its proper place within the context of the serious world situation: must indeed reflect people's concern for their existence and their destiny. When existence is in question, the "how" of existence recedes to the background. And yet what is the "use" of existence unless it be made worthy of man and his highest, unless its just "how" is assured? When discord deepens and war threatens, we slacken in our interest in human rights; and yet is not the violation of these rights among the fundamental causes of war and discord, and can there be tranquility and progress without adequate recognition of these rights and freedoms throughout the world?

NO HURRY The second general situation that determined this session, a situation not altogether independent of the first, was that nobody seemed in a hurry to push our work to a conclusion. I cannot accuse anybody of intentional dilatoriness, but people were on the whole expansive, and many a decision could have been reached with one-half or one-third of the argumentation that led up to it. Certainly the sense of urgency and drive that characterized the preparation of the Declaration back in 1947 and 1948 was absent, and it was impossible to brush aside the reflection that the proclamation of the Declaration in 1948 was really something of a miracle, so that if it were not proclaimed then, possibly we would still be working on it now. In these fundamental matters vigorous leadership makes all the difference: one or two nations, knowing exactly what they want and determined in advance to finish a total job, have a good chance to lead the rest in the attainment of their end. But to leave eighteen representatives to argue more or less ramblingly about what belongs to the dignity of man, without an overarching vigorous design aiming at the completion of a job no matter how difficult, would doubtless lead, if not to trackless, then certainly to inconclusive wanderings. You could not this time—at least until the very last few days—get the Commission to adopt rules limiting the number of interventions per person per subject and the length of time of each intervention, even in respect to those subjects gone over a hundred times before; nor could you set a firm deadline for the receivability of proposals, and amendments, and amendments to amendments; and always when the Chairman wanted to close the list of speakers, practically the whole round of representatives wanted to put their names in again. People simply loved going on and on—arguing, attacking, coaxing, refining.

ONE OR TWO COVENANTS The third fundamental circumstance was that the situation prevailing in the Third Committee of the General Assembly with respect to this matter carried over to the Commission. The issue that was debated for weeks and weeks in the Third Committee last year and the year before was whether to work out one covenant, comprising within its scope civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, or two separate covenants, one for civil and political rights, and one for economic, social and cultural rights. "One or two" became the question; and when great issues are reduced to such absurd simplicity, people in the confusion of the times do not always take sides on the merits of the case. There is room for neat, political manoeuvring and bargaining: room to score a victory against or inflict an embarrassment upon the "twoers" or "oners" by shrewdly siding with the opposite camp. From the point of view of the truth, it is always dangerous to oversimplify issues in international gatherings: overlapping, interpenetration, the providing of significant "riders," the insertion of pregnant nuances, all this helps to prevent false divisions of the house for reasons entirely extraneous to the objective subject-matter under consideration. He who thinks representatives are always swayed by the objective compulsion of the truth and never fall to the seductions of abstract simplification does not know the real character of international existence.

Be that as it may, the 1950 decision of the General Assembly was in favor of one covenant, and the Commission in its session in Geneva last year worked assiduously on the basis of that presupposition. But in 1951 the General Assembly reversed its directive to the Commission, asking us to prepare two separate covenants, to be gone over with equal care, to include as much common language as possible, to be presented to the General Assembly and thence to be opened for accession at the same time, but withal to be two separate instruments capable of being adhered to separately and independently.

Now, there was nothing in the reversal in itself to cause the Commission any special difficulty or embarrassment: we receive our ultimate directives from the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council and we try to execute them as faithfully as possible. But in this particular reversal, what was decisive from the point of view of the general conditions under which we carried out our mandate was the structure of the voting in the General Assembly, considered both quantitatively and qualitatively. From the former point of view, the decision to have one covenant for the two types of rights was carried in 1950 by an overwhelming majority, 38 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions. When this decision was reversed last year in favor of two covenants, the voting was 27 for, 20 against, with 3 abstentions. On the other hand, those that favored two covenants were led by the more developed countries, whereas those who favored one comprised under-developed countries and the Soviet bloc.

Qualitatively, the house in general divided on this issue between the Western world and the Eastern world (India and Lebanon, however, went with the West) with the Soviet world siding with the East and the Latin American world dividing more or less evenly between the two. As a result, at once two matters came to the fore which are of the essence of our present involvement, matters that were, to be sure, partly the cause, but are undoubtedly also partly the effect, of this division: I mean the host of questions subsumed under the rubric "self-determination of peoples" and the antithesis between the developed and the less developed. The whole atmosphere of human rights in the United Nations is now charged with these two themes.

TWO BLOCS The structure of voting in the Third Committee reflected itself both times faithfully in the Commission. Last year a strong majority of the Commission could always be counted upon in support of the idea of one covenant. This year the house was pretty nearly evenly divided on most important issues. Some of the great decisions (whether to adopt or to reject texts) taken this year by the Commission were taken by a bare majority of one or two, and in certain cases we had to call into the room one or two members who were outside attending to some other business in order to enable the Commission to come to a decision. Nothing is more despairing to a Chairman than to be dealing with an evenly divided house: the grounds of seriousness seem then to be withdrawn from underneath his feet. The Commission's work at its eighth session this year cannot be properly appraised without constantly keeping in mind (and without fully appreciating the significance of this fact) that two more or less solid and equal blocs at once formed themselves on practically every important issue, the one composed of the U.S.S.R., the Ukraine, Poland, Yugoslavia, Chile, Uruguay, Pakistan and Egypt, the other of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Australia, Belgium, Sweden, Greece and China, with Lebanon and India sometimes dividing between the two blocs, sometimes voting with the first, sometimes (in fact for the most part) voting with the second bloc. (This statement does not of course apply to every vote taken, but it certainly approximates the normal pattern observed in the voting. Also the listing above is made in the order of firmness with which the country in question stuck to the bloc under which it is listed. Thus the two or three countries toward the end of each listing did not invariably vote with the rest of that bloc, and in one instance—that of communications—the pattern of voting underwent a revolution: the Soviet Union, the United States, the United Kingdom and France coming together in indissoluble union.)

The Commission labored under three great handicaps: the overshadowing world tension, the utter leisureliness with which people moved or wanted to move, and the even division of its membership on the fundamental issues. The first distracted our attention somewhat, the second slowed down our progress considerably, and the third cast a shadow of doubt upon the finality of such results as we were able to achieve.

III

In general and despite the expansiveness and repetitiveness, the quality of debate in this session was high. To attend the meetings day after day and listen carefully to the development of our themes was a veritable education in itself. Because of the nature of our subject-matter — the basic structure of human dignity—no fundamental issue in the world today was not directly or indirectly touched upon. This has always been the case in the Commission on Human Rights. It is doubtful whether in the debates of the United Nations anything compares with the proceedings of this Commission in depth and comprehensiveness.

SELF-DETERMINATION The debate on self-determination revealed two antithetical facts: on the one hand, that in itself this question is exceedingly complex; on the other, that the non-Atlantic nations would brush aside all such complexity in favor of a simple, direct affirmation that every people and every nation has a natural right to self-determination. It is not that the Atlantic nations and their friends are just defensively and selfishly resisting change: the problem is genuinely and objectively complex. Nor is it, on the other hand, that the Soviet, Asian and Latin countries are just spiting and rebelling against the West: people today insist on their right to determine their own fate freely even if that should mean transfer of attachment from one power camp to another. The Western doctrine of freedom is gradually coming to full bloom in non-Western lands; and in this closely-knit world, so long as the two camps remain poised against each other in irresolution and unsettlement, everybody else has a chance to clamor for his right to independence of thought and action. The zest generated by the idea of self-determination is due precisely to the fact that the mind does not at first suspect the formidable complexities concealed under this idea. There is no short-cut to the sophistication of experience and reflection.

Among the questions raised and debated in this connection were the following:

(1) How much does world peace depend upon safeguarding the right of self-determination to peoples and nations?

(2) Whether the right to self-determination, to which all were agreed in principle, was an individual or a group right, and consequently whether it fell under the Charter concept of "fundamental human rights" which it was the intent of the Declaration to define and the covenants to implement.

(3) How much does the exercise of other rights depend upon the prior realization of the right of self-determination?

(4) Where should this right be affirmed? As an integral article in the body of the covenant or covenants? Or in the preamble? Or in the Declaration of Human Rights? Or in a separate document? Or in a special and separate resolution of the General Assembly? (Because our instructions were explicit, the Commission decided that self-determination be an article in the body of the covenants.)

(5) Should its content be a short simple statement of principle, or should it be detailed?

(6) If the structure of self-determination should be gone into in detail, was the Commission competent to undertake this job? Should it not rather seek assistance from the International Law Commission, the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, and UNESCO, in the determination of the diverse moments of this idea?

(7) How is self-determination related to freedom, independence, self-government?

(8) What constitutes a "people"?

(9) When are "minorities" entitled to this right?

(10) When in their maturation are "peoples" entitled to this right?

(11) What legitimate action may a people take to achieve this right?

(12) What should the attitude of other peoples and nations be to a people struggling for the right of self-determination?

(13) The question of plebiscites: when to be taken? under whose auspices?

(14) The great question of "cultural self-determination": is there such a thing? Are people, for instance, entitled to suppress freedom of thought, conscience and enquiry in the name of "cultural self-determination"?

(15) The great question of "economic self-determination," of the right of peoples freely to dispose of their own natural resources: how does this affect international economic co-operation, including the question of development?

(16) Is the right of self-determination according to the Charter unqualified? Is it subject to overarching considerations of international security and peace?

It will be highly rewarding to the student of this topic to go back to the clashes of opinion in the original proceedings of the Commission, and to try to penetrate to the reason and significance of these clashes.

The text of the article on self-determination finally adopted by the Commission for inclusion in both covenants under consideration was as follows:

1. All peoples and all nations shall have the right of self-determination, namely, the right freely to determine their political, economic, social and cultural status.
2. All States, including those having responsibility for the administration of non-self-governing and trust territories and those controlling in whatsoever manner the exercise of that right by another people, shall promote the realization of that right in all their territories, and shall respect the maintenance of that right in other States, in conformity with the provisions of the United Nations Charter.
3. The right of the peoples to self-determination shall also include permanent sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence on the grounds of any rights that may be claimed by other States.

The Commission was also instructed by the General Assembly to work out recommendations concerning international respect for the self-determination of peoples, the presupposition being that pending the elaboration and the coming into force of the covenants, surely the United Nations cannot remain inactive in this field. Two such recommendations were drawn up in which the member governments were asked to uphold the principle of self-determination, particularly with respect to non-self-governing and trust territories, and those responsible for such territories were asked to include in the information transmitted by them under Article 73e of the Charter an account of the political progress of these territories.

IV

Whatever we were able to adopt of the covenant on economic, social and cultural rights was gone over with great care. We have now precise texts on the right to work, to appropriate conditions of work, to social security, to special protection of maternity, children and the family, to food, clothing and housing, to an adequate standard of living, to health, to education, to science and culture, and to forming and joining trade unions. There is also an article on the progressive implementation of compulsory primary education free of charge for all. Besides these substantive articles, there are what might be termed "regulative provisions" on non-discrimination, especially as between men and women, on general limitations on the exercise of these rights, on the fact that the present convention cannot derogate from human rights already in force, and on the fact that the realization of these rights is to be "progressive."

The specialized agencies again took active interest in our work. Especially did the respresentatives of UNESCO and ILO play a significant role in our deliberations. The Commission respectfully deferred to their expert opinion, and our present text reflects some of their ideas.

The Soviet bloc, as is to be expected, were most active in the debates on these matters. They urged the most advanced provisions, especially with respect to non-discrimination, and never tired of alleging that in their respective countries economic and social conditions were incomparably better than in the Western world. I think a study of our proceedings will reveal that the amendments we adopted to the old texts under examination responded for the most part more to Soviet than to Western promptings.

GUARANTEES But on their major thesis they were not successful. They wanted to see a strict governmental guarantee for practically every right. According to the Soviet concept, the government is the agency that "guarantees" for everybody the enjoyment of the right to work, to proper conditions of work, to "social security," to education, etc. The majority of the Commission did not share this view, believing on the contrary that economic power and enforcement should not be a monopoly of the state. Of course this fundamental difference in viewpoint between the Soviet and the non-Soviet worlds raises the three formidable issues: (a) of how governments can enter into international compacts in matters over which they do not have direct control; (b) of how such compacts can therefore be implemented; and (c) of whether the international promotion of this type of right lends itself to the same sort of treatment as that possible for civil and political rights.

LIMITING CLAUSES In two limiting but important cases there is an expression of governmental guarantee. The first is the non-discrimination clause of the general "umbrella" article. Here "the States Parties undertake to guarantee that the rights enunciated in this Covenant will be exercised without distinction of any kind, such as race, color sex, etc." The point of this undertaking is that while some of these rights may not be realized except "progressively," owing to limitations of "available resources" and other conditions, yet insofar as a right is exercised at all, it cannot be exercised on a basis of discrimination. Thus there may not be at once enough schools for all children, but the available schools must take in children without discrimination. The second case is the provision on trade union rights which reads: "the States . . . undertake to ensure the free exercise of the right of everyone to form and join . . . trade unions . . .," the idea being that all that the states here obligate themselves to is not to interfere in trade union activity, and therefore such negative (formal) obligation can be assumed all at once.

The other clause of the opening "umbrella" article reads: "Each State Party hereto undertakes to take steps, individually and through international cooperation, to the maximum of its available resources, with a view to achieving progressively the full realization of the rights recognized in this Covenant by legislation as well as by other means." This text was probably fought hardest of all. Behind every phrase lurks a precise intention, or the avoidance of a supposed danger. The "enthusiasts" saw practically behind every word a possible loophole for evasion by governments; the "realists" argued that these "material" rights differed from the "formal" ones of the other covenant precisely by the feature that they depended on objective, material conditions which can only be brought into effective operation progressively. The realists finally won the day.

SCIENCE AND CULTURE In the debate on science and culture, some of the dread ultimate issues in the world today came to the fore. The Soviet viewpoint was again that the states must "ensure" that the development of science and culture subserve "the interests of progress and democracy." This proposal was defeated by 12 votes to 4, with 1 abstention. Nothing is more detrimental to the spirit and vitality of a culture than to make freedom of thought and enquiry subject to the opinion of the State as to what is good for "progress and democracy" or, for that matter, for anything. Science, culture, truth are absolutely independent of politics: their development obeys an autonomous law of its own. Even if "progress," "democracy," "peace," were univocal terms (and the present world crisis consists precisely in the fact that they are not), and even if they referred to good and desirable things, it is not the business of science, culture and creation to pursue them. These pursue their own proper ends, which are nothing other than the discovery and expression of the truth (which is fulness of life and beauty no less than of mind) in complete freedom. Not only will science and truth wither away where freedom is suppressed or curtailed, but the state itself will wake up one day to the realization that, both by reason of a pervasive dullness of mind which it has succeeded in generating among its citizenry, and by reason of the unavailability of material instruments which the inventiveness of freedom alone can supply, it is decisively handicapped in the pursuit of its own ends. He tampers with the source of life itself who tampers with freedom.

RIGHT TO PROPERTY For the second year an unsuccessful attempt was made to include an article on the right to own property. Article 17 of the Universal Declaration proclaimed this right, but since then the Commission has not been able to agree on an appropriate text for the covenant. The French Delegation put forward a proposal, but so many difficulties and objections were raised, particularly with regard to expropriation and compensation, that finally the Commission, tired of the apparent hopelessness of this matter, decided to adjourn the debate on it. The concept of property and its ownership is at the heart of the great ideological conflict of the present day. It was not only the Communist representatives who riddled this concept with questions and doubts: a goodly portion of the non-Communist world had itself succumbed to these doubts. A study of this particular debate will reveal the extent to which the non-Communist world has been communistically softened or frightened. It seems incredible that in these economic matters, which reflect indeed much more than mere economic divergencies, the Western world is so divided on itself as to be incapable of presenting a common front against Communism. When the material appetite is aroused, there is no end to its claims unless it be checked at some point with the original restraints of the spirit.

V

No drastic revisions have been introduced in the civil and political formulations that have come down to us from the Commission's labors of 1950. One can in general speak of having subjected these rights only to further refinement.

The catalog comprises the right to life; the prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment; the prohibition of slavery and forced labor; the right to liberty and security of person; freedom from imprisonment on account of inability to fulfill a contractual obligation; the right to liberty of movement; the protection of aliens against arbitrary expulsion; the right to a fair trial; the prohibition of retroactive criminal legislation; the right to recognition as a person before the law; freedom of thought, conscience and religion; freedom of opinion and expression; the right of peaceful assembly; the right of association; and equality before the law. There were further three articles of a "regulative" type: one expressing the obligation to respect and ensure the rights enumerated in the covenant; one on the scope and limitation of derogations allowable under exceptional circumstances; and one safeguarding the covenant from abuse and preventing any restrictions upon rights in force not recognized in it.

The student who wishes to go more deeply into these matters must read the records of the Commission or its report to the Economic and Social Council. Among the themes that received significant discussion were the following: the question of capital punishment; how to preserve the integrity and independence of the Genocide Convention in respect to the article on the right to life; what medical and scientific experimentation is permissible on man; the distinction between forced and hard labor; the question of conscientious objectors; the question of exile and of the possibility of return to one's own country; minimum guarantees for accused persons; for what purpose speech may be limited; and whether states may be allowed to sign the convention even if at the time they do not measure up to all its requirements.

FREEDOM OF RELIGION There was an interesting revision of the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. Thanks to the admirable endeavors and openness of mind of the representative of Egypt, and to the studied and profound concern of Dr. Frederick Nolde, representing nongovernmental religious organizations, the modifications suggested by the representative of Egypt were all unanimously adopted. Although it can be philosophically shown that the right to change one's religion or belief (the provision of the Declaration) necessarily implies the right to maintain one's religion or belief, it was felt that this implication had better be made explicit in the covenant. Consequently, the formulation now is "freedom to maintain or to change" one's religion or belief. Now, this revision was meant to guard against an inordinate emphasis upon "changing one's religion or belief," but since it labors the obvious, and since freedom to change necessarily implies freedom to maintain, but freedom to maintain does not necessarily imply freedom to change, it in turn lays itself open to the criticism of overemphasizing the static aspect of freedom of religion or belief. To restore the balance once more, a new clause was introduced into this important article reading: "No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to maintain or to change his religion or belief."

In this way, absolute freedom of conscience to see the truth and follow it, whether by confirming one's previous position or by changing it, is safeguarded. Although he heartily endorsed these modifications, Dr. Nolde read important reservations into our records. I believe no student or interpreter can afford in the future to fail to take notice of these reservations. Important statements guarding against possible misinterpretations of the concept of coercion were also made in the debate. It is always artificial social pressure (the sanction of the group), and not any innate and incurable perversion in man's understanding, that prevents him from seeking, finding and espousing the truth. But that weakness of the will called cowardice also plays an important role.

FUNDAMENTAL DIFFERENCES Again and again it became apparent that our difficulties stemmed for the most part from radical differences in intent with regard to fundamental concepts. We referred above to the equivocal character of such terms as "democracy," "progress," "peace." One can make a list of the fundamental concepts, arising from the objective confusion of the historical moment, which were at the base of our perplexity and torment. Such a list would include, in addition to the three mentioned above, the concepts of "science," "arbitrary," "Fascist" and "Nazi." But it is primarily because "government" is understood and practiced in entirely different senses throughout the world that our confusion was worse confounded.

The ultimate contrast is between "government" as the expression of the free will of the people, and "government" as possessing an independent wisdom and infallibility of its own which would enable it to dictate its will upon the people. This contrast reveals contradictory interpretations of the nature of man, and since our attempt was precisely to determine this nature, no wonder we did not agree. If real horses could meet and argue, presumably, since each is really a horse, they would strike some agreement. But when "governments" meet (through their representatives), and when, although the same term is used ("governments"), the realities indicated by the term are so radically different, how is real, effective agreement ever possible? The alternative is not despair, but patience and faith —both infinite—and a lively sense of humor.

PREAMBLE The Commission decided that there be no difference in the preambles of the two covenants. Much of the adopted language was taken from the preamble of the Declaration. The phrase "recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights" stresses the notion that these rights belong to the nature of man. Again, the recital "recognizing that these rights derive from the inherent dignity of the human person" refutes any notion that an external power, such as a benevolent government or even the United Nations, "granted" man these rights. It is difficult to think of a stronger or more adequate language with which to express the law of nature. But the question remains: do all these rights have the same ultimacy so far as the natural law is concerned?

VI

COMMUNICATIONS Every year the United Nations receives thousands of communications concerning human rights. The procedure of treating these communications is regulated by strict decisions taken by the Economic and Social Council. An attempt was made this year, on the initiative of India, to recommend to the Economic and Social Council to change somewhat these regulations so as to enable the Commission to make reports and recommendations to the Economic and Social Council concerning serious cases of violation of human rights brought to the notice of the Commission by these communications. Some argued that it was a pity nothing whatsoever was done to these communications so far, and that it would conduce to the promotion of human rights if the Commission were allowed to make a significant report to the Economic and Social Council on them. Others, however, stressed the complexity and delicacy of the issue, denying at the same time any competence to the Commission, under the Charter and the Economic and Social Council, to consider complaints or form any judgment on them. The Indian effort was beaten by 9 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions.

The Commission permitted the publication this year of a preliminary analysis by the United Nations Secretariat of the communications received during the thirteen months from April 3, 1951, to May 7, 1952. Of course neither the Secretariat nor the Commission expressed any opinion regarding either the accuracy of the facts alleged by the communications or the constructions placed upon them by their authors. But it is interesting to note that, according to the analysis of the Secretariat, a total of 25,279 communications were received during this period; 36 of which discussed general theoretical principles; 24,194 alleged persecution on political grounds; 305 alleged genocide; 119 alleged violation of the right to freedom of assembly and association; 64 alleged discrimination against and persecution of minorities; 83 dealt with trade union rights; and some 480 alleged contraventions of a variety of rights and freedoms. Certainly the world seems to expect a great deal of the United Nations in the field of human rights.

So long as the Charter exists, which pledges Member states to promote human rights, these concrete communications cannot be altogether disregarded. Sooner or later the Commission or somebody else will have to do something about them. To suppose that all of them are unfounded is of course nonsense. To suppose also that to bring some of them, after the most careful and responsible sifting, to the attention of the Economic and Social Council is to contravene the domestic jurisdiction clause of Article 2 of the Charter, is to forget that, under the Charter itself, human rights problems are no longer exclusively or even essentially matters for domestic jurisdiction. There is no evading the fact that in the modern world, where everybody knows pretty well what goes on in everybody else's domain, we are all on the spot. The more man awakens, the more he will clamor for his natural rights and fundamental freedoms; and the future does not belong to those who hide their heads in the sand, but to those who, facing the truth in all humility, accept the joyous suffering of transforming the given into the image of the just and true.

VII

SHIFTING EMPHASIS A quiet revolution has occurred in the Commission on Human Rights since its establishment. In the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 attention was fastened for the most part on what we now call civil and political rights. The archetype of what we were trying to ensure was freedom from discrimination and from arbitrary arrest, and freedom of religion and speech. It never occurred to us that anything else was as important as these.

Today the emphasis has shifted. Economic, social and cultural rights have come to their own, and indeed with a vengeance. The paradigm today is "the adequate standard of living." There were three logical steps to this transition. The first is to say, the civil, political and personal is primary, but the economic, social and cultural also has its place. The second is to move insensibly from this position to the view that both types of rights are equally important. And the third obviously is to say, what is the use of the civil, political and personal if the economic and social is not first guaranteed? Ergo, the social and economic is primary and more important. It is a fit topic for research to trace this development not only with respect to the Commission as a whole, but also with respect to individual members of the Commission who have participated in this enterprise since its beginning.

We may characterize the revolution as the overwhelming of the end by the means, the personal and intellectual by the social, the wholeness of life by its components, the integral unity (the soul) of the individual by endless factors, conditions, impulses, the perfect and actual by the imperfect and potential, the dignity of freedom by the turbulence of desire. This is the materialistic revolution of the times.

Three not altogether unrelated causes have brought about this revolution. First, the increasing impact of Marx and the amazing persistence of the Soviet representatives in harping upon their views. Second, the rise of the economically and socially less developed, where the accent is far more on the material and social than on the personal and inner. And third, the apparent unimaginative helplessness of the Western world in the face of these two impacts.

What goes on in the Commission is but a reflection of what goes on in the wide world. There is a general disturbance of right order. It will not be by chance, or by halfheartedness, or by surrendering before the material, or by overlooking its just claims, that order is going to be righted, but by the rejuvenation of the original intellectual and spiritual grounds of life. The task is much harder than some people think, but salvation is coming, and when it comes it will not be from the Commission or the United Nations, but from the living institutions of the mind and spirit vigorously reaffirming their faith in truth, justice and order. There are, then, independent grounds of hope that the materialistic revolution will be arrested and reversed, certainly not without much suffering.

DRAFT COVENANTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

PREAMBLE

The States Parties hereto,

Considering, that, in accordance with the principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations, recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Recognizing that these rights and freedoms derive from the inherent dignity of the human person,

Recognizing that, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the ideal of free men enjoying freedom from fear and want can only be achieved if conditions are created whereby everyone may enjoy his economic, social and cultural rights, as well as his civil and political rights,

Considering the obligation of States under the Charter of the United Nations to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and freedoms,

Realizing, that the individual, having duties to other individuals and to the community to which he belongs, is under responsibility to strive for the promotion and observance of the rights recognized in this Covenant,

Agree upon the following articles:

ARTICLE ON SELF-DETERMINATION

1. All peoples and all nations shall have the right of self-determination, namely, the right freely to determine their political, economic, social and cultural status.

2. All States, including those having responsibility for the administration of non-self-governing and trust territories and those controlling in whatsoever manner the exercise of that right by another people, shall promote the realization of that right in all their territories, and shall respect the maintenance of that right in other States, in conformity with the provisions of the United Nations Charter.

3. The right of the peoples to self-determination shall also include permanent sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence on the grounds of any rights that may be claimed by other States.

ARTICLE 1

1. Each State Party hereto undertakes to take steps, individually and through international cooperation, to the maximum of its available resources, with a view to achieving progressively the full realization of the rights recognized in this Covenant by legislative as well as by other means.

2. The States Parties hereto undertake to guarantee that the rights enunciated in this Covenant will be exercised without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

ARTICLE 2

The States Parties to the Covenant undertake to ensure the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all economic, social and cultural rights set forth in this Covenant.

ARTICLE 3

The States Parties to this Covenant recognize that in the enjoyment of those rights provided by the State in conformity with this Covenant, the State may subject such rights only to such limitations as are determined by law only in so far as this may be compatible with the nature of these rights and solely for the purpose of promoting the general welfare in a democratic society.

ARTICLE 4

1. Nothing in this Covenant may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person, any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights or freedoms recognized herein or at their limitation, to a greater extent than is provided for in this Covenant.

2. No restriction upon or derogation from any of the fundamental human rights recognized or existing in any country in virtue of law, conventions, regulations or custom shall be admitted on the pretext that the present Covenant does not recognize such rights or that it recognizes them to a lesser extent.

ARTICLE 5

1. Work being at the basis of all human endeavor, the States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right to work, that is to say, the fundamental right of everyone to the opportunity, if he so desires, to gain his living by work which he freely accepts.

2. The steps to be taken by a State Party to this Covenant to achieve the full realization of this right shall include programs, policies and techniques to achieve steady economic development and full and productive employment under conditions safeguarding fundamental political and economic freedoms to the individual.

ARTICLE 6

The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone to just and favorable conditions of work, including:

(a) Safe and healthy working conditions;
(b) Remuneration which provides all workers as a minimum with:
  (i) Fair wages and equal remuneration for work of equal value without distinction of any kind, in particular, women being guaranteed conditions of work not inferior to those enjoyed by men, with equal pay for equal work; and
  (ii) A decent living for themselves and their families; and
(c) Rest, leisure and reasonable limitation of working hours and periodic holidays with pay.

ARTICLE 7

The States Parties to the Covenant undertake to ensure the free exercise of the right of everyone to form and join local, national and international trade unions of his choice for the protection of his economic and social interests.

ARTICLE 8

The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone to social security.

ARTICLE 9

The States Parties to the Covenant recognize that:

1. Special protection should be accorded to motherhood and particularly to maternity during reasonable periods before and after childbirth; and

2. Special measures of protection, to be applied in all appropriate cases within and with the help of the family, should be taken on behalf of children and young persons, and in particular they should not be required to do work likely to hamper their normal development. To protect children from exploitation, the unlawful use of child labor and the employment of young persons in work harmful to health or dangerous to life should be made legally actionable; and

3. The family, which is the basis of society, is entitled to the widest possible protection. It is based on marriage, which must be entered into with the free consent of the intending spouses.

ARTICLE 10

The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone to adequate food, clothing and housing.

ARTICLE 11

The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone to an adequate standard of living and the continuous improvement of living conditions.

ARTICLE 12

The States Parties to the Covenant, realizing that health is a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being, and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity, recognize the right of everyone to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health.

The steps to be taken by the States Parties to the Covenant to achieve the full realization of this right shall include those necessary for:

(a) The reduction of infant mortality and the provision for healthy development of the child;
(b) The improvement of nutrition, housing, sanitation, recreation, economic and working conditions and other aspects of environmental hygiene;
(c) The prevention, treatment and control of epidemic, endemic and other diseases;
(d) The creation of conditions which would assure to all medical service and medical attention in the event of sickness.

ARTICLE 13

1. The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone to education, and recognize that education shall encourage the full development of the human personality, the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and the suppression of all incitement to racial and other hatred. It shall promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations, racial, ethnic or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace and enable all persons to participate effectively in a free society;

2. It is understood:

(a) That primary education shall be compulsory and available free to all;
(b) That secondary education, in its different forms, including technical and professional secondary education, shall be generally available and shall be made progressively free;
(c) That higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit and shall be made progressively free;
(d) That fundamental education for those persons who have not received or completed the whole period of their primary education shall be encouraged as far as possible.

3. In the exercise of any functions which they assume in the field of education, the States Parties to the Covenant undertake to have respect for the liberty of parents and, when applicable, legal guardians to choose for their children schools other than those established by the public authorities which conform to such minimum educational standards as may be laid down or approved by the State and to ensure the religious education of their children in conformity with their own convictions.

ARTICLE 14

Each State Party to the Covenant which, at the time of becoming a party to this Covenant, has not been able to secure in its metropolitan territory or other territories under its jurisdiction compulsory primary education, free of charge, undertakes, within two years, to work out and adopt a detailed plan of action for the progressive implementation, within a reasonable number of years, to be fixed in the plan, of the principle of compulsory primary education free of charge for all.

ARTICLE 15

1. The States Parties to the Covenant recognize the right of everyone:

(a) To take part in cultural life;

(b) To enjoy the benefits of scientific progress and its applications.

2. The steps to be taken by the States Parties to this Covenant to achieve the full realization of this right shall include those necessary for the conservation, the development and the diffusion of science and culture.

3. The States Parties to the Covenant undertake to respect the freedom indispensable for scientific research and creative activity.

CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS

PREAMBLE

The States Parties hereto,

Considering, that, in accordance with the principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations, recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Recognizing that these rights and freedoms derive from the inherent dignity of the human person,

Recognizing that, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the ideal of free men enjoying civil and political freedoms and freedom from fear and want can only be achieved if conditions are created whereby everyone may enjoy his civil and political rights as well as his economic, social and cultural rights,

Considering the obligation of States under the Charter of the United Nations to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and freedoms,

Realizing that the individual, having duties to other individuals and to the community to which he belongs, is under responsibility to strive for the promotion and observance of the rights recognized in this Covenant,

Agree upon the following articles:

ARTICLE ON SELF-DETERMINATION

1. All peoples and all nations shall have the right of self-determination, namely, the right freely to determine their political, economic, social and cultural status.

2. All States, including those having responsibility for the administration of non-self-governing and trust territories and those controlling in whatsoever manner the exercise of that right by another people, shall promote the realization of that right in all their territories, and shall respect the maintenance of that right in other States, in conformity with the provisions of the United Nations Charter.

3. The right of the peoples to self-determination shall also include permanent sovereignty over their natural wealth and resources. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence on the grounds of any rights that may be claimed by other States.

ARTICLE 1

1. Each State Party hereto undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in this Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

2. Where not already provided for by existing legislative or other measures, each State undertakes to take the necessary steps, in accordance with its constitutional processes and with the provisions of this Covenant, to adopt such legislative or other measures as may be necessary to give effect to the rights recognized in this Covenant.

3. Each State Party hereto undertakes:

(a) To insure that any person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are violated shall have an effective remedy, notwithstanding that the violation has been committeed by persons acting in an official capacity;

(b) To develop the possibilities of judicial remedy and to ensure that any person claiming such a remedy shall have his right thereto determined by competent authorities, political, administrative or judicial;

(c) To ensure that the competent authorities shall enforce such remedies when granted.

ARTICLE 2

1. In time of public emergency which threatens the life of the nation, and the existence of which is officially proclaimed, the States Parties hereto may take measures derogating from their obligations under this Covenant to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with their other obligations under international law and do not involve discrimination solely on the ground of race, color, sex, language, religion or social origin.

2. No derogation from Articles 3, 4, 5, 7, (paragraphs 1 and 2), 11, 12 and 13 may be made under this provision.

3. Any State Party hereto availing itself of the right of derogation shall inform immediately the other States Parties to the Covenant, through the intermediary of the Secretary-General, of the provisions from which it has derogated, the reasons by which it was actuated and the date on which it has terminated such derogation.

ARTICLE 3

1. Nothing in this Covenant may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person the right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms recognized herein or of their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in this Covenant.

2. There shall be no restriction upon or derogation from any of the fundamental human rights recognized or existing in any contracting state pursuant to law, conventions, regulations or custom on the pretext that the present Covenant does not recognize such rights or that it recognizes them to a lesser extent.

ARTICLE 4

1. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of life. Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law.

2. In countries where capital punishment exists, sentence of death may be imposed only as a penalty for the most serious crimes pursuant to the sentence of a competent court and in accordance with law not contrary to the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights or the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

3. Any one sentenced to death shall have the right to seek pardon or commutation of the sentence. Amnesty, pardon or commutation of the sentence of death may be granted in all cases.

4. Sentence of death shall not be carried out on a pregnant woman.

ARTICLE 5

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In particular, no one shall be subjected without his free consent to medical or scientific experimentation involving risk, where such is not required by his state of physical or mental health.

ARTICLE 6

1. No one shall be held in slavery; slavery and the slave trade in all their forms shall be prohibited.

2. No one shall be held in servitude.

3. (a) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labor.

(b) The preceding sub-paragraph shall not be held to preclude, in countries where imprisonment with hard labor may be imposed as a punishment for a crime, the performance of hard labor in pursuance of a sentence to such punishment by a competent court.

(c) Forced or compulsory labor within the meaning of this paragraph shall not include:

(i) Any work or service not covered in Paragraph (b) and normally required of a person under detention in consequence of a lawful order of a court;

(ii) Any service of a military character and, in countries where conscientious objection is recognized, any national service required by law of conscientious objectors;

(iii) Any service exacted in cases of emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community;

(iv) Any work or service which forms part of normal civic obligations.

ARTICLE 7

1. Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law.

2. Anyone who is arrested shall be informed, at the time of arrest, of the reasons for his arrest and shall be promptly informed of any charges against him.

3. Anyone arrested or detained on a criminal charge shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorized by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release. It shall not be the general rule that persons awaiting trial shall be detained in custody, but release may be subject to guarantees to appear for trial, at any other stage of the judicial proceedings, and, should occasion arise, for execution of the judgment.

4. Anyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings before a court, in order that such court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his detention and order his release if the detention is not lawful.

5. Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty shall have an enforceable right to compensation.

ARTICLE 8

No one shall be imprisoned merely on the ground of inability to fulfil a contractual obligation.

ARTICLE 9

1. Subject to any general law of the State concerned which provides for such reasonable restrictions as may be necessary to protect national security, public safety, health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others, consistent with the other rights recognized in this Covenant:

(a) Everyone legally within the teritory of a State shall, within that teritory, have the right to (i) liberty of movement and (ii) freedom to choose his residence;

(b) Everyone shall be free to leave any country including his own.

2. (a) No one shall be subjected to arbitrary exile;

(b) Subject to the preceding sub-paragraph, anyone shall be free to enter his own country.

ARTICLE 10

An alien lawfully in the territory of a State party hereto may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by and be represented for the purpose before the competent authority or a person or persons specially designated by the competent authority.

ARTICLE 11

1. All persons shall be equal before the courts or tribunals. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law. The press and public may be excluded from all or part of a trial for reasons of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, or when the interest of the private lives of the parties so requires, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the Court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interest of justice; but any judgment rendered in a criminal case or in a suit at law shall be pronounced publicly except where the interest of juveniles otherwise requires or the procedings concern matrimonial disputes or the guardianship of children.

2. Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall have the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, everyone shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

(a) To be informed promptly in a language which he understands and in detail of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;

(b) To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence;

(c) To defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing; to be informed, if he does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him in such case where he does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(d) To examine, or have examined the witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;

(e) To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court;

(f) Not to be compelled to testify against himself, or to confess guilt.

3. In the case of juveniles, the procedure shall be such as will take account of their age and the desirability of promoting their rehabilitation.

4. In any case where by a final decision a person has been convicted of a criminal offence and where subsequently his conviction has been reversed or he has been pardoned on the ground that a new or newly discovered fact shows conclusively that there has been a miscarriage of justice, the person who has suffered punishment as a result of such conviction shall be compensated unless it is proved that the non-disclosure of the unknown fact in time is wholly or partly attributable to him.

ARTICLE 12

1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time when the criminal offence was committed. If, subsequent to the commission of the offence, provision is made by law for the imposition of a lighter penalty, the offender shall benefit thereby.

2. Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission, which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations.

ARTICLE 13

Everyone shall have the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

ARTICLE 14

1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right shall include freedom to maintain or to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching.

2. No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to maintain or to change his religion or belief.

3. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.

ARTICLE 15

1. Everyone shall have the right to hold opnions without interference.

2. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, etiher orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice.

3. The exercise of the rights provided for in the foregoing paragraph carries with it special duties and responsibilities. It may therefore be subject to certain restrictions, but these shall be such only as are provided by law and are necessary, (1) for respect or the rights or reputations of others, (2) for the protection of national security or of public order, or of public health or morals.

ARTICLE 16

The right of peaceful assembly shall be recognized. No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those imposed in conformity with the law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order, the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedom of others.

ARTICLE 17

1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

2. No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those prescribed by law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order, the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. This article shall not prevent the imposition of lawful restrictions on the exercise of this right by members of the armed forces or of the police.

3. Nothing in this article shall authorize States Parties to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948, to take legislative measures which would prejudice, or to apply the law in such a manner as to prejudice, the guarantee provided for in that convention.

MR. CHARLES MALIK of Lebanon stops to greet Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt (U.S.A.) before a meeting of the Commission of Human Rights is called to order. In the background are Mr. D. Bracco (Uruguay) and Mr. B. Jevremovich (Yugoslavia).

ARTICLE 18

All persons are equal before the law. The law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

UNESCO'S STUDY TOUR FOR WORKERS

During July and August, over 800 European workers enjoyed travel abroad as members of UNESCO's travelling study groups for workers. Over forty groups, from Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Great Britain, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, and Yugoslavia, spent their summer vacations abroad. The workers were selected from trade unions, co-operatives and workers' educational organizations.

In initiating the scheme, UNESCO sought and found ready co-operation from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Co-operative Alliance, the International Federation of Agricultural Producers, the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions, and the International Federation of Workers' Educational Association.

UNESCO stipulated that groups should be made up exclusively of rank-and-file workers who would not normally have an opportunity of travel abroad. Programs were left to the individual organizations, on the understanding that each one should be genuinely educational, with adequate opportunities for meeting the people of the host country.

The International Labor Office in Geneva, Switzerland, was the host for ten days to a group of 25 members of the British Workers' Educational Association.

A group of British workers took part in an Anglo-Scandinavian Co-operative Summer School.

Oxford welcomed 36 Scandinavians from the Workers' Educational Associations of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, who joined British colleagues in a two-week summer school and study tour organized by the Workers' Educational Association.

Twenty-five Dutch workers visited Austria for two weeks to study social and economic conditions in that country.

Forty Belgian, British, French and Swiss worker-students (all members of the Workers' Educational Associations) took part in an international summer school at Rambouillet, France.

This plan was financed with $40,000 voted by UNESCO's General Conference in 1951.

TOWARDS A NEW AGE IN ERITREA

A young Kunama man. These people live in the extreme south-west areas of Eritrea.

TWO thousands years ago Eritrea was part of the Ethiopian kingdom, whose capital was then Axum, fifty miles south of the Eritrean border. From this city close contact was maintained with the Arab countries, Egypt, and Greece. Along the old caravan routes to the ancient Greek port of Adulis, just south of Massawa, came gold, frankincense, gum arabic, and even lions and fighting elephants. With the decline of the Byzantine Empire, however, foreign links disappeared, and Eritrea, along with the rest of Ethiopia, became isolated until Vasco da Gama's voyages of the fifteenth century.

The capital of Ethiopia was then no longer at Axum but in the interior, and Eritrea formed part of Ethiopia's most northerly province, the Tigrai. The period that followed was one of constant warring, with internal disturbances caused by local war lords and attacks by Somalis, Egyptians, Turks, Sudanese, and Italians. In 1868 the British Government sent a military expedition under Lord Napier to free the British consul at Massawa, who had been imprisoned by the then ruler of Ethiopia. The British withdrew after releasing the prisoners. The Comaile valley, however, along which Napier marched, is still known as the English road.

The Eritrea of today was created, firstly, by the boundaries established under the Italo-Ethiopian Treaty of 1900 and expanded in 1936, after the Italian conquest of Ethiopia, when Eritrea became part of Italian East Africa, and the districts of Tigre, Danakil-land, and Haussa, which had been part of Ethiopia, were added to it.

In 1941, Major-General Platt, acting as commander under General Wavell, defeated the Italian forces in Ethiopia and Eritrea. Eritrea was then taken over by the Allies and placed under British military administration, pending its final disposition.

After big power failure to reach agreement, the question of Eritrea's future was referred to the United Nations in 1948 and considered by the General Assembly in 1949. A commission of investigation was then sent to the territory to ascertain more fully the wishes of the Eritreans and the best means of promoting them. After considering the commission's report and many conflicting proposals, the General Assembly, in December 1950, resolved that Eritrea should be federated with Ethiopia as an autonomous unit under the Ethiopian Crown.

The accompanying pictures show something of the life and activities of Eritrea's inhabitants, who through the successful mission of the United Nations Commissioner, Dr. Eduardo Anze Matienzo, will this month achieve autonomy in federation with Ethiopia.

Water carrying — the girls' task. Note the paraffin can — an improvised utensil used throughout the whole of Africa.

LARGE HERDS OF CATTLE roam the country in continuous search of grazing. Often the rivers dry up and water holes then have to be dug. The seasonal droughts vitally affect both the settled farmers and the nomadic graziers.

HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

10 DECEMBER 1953

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY
OF THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Published by United Nations and UNESCO

WHAT IS HUMAN RIGHTS DAY?

ON December 10, 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations meeting that year in Paris, adopted and proclaimed the historic Universal Declaration of Human Rights "as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction." To celebrate it, the General Assembly in 1950 asked that in future years 10 December be set aside as Human Rights Day by governments and interested organizations, and that reports on these celebrations be made to the Secretary-General by governments.

SUGGESTIONS FOR CELEBRATION

How Governments, Public Authorities and UNESCO National Commissions could Celebrate the Anniversary.

Proclaim 10 December Human Rights Day.

Sponsor and enlist the aid of local authorities in organizing official ceremonies, concerts, receptions, public meetings, exhibitions.

Issue special postage stamps or use special postage cancellations.

Issue special instructions or suggestions and teaching materials to schools.

Issue new translations or editions of the Declaration.

Issue posters for display in public places.

Sponsor Human Rights exhibits in government buildings, libraries and museums.

Sponsor special observances at national shrines.

Illuminate national monuments on 10 December.

Sponsor special displays of United Nations flags.

Call upon non-governmental organizations to help plan and execute celebrations.

Sponsor study groups or Human Rights institutes.

Adopt Human Rights Day resolutions.

Sponsor broadcasts of international, national or local celebrations.

Sponsor film showings.

How Colleges and Universities could Celebrate the Anniversary.

Sponsor public lectures and symposia by members of the faculty on historical and other aspects of the Declaration.

Sponsor student assemblies or university-wide ceremonies.

Sponsor student debating, essay, fine arts, dramatic or musical contests on the theme of Human Rights.

Arrange Human Rights exhibits in college libraries.

Sponsor Human Rights broadcasts.

Sponsor student model meeting of Commission on Human Rights.

Publish Universal Declaration of Human Rights in college paper or periodical.

"There are many standards by which we can measure social progress. One is the degree to which human rights are respected — by governments, peoples, and individuals. Civilization is not a product of technical advance, unless this advance carries with it and inspires a development of the social conscience of mankind. The adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly of the United Nations proclaimed an international standard of rights and freedoms. On the anniversary of that proclamation it is fitting to take stock of what has been done to gain acceptance for its principles, not only in laws and treaties, but also in the behavior of peoples to each other. To promote the widest acceptance and practice of these principles is one of the continuing tasks of all men of good will. It is a task to which the United Nations is dedicated as part of its work."

DAG HAMMARSKJOLD, Secretary-General

How Schools could Celebrate the Anniversary.

Distribute text widely in the schools.

Arrange a pageant in which all schools in the community take part.

Prepare several weeks in advance for celebration in the school, through class activities such as history, art, music.

Display posters and other exhibit material prepared by pupils.

Hold a school assembly, including music, reading all or part of the Declaration, talk by a teacher, reading of statements by national leaders.

Study text of the Declaration in higher classes.

Each student selects one article and gives his own interpretation which is discussed by class.

In class, relate selected articles to history, literature, civics.

Study the connexion between rights and duties, with examples drawn from pupil's experience.

Show how the work of the United Nations and the specialized agencies helps to establish conditions under which Human Rights can be widely achieved.

Sponsor debating, essay or poster contests.

> "For the people of the United States as well as for people everywhere, the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights is a significant beacon in the steady march towards achieving human rights and fundamental freedoms for all."
>
> President* DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER

How Non-Governmental Organizations could Celebrate the Day.

Hold special local, state or national meetings.

Reprint the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in organization journals.

Co-operate with governments, UNESCO National Commissions, U.N. Information Centers in national celebrations.

Join with other organizations in planning local activities, such as concerts, Human Rights institutes, conferences or other special observances.

Prepare and release special press and radio material.

Organize public exhibitions, art competitions, essays or debating contests.

Conduct community action projects or surveys.

> "To the roll of the historic Declarations of the rights of man, the United Nations now adds the most comprehensive document of all, the first in history to define from a truly universal stand point the basic rights and fundamental freedoms to which all men everywhere are entitled."
>
> General* CARLOS P. ROMULO

How Press, Radio, Television and Cinema could Celebrate the Anniversary.

Press reproduces the text of the Declaration.

Press reports celebrations.

Press prints editorials on Human Rights, photo features, stories and cartoons.

Radio broadcasts U.N. Headquarters celebrations.

Radio broadcasts special U.N., UNESCO radio documentaries and features.

Radio and television broadcast special anniversary events.

Radio and television originate and broadcast feature programs.

Radio and television use Human Rights Day spot announcements.

Radio and television broadcast reading of the Declaration by eminent actors.

Cinemas show special Human Rights films.

MAKING THE DECLARATION KNOWN

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights existed in English and French originals only on 10 December 1948. It is now circulating in forty-six languages, including the vast majority of those spoken throughout the world:

Arabic	Gurmukhi	Pushtu
Assamese	Hebrew	Russian
Basque	Hindi	Samoan
Bengali	Icelandic	Serbo-Croat
Burmese	Indonesian	Sinhalese
Chinese	Iranian	Slovak
Czech	Irish	Slovene
Danish	Italian	Spanish
Dutch	Japanese	Swedish
English	Korean	Tagalog
Esperanto	Macedonian	Tamil
Finnish	Malayalam	Telegu
French	Maori	Thai
German	Norwegian	Turkish
Greek	Oriya	Welsh
	Portuguese

MATERIAL AVAILABLE

Available from United Nations sales agents:

UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Pamphlet texts in English, French, Chinese, Russian and Spanish. 12 pages. $.15, 1/- stg. Also available in forty-one other languages in vest-pocket editions from United Nations and UNESCO Headquarters.

Poster texts of the Declaration in English, French or Spanish. Three colors, 30" x 40". $.25*, 1/9d. stg.

THE IMPACT OF THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS (Revised Edition)

Pamphlet tracing the influence of the Declaration on international organizations governments, court decisions, treaties, organizations and individuals. 56 pages. $.25*, 1/9d. stg. English, French and Spanish in preparation.

OUR RIGHTS AS HUMAN BEINGS

A discussion guide for teachers, group leaders, clubs, etc. English, French and Spanish. 32 pages. $.15*, 1/- stg.

Available from United Nations Information Centers:

Most of the above, plus the following:

THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

A film strip in English, French, Spanish, Chinese, Russian, German, Portuguese, Turkish, Arabic. This film strip is also available from McGraw-Hill Co., 330 West 42nd Street, New York 18, N.Y. $3.00.

FOUR-PANEL POSTER SET (No. 31)

A set of four 30" x 40" two-color posters illustrating the text of the Declaration. In English, Arabic, Chinese, Danish, French, Dutch, Hebrew, Hindi, Norwegian, Persian, Portuguese, Russian, Spanish, Swedish, Urdu. These are also available from United Nations Headquarters. $1.00, 7/6d. stg.

*Or its equivalent in other currencies.

"Our Declaration is a most vigorous and necessary protest by humanity against the atrocities and oppressions which have made victims of so many millions of human beings over the centuries and particularly during and between the two World Wars."

Professor* RENE CASSIN

Available from UNESCO sales agents:

Special Human Rights Day Issue of UNESCO "COURIER". 16 pages, illustrated (November Issue) $.20, 1/- stg., 50 F. frs.

HUMAN RIGHTS EXHIBIT ALBUM

110 illustrated sheets and captions for mounting and display in schools, clubs, libraries, etc. An explanatory leaflet, giving details of various types of exhibition possibilities. A 35-page brochure, "A Short History of Human Rights". English, French and Spanish. Complete set: $3.00, 16/- stg., 800 F. frs.

PAMPHLETS

	$	Sterling	French francs
The Race Question	.05	3d	10
The Roots of Prejudice	.25	1/6	75
Race and Psychology	.25	1/6	75
Racial Myths	.25	1/6	75
Race and Biology	.25	1/6	75
Race and Culture	.25	1/6	75
Race and History	.25	1/6	75
Significance of Racial Differences	.25	1/6	75
Race and Society	.25	1/6	75
The Race Concept	.50	2/6	125
Teachers' Guide to Universal Declaration of Human Rights	1.00	5/-	250
What Is Race?	1.00	5/-	250
Race and Class in Rural Brazil	1.25	7/6	350
The Catholic Church and the Race Question	.40	2/-	100

(Similar pamphlets from Jewish, Protestant, Moslem and Hindu religions in preparation.)

Available from UNESCO National Commissions

Eleven film strips with the following titles:

Milestone	Freedom of Thought
Abolition of Slavery	The Right to Education
Emancipation of Women	Arts and Life
Fundamental Education	Technical Training
Patzcuaro	West Africa

What is Race?

Available free from UNESCO Headquarters Paris or New York Office

Leaflet and four color posters explaining UNESCO Gift Coupon Plan as means to implement the "Right to Education".

*Or its equivalent in other currencies.

THE FRONT COVER

(The cover design is an adaptation of the stamp to be issued on December 10, 1953 by the United Nations Postal Administration honoring the anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights by the General Assembly.)

THE IMPACT OF THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

The Universal Declaration is being used increasingly as a source of law.

It has had a marked influence on the new constitutions of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Eritrea, Haiti, Indonesia, Libya, and Syria and on the constitution of Jordan and of the United States Territory of Puerto Rico and the basic law of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Its influence has been reflected in legislation in Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, and in projected legislation in the United Kingdom.

It has been cited in various opinions and judgments of the International Court of Justice as well as in the courts of Austria, Belgium, Netherlands, Philippines, and the United States of America.

It has served as a model in drafting such international agreements as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights, the human rights provisions of the Somaliland Agreement, the Statute of the Netherlands-Indonesian Union, and it is explicitly mentioned in the preamble to the Japanese Peace Treaty.

Its definition of rights and freedoms is a vital part of the United Nations programme for peace.

It has become a principal theme in the work of UNESCO to raise the educational, scientific, and cultural standards of the world.

It has claimed the interest of people in almost all countries and territories in celebrating the anniversary of its adoption and proclamation.

"It might well become the International Magna Carta of all mankind."

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt,

THE UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF Human Rights

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and of he equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

WHEREAS disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

WHEREAS it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law,

WHEREAS it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations,

WHEREAS the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

WHEREAS Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

WHEREAS a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

NOW, THEREFORE, THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY PROCLAIMS this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1. All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2. Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty.

Article 3. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4. No one shall be held in slavery or servitude; slavery and the slave trade shall be prohibited in all their forms.

Article 5. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 6. Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 7. All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 8. Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 9. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 10. Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 11. (1) Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

(2) No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shal a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

Article 12. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation. Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Article 13. (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.

(2) Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

Article 14. (1) Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.

(2) This right may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 15. (1) Everyone has the right to a nationality.

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 16. (1) Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.

(2) Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses.

(3) The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.

Article 17. (1) Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 18. Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 19. Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 20. (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.

(2) No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

Article 21. (1) Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through freely chosen representatives.

(2) Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.

(3) The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections which shall be by universal and equal suffrage and shall be held by secret vote or by equivalent free voting procedures.

Article 22. Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to realization, through national effort and international co-operation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality.

Article 23. (1) Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.

(2) Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.

(3) Everyone who works has the right to just and favourable remuneration ensuring for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity, and supplemented, if necessary, by other means of social protection.

(4) Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 24. Everyone has the right to rest and leisure, including reasonable limitation of working hours and periodic holidays with pay.

Article 25. (1) Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

(2) Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance. All children, whether born in or out of wedlock, shall enjoy the same social protection.

Article 26. (1) Everyone has the right to education. Education shall be free, at least in the elementary and fundamental stages. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit.

(2) Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations, racial or religious groups, and shall further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace.

(3) Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.

Article 27. (1) Everyone has the right freely to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement and its benefits.

(2) Everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic production of which he is the author.

Article 28. Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 29. (1) Everyone has duties to the community in which alone the free and full development of his personality is possible.

(2) In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are determined by law solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and of meeting the just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a democratic society.

(3) These rights and freedoms may in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

Article 30. Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein.

Adopted by the United Nations General Assembly at its 183rd meeting, held in Paris on 10 December 1948

U. S. NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR UNESCO

(United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization)

A Film List

for

"HUMAN RIGHTS"

Discussion leaders and teachers intending to use films to assist discussion programs on HUMAN RIGHTS have available to them, through local film libraries and commercial distributors, a number of films directly related to the problem. In many instances the local film librarian, or the local film council, may be helpful in suggesting films suitable for group discussion, and supplying information about their terms of rental or purchase.

The following are a few examples of generally available films relating to HUMAN RIGHTS, and catalogues in which other such films are described:

OF HUMAN RIGHTS (1950) 16 mm. b&w sound 20 min.
Produced and directed by Helen van Dongen, in cooperation with the United Nations Film Division.

"...a story based on the Declaration of Human Rights, takes place in the office of a newspaper editor in a small town...an incident involving economic and racial prejudice among children...dramatizes the importance of the Declaration."

NOTE: There are two editions, coded "A" and "B". The "A" edition contains scenes from concentration camps; the "B" edition is considered more suitable for children, and also is cleared for television. Inquiries should specify which edition is desired.

(United Nations Distribution Office, 1600 Broadway, New York 19, N. Y.; available through regional distributors for United Nations Films.)

* * * * *

AMERICANS ALL (1945) 16 mm. b&w sound 18 min.

"...shows what has been done in various parts of the country to combat racial and religious discrimination...explains work of the Southern Regional Council and the Springfield, Massachusetts, schools."

(March of Time, Forum Edition, 369 Lexington Avenue, New York 17, N.Y.)

THE BILL OF RIGHTS (1939) 16 mm. color sound 20 min.

"...dramatic reenactment of some of the events influencing the colonists' demand for freedom of speech, religion, and person, and culminating in the adoption of the Bill of Rights."

(Teaching Film Custodians, Inc., 25 W. 43rd Street, New York 18, N.Y.)

BOUNDARY LINES (1947) 16 mm. color sound 10 min.

"...animated color film with an unusual modern art technique...shows imaginary lines which divide people...color, wealth, nationalism, fear..."

(International Film Foundation, 1600 Broadway, New York 19, N. Y.)

BROTHERHOOD OF MAN (1946) 16 mm. color sound 11 min.
Produced for the United Automobile Workers, CIO.

"Based on the pamphlet 'Races of Mankind'...animated cartoon in color demonstrating similarities of men...demonstrating the environmental origin of the three races of mankind...Caucasian, Negro, Mongolian... recommends that racial discrimination be abolished."

(Brandon Films, Inc., 1700 Broadway, New York 19, N. Y.)

THE CUMMINGTON STORY (1945) 16 mm. b&w sound 21 min.

"...a group of European refugees in a small New England town...their gradual absorption into the life of the community, and their acceptance as friends and neighbors."

(United World Films, Inc., Castle Films Division, 1445 Park Avenue, New York 29, N. Y.)

DOES IT MATTER WHAT YOU THINK? (1947) 16 mm. b&w sound 15 min.

"...emphasizes the importance of an individual's beliefs and his expressing them by voting and by group action...importance of the individual in creating public opinion in a democracy."

(British Information Services, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N. Y., or nearest branch, or British Consulate)

DUE PROCESS OF LAW DENIED (1950) 16 mm. b&w sound 29 min.

"...depicts the kind of unlawful trial sometimes held in the early days of the West...denial of the due process of law. Illustrates the necessity of recognizing the right of the individual as held by the Constitution."

(Teaching Film Custodians, Inc., 25 W. 43rd Street, New York 18, N.Y.)

ENGLISH CRIMINAL JUSTICE (1948) 16 mm. b&w sound 22 min.

"...stresses such principles as the right of trial by jury, presumption of innocence until proved guilty, impartiality of the judge, right of the accused to counsel, and hearings in an open court."

(British Information Services, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N. Y., or nearest branch, or British Consulate.)

MAKE WAY FOR YOUTH (1947) 16 mm. b&w sound 20 min.
Sponsored by Youth Division, National Social Welfare Assembly.

"...a community, stimulated into action by tragedy, constructs a youth program, and clashes between neighborhoods, races, and religions begin to break down."

(Association Films, Inc., 35 W. 45th Street, New York 19, N. Y.)

PICTURE IN YOUR MIND (1949) 16 mm. color sound 16 min.
Julian Bryan production endorsed by United Nations Film Board.

"...animated color film, dealing with inter-group and international relations...the origins of the earliest roots of prejudice...first prize for animated film at World Film Festival in Brussels, 1949."

(International Film Foundation, Inc., 1600 Broadway, New York 19, N.Y.)

A PLACE TO LIVE (1941) 16 mm. b&w sound 18 min.

"...more than a 'housing' film...presentation of the dilemma of a single family...and the human dignity of the members of that family... a reminder of the basic democratic concept of respect for the dignity and welfare of the individual."

(Brandon Films, Inc., 1700 Broadway, New York 19, N. Y.)

PREJUDICE (1949) 16 mm. b&w sound 58 min.
Produced by the Protestant Film Commission.

"...story of a production manager who believes he is tolerant...but through lack of security falls back on prejudice..."

(Religious Film Association, Inc., 45 Astor Place, New York 3, N. Y.)

NOTE: Names and addresses of distributors or those who can give distribution information are in parentheses; if the local film library cannot secure a desired film, the distributor should be able to advise where a print is available. SOUND FILMS CANNOT BE USED WITH A SILENT PROJECTOR.

SOME FILMSTRIPS AND RECORDINGS

The filmstrips, UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS (73 frames) and GENOCIDE - THE GREATER CRIME (62 frames) are obtainable from Film and Visual Information Division, United Nations, Lake Success, New York. UNESCO has prepared and will presently be distributing a series of six film strips relating to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights: MILESTONE, ABOLITION OF SLAVERY, EMANCIPATION OF WOMEN, FREEDOM OF THOUGHT, THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION, ARTS AND LIFE. The first is described as a general study of the historical development and concept of human rights; the other five deal with single articles of the Universal Declaration. Further information about the UNESCO filmstrips will soon be available from the U. S. National Commission for UNESCO.

"The New Frontier", a series of 13 recorded radio programs, dealing with the problems of Human Rights in the United States, has been produced by the Institute for Democratic Education, 2121 Fifth Avenue, New York 10, New York. Further information may be obtained from the Institute regarding the availability of the programs to radio stations, as well as to schools, clubs and groups.

CATALOGUES AND FILM LISTS

Other sources of information about films relating to HUMAN RIGHTS include the following:

102 MOTION PICTURES ON DEMOCRACY (1950) Federal Security Agency, Office of Education, Bulletin 1950, No. 1. For sale by the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C. (20¢) 51 pp.

> 16 mm. sound films selected and recommended by the Office of Education Advisory Committee. Includes films on Heritage, Meaning of Democracy, Democratic Processes, Films for Patriotic Occasions. Annotated and evaluated.

INTERNATIONAL UNDERSTANDING (1950) Published by Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and Committee on International Relations, National Education Association. Copies may be obtained from the Committee on International Relations, National Education Association, 1201 Sixteenth Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C. (25¢) 63 pp.

> Catalogue comprises an annotated list of 440 16 mm. films, with running time and detailed production data. Films deal with United Nations, its Member States, and related subjects.

SELECTED LIST OF HUMAN RELATIONS FILMS, Film Division of the American Jewish Committee, 386 Fourth Avenue, New York 16, N. Y. (15¢) 28 pp.

> "A catalogue of films which have a common goal - the improvement of relationships between people of varied origins as they live together." Annotated and briefly evaluated for age groups.

These three are examples of the many catalogues and film lists which describe films relating to human rights. For a descriptive bibliography of films covering many subjects and from many different sources, see "General Catalogues of Educational Motion Pictures and Filmstrips", prepared by Federal Security Agency, Office of Education, Washington 25, D. C.

The Office of Education has also published "A Directory of 897 16 mm. Film Libraries" (1949) 32 pp. which contains a state-by-state listing of local film libraries. It is for sale by the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C. (15¢)

* * * * *

U. S. NATIONAL COMMISSION FOR UNESCO
Department of State
Washington 25, D. C.

RADIO UNESCO RADIO

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

A Dramatization About
The Universal Declaration of Human Rights

Duration: 14 min.

VOICE (powerful, clear, simple) "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood."

NARRATOR (casual, confidential, but earnest) Old familiar words, aren't they? Noble thoughts of ancient wisdom - like a prophet's words. They roll off the tongue so easily -- Where did we first hear them? Who taught them to us? - Let us listen again--

VOICE "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights."

NARRATOR Who said it first? - Thomas Jefferson might have written that when he was drafting the American Declaration of Independence -- Or was it a Frenchman on the eve of his revolution?

VOICE "They are endowed with reason and conscience -- "

NARRATOR Oh, that must come from the ancient Hindu Scriptures -- Wait a minute! Wasn't it a Greek philosopher?

VOICE " -- and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood."

NARRATOR This we must have heard in church -- or read in the Bible. Yet, the Chinese scholar may argue that it was a Chinese prophet who said it long before. Others will claim that it

GPO O State—184

NARRATOR (Cont.) comes from the Koran -- Actually, this is Article One of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, passed and proclaimed by the General Assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948. Fifty-eight nations of the world are the authors. The people of the world are the authors. Say these words in any corner of the earth: everywhere, they will have a familiar ring -- everywhere, from the deep well of time, they will draw ancient echoes of native wisdom, spelling out an age-long dream. -- This great Declaration ....

CYNIC (interrupting, sneeringly) A scrap of paper!

NARRATOR What's that?

CYNIC A scrap of paper, I said. Just another scrap of paper.

NARRATOR Oh, it's you. The Cynic.

CYNIC Call me what you want. I am a man just like you. We're all free and equal, you say. -- Well, are we?

NARRATOR Of course we are. What's your point?

CYNIC You can declare human rights from now till doomsday -- man will not be any better off for all that. Look at the world today.

NARRATOR Look at the world yesterday. Don't you think we've marched quite a bit forward?

CYNIC Get this, mister: man never marches forward. Just turns around in circles -- trudging in the mud. Goodbye. I'm busy.

NARRATOR Busy at what?

CYNIC Turning around in circles. (Laughing cynically)

NARRATOR (topping his laugh with a good humored chuckle) -- Well, that's that. Let's look at another busy man. -- Pardon me, Professor - would you mind a minute's interruption?

ARCHAEOLOGIST I don't mind minutes, I mind centuries. My job is looking into the cave-man's kitchen, so to speak -- the stone age, ARCHAEOLOGIST (Cont.) you know - and all that sort of thing -- You see, I am an archaeologist.

NARRATOR Perhaps you have the answer. Tell me: do you believe that man never marches forward - that he is, as it were, just turning around in circles - trudging in the mud?

ARCHAEOLOGIST Now, these are pretty big words. As a scientist, I wouldn't like to jump to conclusions. I'd rather see the evidence first — Trudging in the mud, you say? Let me show you something. Take a look at this plaster cast. What do you make of it?

NARRATOR It's a footprint. A human footprint, isn't it?

ARCHAEOLOGIST Right. In mud.

NARRATOR Oh — Trudging around, huh?

ARCHAEOLOGIST Yes. A man. A cave-man. Some forty thousand years ago.

NARRATOR Forty thousand years ago! He sure had a long march ahead of him after he left this footprint.

ARCHAEOLOGIST Quite. Even then, he was born free and equal. But his freedom and equality were those of the beast. He was exposed to wild beasts with no means to fight them and together with the beasts he had to endure the hardships of nature. He had no net to fish with, no trap, no bow and arrow to hunt for his food - he hadn't yet invented the needle to sew his clothes - nor the flint to make fire -- He couldn't cook his food or heat his shelter or light his cave to keep out the night with its threats --

NARRATOR And all along the way, as he made each step, he had to put up with his fellow-man, the Cynic - who kept repeating:

CYNIC Get this, mister: man can't march forward. Just turns around in circles.

NARRATOR That's just what he did - turn around in circles - until he circled the world. He has left more than footprints wherever he went. He's left a heritage. — Listen to his offspring.

FARMER I am a farmer. My forefathers sowed the first field and made the plough to labour it. They reaped the first crop and settled down. They left me my land and my home for me to make it a happier one.

JUDGE I am a judge. When our ancestors settled the land and made up rules whereby to establish the boundaries of their fields, they founded law and justice for me to protect and improve them.

TEACHER I am a teacher. When man had built his home, he made up the alphabet to record History and Law. Thereafter, before his death, he could write down what he knew. He left me his wisdom for me to teach his children so they might teach their own.

NARRATOR That's the way it went. The teacher taught the farmer's son and the judge was the guardian of justice. As man learned more - he feared less. Instead of dreading nature, he observed it - and he founded science. He had two new tools now: justice and truth.

VOICE "All human beings are endowed with reason and conscience."

NARRATOR It seems obvious - but it didn't just happen by itself. Reason and conscience are dear commodities. Before they became our self-evident rights, millions had to suffer and die. Out of these millions we remember only a few --

VOICE There was the one who said: "It is most honorable and most easy, not to put a check upon others, but for a man to take heed to himself, how he may be most perfect."

NARRATOR — He was a teacher in ancient Greece and he preferred to die rather than to renounce the freedom of his wisdom. His name was Socrates.

VOICE — Another said: "Love thy neighbor as thyself --"

NARRATOR — He came from a humble village of Judea, called Nazareth - and he marked this planet with the cross on which he died.

JOHN HUSS — "Love one another and see to it that truth should always prevail."

NARRATOR — He was a Czech preacher by the name of John Huss, and was burned to death, for no one could convince him that it was wrong to worship God in his own way.

LINCOLN — "It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces."

NARRATOR — He was an American woodsman - Abraham Lincoln - who died of a madman's bullet for having freed the slaves.

GANDHI — "The very right to live accrues to us only when we do the duty of citizenship of the world."

NARRATOR — He was an Indian sage killed by another madman's bullet for his belief that human rights imply human duties. His name was Mahatma Gandhi. We remember these great names. Yet, there were other martyrs - more humble - who had made the supreme sacrifice for far less glory -- the nameless millions --

MONTAGE OF VOICES, MALE AND FEMALE, IN A STEADY FLOW

Male: — -- I was sixteen - a baker's apprentice - when I died storming the Bastille.

Male: — -- Two thousand years ago - in China - I taught a prince how to rule with justice. His father, the Emperor, condemned me to death.

Female: — I studied history in St. Petersburg. I spoke at a secret meeting for freedom of the press. The Czar sent me to Siberia. I was twenty-one and it was forty below zero.

Male: — I'm German. Coal miner. They shot me when we went on strike for the eight-hour day.

Female: — I am no heroine. I was handing out leaflets in the streets of London. For women's rights. A nasty evening and old shoes. Pneumonia.

Male: — I was serving a life sentence in Sydney, Australia. Then I volunteered in prison to try out a malaria serum. Didn't work.

Male: — Geologist. Mexican. Fell off a cliff while on survey.

Female: — Red Cross worker. Swiss. Killed while tending casualties.

Male: — Sailor. Norwegian. Froze to death on polar expedition.

Male: — Doctor. Brazilian. Caught cholera while fighting epidemic.

(SLOWLY FADE OUT UNDER:)

VOICE - BOOMING OUT, CLEAR AND RESOLUTE, OVER THE FADING ROLL CALL.

"Article Two: Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status."

NARRATOR Did you hear that? Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms — everyone. That means you - and you - and you - whoever and wherever you may be, fellow-citizens of the world. These rights are your passport - your identity badge. But you must wear this badge. -- Remember Gandhi?

GANDHI "The very right to live accrues to us only when we do the duty of citizenship of the world."

NARRATOR — That's it. We cannot have anything for nothing. Not even man's heritage.

Look -- The farmer inherited the plough. What happens if he doesn't use it? The plough gets rusty and the farmer goes hungry.

Rights and liberties get rusty too if we don't use them - and the free become slaves.

And the Declaration? You heard only Articles One and Two. There are others. Thirty in all - All written in blood.

CYNIC — Aah! A scrap of paper! Another scrap of paper!

NARRATOR — Watch your step, citizens of the world! Don't let the Cynic have the last word.

(with energetic emphasis)

Unless we use our rights, this Universal Declaration will be as much of a scrap of paper as the writ of Habeas Corpus would have been - if it weren't for generations of stubborn Englishmen who stood by their freedoms.

The French declared the Rights of Man two centuries ago. So did the Americans. — We would not even remember it if the men and women of these nations had failed to live their liberties. We wouldn't remember Confucius if all the peoples of Asia hadn't sprinkled bits of his wisdom over the humble deeds of their daily life.

What's left of ancient Egypt? The pyramids? They are merely tombs of their dead. But in these tombs the Books of the Dead were found. And the Books say: Only those deserve eternal life who can honestly say:

SECOND VOICE (Quoting from the Book) — "I never oppressed the poor —

I never forced my fellow-man to toil beyond his strength --

SECOND VOICE (Cont.)

I wronged no one --

I killed no one --

I betrayed no one --

I never tipped the scales --

I never kept milk from the mouths of children --"

NARRATOR

A pretty hard test - even today. But apparently, enough souls could pass it - since Egypt is immortal in our minds - since we understand a dream four thousand years old. And apparently, four thousand years haven't been wasted - since fifty-nine nations today can agree on a new common dream. Fifty-nine nations had agreed to build a home where our children shall live in freedom of speech and belief - in freedom from fear and want.

On December 10, 1948, the architects of world peace accepted the blueprint of universal freedom.

We can start building. You - and you - and you - all of us. Come on -- it will be our children's home.

THE END

This radio script was prepared by UNESCO - The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization - at its international headquarters, 19 Avenue Kleber, Paris, as part of an educational campaign to increase understanding of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is distributed in the United States by the U. S. National Commission for UNESCO, Department of State, Washington, D. C.